START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT
CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

July 1994

Camera Operator:
John Sullivan

MASTER
NEGATIVE NUMBER:
BSO-56-049

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library (August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks (Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO
	Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO
	Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO
	Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO
	Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO
	Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO
	Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO
	Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO
	Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO
	Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO
	Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO
	Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO
	Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO
	Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO
	Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO
	Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO
	Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO
	Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO
	BSO Advertisements
	Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO
	Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO
	Pops	1924
46	BSO
	BSO Advertisements
	Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO
	Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements
	Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO
	Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO
	Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO
	Pops
	U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO
	Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO
	Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959

VOL	TITLE	DATES
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copy-right law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: [✓ IA] IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 14X

FILM STOCK: Kodak
IMAGELINK™ HQ
MICROFILM
35mm x 30.5m · 100ft
Sp 425
DEVELOP BEFORE 05/1996
1461-0341-012-06
CAT 840 3594
04-08
Kodak

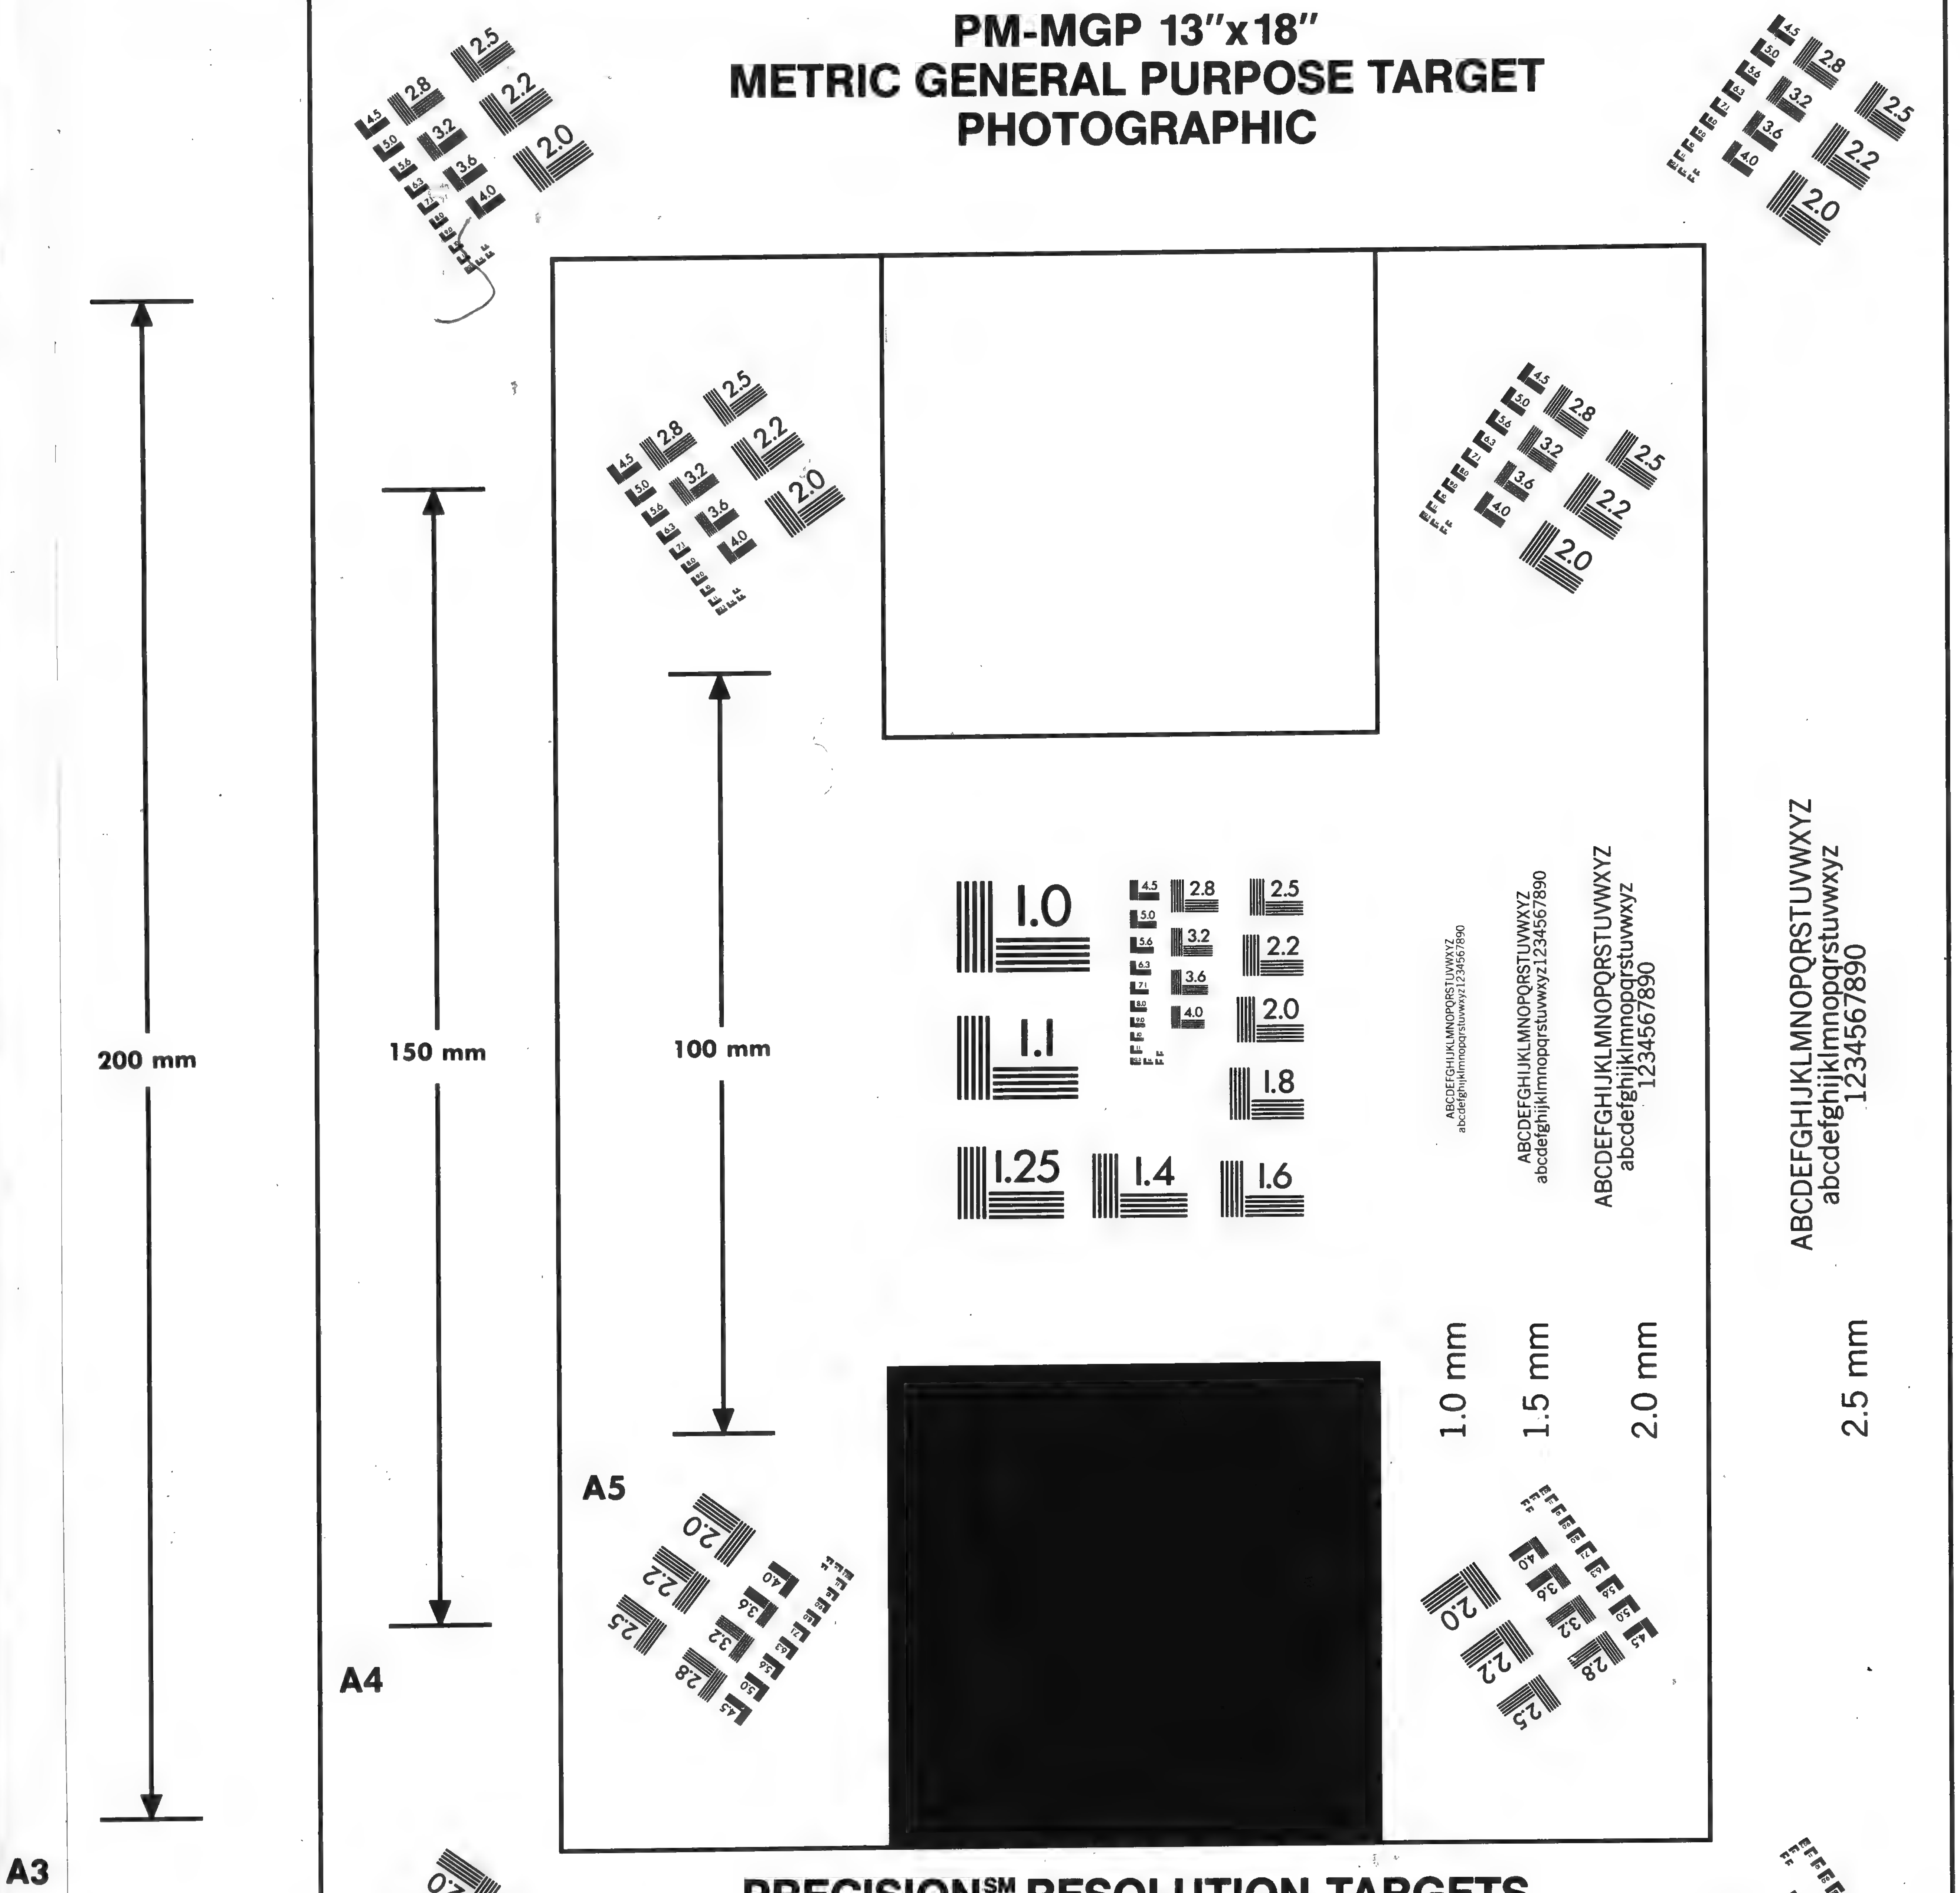
REEL 49

Volumes 85

BSO

1953-1955

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES
DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS
AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 85

BSO

1953 - 1955

1953-1954

AND

1954-1955

NATIONAL FLAT BACK SCRAP BOOKS

NATIONAL Made in U.S.A.

FULL DUCK COVER, MANILA PAPER

Without Index, Ruling, Paging or Title

NUMBER	THICKNESS	SIZE
1032	72 Leaves	12⅝ × 10¼
1033	72 Leaves	15 × 10
1034	100 Leaves	15 × 10
1036	90 Leaves	16 × 11⅜
1038	150 Leaves	16 × 11⅜
1039	90 Leaves	18 × 13
1041	150 Leaves	18 × 13
1042	150 Leaves	25 × 20

To duplicate this book Order Number indicated by arrow

This Clipping From VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

AUG 19 1953

Boston Symph Vets Retire

Boston, Aug. 18.

Raymond Allard, 1st bassoonist, and cellist Hyppolyte Droeghmans retired from the Boston Symphony orch at the conclusion of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, last week. Allard had been a member of the organization since 1922 and Droeghmans a member since 1927.

BSO members tossed a luncheon for the outgoing musicos with maestro Charles Munch presenting the pair with gold watches.

2

This Clipping From VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

AUG 19 1953

Michigan Music Group Skeds Anni Concerts

Ann Arbor, Mich., Aug. 18.

The University of Michigan's Musical Society has arranged 26 major concerts for the society's diamond jubilee. The Choral Union will provide 10 concerts in its 75th annual series, beginning with Roberta Peters, Met Opera soprano, on Oct. 7. She will be followed by the Boston Symph under Charles Munch, Oct. 22.

Others booked include the Virtuosi di Roma, Leonard de Paur's Infantry Chorus, the Chicago Symph directed by Fritz Reiner, the Toronto Symph, Paul Badura-Skoda, George London, Elena Nikolaidi, Greek soprano, and Dame Myra Hess, English pianist, who will close the series March 17.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD

3

AUG 2 - 1953

DISCussion:

RCA Victor's Fall Release Offers 17 Red Seal Albums

As the recording industry shifts into high gear in preparation for what is expected to be the biggest fall season in history, it becomes increasingly apparent that the coming months, in any case, will provide a choice of musical works and performances such as record buyers have not encountered in many a moon.

September Release

RCA Victor alone has 17 separate albums in its September Red Seal release, while Columbia announces 12 Masterworks issues for the same month.

The Victor list is particularly impressive, since it includes a number of items which are finally to be made available after having been long and eagerly awaited by collectors the world over.

The complete RCA Red Seal release follows:

Beethoven: Symphonies Nos. 2 and 4; Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra.

Beethoven: Symphonies Nos. 5 and 8; Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra.

Beethoven: Symphony No. 6 ("Pastoral"); Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra.

Beethoven: Symphony No. 7; Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra.

(The Beethoven Symphonies are from the previously issued Toscanini limited edition and are released to the general public for the first time.)

Berlioz: Romeo and Juliet, a Dramatic Symphony; Charles Munch conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. (Complete recording.)

Classical Music for People Who Hate Classical Music; Arthur Fiedler conducting the Boston Pops Orchestra.

Respighi: Pines of Rome, Fountains of Rome; Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra. (This makes the third coupling of these two works thus far available on long play. The Toscanini versions, however, have long been considered the definitive ones.)

Mascagni: Cavalleria Rusticana and Leoncavallo: I Pagliacci; Victoria de los Angeles, Zinka Milanov, Jussi Bjoerling, Robert Merrill, Leonard Warren, the Robert Shaw Chorale, and the RCA Victor Symphony Orchestra conducted by Renato Cellini. (Complete recordings.)

Verdi: Otello; Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra. (This is the complete recording of the famous Toscanini broadcast performance of one of Verdi's greatest operatic masterpieces. The cast includes Herva Nelli, the maestro's sensational soprano discovery, now a member of the Metropolitan Opera Association.)

Moussorgsky: Boris Godounoff (abridged version); Nicola Rossi-Lemeny, bass, with Leopold Stokowski and the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra and the San Francisco Opera Chorus, Kurt Adler, chorus master.

A special Red Seal series of four albums designed for children is being issued:

The Story of the Little Ballerina (excerpts from the Sleeping Beauty, Les Sylphides, Giselle); Leopold Stokowski and His Symphony Orchestra.

Prokofieff: Peter and the Wolf; Alec Guinness, narrator with the Boston Pops Orchestra conducted by Arthur Fiedler. (Also included on this 12-inch LP is Saint-Saens' Carnival of the Animals, likewise performed by the Boston Pops.

Tschaikovsky: Nutcracker Suite; Waldteufel: The Skater's Waltz; Rossini: William Tell Overture: Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra.

Bach: Unaccompanied Sonatas and Partitas (Complete); Jascha Heifetz.

Shakespeare: Macbeth: Alec Guinness, Pamela Brown and members of The Old Vic Company, London.

Beethoven: Concerto No. 3; Jose Iturbi at the piano and conducting the RCA Symphony Orchestra.

Columbia, celebrating the fifth fifth anniversary of LP, has on its schedule a number of noteworthy endeavors. The slate for September follows:

J. S. Bach: St. Matthew Passion (Complete); Wilhelm Mengelberg conducting the Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam with Karl Erb, Willem Ravelli, Jo Vincent, Ilona Durigo, Louis Van Tulder, Herman Shey, the Amsterdam Toonkunsterchoir, and the Boys' Choir Zanglust. (Complete recording of an actual concert performance given in 1939.)

Benet: John Brown's Body: Tyrone Power, Judith Anderson, Raymond Massey. (Recording of the dramatic work seen in Syracuse last winter.)

Moussorgsky-Ravel: Pictures at an Exhibition; Stravinsky: Firebird Suite; the Philadelphia Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy, conductor.

Clair de Lune; Andre Kostelanetz and His Orchestra. (Includes Debussy's Clair de Lune, Rossini's Barber of Seville Overture, Ravel's Pavane pour une Infante defunte, Richard Strauss' Waltzes from the Der Rosenkavalier, and three others.)

Beethoven: Symphony N. 3 (Eroiac): Sir Thomas Beecham conducting the Royal Philharmic Orchestra.

Mozart: Symphonies Nos 35 and 40, Bruno Walter conducting the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra of New York.

Mozart Arias: Eleanor Steber with Bruno Walter conducting the Columbia Symphony Orchestra.

Mozart Operatic and Concert Arias; George London with Bruno Walter Conducting the Columbia Symphony Orchestra.

Beethoven: Symphonies No. 8 and 9; Bruno Walter conducting the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra of New York (This release contains an entirely new recording of the Choral movement of the Ninth with Frances Yeend, Martha Lipton, David Lloyd, Mack Harrell, and the Westminster Choir.)

Scarlatti: Sonatas: Robert Casadesus. (Also included on this disc are four piano works by Rameau.)

Chopin: Sonata No. 3, Barcarolle in F-Sharp Major, Nocturne No. 8, Mazurka No. 32; Dinu Lupatti.

Castelnuova - Tedesco: Concerto for Guitar and Orchestra; Andres Segovia with the New London Symphony Orchestra conducted by Alec Sherman. (This disc also includes five guitar selections played by Segovia.)

All in all, it seems like a mighty promising fall. The recordings mentioned will be on dealers' shelves the last week of the this month.

B. D.

Cir. (D 22,412) (S 24,082)

This Clipping From
LYNN, MASS.
TELEGRAM-NEWS

AUG 23 1953

CONCERT SERIES DATES KNOWN

Civic Music Programs To Start November 10

The coming series of concerts of the Greater Lynn Civic Music Association will open Nov. 10 with Magaloff, internationally famous pianist. An attractive and diversified program is arranged, and dates are confirmed by Amos E. Russell, president of the organization.

All concerts will be given in the Memorial Auditorium of Lynn City Hall.

The National Operatic Sextette will appear in concert Sunday afternoon, December 6, followed by the Vienna String Symphony with Rose Schwaiger, Viennese coloratura soprano. Tuesday evening, February 23, will bring the handsome young American tenor, William Olvis, well known in concert, opera and radio. Concluding concert will be on Wednesday, April 7, featuring Nicola Moscona, baritone, of Metropolitan Opera, recent soloist at Tanglewood with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Cir. (D 8,364)

This Clipping From
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
TIMES

AUG 20 1953

Camille Girouard Joins Garden Musicale Cast

Three eminent artists will be heard at a garden party musicale to be given on Sunday afternoon, August 23, at 3 o'clock at "Shoal Water," the Eastern Point estate of Mrs. Roscoe Prior. The artists who will appear are Miss Vera Appleton and Michael Field, famous duo pianists, and Camille Girouard, well-known baritone who will sing during the intermission.

The musicale is being sponsored by Mrs. Augustus d'E. Bourneuf and Mrs. Prior, under the auspices of the Guild of Our Lady, to raise funds for Our Lady's Youth Center. An interesting program has been arranged and the beautiful setting of Mrs. Prior's formal gardens will lend an added enchantment to the musicale. In case of inclement weather, the musicale will be held in the High school auditorium.

The duo piano team of Appleton and Field already has achieved many brilliant successes and occupies an enviable position in the music world. Both young pianists are graduates of the famed Juilliard School of Music where they were students together under Carl Freedberg, a pupil of Clara Schumann.

Since teaming up as duo pianists in 1943, Miss Appleton and Mr. Field have played more than 500 concerts together in leading cities throughout the country, and have given annual recitals at Town and Carnegie Halls.

They have done much pioneering in research work in the history and traditions of original two-piano literature, which inspired them to make the first professional attempt on record to survey, in concert form the repertoire of original keyboard music for four hands from the earliest-known compositions for two virginals through the writings of outstanding contemporaries.

There has been a regrettable tendency in recent years to present ensemble piano playing as a type of stunt performance and to regard the ensemble of two or more pianos either as a means of dressing up for greater popular appeal music conceived originally for a solo instrument, or as a means for presentation of works intended for the orchestra.

Thus, one loses sight of the fact that the art of duopianism has a four centuries' tradition of its own with a substantial literature of its own written solely for that medium by the world's greatest composers. It is the ambition of these two young artists to acquaint the musical public with this hitherto much neglected keyboard literature.

Mr. Girouard, who will sing during the intermission, is well-known to local music lovers, having been heard here in 1948 when he gave a concert at the high school auditorium for benefit of the Youth Center. Mr. Girouard is a summer resident at Brier Neck. He was born in Pittsburgh and received his higher education in Montreal, Ca. He has sung extensively in concerts, oratorios and opera throughout Canada and the eastern part of the United States. He has appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony Pops Orchestra, the Handel and Haydn Oratorio Society, the Leo Litwin Concert Orchestra and recently gave a very successful concert at Jordan Hall. He will be accompanied by his wife, Alice Girouard, who teaches voice at the New England Conservatory of Music.

1

Cir. (D 5,219)

This Clipping From
FILM DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

AUG 28 1953

New Firm Plans Theater TV Concerts

Another theater television event lined up by a newly formed theater TV firm, may soon be added to the growing schedule of theater TV offerings.

Theater telecasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts are currently being offered to the leading circuits by Edmund L. Dorfmann, head of Stadium Television Network, the newest entry into the theater TV field.

Negotiations with circuit executives on booking the Boston Symphony concerts are still in the early stages, Dorfmann told THE FILM DAILY yesterday, but initial reaction to the idea, he said, has been "favorable."

Dorfmann, a former lawyer, has been active in the motion picture industry as an independent producer and as vice-president in charge of film production for United World Films, Inc. His most recent credit as an independent producer is "Guilty Bystander," starring Faye Emerson and Zachary Scott.

In addition to his efforts in lining up theaters for the symphony concerts, Dorfmann has concluded an agreement with operators of 10 of the leading baseball stadiums in the country that will enable him to show theater telecasts of sports events in these ball parks. Portable theater television equipment will be rented for these outdoor stadium telecasts from RCA, which will work closely with Dorfmann in this sphere of activity. RCA, it was indicated, has already engaged in a study of Ebbets Field as a site for future theater television showings.

Dorfmann is currently negotiating with Nate Halpern of TNT for the right to bring the Marciano-LaStarza fight telecast into Crosley Field in Cincinnati. The only motion picture theater in Cincinnati that is equipped to receive theater telecasts is the RKO Albee. Whether or not the Albee has booked the Marciano-LaStarza fight has not been disclosed.

Dorfmann feels that outdoor stadiums offer a perfect spot for summer telecasts of sports events because of their familiarity to sports enthusiasts and the fact that they are out of doors. Ticket sales for ball park theater telecasts would be promoted in advance by loudspeaker announcements to sports fans witnessing regularly scheduled games. He said that the Crosley Field showing, when and if it becomes a reality, would be closely studied in order to obtain information to be used in the future for other ball park theater telecasts.

Initial plans for a ball park telecast, he said, foresee the use of more than one theater TV screen so as to enable as large a seating area of the circular stadium as possible to be used for public seating.

1

This Clipping From VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
AUG 19 1953

Boston Symph Vets Retire

Boston, Aug. 18.

Raymond Allard, 1st bassoonist, and cellist Hyppolyte Droeghmans retired from the Boston Symphony orch at the conclusion of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, last week. Allard had been a member of the organization since 1922 and Droeghmans a member since 1927.

BSO members tossed a luncheon for the outgoing musicos with maestro Charles Munch presenting the pair with gold watches.

This Clipping From VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
AUG 19 1953

Michigan Music Group Skeds Anni Concerts

Ann Arbor, Mich., Aug. 18.

The University of Michigan's Musical Society has arranged [illegible] major concerts for the society's diamond jubilee. The Choral Union will provide 10 concerts in its 75th annual series, beginning with Roberta Peters, Met Opera soprano, on Oct. 7. She will be followed by the Boston Symph under Charles Munch, Oct. 22.

Others booked include the Virtuosi di Roma, Leonard de Paur's Infantry Chorus, the Chicago Symph directed by Fritz Reiner, the Toronto Symph, Paul Badura-Skoda, George London, Elena Nikolaidi, Greek soprano, and Dame Myra Hess, English pianist, who will close the series March 17.

Cir. (D 22,412) (S 24,082)
This Clipping From
LYNN, MASS.
TELEGRAM-NEWS
AUG 23 1953

CONCERT SERIES DATES KNOWN

Civic Music Programs To Start November 10

The coming series of concerts of the Greater Lynn Civic Music Association will open Nov. 10 with Magaloff, internationally famous pianist. An attractive and diversified program is arranged, and dates are confirmed by Amos E. Russell, president of the organization.

All concerts will be given in the Memorial Auditorium of Lynn City Hall.

The National Operatic Sextette will appear in concert Sunday afternoon, December 6, followed by the Vienna String Symphony with Rose Schwaiger, Viennese coloratura soprano. Tuesday evening, February 23, will bring the handsome young American tenor, William Olvis, well known in concert, opera and radio. Concluding concert will be on Wednesday, April 7, featuring Nicola Moscona, baritone, of Metropolitan Opera, recent soloist at Tanglewood with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Cir. (D 5,219)
This Clipping From
FILM DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
AUG 28 1953

New Firm Plans Theater TV Concerts

Another theater television eve lined up by a newly formed theat TV firm, may soon be added to the growing schedule of theater TV offerings.

Theater telecasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts are currently being offered to the leading circuits by Edmund L. Dorfmann, head of Stadium Television Network, the newest entry into the theater TV field.

Negotiations with circuit executives on booking the Boston Symphony concerts are still in the early stages, Dorfmann told THE FILM DAILY yesterday, but initial reaction to the idea, he said, has been "favorable."

Dorfmann, a former lawyer, has been active in the motion picture industry as an independent producer and as vice-president in charge of film production for United World Films, Inc. His most recent credit as an independent producer is "Guilty Bystander," starring Faye Emerson and Zachary Scott.

In addition to his efforts in lining up theaters for the symphony concerts, Dorfmann has concluded an agreement with operators of 10 of the leading baseball stadiums in the country that will enable him to show theater telecasts of sports events in these ball parks. Portable theater television equipment will be rented for these outdoor stadium telecasts from RCA, which will work closely with Dorfmann in this sphere of activity. RCA, it was indicated, has already engaged in a study of Ebbets Field as a site for future theater television showings.

Dorfmann is currently negotiating with Nate Halpern of TNT for the right to bring the Marciano-LaStarza fight telecast into Crosley Field in Cincinnati. The only motion picture theater in Cincinnati that is equipped to receive theater telecasts is the RKO Albee. Whether or not the Albee has booked the Marciano-LaStarza fight has not been disclosed.

Dorfmann feels that outdoor stadiums offer a perfect spot for summer telecasts of sports events because of their familiarity to sports enthusiasts and the fact that they are out of doors. Ticket sales for ball park theater telecasts would be promoted in advance by loudspeaker announcements to sports fans witnessing regularly scheduled games. He said that the Crosley Field showing, when and if it becomes a reality, would [illegible] closely studied in order to obtai[illegible]mation to be used in the fut[illegible] other ball park theater telecasts.

Initial plans for a ball park telecast, he said, foresee the use of more than one theater TV screen so as to enable as large a seating area of the circular stadium as possible to be used for public seating,

---

SYRACUSE, N. Y. 3
POST-STANDARD
AUG 2 - 1953

DISCussion:

RCA Victor's Fall Release Offers 17 Red Seal Albums

As the recording industry shifts into high gear in preparation for what is expected to be the biggest fall season in history, it becomes increasingly apparent that the coming months, in any case, will provide a choice of musical works and performances such as record buyers have not encountered in many a moon.

September Release

RCA Victor alone has 17 separate albums in its September Red Seal release, while Columbia announces 12 Masterworks issues for the same month.

The Victor list is particularly impressive, since it includes a number of items which are finally to be made available after having been long and eagerly awaited by collectors the world over.

The complete RCA Red Seal release follows:

Beethoven: Symphonies Nos. 2 and 4; Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra.

Beethoven: Symphonies Nos. 5 and 8; Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra.

Beethoven: Symphony No. 6 ("Pastoral"); Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra.

Beethoven: Symphony No. 7; Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra.

(The Beethoven Symphonies are from the previously issued Toscanini limited edition and are released to the general public for the first time.)

Berlioz: Romeo and Juliet, a Dramatic Symphony; Charles Munch conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. (Complete recording.)

Classical Music for People Who Hate Classical Music; Arthur Fiedler conducting the Boston Pops Orchestra.

Respighi: Pines of Rome, Fountains of Rome; Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra. (This makes the third coupling of these two works thus far available on long play. The Toscanini versions, however, have long been considered the definitive ones.)

Mascagni: Cavalleria Rusticana and Leoncavallo: I Pagliacci; Victoria de los Angeles, Zinka Milanov, Jussi Bjoerling, Robert Merrill, Leonard Warren, the Robert Shaw Chorale, and the RCA Victor Symphony Orchestra conducted by Renato Cellini. (Complete recordings.)

Verdi: Otello; Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra. (This is the complete recording of the famous Toscanini broadcast performance of one of Verdi's greatest operatic masterpieces. The cast includes Herva Nelli, the maestro's sensational soprano discovery, now a member of the Metropolitan Opera Association.)

Moussorgsky: Boris Godounoff (abridged version); Nicola Rossi-Lemeny, bass, with Leopold Stokowski and the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra and the San Francisco Opera Chorus, Kurt Adler, chorus master.

A special Red Seal series of four albums designed for children is being issued:

The Story of the Little Ballerina (excerpts from the Sleeping Beauty, Les Sylphides, Giselle); Leopold Stokowski and His Symphony Orchestra.

Prokofieff: Peter and the Wolf; Alec Guinness, narrator with the Boston Pops Orchestra conducted by Arthur Fiedler. (Also included on this 12-inch LP is Saint-Saens' Carnival of the Animals, likewise performed by the Boston Pops.

Tschaikovsky: Nutcracker Suite; Waldteufel: The Skater's Waltz; Rossini: William Tell Overture; Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra.

Bach: Unaccompanied Sonatas and Partitas (Complete); Jascha Heifetz.

Shakespeare: Macbeth; Alec Guinness, Pamela Brown and members of The Old Vic Company, London.

Beethoven: Concerto No. 3; Jose Iturbi at the piano and conducting the RCA Symphony Orchestra.

Columbia, celebrating the fifth fifth anniversary of LP, has on its schedule a number of noteworthy endeavors. The slate for September follows:

J. S. Bach: St. Matthew Passion (Complete); Wilhelm Mengelberg conducting the Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam with Karl Erb, Willem Ravelli, Jo Vincent, Ilona Durigo, Louis Van Tulder, Herman Shey, the Amsterdam Toonkunsterchoir, and the Boys' Choir Zanglust. (Complete recording of an actual concert performance given in 1939.)

Benet: John Brown's Body; Tyrone Power, Judith Anderson, Raymond Massey. (Recording of the dramatic work seen in Syracuse last winter.)

Moussorgsky-Ravel: Pictures at an Exhibition; Stravinsky: Firebird Suite; the Philadelphia Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy, conductor.

Clair de Lune; Andre Kostelanetz and His Orchestra. (Includes Debussy's Clair de Lune, Rossini's Barber of Seville Overture, Ravel's Pavane pour une Infante Defunte, Richard Strauss' Waltzes from the Der Rosenkavalier, and three others.)

Beethoven: Symphony N. 3 (Eroiac); Sir Thomas Beecham conducting the Royal Philharmic Orchestra.

Mozart: Symphonies Nos. 35 and 40, Bruno Walter conducting the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra of New York.

Mozart Arias; Eleanor Steber with Bruno Walter conducting the Columbia Symphony Orchestra.

Mozart Operatic and Concert Arias; George London with Bruno Walter Conducting the Columbia Symphony Orchestra.

Beethoven: Symphonies No. 8 and 9; Bruno Walter conducting the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra of New York (This release contains an entirely new recording of the Choral movement of the Ninth with Frances Yeend, Martha Lipton, David Lloyd, Mack Harrell, and the Westminster Choir.)

Scarlatti: Sonatas; Robert Casadesus. (Also included on this disc are four piano works by Rameau.)

Chopin: Sonata No. 3, Barcarolle in F-Sharp Major, Nocturne No. 8, Mazurka No. 32; Dinu Lupatti.

Castelnuova - Tedesco: Concerto for Guitar and Orchestra; Andres Segovia with the New London Symphony Orchestra conducted by Alec Sherman. (This disc also includes five guitar selections played by Segovia.)

All in all, it seems like a mighty promising fall. The recordings mentioned will be on dealers' shelves the last week of the this month.

B. D.

Cir. (D 6,364)
This Clipping From
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
TIMES
AUG 20 1953

Camille Girouard Joins Garden Musicale Cast

Three eminent artists will be heard at a garden party musicale to be given on Sunday afternoon, August 23, at 3 o'clock at "Shoal Water," the Eastern Point estate of Mrs. Roscoe Prior. The artists who will appear are Miss Vera Appleton and Michael Field, famous duo pianists, and Camille Girouard, well-known baritone who will sing during the intermission.

The musicale is being sponsored by Mrs. Augustus d'E. Bourneuf and Mrs. Prior, under the auspices of the Guild of Our Lady, to raise funds for Our Lady's Youth Center. An interesting program has been arranged and the beautiful setting of Mrs. Prior's formal gardens will lend an added enchantment to the musicale. In case of inclement weather, the musicale will be held in the High school auditorium.

The duo piano team of Appleton and Field already has achieved many brilliant successes and occupies an enviable position in the music world. Both young pianists are graduates of the famed Juilliard School of Music where they were students together under Carl Freedberg, a pupil of Clara Schumann.

Since teaming up as duo pianists in 1943, Miss Appleton and Mr. Field have played more than 500 concerts together in leading cities throughout the country, and have given annual recitals at Town and Carnegie Halls.

They have done much pioneering in research work in the history and traditions of original two-piano literature, which inspired them to make the first professional attempt on record to survey, in concert form the repertoire of original keyboard music for four hands from the earliest-known compositions for two virginals through the writings of outstanding contemporaries.

There has been a regrettable tendency in recent years to present ensemble piano playing as a type of stunt performance and to regard the ensemble of two or more pianos either as a means of dressing up for greater popular appeal music conceived originally for a solo instrument, or as a means for presentation of works intended for the orchestra.

Thus, one loses sight of the fact that the art of duopianism has a four centuries' tradition of its own with a substantial literature of its own written solely for that medium by the world's greatest composers. It is the ambition of these two young artists to acquaint the musical public with this hitherto much neglected keyboard literature.

Mr. Girouard, who will sing during the intermission, is well-known to local music lovers, having been heard here in 1949 when he gave a concert at the high school auditorium for benefit of the Youth Center. Mr. Girouard is a summer resident at Brier Neck. He was born in Pittsburgh and received his higher education in Montreal, Ca. He has sung extensively in concerts, oratorios and opera throughout Canada and the eastern part of the United States. He has appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony Pops Orchestra, the Handel and Haydn Oratorio Society, the Leo Litwin Concert Orchestra and recently gave a very successful concert at Jordan Hall. He will be accompanied by his wife, Alice Girouard, who teaches voice at the New England Conservatory of Music.

2

AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION JOURNAL
CHICAGO, ILL
AUG. 1953

Program for Diamond Jubilee Meeting

Boston, Massachusetts, August 23-28

■ The 1953 Annual Meeting promises to be the most notable in the history of the Association. The program is set forth on the following alternate pages in as complete a form as possible at the time this issue of the Journal went to press. Because the Journal must be sent to the printer a month ahead of the opening of the Meeting, some changes in the program as it appears here are inevitable.

EVENTS, SUNDAY, AUGUST 23

MORNING 10:00 A.M. The Red Mass in Holy Cross Cathedral (on Washington Street)
(Transportation by bus to the Cathedral will be provided)

11:00 A.M. In historic King's Chapel (corner of School and Fremont Streets) a special service will be held. Dr. Palfrey Perkins will preach on "Liberty Under Law." The Lessons will be read by former Governor Robert F. Bradford and United States Senator Leverett Saltonstall.

The hours of services in other churches will be announced later or will be available at the hotels. Transportation by bus will be provided to churches having special services except to those churches in the Back Bay area which are immediately adjacent to the convention hotels.

AFTERNOON 4:00 to 6:00 P.M. General Reception at the Harvard Club of Boston (Commonwealth Avenue at Massachusetts Avenue) in honor of President and Mrs. Storey. During the reception, the organ in Harvard Hall will be played by William W. Evans, of New Jersey.
(A shuttle service will supply transportation by bus between the Harvard Club and the convention hotels from 4:00 P.M. to 6:00 P.M.)

EVENING 8:00 P.M. Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Hatch Memorial Shell on the Charles River Esplanade (five blocks from the Hotel Statler).
If inclement weather makes an out-of-doors concert impossible, the concert will be held either at the Boston Garden or in Symphony Hall. Final plans will be announced later. Transportation by bus will be provided to whichever is finally selected.

On both occasions, members of the American Bar Association, the Conference of Chief Justices, and other related organizations will be the guests of the Massachusetts Bar Association and the Boston Bar Association.

SECTION MEETINGS (see Section programs).

COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

First Day Sale, Monday, August 24

The United States Postmaster General has authorized the issuance of a special stamp in honor of our Diamond Jubilee Year.

The first-day sale of this stamp will take place in Boston on Monday, August 24, beginning at 9:00 A.M. in a branch Post Office in the Hotel Statler.

At 9:00 A.M. there will be suitable ceremonies which are being arranged by the United States Post Office Department, Boston Postmaster Finn, and the Boston Committee of Lawyer-Philatelists.

Cir. (D 152,922) (S 379,464)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
SEP 10 1953

Richard Burgin Named Conductor of New England Conservatory Orchestra

Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and member of the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music, has been named conductor of the Conservatory Orchestra, Harrison Keller, president of the conservatory, has announced. Burgin will continue to head the string department of the conservatory and will be in complete charge of all orchestral activities.

Burgin is widely known for his orchestral and chamber music activities with students, particularl yat Tanglewood.

Burgin has been concertmaster of the Boston Symphony since 1920 and its associate conductor since 1933. An internationally known violinist, he studied with Isidore Lotto, Joachim and Auer, later becoming Auer's assistant. He graduated with highest honors from the Petrograd Conservatory in 1912.

RICHARD BURGIN

Cir. (D 145,494) (S 272,057)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
SEP 10 1953

Burgin to Conduct Conservatory Group

Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been named conductor of the Conservatory Orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music, President Harrison Keller announced yesterday.

2

AMERICAN BAR ASSO-CIATION JOURNAL
CHICAGO, ILL
AUG. 1953

Program for Diamond Jubilee Meeting

Boston, Massachusetts, August 23-28

■ The 1953 Annual Meeting promises to be the most notable in the history of the Association. The program is set forth on the following alternate pages in as complete a form as possible at the time this issue of the Journal went to press. Because the Journal must be sent to the printer a month ahead of the opening of the Meeting, some changes in the program as it appears here are inevitable.

EVENTS, SUNDAY, AUGUST 23

MORNING 10:00 A.M. The Red Mass in Holy Cross Cathedral (on Washington Street)
(Transportation by bus to the Cathedral will be provided)

11:00 A.M. In historic King's Chapel (corner of School and Fremont Streets) a special service will be held. Dr. Palfrey Perkins will preach on "Liberty Under Law." The Lessons will be read by former Governor Robert F. Bradford and United States Senator Leverett Saltonstall.

The hours of services in other churches will be announced later or will be available at the hotels. Transportation by bus will be provided to churches having special services except to those churches in the Back Bay area which are immediately adjacent to the convention hotels.

AFTERNOON 4:00 to 6:00 P.M. General Reception at the Harvard Club of Boston (Commonwealth Avenue at Massachusetts Avenue) in honor of President and Mrs. Storey. During the reception, the organ in Harvard Hall will be played by William W. Evans, of New Jersey.
(A shuttle service will supply transportation by bus between the Harvard Club and the convention hotels from 4:00 P.M. to 6:00 P.M.)

EVENING 8:00 P.M. Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Hatch Memorial Shell on the Charles River Esplanade (five blocks from the Hotel Statler).
If inclement weather makes an out-of-doors concert impossible, the concert will be held either at the Boston Garden or in Symphony Hall. Final plans will be announced later. Transportation by bus will be provided to whichever is finally selected.

On both occasions, members of the American Bar Association, the Conference of Chief Justices, and other related organizations will be the guests of the Massachusetts Bar Association and the Boston Bar Association.

SECTION MEETINGS (see Section programs).

COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

First Day Sale, Monday, August 24

The United States Postmaster General has authorized the issuance of a special stamp in honor of our Diamond Jubilee Year.

The first-day sale of this stamp will take place in Boston on Monday, August 24, beginning at 9:00 A.M. in a branch Post Office in the Hotel Statler.

At 9:00 A.M. there will be suitable ceremonies which are being arranged by the United States Post Office Department, Boston Postmaster Finn, and the Boston Committee of Lawyer-Philatelists.

Cir. (D 152,922) (S 379,464)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
SEP 10 1953

Richard Burgin Named Conductor of New England Conservatory Orchestra

Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and member of the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music, has been named conductor of the Conservatory Orchestra, Harrison Keller, president of the conservatory, has announced. Burgin will continue to head the string department of the conservatory and will be in complete charge of all orchestral activities.

Burgin is widely known for his orchestral and chamber music activities with students, particularly at Tanglewood.

Burgin has been concertmaster of the Boston Symphony since 1920 and its associate conductor since 1933. An internationally known violinist, he studied with Isidore Lotto, Joachim and Auer, later becoming Auer's assistant. He graduated with highest honors from the Petrograd Conservatory in 1912.

RICHARD BURGIN

Cir. (D 148,494) (S [illegible])

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
SEP 10 1953

Burgin to Conduct Conservatory Group

Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been named conductor of the Conservatory Orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music, President Harrison Keller announced yesterday.

2

AMERICAN BAR ASSO-CIATION JOURNAL
CHICAGO, ILL
AUG. 1953

Congratulations and Good Wishes

to a great organization on the occasion of its

Diamond Jubilee

Commemorating

75 years of outstanding service

BURDETTE SMITH COMPANY

Law Book Publishers

Chicago

"... the most fertile commentary on the Constitution since The Federalist papers."
—ARTHUR M. SCHLESINGER

POLITICS AND THE CONSTITUTION

IN THE HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES

By William W. Crosskey

- A book that makes history
- An important new source for judges, lawyers, and political scientists

What kind of government did the constitutional Fathers intend for these United States? Mr. Crosskey answers: George Washington and other men who planned our government intended a government with plenary, nation-wide powers—legislative, executive, and judicial—a truly national government, uncomplicated and unimpeded by divisions of power over indivisible spheres of action between the national government and the states. And within this national government of plenary power the Fathers intended that the Congress of the United States should be supreme. 2 vols., 1410 pages $20

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS
5750 Ellis Avenue, Chicago 37, Illinois

VALUATIONS OF CLOSE CORPORATION STOCK

for

- GIFT AND ESTATE TAX PURPOSES
- SALES, PURCHASES, AND MERGERS
- RECAPITALIZATIONS
- STOCK OPTION PLANS

A background of close cooperation with attorneys, accountants, executors, and financial and banking institutions.

MANAGEMENT PLANNING
OF WASHINGTON, INC.
192 NASSAU STREET
PRINCETON, N. J.

nond Jubilee Meeting

E ASSEMBLY

FIRST SESSION

Monday, 10:00 A.M.

Imperial Ballroom, Hotel Statler

The President presiding

Call to order
Invocation, The Most Reverend Eric F. MacKenzie, Auxiliary Bishop of Boston
Response, Albert E. Jenner, Jr., of Chicago, Illinois
Introduction of Distinguished Guests
Report of American Bar Center Campaign, by George Maurice Morris, Chairman, Finance Committee, American Bar Foundation, Washington, D. C.
Annual Address of the President
Address of Welcome, His Excellency Christian A. Herter, Governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts
Presentation of Resolutions
Twelfth Annual Meeting of the American Bar Association Endowment, Carl B. Rix, President, Milwaukee, Wisconsin
Announcement of vacancies in offices of State and Assembly Delegates
Nomination of five Assembly Delegates for three-year terms
Nomination and Election of Assembly Delegates to fill vacancies

SECOND SESSION

Wednesday, 2:30 P.M.

John Hancock Auditorium

The President presiding

Invocation, The Reverend Albert Buckner Coe, President of the Massachusetts Congregational Conference
Introduction of Past Presidents of the Association
Response, Honorable John W. Davis, New York, New York
Speakers:
André Taschereau, Q.C., LL.D., President of The Canadian Bar Association
The Honorable John Foster Dulles, The Secretary of State

THIRD SESSION

Thursday, 2:30 P.M.

John Hancock Auditorium

The President presiding

Invocation, Rabbi Joseph S. Shubow, President, Rabbinical Association of Greater Boston
Presentation of Ross Bequest Award to Lois G. Forer, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania
Address by The Honorable Herbert Brownell, Jr., The Attorney General of the United States
Consideration of Amendments to Constitution and By-Laws
Report of Committee on Resolutions, Roy E. Willy, Chairman, Sioux Falls, South Dakota
Presentation of Awards of Merit to Bar Associations
Presentation of Awards of Merit to cities showing greatest improvement in Traffic Courts

FOURTH SESSION

Thursday, 7:30 P.M.

Imperial Ballroom, Hotel Statler

Annual Dinner

The President presiding

Invocation, Dr. Frederick M. Eliot, President of the American Unitarian Association
Presentation of American Bar Association Medal
Introduction of The Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain by The Chief Justice of the United States
Address by The Right Honorable Lord Simonds, The Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain
Introduction of Incoming President

FIFTH SESSION

Friday

Georgian Room, Hotel Statler

Immediately following adjournment of the final session of the House of Delegates

The President presiding

Report by the Chairman of the House of Delegates of action upon resolutions previously adopted by the Assembly
Action by the Assembly upon any resolutions previously adopted by the Assembly but disapproved or modified by the House
Unfinished Business
New Business
Introduction of new officers and members of Board of Governors
Adjournment sine die

HOUSE OF DELEGATES

August 24-28, 1953

Georgian Room, Hotel Statler

The sessions convene promptly at 2:00 P. M. Monday, August 24, and 9:30 A. M., Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday. The afternoon session will recess at 5:00 P. M., and the morning sessions not later than 12:30 P. M.

The final order of business will be printed in the Final Program for the Annual Meeting, and a Final Calendar for the House of Delegates, con-

---

Cir. (D 152,922) (S 379,464)

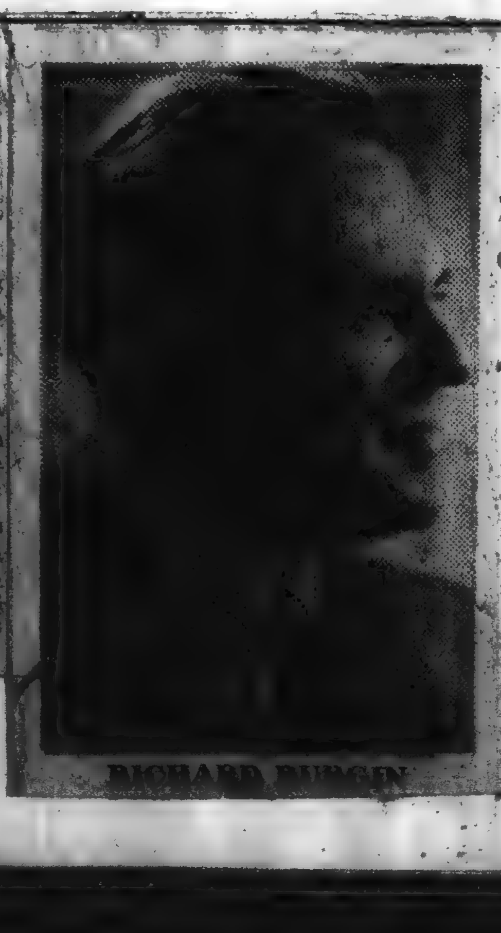
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
SEP 10 1953

Richard Burgin Named Conductor of New England Conservatory Orchestra

Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and member of the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music, has been named conductor of the Conservatory Orchestra, Harrison Keller, president of the conservatory, has announced. Burgin will continue to head the string department of the conservatory and will be in complete charge of all orchestral activities.

Burgin is widely known for his orchestral and chamber music activities with students, particularly at Tanglewood.

Burgin has been concertmaster of the Boston Symphony since 1920 and its associate conductor since 1933. An internationally known violinist, he studied with Isidore Lotto, Joachim and Auer, later becoming Auer's assistant. He graduated with highest honors from the Petrograd Conservatory in 1912.



RICHARD BURGIN

Cir. (D 146,494) (S [illegible])

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
SEP 10 1953

Burgin to Conduct Conservatory Group

Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been named conductor of the Conservatory Orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music, President Harrison Keller announced yesterday.

2

Congratulations and Good Wishes

to a great organization on the occasion of its

Diamond Jubilee

Commemorating

75 years of outstanding service

BURDETTE SMITH COMPANY

Law Book Publishers

Chicago

"... the most fertile commentary on the Constitution since The Federalist papers."

—ARTHUR M. SCHLESINGER

POLITICS AND THE CONSTITUTION

IN THE HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES

By William W. Crosskey

- A book that makes history
- An important new source for judges, lawyers, and political scientists

What kind of government did the constitutional Fathers intend for these United States? Mr. Crosskey answers: George Washington and other men who planned our government intended a government with plenary, nation-wide powers—legislative, executive, and judicial—a truly national government, uncomplicated and unimpeded by divisions of power over indivisible spheres of action between the national government and the states. And within this national government of plenary power the Fathers intended that the Congress of the United States should be supreme. 2 vols., 1410 pages $20

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS
5750 Ellis Avenue, Chicago 37, Illinois

MANAGEMENT PLANNING OF WASHINGTON, INC.

VALUATIONS OF CLOSE CORPORATION STOCK

for

- GIFT AND ESTATE TAX PURPOSES
- SALES, PURCHASES, AND MERGERS
- RECAPITALIZATIONS
- STOCK OPTION PLANS

A background of close cooperation with attorneys, accountants, executors, and financial and banking institutions.

MANAGEMENT PLANNING
OF WASHINGTON, INC.
192 NASSAU STREET
PRINCETON, N. J.

THE ASSEMBLY

FIRST SESSION

Monday, 10:00 A.M.

Imperial Ballroom, Hotel Statler

The President presiding

Call to order
Invocation, The Most Reverend Eric F. MacKenzie, Auxiliary Bishop of Boston
Response, Albert E. Jenner, Jr., of Chicago, Illinois
Introduction of Distinguished Guests
Report of American Bar Center Campaign, by George Maurice Morris, Chairman, Finance Committee, American Bar Foundation, Washington, D. C.
Annual Address of the President
Address of Welcome, His Excellency Christian A. Herter, Governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts
Presentation of Resolutions
Twelfth Annual Meeting of the American Bar Association Endowment, Carl B. Rix, President, Milwaukee, Wisconsin
Announcement of vacancies in offices of State and Assembly Delegates
Nomination of five Assembly Delegates for three-year terms
Nomination and Election of Assembly Delegates to fill vacancies

SECOND SESSION

Wednesday, 2:30 P.M.

John Hancock Auditorium

The President presiding

Invocation, The Reverend Albert Buckner Coe, President of the Massachusetts Congregational Conference
Introduction of Past Presidents of the Association
Response, Honorable John W. Davis, New York, New York
Speakers:
André Taschereau, Q.C., LL.D., President of The Canadian Bar Association
The Honorable John Foster Dulles, The Secretary of State

THIRD SESSION

Thursday, 2:30 P.M.

John Hancock Auditorium

The President presiding

Invocation, Rabbi Joseph S. Shubow, President, Rabbinical Association of Greater Boston
Presentation of Ross Bequest Award to Lois G. Forer, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania
Address by The Honorable Herbert Brownell, Jr., The Attorney General of the United States
Consideration of Amendments to Constitution and By-Laws
Report of Committee on Resolutions, Roy E. Willy, Chairman, Sioux Falls, South Dakota
Presentation of Awards of Merit to Bar Associations
Presentation of Awards of Merit to cities showing greatest improvement in Traffic Courts

FOURTH SESSION

Thursday, 7:30 P.M.

Imperial Ballroom, Hotel Statler

Annual Dinner

The President presiding

Invocation, Dr. Frederick M. Eliot, President of the American Unitarian Association
Presentation of American Bar Association Medal
Introduction of The Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain by The Chief Justice of the United States
Address by The Right Honorable Lord Simonds, The Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain
Introduction of Incoming President

FIFTH SESSION

Friday

Georgian Room, Hotel Statler

Immediately following adjournment of the final session of the House of Delegates

The President presiding

Report by the Chairman of the House of Delegates of action upon resolutions previously adopted by the Assembly
Action by the Assembly upon any resolutions previously adopted by the Assembly but disapproved or modified by the House
Unfinished Business
New Business
Introduction of new officers and members of Board of Governors
Adjournment sine die

HOUSE OF DELEGATES

August 24-28, 1953

Georgian Room, Hotel Statler

The sessions convene promptly at 2:00 P. M. Monday, August 24, and 9:30 A. M., Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday. The afternoon session will recess at 5:00 P. M., and the morning sessions not later than 12:30 P. M.

The final order of business will be printed in the Final Program for the Annual Meeting, and a Final Calendar for the House of Delegates, con-

---

Cir. (D 152,922) (S 379,464)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
SEP 10 1953

Richard Burgin Named Conductor of New England Conservatory Orchestra

Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and member of the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music, has been named conductor of the Conservatory Orchestra, Harrison Keller, president of the conservatory, has announced. Burgin will continue to head the string department of the conservatory and will be in complete charge of all orchestral activities.

Burgin is widely known for his orchestral and chamber music activities with students, particularly at Tanglewood.

Burgin has been concertmaster of the Boston Symphony since 1920 and its associate conductor since 1933. An internationally known violinist, he studied with Isidore Lotto, Joachim and Auer, later becoming Auer's assistant. He graduated with highest honors from the Petrograd Conservatory in 1912.

RICHARD BURGIN

Cir. (D 146,494) (S [illegible])

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
SEP 10 1953

Burgin to Conduct Conservatory Group

Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been named conductor of the Conservatory Orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music, President Harrison Keller announced yesterday.

3

The Saturday Review

AUGUST 29. 1953

Recordings in Review

Some Enchanted Music

Berlioz: "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony. Charles Munch conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Margaret Roggero, contralto, Leslie Chabay, tenor, Yi-Kwei-Sze, bass, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. (RCA Victor LM 6011, $11.14.)

—Fred Fehl.

Charles Munch—"long-delayed triumph."

IN HIS perceptive commentary accompanying this first complete recording of the "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony, Jacques Barzun observes that "it is the only large work of Berlioz's . . . which makes me feel that I want nothing different, nothing removed, nothing shorter, longer, or in another place." By the same token, it is the one large-scaled Berlioz score which sustains in its totality the imposing poetry present in isolated excerpts. The same cannot be said of other works by Berlioz. In the "Damnation of Faust," for instance, the nimble invention of the "Danses des Sylphes" and the "Menuet des Follets" does not course through the entire score; neither does the atmospheric bewitchery of "The Royal Hunt and Storm" pervade the whole of "Les Troyens." But in "Romeo and Juliet" Berlioz never lets his listeners down. From beginning to end it lives up to the lofty promise of the "Queen Mab" Scherzo or the "Scène d'amour"—which is to say that it is a masterpiece and one of the monuments of Western music.

Toscanini's recording of excerpts from "Romeo" with the NBC Symphony and Munch's similar effort with the Paris Conservatory Orchestra (for London) included, between them, most of the purely orchestral passages in the score. But they omitted all of the vocal sections; that is, the whole of the Prologue, where Berlioz introduces the thematic material he is to develop later on, and the whole of the Finale, where he crowns his "dramatic symphony" with a hymn of reconciliation, much as Beethoven, sixteen years earlier, had ended his Ninth Symphony with an ode to joy. They omitted too the poignant Funeral March, for chorus and orchestra, and the bizarre, but marvelously effective, orchestral fantasia entitled "Romeo at the Tomb of the Capulets," compounded of the half-statements, the suddenly twisting string whiplashes, and the blaring brass invocations which Berlioz so delighted in. This is not to deprecate the beauties of the previously recorded excerpts, but merely to notify the unsuspecting that there is much more to "Romeo and Juliet" than has heretofore been offered on records.

For Charles Munch this is an impressive and long-delayed triumph after a series of false starts in which RCA Victor cast him in roles for which he was indifferently suited. Ever since his first appearances here with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, he has been recognized as a Berlioz interpreter of uncommon gifts, a conductor extraordinarily responsive to the rise and fall of this composer's unique rhetoric, and possessed of an unerring ear for his kaleidoscopic scoring. Never has Munch's identification with the Berlioz idiom been more brilliantly defined than in this recording. From the turbulent eddies of the Introduction to the ringing asseveration of the final chorus, it carries the commanding imprint of a conductor who knows what to ask for and how to get it. Needless to say, the virtuosity of the Boston Symphony requires no endorsement; however, it has seldom been given such an opportunity to show off its sparkling contours. The soloists and chorus do not reach quite the same heights of accomplishment, though their work is always adequate and occasionally—as in Leslie Chabay's trippingly sung "Mab! la messagère"—distinguished.

Considering the unusual proportions of this work, both in the number of performers and in the variety of sounds they produce, RCA Victor's engineers must have experienced more than the normal quota of difficulties; nonetheless, they have obtained a recording of remarkable balance and presence. I am not sure that it embodies the Ideal Dynamic Range Suitable for Home Listening, which is one of the principal virtues claimed for the "new orthophonic recording technique." The neighbors may find the resounding, crackling fortissimos with which this recording abounds anything but ideal; high-fidelity enthusiasts, however, will relish them unreservedly.

Cir. (D 203,001)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
AUG 26 1953

Take It From Me

Neal O'Hara

TODAY'S QUIZ for those still hanging on: No. 1. In what field was August Strindberg eminent?...... No. 2. Would you say the song "California, Here I Come" was written more than 25 years ago?......No. 3. Which Tennessee city has the greater population, Memphis or Nashville?......(The answers you'll find somewhere below.)

My dear, sit down a while: Watch for another fierce competition this fall among the giants of the dentifrice industry. With the furore over chlorophyll toothpastes having subsided, the new ingredient called sarcosinate, which reduces decay-causing acids in the mouth, is to be featured in many established brands. New toothpastes of the detergent type, and requiring only one brushing per day, will also compete in the national market.......Once regarded as an aeronautical gadget, the helicopter now plays an important part in warfare. During the Korean rumpus, more than 21,000 U.N. casualties were evacuated by helicopter, several thousand of whom would probably have died but for their speedy rescue. . . . . The Salt Lake City News, in correcting an error printed on its society page, made amends with this announcement: "The marriage of Miss Blank and Mr. Smith which was announced in this newspaper a few weeks ago was a mistake and we wish to correct it."......Only about 10 per cent. of the food taken into the body is expended by measurable physical work in the average adult. The remaining 90 per cent. is turned directly into heat which the body then radiates, either by evaporation, by perspiration or by conducting it by direct contact to clothes or other surfaces that are cooler than the body....... Today's favorite gag: When the young woman sought to buy a sweater for her dog at the pet shop, the clerk asked how big was the dog. Being confused as to her doggie's size, she was asked by the clerk, "Why don't you bring him in an let me measure him?" "Oh, I couldn't do that," she exclaimed. "I want it to be a surprise."......A device for taking remote readings of atmospheric temperatures from any distance up to slightly more than 100 miles is manufactured by one NE company. The temperatures are conveyed over telephone wires by a transmitter to a recorder chart which tells what the temperature is at the remote point, what it has been for the previous several hours and what its current trend is.......Here's how Variety lauds our venerated Boston Symphony Orchestra: "The Boston Symph rates as a hot attraction. Musical aggregation recently returned from a hinterland tour and chalked up sock b.o. returns." (Our orko is socko, see?).......We all know our income taxes rank first, but the next largest tax source of the federal govt. last yr. was from cigarets. They plopped $1,579,599,382 into Uncle Sam's till.......Thoughts while shaving: 1. We often wonder just how Henry Wadsworth Longfellow rolled up a fortune just from writing poetry. It would be quite a stunt for any modern poet to cut himself in on a giant hunk of dough today. . . . 2. Of course, a fellow like Edgar Guest did all right for himself in the past quarter century; but he ground out a poem a day which was widely syndicated in newspapers. And Edgar handsomely augmented his income by hitting the lyceum circuit with his readings. But Longfellow neither had syndication nor booked himself for a route on the lecture loop.......3. The only modern poet we can think of who made real money by poetic talent alone was Edna St. Vincent Millet. Yup; she's the only modern who comes to mind.......4. Wonder if a 1954 congressional candidate wouldn't improve his chances of election if he favored putting those European nations on the Morris Plan instead of the Marshall Plan? (Now tossing away the blade.)......A community relations expert, Marjorie Dawson, complains that movie advs. stress too much the masculine appeal of films and ignore women as potential cinema customers. A women is hardly enchanted by an adv. featuring a luscious, blond glamor girl in a situation of which she either doesn't approve or in which she cannot imagine herself, this critic contends. Miss Dawson also decries brutality so often featured in films as a deterrent to feminine patronage of movies.......Long before the Kremlin gang was born, the great French statesman, de Tocqueville, observed: "Despotism may govern without faith, but liberty cannot."......ANSWERS TO TODAY'S QUIZ: No. 1. August Strindberg was the Swedish dramatist. ......No. 2. "California, Here I Come" was written 29 yrs. ago, in 1924.......No. 3. Memphis (396,000) is larger than Nashville (175,000)......Color advs. giving the 3-D effect have already appeared in scattered newspaper and magazines. It is achieved by the so-called "anaglyph" technique, which presents fuzzy pictures which more or less focus when viewed with 2-color lenses, and give an illusion of depth.......From the Haverhill Gazette: "Ten cases of toothpaste were stolen from a Buffalo warehouse and police do not suspect any children."......The Aztec Indians of our Southwest thought they had a system for ending a drought. One of their ancient customs was to sacrifice human beings to assure a good corn crop.

Answers to correspondents:
M. G. F., West Newton—Individually, yes.
H. A. P., Boston—Yup, that was when culture flourished.
H. E. C., Boston—It's colossal!

Cir. (D 503,999) (S 1,096,738)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
SEP 6 - 1953

WORLD OF MUSIC: GUESTS EXPECTED

Six Visiting Orchestras Will Be Heard in New York Next Season

By ROSS PARMENTER

THREE orchestras which have not visited New York in a number of years will be heard here during the forthcoming season. In order of appearance at Carnegie Hall, they will be the Detroit Symphony on Jan. 15, the Minneapolis Symphony on Feb. 23 and the Rochester Philharmonic on March 26. The Detroit, which has not been here since January, 1945, will be led by Paul Paray. The last visits of the other two were early in 1948. Erich Leinsdorf will lead the Rochester group, as he did last time, but Antal Dorati will be leading the Minneapolis Symphony for the first time in New York.

Since the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestras will play their regular seasons here, and since the Pittsburgh Symphony, which came here for the first time last spring, will be back again on March 6 under William Steinberg, the city will hear six major visiting orchestras. But a seventh visitor, the Vienna Philharmonic, has fallen out of the race.

The famous Austrian orchestra was to have begun a six-week United States tour in January, 1954, but the scheme fell through because no agreement over conductors could be reached between the Vienna organization and the local sponsors, National Concert and Artists Corporation and Sol Hurok. Five conductors were considered, Wilhelm Furtwaengler, Clemens Kraus, Karl Boehm, Hans Knappertsbusch and Josef Krips, but no single leader, or combination of leaders, was acceptable to both sides. When the negotiations had dragged beyond a certain point with no settlement reached, it was mutually agreed to let the contract lapse. But it is hoped the tour has been postponed rather than canceled, and plans are being made with a view to having the orchestra come here in 1954-55.

GUESTS: Most of the nation's large orchestras have made their plans for the new season. They include guest appearances by well-known conductors, in addition to the regular concerts of the permanent musical directors. Leopold Stokowski and Ernest Ansermet, it seems, will be the busiest guests. Both are going to six orchestras—Mr. Stokowski to the St. Louis, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Toronto, Minneapolis and National symphonies; Mr. Ansermet to the Dallas, Baltimore, Houston, Cleveland, Chicago and University of Illinois orchestras. Pierre Monteux will be a guest conductor in Boston, Minneapolis, Montreal and at the Metropolitan Opera. The New York Philharmonic, the Chicago Symphony and the San Francisco Symphony will be the orchestras that Bruno Walter will lead.

3

The Saturday Review

AUGUST 29, 1953

Recordings in Review

Some Enchanted Music

Berlioz: "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony. Charles Munch conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Margaret Roggero, contralto, Leslie Chabay, tenor, Yi-Kwei-Sze, bass, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. (RCA Victor LM 6011, $11.14.)

—Fred Fehl.

Charles Munch—"long-delayed triumph."

IN HIS perceptive commentary accompanying this first complete recording of the "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony, Jacques Barzun observes that "it is the only large work of Berlioz's... which makes me feel that I want nothing different, nothing removed, nothing shorter, longer, or in another place." By the same token, it is the one large-scaled Berlioz score which sustains in its totality the imposing poetry present in isolated excerpts. The same cannot be said of other works by Berlioz. In the "Damnation of Faust," for instance, the nimble invention of the "Danses des Sylphes" and the "Menuet des Follets" does not course through the entire score; neither does the atmospheric bewitchery of "The Royal Hunt and Storm" pervade the whole of "Les Troyens." But in "Romeo and Juliet" Berlioz never lets his listeners down. From beginning to end it lives up to the lofty promise of the "Queen Mab" Scherzo or the "Scène d'amour"—which is to say that it is a masterpiece and one of the monuments of Western music.

Toscanini's recording of excerpts from "Romeo" with the NBC Symphony and Munch's similar effort with the Paris Conservatory Orchestra (for London) included, between them, most of the purely orchestral passages in the score. But they omitted all of the vocal sections; that is, the whole of the Prologue, where Berlioz introduces the thematic material he is to develop later on, and the whole of the Finale, where he crowns his "dramatic symphony" with a hymn of reconciliation, much as Beethoven, sixteen years earlier, had ended his Ninth Symphony with an ode to joy. They omitted too the poignant Funeral March, for chorus and orchestra, and the bizarre, but marvelously effective, orchestral fantasia entitled "Romeo at the Tomb of the Capulets," compounded of the half-statements, the suddenly twisting string whiplashes, and the blaring brass invocations which Berlioz so delighted in. This is not to deprecate the beauties of the previously recorded excerpts, but merely to notify the unsuspecting that there is much more to "Romeo and Juliet" than has heretofore been offered on records.

For Charles Munch this is an impressive and long-delayed triumph after a series of false starts in which RCA Victor cast him in roles for which he was indifferently suited. Ever since his first appearances here with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, ~~he~~ has been recognized as a Berlioz interpreter of uncommon gifts, a conductor extraordinarily responsive to the rise and fall of this composer's unique rhetoric, and possessed of an unerring ear for his kaleidoscopic scoring. Never has Munch's identification with the Berlioz idiom been more brilliantly defined than in this recording. From the turbulent eddies of the Introduction to the ringing asseveration of the final chorus, it carries the commanding imprint of a conductor who knows what to ask for and how to get it. Needless to say, the virtuosity of the Boston Symphony requires no endorsement; however, it has seldom been given such an opportunity to show off its sparkling contours. The soloists and chorus do not reach quite the same heights of accomplishment, though their work is always adequate and occasionally—as in Leslie Chabay's trippingly sung "Mab! la messagère"—distinguished.

Considering the unusual proportions of this work, both in the number of performers and in the variety of sounds they produce, RCA Victor's engineers must have experienced more than the normal quota of difficulties; nonetheless, they have obtained a recording of remarkable balance and presence. I am not sure that it embodies the Ideal Dynamic Range Suitable for Home Listening, which is one of the principal virtues claimed for the "new orthophonic recording technique." The neighbors may find the resounding, crackling fortissimos with which this recording abounds anything but ideal; high-fidelity enthusiasts, however, will relish them unreservedly.

Cir. (D 203,001)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
AUG 26 1953

Take It From Me

Neal O'Hara

TODAY'S QUIZ for those still hanging on: No. 1. In what field was August Strindberg eminent?......No. 2. Would you say the song "California, Here I Come" was written more than 25 years ago?......No. 3. Which Tennessee city has the greater population, Memphis or Nashville?......(The answers you'll find somewhere below.)

My dear, sit down a while: Watch for another fierce competition this fall among the giants of the dentifrice industry. With the furore over chlorophyll toothpastes having subsided, the new ingredient called sarcosinate, which reduces decay-causing acids in the mouth, is to be featured in many established brands. New toothpastes of the detergent type, and requiring only one brushing per day, will also compete in the national market......Once regarded as an aeronautical gadget, the helicopter now plays an important part in warfare. During the Korean rumpus, more than 21,000 U.N. casualties were evacuated by helicopter, several thousand of whom would probably have died but for their speedy rescue. . . . . The Salt Lake City News, in correcting an error printed on its society page, made amends with this announcement: "The marriage of Miss Blank and Mr. Smith which was announced in this newspaper a few weeks ago was a mistake and we wish to correct it."......Only about 10 per cent. of the food taken into the body is expended by measurable physical work in the average adult. The remaining 90 per cent. is turned directly into heat which the body then radiates, either by evaporation, by perspiration or by conducting it by direct contact to clothes or other surfaces that are cooler than the body......Today's favorite gag: When the young woman sought to buy a sweater for her dog at the pet shop, the clerk asked how big was the dog. Being confused as to her doggie's size, she was asked by the clerk, "Why don't you bring him in an let me measure him?" "Oh, I couldn't do that," she exclaimed. "I want it to be a surprise."......A device for taking remote readings of atmospheric temperatures from any distance up to slightly more than 100 miles is manufactured by one NE company. The temperatures are conveyed over telephone wires by a transmitter to a recorder chart which tells what the temperature is at the remote point, what it has been for the previous several hours and what its current trend is......Here's how Variety lauds our venerated Boston Symphony Orchestra: "The Boston Symph rates as a hot attraction. Musical aggregation recently returned from a hinterland tour and chalked up sock b.o. returns." (Our orko is socko, see?)......We all know our income taxes rank first, but the next largest tax source of the federal govt. last yr. was from cigarets. They plopped $1,579,599,382 into Uncle Sam's till......Thoughts while shaving: 1. We often wonder just how Henry Wadsworth Longfellow rolled up a fortune just from writing poetry. It would be quite a stunt for any modern poet to cut himself in on a giant hunk of dough today. . . . 2. Of course, a fellow like Edgar Guest did all right for himself in the past quarter century; but he ground out a poem a day which was widely syndicated in newspapers. And Edgar handsomely augmented his income by hitting the lyceum circuit with his readings. But Longfellow neither had syndication nor booked himself for a route on the lecture loop......3. The only modern poet we can think of who made real money by poetic talent alone was Edna St. Vincent Millet. Yup; she's the only modern who comes to mind......4. Wonder if a 1954 congressional candidate wouldn't improve his chances of election if he favored putting those European nations on the Morris Plan instead of the Marshall Plan? (Now tossing away the blade.)......A community relations expert, Marjorie Dawson, complains that movie advs. stress too much the masculine appeal of films and ignore women as potential cinema customers. A women is hardly enchanted by an adv. featuring a luscious, blond glamor girl in a situation of which she either doesn't approve or in which she cannot imagine herself, this critic contends. Miss Dawson also decries brutality so often featured in films as a deterrent to feminine patronage of movies......Long before the Kremlin gang was born, the great French statesman, de Tocqueville, observed: "Despotism may govern without faith, but liberty cannot."......ANSWERS TO TODAY'S QUIZ: No. 1. August Strindberg was the Swedish dramatist. ......No. 2. "California, Here I Come" was written 29 yrs. ago, in 1924......No. 3. Memphis (396,000) is larger than Nashville (175,000)......Color advs. giving the 3-D effect have already appeared in scattered newspaper and magazines. It is achieved by the so-called "anaglyph" technique, which presents fuzzy pictures which more or less focus when viewed with 2-color lenses, and give an illusion of depth......From the Haverhill Gazette: "Ten cases of toothpaste were stolen from a Buffalo warehouse and police do not suspect any children."......The Aztec Indians of our Southwest thought they had a system for ending a drought. One of their ancient customs was to sacrifice human beings to assure a good corn crop.

Answers to correspondents:
M. G. F., West Newton—Individually, yes.
H. A. P., Boston—Yup, that was when culture flourished.
H. E. C., Boston—It's colossal!

Cir. (D 503,999) (S 1,096,738)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
SEP 6 - 1953

WORLD OF MUSIC: GUESTS EXPECTED

Six Visiting Orchestras Will Be Heard in New York Next Season

By ROSS PARMENTER

THREE orchestras which have not visited New York in a number of years will be heard here during the forthcoming season. In order of appearance at Carnegie Hall, they will be the Detroit Symphony on Jan. 15, the Minneapolis Symphony on Feb. 23 and the Rochester Philharmonic on March 26. The Detroit, which has not been here since January, 1945, will be led by Paul Paray. The last visits of the other two were early in 1948. Erich Leinsdorf will lead the Rochester group, as he did last time, but Antal Dorati will be leading the Minneapolis Symphony for the first time in New York.

Since the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestras will play their regular seasons here, and since the Pittsburgh Symphony, which came here for the first time last spring, will be back again on March 6 under William Steinberg, the city will hear six major visiting orchestras. But a seventh visitor, the Vienna Philharmonic, has fallen out of the race.

The famous Austrian orchestra was to have begun a six-week United States tour in January, 1954, but the scheme fell through because no agreement over conductors could be reached between the Vienna organization and the local sponsors, National Concert and Artists Corporation and Sol Hurok. Five conductors were considered, Wilhelm Furtwaengler, Clemens Kraus, Karl Boehm, Hans Knappertsbusch and Josef Krips, but no single leader, or combination of leaders, was acceptable to both sides. When the negotiations had dragged beyond a certain point with no settlement reached, it was mutually agreed to let the contract lapse. But it is hoped the tour has been postponed rather than canceled, and plans are being made with a view to having the orchestra come here in 1954-55.

GUESTS: Most of the nation's large orchestras have made their plans for the new season. They include guest appearances by well-known conductors, in addition to the regular concerts of the permanent musical directors. Leopold Stokowski and Ernest Ansermet, it seems, will be the busiest guests. Both are going to six orchestras—Mr. Stokowski to the St. Louis, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Toronto, Minneapolis and National symphonies; Mr. Ansermet to the Dallas, Baltimore, Houston, Cleveland, Chicago and University of Illinois orchestras. Pierre Monteux will be a guest conductor in Boston, Minneapolis, Montreal and at the Metropolitan Opera. The New York Philharmonic, the Chicago Symphony and the San Francisco Symphony will be the orchestras that Bruno Walter will lead.

4

Cir. (D 503,999) (S 1,096,738)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

SEP 6-1953

RECORDS: SIBELIUS

Finn's Works Are Played By Stockholm Group

JEAN SIBELIUS.

Keystone Pictures, Inc.

His Fifth and Sixth Symphonies are now available on LP disks.

THE series of Sibelius symphonies that Mercury started several months ago continues with Nos. 5 and 6. By now all the seven symphonies are available, played by the Stockholm Radio Symphony under the direction of Sixten Ehrling.

The Fifth Symphony, in E flat, is well known; it used to be one of Koussevitzky's specialties. Less familiar is the Sixth in D minor, a typical work, with the scurrying strings, the stubborn ostinatos and the spare writing characteristic of Sibelius' later symphonic style.

Ehrling's interpretations are interesting. He produces a drier sound than the rich, thick tone featured by the major American orchestras. It may be that the Stockholm group could not match the tone quality of said American ensembles; it also is obvious that the lessened concentration on pure sound gives a more lithe quality to these Sibelius scores, and a quality more in keeping with the nature of the music.

Those who were weaned on the Koussevitzky-Boston Symphony reading of the E flat Symphony may find Ehrling a little dry and considerably less impressive in contour. After a few hearings and mental readjustments, however, the listener should fall completely in line with Ehrling's approach.

Strauss With Zither

Mercury also has made available a pleasant disk of Strauss waltzes, conducted by Antal Dorati and the Minneapolis Symphony. Contained herein are Wiener Blut; Wine, Women and Song; Tales From the Vienna Woods and Emperor. In "Tales" the score is presented with the original zither solo, here played by John C. Scherer. Has no composer written a zither concerto for the likes of virtuosos like Mr. Scherer? Dorati leads this music with style and the recording is superb in sound.

Some modern French and American orchestral music has been supplied by Urania. Previously unrecorded is Honegger's Symphonie Liturgique, performed by the Dresden Philharmonic under Walter Stoschek. Honegger composed this work in 1946; it is the symphonic equivalent of three sections of a requiem, which explains the titles of the movements—Dies Irae, De Profundis and Dona Nobis Pacem.

It is, on the whole, a busy, hectic work. The first movement and most of the last carries on grimly, with a multitude of interjections and punctuations. The harmony tends toward dissonance, the melodies are angular, and the writing as a whole is of a conventional modernism without much profile or feeling of individuality. In the slow movement there are long-phrased melodies that wind around everything but the heart. And the quiet conclusion sounds too obvious in its lithographic ecclesiasticism. Who was it who said that in every French composer's breast there lies a slumbering Massenet?

The American contribution is a coupling of two ballet suites—Copland's Appalachian Spring and Piston's Incredible Flutist, both conducted by Arthur Rother at the head of the Symphony Orchestra of Radio Berlin. It marks the first LP version for the Piston work, one of his most popular and, without doubt, one of his weakest. In the present recording it is not presented in its entirety; at least, that delirious moment in the old Victor set, where the orchestra players suddenly yell and whistle, is absent.

"Appalachian Spring" is not as clearly performed as it might be. Rother, a competent and well-routined conductor, seems a little miscast here. Either he is not too familiar with the score or has little sympathy for it (the chances are that a few more rehearsals would have clarified some of the writing for him). The recording, too, is a little thick. On all counts, then, the American Recording Society performance, issued a few months ago, is to be preferred.

H. C. S.

Cir. (D 125,983) (S 379,464)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

SEP 10 1953

Richard Burgin Appointed Conductor of Boston Conservatory Orchestra

Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and member of the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music, has been named conductor of the Conservatory Orchestra, Harrison Keller, president of the conservatory, has announced. Burgin will continue to head the string department of the conservatory and will be in complete charge of all orchestral activities.

Burgin is widely known for his orchestral and chamber music activities with students, particularly at Tanglewood.

Burgin has been concertmaster of the Boston Symphony since 1920 and its associate conductor since 1933. An internationally known violinist, he studied with Isidore Lotto, Joachim and Auer, later becoming Auer's assistant. He graduated with highest honors from the Petrograd Conservatory in 1912.

RICHARD BURGIN

Cir. (D 331,853) (S 567,298)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

SEP 12 1953

Burgin to Conduct

BOSTON, Sept. 11.—Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and member of the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music, has been named conductor of the conservatory orchestra, it was announced today. Mr. Burgin will continue to head the string department of the conservatory and will be in complete charge of all orchestral activities.

Cir. (D 26,526)

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

SEP 11 1953

Burgin Named Conductor of NECM Orchestra

BOSTON—Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and member of the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music, has been named conductor of the Conservatory Orchestra. The announcement today was made by Harrison Keller, president of the Conservatory, who stated that Mr. Burgin will continue to head its string department and will be in complete charge of all orchestral activities.

Concertmaster of the Boston Orchestra since 1920 and its associate conductor since 1933, Mr. Burgin has played in Berkshire Festival concerts since 1936, and since 1940 has been a member of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, in its orchestral and chamber music departments. In the past season he succeeded Gregor Piatigorsky as head of the latter department.

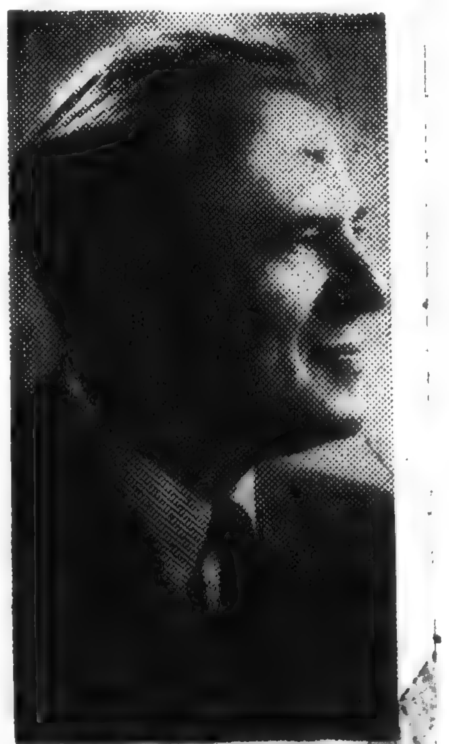
Internationally known as a violinist, Mr. Burgin studied with Isadore Lotto, Joachim and Auer, later becoming Auer's assistant. He graduated with highest honors from the Petrograd Conservatory in 1912 and concertized in Russia, Finland, Denmark, Norway, Sweden and Paris. He made his debut with the Warsaw Philharmonic Orchestra at the age of 10. Before coming to Boston he was concertmaster of the Helsingfors and Stockholm Symphony Orchestras and of the Oslo Philharmonic.

With his wife, Ruth Posselt, a concert violinist who often appears with the Boston Orchestra, and their two children, he spends summers in a cottage on Stockbridge Bowl.

Cir. (D 145,494) (S 272,057)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

SEP 12 1953



NAMED—Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, has been appointed conductor of the orchestra of the New England Conservatory.

---

pas possible.

Le Monde 9/1/

Jacques Thibaud est mort comme il le désirait

M. Charles Munch, chef de l'orchestre philharmonique de Boston, qui se trouvait en villégiature près de Grasse, s'est rendu à Fours-Saint-Laurent dès qu'il a eu connaissance de la mort de son ami, Jacques Thibaud. Il a fait la déclaration suivante :

« J'ai connu Jacques Thibaud avant la guerre de 1914 à Strasbourg où il venait chaque année donner un récital qui était chaque fois un événement pour tous les Alsaciens français. J'ai été son élève à l'École normale de Paris où il donnait des cours avec Cortot et Casals. Je l'ai mieux connu lorsque je suis devenu chef d'orchestre.

« Nous avons donné beaucoup de concerts ensemble. Jacques Thibaud était un grand seigneur parmi les [illegible] qui le touchait [illegible] pur et grand. Les grands souvenirs qu'il a laissés sont les interprétations des concertos de Mozart, Lalo Saint-Saëns et la façon dont il jouait la « Sonate » de Debussy, était extraordinaire.

« Jacques Thibaud était un charmeur. Et quelle gentillesse et quelle bonté il avait pour tous. On ne frappait jamais à sa porte sans qu'il l'ouvrît. Les musiciens du monde entier sont en deuil aujourd'hui. »

D'autre part, un ami intime de Jacques Thibaud, M. Margot Noblemaire, a confié à l'envoyé spécial de l'A.F.P. que Jacques Thibaud avait trouvé au mont Cimet la mort qu'il avait souhaitée.

« Lorsque Ginette Neveu a péri dans un accident d'aviation, a-t-il déclaré, Jacques Thibaud m'a dit textuellement qu'il aimerait mourir comme cela ».

Cir. (D 203,001)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER

SEP 17 1953

Boston Symphony Sets Schedule for Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 73rd season in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon, Oct. 9.

Vacationing Charles Munch will return from France by the first of the month to start his fifth year as music director.

The 69 concerts in Greater Boston, running through May 1, are fully subscribed in advance, and only a few seats remain for the six Sunday afternoons. Six rehearsals during the season will be open to the public.

The orchestra will tour from Oct. 19 to 26, playing in Northampton, Springfield, Buffalo,, Ann Arbor,, Detroit, Rochester, Ithaca and Troy. There will be four concerts in Washington, D. C., ten in New York City, five in Brooklyn and five in Providence. Other cities on the touring schedule will be Newark, Philadelphia, New Haven (2), Hartford, New London and New Brunswick.

Ferenc Fricsay, Hungarian conductor who directs Berlin's RIAS Orchestra, will make his first American appearance as guest conductor here.

Others invited by Mr. Munch to conduct will be Pierre Monteux, former conductor of the Boston orchestra, and Guido Cantelli, who was here last season.

Choral works during the season will include Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust," "L'Enfance du Christ" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Among the soloists who will appear with the orchestra are: Soprano Margaret Harshaw; Samson Francois, Leon Fleisher, Alexander Brailowsky and Zadel Skolovsky, pianists; Zino Francescatti and Tossy Spivakovsky, violinists, and Pierre Fournier and Samuel Mayes, 'cellists.

The Helsinki University Chorus from Finland, the Harvard and Radcliffe Choral Society and the New England Conservatory Chorus will sing with the orchestra.

5

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1953 Art—Music—Theater

–Symphony to Open Seventy-Third Year

Munch Invites Three Guest Conductors

Charles Munch, now vacationing in France, will return to Boston on Oct. 1 to prepare for his fifth year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The 73d season of the Boston Symphony will open in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, Oct. 9.

The double series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts in Symphony Hall are completely subscribed, as well as the series of nine Tuesday evening concerts, which will begin on Oct. 13. A few seats are still to be had for the Sunday afternoon series of six concerts which begin Nov. 1. Six rehearsals in the course of the season will be open to the public according to a now-established custom.

* * *

Charles Munch has invited three conductors to appear as guests in the course of the season. The first of them will be Ferenc Fricsay, the conductor from Budapest who is the permanent leader of the RIAS Orchestra in Berlin and who will cross the ocean to make his first American appearance with this orchestra. Pierre Monteux, a former conductor of the Boston Symphony, will again be a guest, and Guido Cantelli who conducted in Boston last season will return.

Three instrumental soloists will be heard at these concerts for the first time. They are Samson François, French pianist; Leon Fleisher, San Francisco pianist, and Tossy Spivakovsky, violinist.

Zino Francescatti, a violinist familiar to Boston audiences, will return; also the pianists Alexander Brailowsky and Zadel Skolovsky. Cellists will be Pierre Fournier and Samuel Mayes. Margaret Harshaw of the Metropolitan Opera Company has been engaged as a soloist. The Helsinki University Chorus, which sang with this orchestra in 1936, will return.

* * *

Soloists for the Sunday series will be the pianists Grant Johannesen and Leon Fleisher. Guest conductors will be Ferenc Fricsay and Guido Cantelli. The Messrs. Johannesen and Brailowsky will appear in the Tuesday series, and Pierre Monteux will conduct a concert as guest.

Choral works for the season will include Berlioz "Damnation of Faust" with Suzanne Danco, soprano; David Poleri, tenor; Martial Singher, baritone, and Nicola Moscona, bass. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses will participate in this work and in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which will olose the season on May 1.

Mr. Munch will introduce to these concerts Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ" in the pair of concerts before Christmas, the New England Conservatory Chorus participating. The Guard Republican Band of Paris, Capt. François Julien-Brun conducting, will make a tour of the United States and will visit Boston to give a concert for the benefit of this Orchestra's Pension Fund on Friday evening, Dec. 11. Charles Munch will conduct a part of the program.

The usual series of five each will be given in New York City, Brooklyn, and Providence.

Godfried de Groot

Ferenc Fricsay, conductor of the RIAS Orchestra in Berlin, is scheduled to make his first American appearance this fall as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Cir. (D 152,922) (S 379,464)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE

SEP 17 1953

Boston Symphony's 73d Season (and Munch's 5th) Begins Oct. 9

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 73d season in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, Oct. 9. Charles Munch, now vacationing in France, will return by the first of the month to begin preparation for his fifth year as the music director of the orchestra

The double series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts in Symphony Hall are completely subscribed, as well as the series of 9 Tuesday evening concerts, which begin on Oct. 13. A few seats are available for the Sunday afternoon series of six concerts which begin Nov. 1. Six rehearsals in the course of the season will be open to the public, according to a new custom.

Dr. Munch has invited three conductors to take over the concerts as guests in the course of the season. The first will be Ferenc Fricsay, Budapest conductor who is now permanent leader of the R. I. A. S. Orchestra in Berlin. Pierre Monteux, former conductor of the Boston Orchestra, will again be a guest, and Guido Cantelli, who conducted here last season, will return.

Soloists Announced

Of the instrumental soloists, three will be heard at these concerts for the first time. They are Samson Francois, French pianist; Leon Fleisher, pianist from San Francisco; and Tossy Spivakovsky, violinist. Zino Francescatti, violinist, will return, and likewise the pianists Alexander Brailowsky and Zadel Skolovsky. Cellists will be Pierre Fournier and Samuel Mayes. Margaret Harshaw of the Metropolitan Opera Company has been engaged as a soloist as well as the singers to appear in choral works. The Helsinki University Chorus which sang with this orchestra in 1938 will return.

Soloists for the Sunday series will be the pianists Grant Johannesen and Leon Fleisher. Guest conductors will be Fricsay and Cantelli. Johannesen and Brailowsky will appear in the Tuesday series and Monteux will conduct a concert as guest.

French Band Coming

Choral works for the season will include Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust" with Suzanne Danco, soprano; David Poleri, tenor; Martial Singher, baritone, and Nicola Moscona, bass. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses will participate in this work and in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony which will close the season on May 1.

Dr. Munch will introduce to these concerts Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ" in the pair of concerts before Christmas, the New England Conservatory Chorus participating. The Garde Republicain Band of Paris, Capt Francois Julien-Brun, conductor, is to make a tour of the United States and will visit Boston to give a concert for the benefit of the Boston Symphony's Pension Fund, Dec. 11.

The usual series of five each will be given in New York city on Wednesday evenings and Saturday afternoons, in Brooklyn and Providence. There will be four concerts in Washington, six in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, and visits to Newark, Philadelphia, New Haven, Hartford, New London and New Brunswick. A tour from Oct. 19-26 will include Northampton, Springfield, Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Detroit, Rochester, Ithaca and Troy.

Cir. (D 31,687)

This Clipping From PORTLAND, ME.
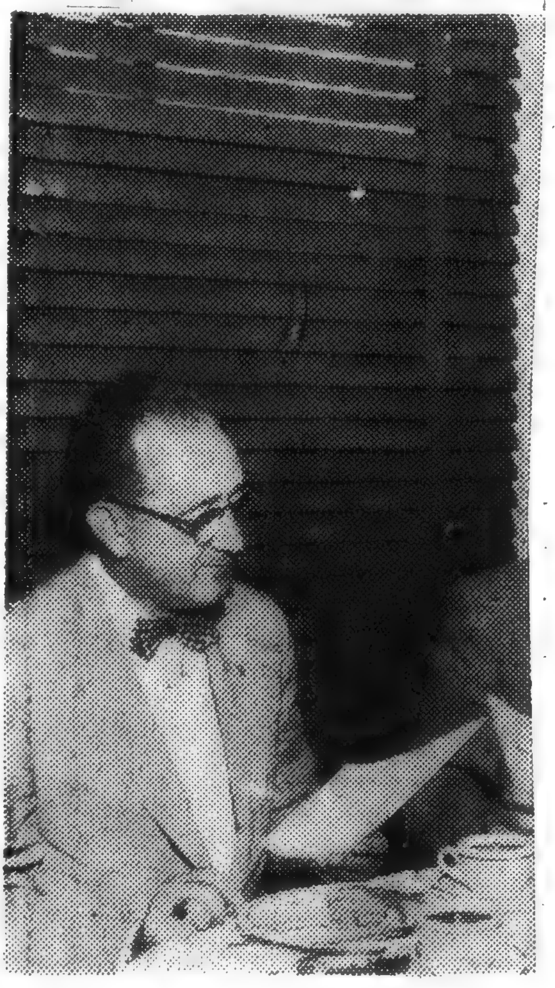
EXPRESS

SEP 10 1953



Planning Arthur Fiedler
Hall Friday, Oct. 2, are, seated ton, president and vice preside Fiedler's representative and li standing, Clark Neily, in cha Underprivileged Child Fund, I

tographer Olson Orchestra in City
d Arthur R. Clif-
Leslie J. Rogers, Orchestra; and efit the Kiwanis

— 6 — LE MONDE. — 6-7 septembre 1953.—

La catastrophe du Paris-Saigon

LES ENQUETEURS ESPERENT déterminer dans quelques jours les causes exactes de l'accident

(De notre correspondant particulier.)

Grenoble, 5 septembre. — Les corps des quarante-deux victimes de l'accident du Paris-Saigon ont été ramenés hier soir à Grenoble. Deux d'entre eux seulement ont été identifiés d'une façon certaine. Les formalités d'identification vont se poursuivre à l'aide des nombreux objets récupérés dans les débris de l'appareil. Lorsqu'elles seront achevées la Compagnie proposera aux familles des victimes dont les corps n'ont pu être reconnus de faire élever un mausolée en leur souvenir. Ce monument pourrait être édifié à Paris.

De leur côté les enquêteurs chargés de déterminer les causes de la catastrophe ont retrouvé dans l'épave du Constellation plusieurs pièces qui les aideront dans leur tâche : les papiers du bord où sont consignés les derniers messages radio, plusieurs appareils de contrôle, dont un altimètre qui se serait bloqué à l'altitude 2 970. « C'est à bord de l'avion qu'il faut chercher les causes de l'accident, a déclaré le colonel Bellonte, je pense que les éléments d'enquête nous permettront de les déterminer exactement dans quelques jours. »

Après une conférence à Nice avec plusieurs techniciens des aérodromes d'Aix-en-Provence et de Marignane, les experts de l'aviation civile et de la Compagnie ont regagné hier soir Paris, où ils vont poursuivre leurs travaux.

A la cérémonie qui s'est déroulée hier matin vendredi à Fours-Saint-Laurent à la mémoire des victimes assistait, avec de nombreuses personnalités de la région, M. Charles Münch. A propos de son ami Jacques Thibaud, auquel il était venu de Grasse apporter un dernier hommage, le célèbre chef d'orchestre a déclaré : « Lorsque Ginette Neveu a péri dans un accident d'avion Jacques Thibaud a dit textuellement qu'il aimerait mourir comme cela. A soixante-treize ans il a eu la fin qu'il désirait. Il n'a pas connu la déchéance. Je viens de rencontrer en Amérique un violoniste de génie, qui, sourd et accablé d'infirmités, ne peut plus jouer. Thibaud a échappé à tout cela. »

BOSTON HERALD, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1953

Symphony Plans Notable Season; Other Music News

By ELINOR HUGHES

NOT ONLY is Boston due for an unusually promising theatrical season, but from a musical standpoint the outlook is also excellent, if we may judge by the prospectus just released by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its 73rd season.

On October 9, Charles Munch will open the orchestra's double series of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts at Symphony Hall, as well as his own fifth year as musical director.

Although the Friday and Saturday concerts and the series of nine Tuesday night concerts are already completely subscribed for, there are still a few seats available for six Sunday afternoon concerts beginning Nov. 1. There will be once again six rehearsals during the course of the season which will be open to the public.

Three guest conductors will appear here during the year. Ferenc Fricsay from Budapest, permanent conductor of the RIAS orchestra in Berlin, will make his first American appearance; and Pierre Monteau and Guido Cantelli will return again this year. Soloists will include Samson Francois, French pianist; Leon Fleisher, pianist from San Francisco; Tossy Spivakovsky, violinist; pianists Alexander Brailowsky and Zadel Skolovsky and cellists Pierre Fournier and Samuel Mayes. Margaret Hanshaw, Metropolitan Opera star, has also been engaged as soloist, and the Helsinki University Chorus will make its first appearance since 1938.

CHORAL WORKS WILL feature Berlioz' 'Damnation of Faust," with Suzanne Danco, soprano; David Poleri, tenor; Martial Singher, baritone; Nicola Moscona, bass; and the Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses, who will also be heard in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony on May 1. Mr. Munch will introduce Berlioz's "L'Enfance du Christ" in the pair of concerts before Christmas, with the New England Conservatory Chorus assisting and the Guard Republican Band of Paris, Capt. Francois Julien-Brun conductor, will visit Boston to give a concert for the Orchestra's Pension Fund on Dec. 11.

In addition to the 69 concerts in Greater Boston, the Orchestra will make its usual tours, the week of Oct. 19-26 being devoted to Northampton, Springfield, Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Detroit, Rochester, Ithaca and Troy. There will also be four concerts in Washington, D. C.: ten in New York City; five in Providence, five in Brooklyn, two in New Haven and single appearances in Newark, Philadelphia, Hartford, New London and New Brunswick.

Cir. (D 189,738)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN

SEP 17 1953

Berlioz Chorals by Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its 73d season in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon, Oct. 9. Charles Munch, now in France, returns soon to begin his fifth year as music director.

The double series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts in Symphony Hall are completely subscribed, as well as the series of nine Tuesday evening concerts. A few seats are still to be had for the Sunday afternoon series of six concerts, which begin Nov. 1. Six rehearsals in the course of the season will be open to the public according to established custom.

Choral works for the season will include Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust," with Suzanne Danco, soprano; David Poleri, tenor; Martial Singher, baritone, and Nicola Moscona, bass. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses will participate in this work and in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony which will close the season on May 1.

Mr. Munch will introduce Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ" in the pair of concerts before Christmas, the New England Conservatory chorus participating.

5

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1953 Art—Music—Theater

—Symphony to Open Seventy-Third Year

M… Guest Conductors

Charl… tioning … Boston … his fifth … Boston … 73d sea… phony … Hall on…

The … afternc… ning c… are c… well a… day ev… begin … still t… aftern… which … als in … will … cordi… custo…

Ch… three … gues… son. Fere… from … man… ches… cros… Ame… orch… mer… Sym… and… ducts… retu…

… these concerts … They are Sam- … rench pianist; … San Francisco … y Spivakovsky,

…atti, a violinist … ston audiences, … the pianists Al- … wsky and Zadel … sts will be Pierre … Samuel Mayes. … aw of the Metro- … ompany has been … loist. The Helsin- … Chorus, which … rchestra in 1936,

…he Sunday series … ists Grant Johan- … n Fleisher. Guest … be Ferenc Fric- … o Cantelli. The … nesen and Brail- … pear in the Tues- … d Pierre Monteux … concert as guest.

…ks for the season … Berlioz "Damnation … h Suzanne Danco, … vid Poleri, tenor; … her, baritone, and … na, bass. The Har- … cliffe choruses will … this work and in … Ninth Symphony, … lose the season on

…h will introduce to … rts Berlioz' "L'En-fance du Christ" in the pair of concerts before Christmas, the New England Conservatory Chorus participating. The Guard Republican Band of Paris, Capt. François Julien-Brun conducting, will make a tour of the United States and will visit Boston to give a concert for the benefit of this Orchestra's Pension Fund on Friday evening, Dec. 11. Charles Munch will conduct a part of the program.

The usual series of five each will be given in New York City, Brooklyn, and Providence.

Godfried de Groot

Ferenc Fricsay, conductor of the RIAS Orchestra in Berlin, is scheduled to make his first American appearance this fall as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Cir. (D 152,922) (S 379,464)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE

SEP 17 1953

Boston Symphony's 73d Season (and Munch's 5th) Begins Oct. 9

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 73d season in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, Oct. 9. Charles Munch, now vacationing in France, will return by the first of the month to begin preparation for his fifth year as the music director of the orchestra

The double series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts in Symphony Hall are completely subscribed, as well as the series of 9 Tuesday evening concerts, which begin on Oct. 13. A few seats are available for the Sunday afternoon series of six concerts which begin Nov. 1. Six rehearsals in the course of the season will be open to the public, according to a new custom.

Dr. Munch has invited three conductors to take over the concerts as guests in the course of the season. The first will be Ferenc Fricsay, Budapest conductor who is now permanent leader of the R. I. A. S. Orchestra in Berlin. Pierre Monteux, former conductor of the Boston Orchestra, will again be a guest, and Guido Cantelli, who conducted here last season, will return.

Soloists Announced

Of the instrumental soloists, three will be heard at these concerts for the first time. They are Samson Francois, French pianist; Leon Fleisher, pianist from San Francisco; and Tossy Spivakovsky, violinist. Zino Francescatti, violinist, will return, and likewise the pianists Alexander Brailowsky and Zadel Skolovsky. Cellists will be Pierre Fournier and Samuel Mayes. Margaret Harshaw of the Metropolitan Opera Company has been engaged as a soloist as well as the singers to appear in choral works. The Helsinki University Chorus which sang with this orchestra in 1938 will return.

Soloists for the Sunday series will be the pianists Grant Johannesen and Leon Fleisher. Guest conductors will be Fricsay and Cantelli. Johannesen and Brailowsky will appear in the Tuesday series and Monteux will conduct a concert as guest.

French Band Coming

Choral works for the season will include Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust" with Suzanne Danco, soprano; David Poleri, tenor; Martial Singher, baritone, and Nicola Moscona, bass. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses will participate in this work and in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony which will close the season on May 1.

Dr. Munch will introduce to these concerts Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ" in the pair of concerts before Christmas, the New England Conservatory Chorus participating. The Garde Republicain Band of Paris, Capt Francois Julien-Brun, conductor, is to make a tour of the United States and will visit Boston to give a concert for the benefit of the Boston Symphony's Pension Fund, Dec. 11.

The usual series of five each will be given in New York city on Wednesday evenings and Saturday afternoons, in Brooklyn and Providence. There will be four concerts in Washington, six in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, and visits to Newark, Philadelphia, New Haven, Hartford, New London and New Brunswick. A tour from Oct. 19-26 will include Northampton, Springfield, Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Detroit, Rochester, Ithaca and Troy.

Cir. (D 31,687)

This Clipping From PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

SEP 10 1953

By Staff Photographer Olson

Planning Arthur Fiedler's appearance with the Boston Pops Orchestra in City Hall Friday, Oct. 2, are, seated, left to right, Joseph T. Garland and Arthur R. Clifton, president and vice president of the Portland Kiwanis Club and Leslie J. Rogers, Fiedler's representative and librarian of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and standing, Clark Neily, in charge of publicity. The concert will benefit the Kiwanis Underprivileged Child Fund, Inc.

BOSTON HERALD, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1953

Symphony Plans Notable Season; Other Music News

By ELINOR HUGHES

NOT ONLY is Boston due for an unusually promising theatrical season, but from a musical standpoint the outlook is also excellent, if we may judge by the prospectus just released by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its 73rd season.

On October 9, Charles Munch will open the orchestra's double series of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts at Symphony Hall, as well as his own fifth year as musical director.

Although the Friday and Saturday concerts and the series of nine Tuesday night concerts are already completely subscribed for, there are still a few seats available for six Sunday afternoon concerts beginning Nov. 1. There will be once again six rehearsals during the course of the season which will be open to the public.

Three guest conductors will appear here during the year. Ferenc Fricsay from Budapest, permanent conductor of the RIAS orchestra in Berlin, will make his first American appearance; and Pierre Monteau and Guido Cantelli will return again this year. Soloists will include Samson Francois, French pianist; Leon Fleisher, pianist from San Francisco; Tossy Spivakovsky, violinist; pianists Alexander Brailowsky and Zadel Skolovsky and cellists Pierre Fournier and Samuel Mayes. Margaret Hanshaw, Metropolitan Opera star, has also been engaged as soloist, and the Helsinki University Chorus will make its first appearance since 1938.

CHORAL WORKS WILL feature Berlioz' 'Damnation of Faust,'' with Suzanne Danco, soprano; David Poleri, tenor; Martial Singher, baritone; Nicola Moscona; bass; and the Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses, who will also be heard in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony on May 1. Mr. Munch will introduce Berlioz's ''L'Enfance du Christ'' in the pair of concerts before Christmas, with the New England Conservatory Chorus assisting and the Guard Republican Band of Paris, Capt. Francois Julien-Brun conductor, will visit Boston to give a concert for the Orchestra's Pension Fund on Dec. 11.

In addition to the 69 concerts in Greater Boston, the Orchestra will make its usual tours, the week of Oct. 19-26 being devoted to Northampton, Springfield, Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Detroit, Rochester, Ithaca and Troy. There will also be four concerts in Washington, D. C.: ten in New York City; five in Providence, five in Brooklyn, two in New Haven and single appearances in Newark, Philadelphia, Hartford, New London and New Brunswick.

Cir. (D 189,738)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN

SEP 17 1953

Berlioz Chorals by Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its 73d season in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon, Oct. 9. Charles Munch, now in France, returns soon to begin his fifth year as music director.

The double series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts in Symphony Hall are completely subscribed, as well as the series of nine Tuesday evening concerts. A few seats are still to be had for the Sunday afternoon series of six concerts, which begin Nov. 1. Six rehearsals in the course of the season will be open to the public according to established custom.

Choral works for the season will include Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust," with Suzanne Danco, soprano; David Poleri, tenor; Martial Singher, baritone, and Nicola Moscona, bass. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses will participate in this work and in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony which will close the season on May 1.

Mr. Munch will introduce Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ" in the pair of concerts before Christmas, the New England Conservatory chorus participating.

b

Cir. (D 180,828) (S 260,088)

This Clipping From
SEATTLE, WASH.
POST-INTELLIGENCER
SEP 15 1953

Off The Record:

'Romeo, Juliet Complete On L

BY MAXINE CUSHING GRAY
Post-Intelligeneer Record Editor

HECTOR BERLIOZ looks like a two-time winner with the new, complete "Romeo and Juliet" (two 12-inch LPs, Victor). Last year his "Harold in Italy" climbed to a classic sales peak for Columbia. Now we have Shakespeare in France, by way of Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Victor should be very happy.

This "dramatic symphony," built upon a French text by Emile Deschamps which outlines the plot more prosaically than poetically, gets its first complete recording with considerable international assistance. There is Hungarian tenor Leslie Chabay for the swift, delicious Queen Mab scherzetto; Chinese basso Yi-Kwei Sze as "Le Pere Laurence," whose role is enlarged to that of a grand mediator between the Capulets and Montagues; and American contralto Margaret Roggero as a kind of eye at the keyhole for the young love affair. (She should soften her French "R"s before she sings another line, however rich the sound.)

All three soloists, by the way, are known on the Coast—Sze with the San Francisco Opera, Roggero last season in concert at Shoreline and Chabay with relatives in Seattle.

"Romeo and Juliet" also has eager, responsive work by the Harvard Glee Club and its side-kick, the Radcliffe Choral Society. But the astounding sounds and drama come from that collection of venerable virtuosi, the Boston men, in a performance which certainly tops the recording career of Mr. Munch.

★ ★ ★

shade of a German, is a new name to us but we like what we heard on an all-Brahms disk for Decca, no thundering but re spect for the thoughtfu

ried and richly pia
pieces of Op. 116
For Victor
Russian-bo
now del

sky's
Nig

Cir. (D 195,053) (S 269,645)

This Clipping From
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

SEP 17 1953

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives a performance of the complete Berlioz "Romeo and Juliet" in a new Victor issue with the tonal richness and luminosity for which it has long been famous. Charles Munch, who conducted, shows a clear understanding and firm grasp of Berlioz's wildly romantic musical imagery. He plumbs the depths of its dramatic content without being carried away by its sentimental excesses. The orchestra is ably assisted in this full-scale concert production by the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society; Margaret Roggero, contralto, and Leslie Chabay, tenor—good voices, all. The result is four sides of rather wonderful listening. This set also comes done up neatly in a box album.

Cir. (D 125,983) (S 379,464)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

SEP 17 1953

Boston Symphony's 73d Season (and Munch's 5th) Begins Oct. 9

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 73d season in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, Oct. 9, Charles Munch, now vacationing in France, will return by the first of the month to begin preparation for his fifth year as the music director of the orchestra.

The double series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts in Symphony Hall are completely subscribed, as well as the series of 9 Tuesday evening concerts, which begin on Oct. 13. A few seats are available for the Sunday afternoon series of six concerts which begin Nov. 1. Six rehearsals in the course of the season will be open to the public, according to a new custom.

Dr. Munch has invited three conductors to take over the concerts as guests in the course of the season. The first will be Ferenc Fricsay, Budapest conductor who is now permanent leader of the R. I. A. S. Orchestra in Berlin. Pierre Monteux, former conductor of the Boston Orchestra, will again be a guest, and Guido Cantelli, who conducted here last season, will return.

Soloists Announced

Of the instrumental soloists, three will be heard at these concerts for the first time. They are Samson Francois, French pianist; Leon Fleisher, pianist from San Francisco; and Tossy Spivakovsky, violinist. Zino Francescatti, violinist, will return, and likewise the pianists Alexander Brailowsky and Zadel Skolovsky. Cellists will be Pierre Fournier and Samuel Mayes. Margaret Harshaw of the Metropolitan Opera Company has been engaged as a soloist as well as the singers to appear in choral works. The Helsinki University Chorus which sang with this orchestra in 1938 will return.

Soloists for the Sunday series will be the pianists Grant Johannesen and Leon Fleisher. Guest conductors will be Fricsay and Cantelli. Johannesen and Brailowsky will appear in the Tuesday series and Monteux will conduct a concert as guest.

French Band Coming

Choral works for the season will include Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust" with Suzanne Danco, soprano; David Poleri, tenor; Martial Singher, baritone, and Nicola Moscona, bass. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses will participate in this work and in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony which will close the season on May 1.

Dr. Munch will introduce to these concerts Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ" in the pair of concerts before Christmas, the New England Conservatory Chorus participating. The Garde Republicain Band of Paris, Capt Francois Julien-Brun, conductor, is to make a tour of the United States and will visit Boston to give a concert for the benefit of the Boston Symphony's Pension Fund, Dec. 11.

The usual series of five each will be given in New York city on Wednesday evenings and Saturday afternoons, in Brooklyn and Providence. There will be four concerts in Washington, six in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, and visits to Newark, Philadelphia, New Haven, Hartford, New London and New Brunswick. A tour from Oct. 19-26 will include Northampton, Springfield, Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Detroit, Rochester, Ithaca and Troy.

Cir. (D 400,454)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
RECORD

SEP 17 1953

Symphony Plans Two Berlioz Chorals

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its 73d season in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon, Oct. 9. Charles Munch, now in France, returns soon to begin his fifth year as music director.

The double series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts in Symphony Hall are completely subscribed, as well as the series of nine Tuesday evening concerts. A few seats are still to be had for the Sunday afternoon series of six concerts, which begin Nov. 1. Six rehearsals in the course of the season will be open to the public according to established custom.

Choral works for the season will include Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust," with Suzanne Danco, soprano; David Poleri, tenor; Martial Singher, baritone, and Nicola Moscona, bass. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses will participate in this work and in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony which will close the season on May 1.

Mr. Munch will introduce Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ" in the pair of concerts before Christmas, the New England Conservatory chorus participating.

Cir. (D 30,663)

This Clipping From
QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER

SEP 17 1953

73RD SEASON

BOSTON, Sept. 17—(UP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra will open its 73rd season here Oct. 9 when Charles Munch begins his fifth year as conductor and musical director.

Cir. (D 39,808)

This Clipping From
FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD NEWS

SEP 17 1953

Boston Symphony To Open Season

BOSTON (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 73rd season here Oct. 9 when Charles Munch begins his fifth year as conductor and musical director.

Concert series also will be resumed in Cambridge; Providence; New York City; Brooklyn, N.Y.; and Washington, D. C.

The orchestra also will play in Northampton, Springfield Hartford, New Haven and New London, Conn.; Newark and New Brunswick, N.J.; Philadelphia; Buffalo, Ithaca and Troy, N.Y.; and Detroit and Ann Arbor, Mich.

Cir. (D 24,512)

This Clipping From
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
HERALD

SEP 17 1953

Boston Symphony Opens 73rd Season on Oct. 9

BOSTON—(UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 73rd season here October 9 when Charles Munch begins his fifth year as conductor and musical director.

Concert series also will be resumed in Cambridge; Providence, R. I.; New York City; Brooklyn, N. Y., and Washington, D. C.

The orchestra also will play in Northampton; Springfield; Hartford, New Haven and New London, Conn.; Newark and New Brunswick, N. J.; Philadelphia; Buffalo, Ithaca and Troy, N. Y.; and Detroit and Ann Arbor, Mich.

Cir. (D 134,403) (S 160,827)

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS

SEP 20 1953

Boston Orchestra Schedules Soloists For 73rd Season

BOSTON, Sept. 19.—Three guest conductors have been invited to participate in the Boston Symphony orchestra grogram, according to word from Charles Munch who is vacationing in France.

Guest conductors will be Ferenc Fricsay, Budapest director who is now permanent leader of the RIAS orchestra in Berlin; Pierre Monteux, former conductor of the Bostonians, and Guido Cantelli, who directed the orchestra in some of last year's concerts.

The orchestra will begin its 73rd season in Symphony hall Friday, Oct. 9, with Munch conducting.

The season will include 69 concerts in Greater Boston. Six rehearsals will be open to the public.

The orchestra will make a tour from Oct. 19 to 26, playing in the Eastern area.

Soloists will include Samson Francois, Leon Fleisher, Alexander Brailowsky, Zino Francescatti, Tossy Spivakovsky, Pierre Fournier and Margaret Harshaw.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

b

Cir. (D 180,828) (S 260,088)
This Clipping From
SEATTLE, WASH.
POST-INTELLIGENCER
SEP 15 1953

Off The Record:

'Romeo, Juliet Complete On L

BY MAXINE CUSHING GRAY
Post-Intelligencer Record Editor

HECTOR BERLIOZ looks like a two-time winner with the new, complete "Romeo and Juliet" (two 12-inch LPs, Victor). Last year his "Harold in Italy" climbed to a classic sales peak for Columbia. Now we have Shakespeare in France, by way of Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Victor should be very happy.

This "dramatic symphony," built upon a French text by Emile Deschamps which outlines the plot more prosaically than poetically, gets its first complete recording with considerable international assistance. There is Hungarian tenor Leslie Chabay for the swift, delicious Queen Mab scherzetto; Chinese basso Yi-Kwei Sze as "Le Pere Laurence," whose role is enlarged to that of a grand mediator between the Capulets and Montagues; and American contralto Margaret Roggero as a kind of eye at the keyhole for the young love affair. (She should soften her French "R"s before she sings another line, however rich the sound.)

All three soloists, by the way, are known on the Coast—Sze with the San Francisco Opera, Roggero last season in concert at Shoreline and Chabay with relatives in Seattle.

"Romeo and Juliet" also has eager, responsive work by the Harvard Glee Club and its side-kick, the Radcliffe Choral Society. But the astounding sounds and drama come from that collection of venerable virtuosi, the Boston men, in a performance which certainly tops the recording career of Mr. Munch.

* * *

a German, is a new name to us but we like what we heard on an all-Brahms disk for Decca, no thundering but re spect for the thoughtfu
ried and richly pia
pieces of Op. 116
For Victor
Russian-bo
now
del

sky's
Nig

Cir. (D 195,053) (S 269,645)
This Clipping From
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR
SEP 17 1952

'St. M
Stand

Symphony Or-formance of Romeo is-
and s long Munch,
A MONG t a clear
the fif n grasp of Bach's "St nantic mu-
Orchestra plumbs the Willem M matic content in his ha arried away by Menge excesses. The Bach's oly assisted in this written cert production by conduc d Glee Club and Rad-and in ral Society; Margaret sical contralto, and Leslie
, tenor—good voices, all.
esult is four sides of rather derful listening. This set o comes done up neatly in a x album.

NO ONE GLAD
ED MY SISTER
NTER? YOU'LL

Cir. (D 125,983) (S 379,464)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
SEP 17 1953

Boston Symphony's 73d Season (and Munch's 5th) Begins Oct. 9

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 73d season in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, Oct. 9, Charles Munch, now vacationing in France, will return by the first of the month to begin preparation for his fifth year as the music director of the orchestra.

The double series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts in Symphony Hall are completely subscribed, as well as the series of 9 Tuesday evening concerts, which begin on Oct. 13. A few seats are available for the Sunday afternoon series of six concerts which begin Nov. 1. Six rehearsals in the course of the season will be open to the public, according to a new custom.

Dr. Munch has invited three conductors to take over the concerts as guests in the course of the season. The first will be Ferenc Fricsay, Budapest conductor who is now permanent leader of the R. I. A. S. Orchestra in Berlin. Pierre Monteux, former conductor of the Boston Orchestra, will again be a guest, and Guido Cantelli, who conducted here last season, will return.

Soloists Announced

Of the instrumental soloists, three will be heard at these concerts for the first time. They are Samson Francois, French pianist; Leon Fleisher, pianist from San Francisco; and Tossy Spivakovsky, violinist. Zino Francescatti, violinist, will return, and likewise the pianists Alexander Brailowsky and Zadel Skolovsky. Cellists will be Pierre Fournier and Samuel Mayes. Margaret Harshaw of the Metropolitan Opera Company has been engaged as a soloist as well as the singers to appear in choral works. The Helsinki University Chorus which sang with this orchestra in 1938 will return.

Soloists for the Sunday series will be the pianists Grant Johannesen and Leon Fleisher. Guest conductors will be Fricsay and Cantelli. Johannesen and Brailowsky will appear in the Tuesday series and Monteux will conduct a concert as guest.

French Band Coming

Choral works for the season will include Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust" with Suzanne Danco, soprano; David Poleri, tenor; Martial Singher, baritone, and Nicola Moscona, bass. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses will participate in this work and in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony which will close the season on May 1.

Dr. Munch will introduce to these concerts Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ" in the pair of concerts before Christmas, the New England Conservatory Chorus participating. The Garde Republicain Band of Paris, Capt Francois Julien-Brun, conductor, is to make a tour of the United States and will visit Boston to give a concert for the benefit of the Boston Symphony's Pension Fund, Dec. 11.

The usual series of five each will be given in New York city on Wednesday evenings and Saturday afternoons, in Brooklyn and Providence. There will be four concerts in Washington, six in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, and visits to Newark, Philadelphia, New Haven, Hartford, New London and New Brunswick. A tour from Oct. 19-26 will include Northampton, Springfield, Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Detroit, Rochester, Ithaca and Troy.

Cir. (D 400,454)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
RECORD
SEP 17 1953

Symphony Plans Two Berlioz Chorals

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its 73d season in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon, Oct. 9. Charles Munch, now in France, returns soon to begin his fifth year as music director.

The double series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts in Symphony Hall are completely subscribed, as well as the series of nine Tuesday evening concerts. A few seats are still to be had for the Sunday afternoon series of six concerts, which begin Nov. 1. Six rehearsals in the course of the season will be open to the public according to established custom.

Choral works for the season will include Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust," with Suzanne Danco, soprano; David Poleri, tenor; Martial Singher, baritone, and Nicola Moscona, bass. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses will participate in this work and in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony which will close the season on May 1.

Mr. Munch will introduce Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ" in the pair of concerts before Christmas, the New England Conservatory chorus participating.

Cir. (D 30,663)
This Clipping From
QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER
SEP 17 1953

73RD SEASON

BOSTON, Sept. 17—(UP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra will open its 73rd season here Oct. 9 when Charles Munch begins his fifth year as conductor and musical director.

Cir. (D 39,808)
This Clipping From
FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD NEWS
SEP 17 1953

Boston Symphony To Open Season

BOSTON (UP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 73rd season here Oct. 9 when Charles Munch begins his fifth year as conductor and musical director.

Concert series also will be resumed in Cambridge; Providence; New York City; Brooklyn, N.Y.; and Washington, D. C.

The orchestra also will play in Northampton, Springfield Hartford, New Haven and New London, Conn.; Newark and New Brunswick, N.J.; Philadelphia; Buffalo, Ithaca and Troy, N.Y.; and Detroit and Ann Arbor, Mich.

Cir. (D 24,612)
This Clipping From
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
HERALD
SEP 17 1953

Boston Symphony Opens 73rd Season on Oct. 9

BOSTON—(UP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 73rd season here October 9 when Charles Munch begins his fifth year as conductor and musical director.

Concert series also will be resumed in Cambridge; Providence, R. I.; New York City; Brooklyn, N. Y., and Washington, D. C.

The orchestra also will play in Northampton; Springfield; Hartford, New Haven and New London, Conn.; Newark and New Brunswick, N. J.; Philadelphia; Buffalo, Ithaca and Troy, N. Y.; and Detroit and Ann Arbor, Mich.

Cir. (D 134,403) (S 160,827)
This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS
SEP 20 1953

Boston Orchestra Schedules Soloists For 73rd Season

BOSTON, Sept. 19.—Three guest conductors have been invited to participate in the Boston Symphony orchestra grogram, according to word from Charles Munch who is vacationing in France.

Guest conductors will be Ferenc Fricsay, Budapest director who is now permanent leader of the RIAS orchestra in Berlin; Pierre Monteux, former conductor of the Bostonians, and Guido Cantelli, who directed the orchestra in some of last year's concerts.

The orchestra will begin its 73rd season in Symphony hall Friday, Oct. 9, with Munch conducting.

The season will include 69 concerts in Greater Boston. Six rehearsals will be open to the public.

The orchestra will make a tour from Oct. 19 to 26, playing in the Eastern area.

Soloists will include Samson Francois, Leon Fleisher, Alexander Brailowsky, Zino Francescatti, Tossy Spivakovsky, Pierre Fournier and Margaret Harshaw.

I suppose you have your eye

COLUMBIA ARTISTS MGT. TT
113W. 57 ST.
NYC

SHOW BUSINESS

Vol. XIII — No. 34 155 W. 46th St.—JU 6-6900.—Founded 1941.—One of th 7 Leo Shull Publications Monday, August 24, 1953—25c

PREDICT 60 SHO

[illegible]

Educat'nal TV Communities To Get $150,000 Ford Foundation Grant

Robert M. Hutchins, former president of the University of Chicago and now associate director of the Ford Foundation has announced that the Ford Foundation will grant between $100,000 and $150,000 to communities that wish to install educational tv stations. The grants would be for construction of the stations.

The Ford Foundation is currently working on a project that will completely cover the entire educational television field. Their report will be published in the very near future, and will supercede all other reports in the educational field.

Hutchins said prospects for educational tv stations are best in St. Louis, Pittsburgh, San Francisco, Chicago and Cleveland. Houston and Los Angeles were the first two cities to begin work in the educational tv field.

Cir. (D 503,999) (S 1,096,738)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

SEP 26 1953

WILL DIRECT ORCHESTRA

Richard Burgin Appointed by Harvard-Radcliffe Group

Special to The New York Times.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Sept. 25—Richard Burgin, concert master and assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been appointed director of the Harvard-Radcliffe orchestra, The Crimson, Harvard University undergraduate daily newspaper, will announce in tomorrow's editions. He succeeds Russell Stanger, who resigned several weeks ago.

Mr. Burgin, who has been concert master since 1920, will continue his association with the Boston orchestra. The Crimson said that he also has been appointed director of the New England Conservatory of Music orchestra to fill a vacancy caused by the death of Malcolm Holmes Fenton.

Cir. (D 124,110) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
SEP 20 1953

Charles Munch Will Open 73d Season of Boston Symphony Orchestra Oct. 9

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 73d season in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon, Oct. 9. Charles Munch will return for his fifth year as music director.

The double series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts in Symphony Hall are completely subscribed, as well as the series of 9 Tuesday evening concerts, which will begin on Oct. 13. A few seats are still to be had for the Sunday afternoon series of six concerts which begin Nov. 1. Six rehearsals in the course of the season will be open to the public, according to a now-established custom.

Munch has invited three conductors to appear as guests. The first will be Ferenc Fricsay, from Budapest. He is the permanent leader of the R. I. A. S. Orchestra in Berlin and will make his first American appearance. Pierre Monteux, former conductor of the Boston Orchestra, will again be a guest, and Guido Cantelli who conducted in Boston last season, will return.

The Soloists

Of the instrumental soloists, three will be heard at these concerts for the first time, Samson Francois, French pianist; Leon Fleisher, pianist from San Francisco and Tossy Spivakovsky, violinist of national reputation. Zino Francescatti, a violinist familiar to Boston audiences, will return, and likewise pianists Alexander Brailowsky and Zadel Skolovsky.

Cellists will be Pierre Fournier and Samuel Mayes. Margaret Harshaw of the Metropolitan Opera has been engaged as a soloist. The Helsinki University Chorus which sang with this orchestra in 1939, will return.

Soloists for the Sunday series will be pianists Grant Johannesen and Leon Fleisher. Guest conductors will be Ferenc Fricsay and Guido Cantelli. Messrs. Johannesen and Brailowsky will appear in the Tuesday series, and Pierre Monteux will conduct a concert as guest.

Choral works for the season will include Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust," with Suzanne Danco, soprano, David Poleri, tenor, Martial Singher, baritone, and Nicola Moscona, bass. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses will participate in this work and in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which will close the season May 1.

Mr. Munch will introduce to these concerts Berlioz' L'Enfance du Christ" in the pair of concerts before Christmas, with the New England Conservatory Chorus participating. The Garde Republicain Band of Paris, Capt Francois Julien-Brun, conductor, is to make a tour of the United States and will give a Boston concert for the benefit of this orchestra's pension fund Friday evening, Dec. 11. Charles Munch will conduct a part of the program.

The usual series of five each will be given in New York city on Wednesday evenings and Saturday afternoons, in Brooklyn and Providence. There will be four concerts in Washington, six in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, and visits to Newark, Philadelphia, New Haven, Hartford, New London and New Brunswick. A tour from Oct. 19-26 will include Northampton, Springfield, Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Detroit, Rochester, Ithaca and Troy.

Cir. (D 152,922) (S 379,464)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
SEP 23 1953

Doriot Anthony Joins N. E. Conservatory Staff

Doriot Anthony, flutist, has been appointed to the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music, Pres. Harrison Keller announces. Miss Anthony came to Boston last year as first flutist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Her first teachers were her mother and Ralph Johnson in Streator, Ill., who was a graduate of the New England Conservatory and a pupil at the conservatory of Georges Laurent, former first flutist of the Boston Symphony.

Sunday Star, Washington DC
Sept 20/53
(from GEJ)

Turntable Talk

Berlioz 'Romeo' at Last

Heretofore Known Only by Fragments, Full Work Is Recorded by Munch

By James G. Deane

Chalk up to Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony—and Hector Berlioz—one of this year's noteworthy recordings.

After years of depending on rare broadcasts and a few recorded excerpts to establish a tenuous, though tantalizing, acquaintance with Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet," it seems almost too good to be true to have, all at once, the means of achieving bosom friendship.

As any one who has heard Toscanini's broadcasts or come into possession of one of several previous (incomplete) recordings knows, Berlioz' "Romeo" contains singularly potent, sensuous music. The magical "Queen Mab Scherzo" alone should predispose any one in its favor. No admirer will claim that the familiar orchestral excerpts are anything less than intoxicating. To an extent that few have had any way of appreciating, however, the usually missing vocal portions are far from expendable; so essential are they to full enjoyment of the music's contours that it is the greater tribute to Berlioz' genius that the excerpts have stood so long alone, like pillars without a floor or roof.

The bare fact is, half of the music has been missed.

At last, thanks to Munch-Boston-Victor, Berlioz' great edifice is for record collectors complete. And as with many wholes, the sum amounts to considerably more than twice the halves. Here is not a group of isolated orchestral essays, beautiful in themselves but without a context. Here, instead, is a musical drama (though neither a play nor an opera, Berlioz designating it a dramatic symphony) which is intense, impassioned, ethereally lyrical, and superbly unified and close-knit, with a perfect balance of instrument and voice which it is an architectural sacrilege to disturb.

Extent Is Plain

The extent of the sacrilege is plain from a mere list of what one generally is denied—the portentous opening orchestral depiction of tumult, stilled by the majesty of princely horns; the prologue, with orchestra, chorus and solo contralto establishing the Shakespearean setting and delineating musical and dramatic themes for later development; the verses for contralto and tenor solo, interludes preceding emotional storms; the choice, evocative little choral prelude to the soaring love music; the stately choral funeral march after Juliet's feigned death, and the entire turbulent, magnificent finale, in which Friar Laurence's intoning basso operates to calm the warring voices of Montagues and Capulets.

Add to all this what we already know—Romeo's reverie, the love scene, the scherzo—and the orchestral depiction of the lovers at the tomb, which was included in the recent Mitropoulos recording, and we can begin to appreciate what Berlioz was driving at.

Munch and his wonderful orchestra do a fine job. I am not especially taken with the contralto, Margaret Roggero, who seems rather too cool, and the other two soloists, Leslie Chabay and Yi-Kwei Sze, are merely good. The Harvard-Radcliffe choristers turn out surprisingly better than one might anticipate. Really, though, it's Munch's show, and minor flaws disappear in the success of the whole. As for the engineering, it's about the best the Boston Symphony has yet been accorded by Victor, which is to say it is excellent.

Personally, I have always hoped for a complete Toscanini recording, and Munch—successful as he is in invoking the Berliozan image—doesn't quite erase the wish. But at this point its chances of fulfillment seem pretty slim, so there seems no good reason for delaying acquisition—a course hereby recommended.

One of the most diverting examples of the charm of the 17th century madrigal—about as far as you can go from Berloizan lushness—yet to arrive is a piece called "Festino," by an Italian contemporary of Monteverdi's, Adriano Banchieri.

In a Light Vein

"Festino" was composed for the feast day held just before Lent. The relationship to feasting is more apparent than any religious connotations, though, for the music is decidedly in a light vein. One song, dedicated to "bestial counterpoint," involves choice imitations of a dog, cat, owl and cuckoo; another, devoted to "a wining of toasts and talks," requires everybody to drink a health, after which he quits singing. A third depicts, of all things, the striking of matches. There are 17 others.

The Primavera Singers, led by Noah Greenberg, do a properly light-hearted job on all this pleasant foolishness, with a break now and then for an interlude on the harpsichord-like virginal. The recording, by Esoteric, is fine.

Madrigals of a soberer vein are assembled on a Westminister disc. Monteverdi and a composer named Gesualdo are the originators here, and the Randolph Singers perform perceptively.

8

Cir. (D 503,553) (S 819,226)

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-AMERICAN

SEP 20 1953

REC RDS

CLASSICAL

Reviewed by Roger Dettmer

★ ★ ★

BERLIOZ: "ROMEO ET JULIETTE" (A DRAMATIC SYMPHONY, OP. 17). Charles Munch conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club. Soloists: Margaret Roggero, Leslie Chabay and Yi-Kwei Sze. (2 12" Victor Lps, boxed.)

At last the complete "Romeo" of Berlioz, and in many respects a superior one

"Romeo" is not quite a masterscore, for it wants organization midway and continuity throughout. Yet it is a masterful composition, with its fabulous "Queen Mab" Scherzo, its Ball and Love Scenes, several touching solo passages and much extraordinary choral writing.

"Romeo" is a challenging score, increasingly wondrous as it grows familiar, a pillar in French music. And if it is not a masterpiece, that alone should not keep listeners from its multiple delights.

At once impressive is the sound in this set—the finest ever captured in Boston. It has depth, clarity, balance and brilliance, which point up some really luminous playing by the orchestra and a conception by Munch much more controlled and coherent than one expected. His work is not consistently perceptive—some of it even is squarish—but the purpose remains grand and the detailing remarkable.

All three soloists sing impressively, and the choruses are student in name only. This is a jewel chest, by all means recommended.

Cir. (D 60,162) (S 59,500)

This Clipping From
CHARLESTON, W. VA.
MAIL

SEP 20 1953

NEW RECORDINGS

Two Bows To W. Shakespeare

Hector Berlioz wrote his "Romeo and Juliet," a dramatic symphony, as he called it, more than 100 years ago. It has been praised and unplayed in about equal measure ever since, its reputation growing, paradoxically, as it slipped from the repertory.

That we may judge for ourselves from the whole and not the parts, RCA-Victor has recorded a complete performance (the first, we believe) as done by the Boston Symphony last February under Charles Munch with the Harvard Glee club, the Radcliffe Choral society and the following soloists: Margaret Roggero, contralto, Leslie Chabay, tenor, and Yi-Kwei Sze, bass.

It is, to put first thing first, a dazzling job—musically, interpretively and technically. Mr. Munch is something of a specialist in Berlioz, and he marshals his musical battalions with a Napoleonic skill. With this the engineers have outdone themselves to record a shimmering spectacle of sound. The album (LP, four 12-inch sides) is labelled "For Hi-Fi Fans," and it sets a new standard for color and "presence."

With this to go on, we may judge the paradox. At its best—in the Queen Mab Scherzo, the Love Scene in the Garden, Juliet's Funeral March — the music is unequalled by anything else that Berlioz or his contemporaries set down. Hearing them, the inclination is to say that Berlioz succeeded in creating a new form, the dramatic symphony. The trouble is — and it explains the infrequent performance—is that all falls apart in the finale for orchestra, chorus and bass.

Suddenly Berlioz's inspiration seems to have left him, and he tacks on to an otherwise moving recital sententious and bombastic sermon which Shakespeare would not have attempted and Berlioz could not carry off.

To call this a failure, however, is not quite fair. It was a failure in the grand manner, which is to say that Berlioz even in lesser moment was man of unique daring and fancy; and it is a satisfaction to have all of him in this trail-blazing score. More and more he emerges as the central figure in 19th century music.

art of broadcast music
6, 1947. On that occasi canini stepped to the
ork to lead a perfor
oes over the interve
on.

he "Old Maestro" f
he concessions he mphony to start w o scenes, his choi pparently unlimi
rces to perfectio

most recent hig
ings.

Ramon Vinay
excellent in th
Herva Nelli is lemona. Giuse
s a rare com
craft and vo artists as
Leslie Chab

Cir. (D 225,237) (S 252,463)

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

SEP 20 1953

Turntable Talk

Berlioz 'Romeo' at Last

Heretofore Known Only by Fragments, Full Work Is Recorded by Munch

By James G. Deane

Chalk up to Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony—and Hector Berlioz—one of this year's noteworthy recordings.

After years of depending on rare broadcasts and a few recorded excerpts to establish a tenuous, though tantalizing, acquaintance with Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet," it seems almost too good to be true to have, all at once, the means of achieving bosom friendship.

As any one who has heard Toscanini's broadcasts or come into possession of one of several previous (incomplete) recordings knows, Berlioz' "Romeo" contains singularly potent, sensuous music. The magical "Queen Mab Scherzo" alone should predispose any one in its favor. No admirer will claim that the familiar orchestral excerpts are anything less than intoxicating. To an extent that few have had any way of appreciating, however, the usually missing vocal portions are far from expendable; so essential are they to full enjoyment of the music's contours that it is the greater tribute to Berlioz' genius that the excerpts have stood so long alone, like pillars without a floor or roof.

The bare fact is, half of the music has been missed.

At last, thanks to Munch-Boston-Victor, Berlioz' great edifice is for record collectors complete. And as with many wholes, the sum amounts to considerably more than twice the halves. Here is not a group of isolated orchestral essays, beautiful in themselves but without a context. Here, instead, is a musical drama (though neither a play nor an opera, Berlioz designating it a dramatic symphony) which is intense, impassioned. ethereally lyrical, and superbly unified and close-knit, with a perfect balance of instrument and voice which it is an architectural sacrilege to disturb.

Extent Is Plain

The extent of the sacrilege is plain from a mere list of what one generally is denied—the portentous opening orchestral depiction of tumult, stilled by the majesty of princely horns; the prologue, with orchestra, chorus and solo contralto establishing the Shakespearean setting and delineating musical and dramatic themes for later development; the verses for contralto and tenor solo, interludes preceding emotional storms; the choice, evocative little choral prelude to the soaring love music; the stately choral funeral march after Juliet's feigned death, and the entire turbulent, magnificent finale, in which Friar Laurence's intoning basso operates to calm the warring voices of Montagues and Capulets.

Add to all this what we already know—Romeo's reverie, the love scene, the scherzo—and the orchestral depiction of the lovers at the tomb, which was included in the recent Mitropoulos recording, and we can begin to appreciate what Berlioz was driving at.

Munch and his wonderful orchestra do a fine job. I am not especially taken with the contralto, Margaret Roggero, who seems rather too cool, and the other two soloists, Leslie Chabay and Yi-Kwei Sze, are merely good. The Harvard-Radcliffe choristers turn out surprisingly better than one might anticipate. Really, though, it's Munch's show, and minor flaws disappear in the success of the whole. As for the engineering, it's about the best the Boston Symphony has yet been accorded by Victor, which is to say it is excellent.

Personally, I have always hoped for a complete Toscanini recording, and Munch—successful as he is in invoking the Berliozan image—doesn't quite erase the wish. But at this point its chances of fulfillment seem pretty slim, so there seems no good reason for delaying acquisition—a course hereby recommended.

One of the most diverting examples of the charm of the 17th century madrigal—about as far as you can go from Berloizan lushness—yet to arrive is a piece called "Festino," by an Italian contemporary of Monteverdi's, Adriano Banchieri.

Cir. (D 149,465) (S 290,348)

This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

SEP 27 1953

On the Records

More Hi-Fi Material

Of at least equal stature for sound quality (in fact, it bears the label Fo HI-Fi Fans) is RCA Victor's complete recording of Romeo and Juliet, dramatic symphony by Berlioz. It occupies two 12-inch long-playing discs.

Charles Munch

This fine recording is by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch. Assisting are the Harvest Glee Club, the Ratcliffe Choral Society and three soloists, Margaret Roggero, contralto; Leslie Chabay, tenor, and Yi-Kwei Sze, an excellent basso, who sings Frair Laurence.

This massive symphony is in four parts. The first and last parts are subdivided into four movements each, with voices, and are generally unfamiliar, since concert performances usually are confined to excerpts. These excerpts, all orchestral, are an incomplete picture of the Berlioz work, of course.

Accompanying the two-record album is a booklet containing explanatory text and the "libretto" of the vocal portions.

It's a composition which demands much from the listener, but which provides much in the way of rewards. And, as remarked before, the recording is exceptional for its fidelity.

This Clipping From
SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
EXPRESS

SEP 20 1953

Universal Appeal in Victor's Latest Offerings

By BILL REDDELL

Berlioz' ROMEO AND JULIET was recorded in Boston's Symphony Hall, a fine recording room, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Chares Munch conducting.

The orchestra is assisted by Margaret Roggero, contralto; Leslie Chabay, tenor; and Yi-kwei Sze, bass; the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

There have been several excerpted versions of this work and popular writers have used themes from this symphony with great success. The symphony was drawn from Shakespeare's great story, the genius of Berioz making a stirring presentation of fighting families and their loving offspring.

These offerings are "must" in your next visit to the store.

8

Cir. (D [illegible]) (S 519,226)

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-AMERICAN
SEP 20 1953

RECORDS

CLASSICAL

Reviewed by Roger Dettmer

★ ★ ★

BERLIOZ: "ROMEO ET JULIETTE" (A DRAMATIC SYMPHONY, OP. 17). Charles Munch conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club. Soloists: Margaret Roggero, Leslie Chabay and Yi-Kwei Sze. (2 12" Victor Lps, boxed.)

At last the complete "Romeo" of Berlioz, and in many respects a superior one.

"Romeo" is not quite a masterscore, for it wants organization midway and continuity throughout. Yet it is a masterful composition, with its fabulous "Queen Mab" Scherzo, its Ball and Love Scenes, several touching solo passages and much extraordinary choral writing.

"Romeo" is a challenging score, increasingly wondrous as it grows familiar, a pillar in French music. And if it is not a masterpiece, that alone should not keep listeners from its multiple delights.

At once impressive is the sound in this set—the finest ever captured in Boston. It has depth, clarity, balance and brilliance, which point up some really luminous playing by the orchestra and a conception by Munch much more controlled and coherent than one expected. His work is not consistently perceptive—some of it even is squarish—but the purpose remains grand and the detailing remarkable.

All three soloists sing impressively, and the choruses are student in name only. This is a jewel chest, by all means recommended.

Cir. (D 60,162) (S 59,500)

This Clipping From
CHARLESTON, W. VA.
MAIL
SEP 20 1953

NEW RECORDINGS

Two Bows To W. Shakespeare

Hector Berlioz wrote his "Romeo and Juliet," a dramatic symphony, as he called it, more than 100 years ago. It has been praised and unplayed in about equal measure ever since, its reputation growing, paradoxically, as it slipped from the repertory.

That we may judge for ourselves from the whole and not the parts, RCA-Victor has recorded a complete performance (the first, we believe) as done by the Boston Symphony last February under Charles Munch with the Harvard Glee club, the Radcliffe Choral society and the following soloists: Margaret Roggero, contralto, Leslie Chabay, tenor, and Yi-Kwei Sze, bass.

It is, to put first thing first, a dazzling job—musically, interpretively and technically. Mr. Munch is something of a specialist in Berlioz, and he marshals his musical battalions with a Napoleonic skill. With this the engineers have outdone themselves to record a shimmering spectacle of sound. The album (LP, four 12-inch sides) is labelled "For Hi-Fi Fans," and it sets a new standard for color and "presence."

With this to go on, we may judge the paradox. At its best—in the Queen Mab Scherzo, the Love Scene in the Garden, Juliet's Funeral March — the music is unequalled by anything else that Berlioz or his contemporaries set down. Hearing them, the inclination is to say that Berlioz succeeded in creating a new form, the dramatic symphony. The trouble is — and it explains the infrequent performance—is that all falls apart in the finale for orchestra, chorus and bass.

Suddenly Berlioz's inspiration seems to have left him, and he tacks on to an otherwise moving recital sententious and bombastic sermon which Shakespeare would not have attempted and Berlioz could not carry off.

To call this a failure, however, is not quite fair. It was a failure in the grand manner, which is to say that Berlioz even in lesser moment was man of unique daring and fancy; and it is a satisfaction to have all of him in this trail-blazing score. More and more he emerges as the central figure in 19th century music.

art of broadcast music
6, 1947. On that occas
canini stepped to the
ork to lead a perfor
oes over the interve
on.
he "Old Maestro"
he concessions he mphony to start
o scenes, his cho
pparently unlimi
rces to perfectio

most recent hig
ings.
Ramon Vinay
excellent in th
Herva Nelli is
lemona. Giuse
s a rare com
raft and vo
artists as
Leslie Chab

Cir. (D 225,237) (S 252,463)

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
SEP 20 1953

Turntable Talk

Berlioz 'Romeo' at Last

Heretofore Known Only by Fragments, Full Work Is Recorded by Munch

By James G. Deane

Chalk up to Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony—and Hector Berlioz—one of this year's noteworthy recordings.

After years of depending on rare broadcasts and a few recorded excerpts to establish a tenuous, though tantalizing, acquaintance with Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet," it seems almost too good to be true to have, all at once, the means of achieving bosom friendship.

As any one who has heard Toscanini's broadcasts or come into possession of one of several previous (incomplete) recordings knows, Berlioz' "Romeo" contains singularly potent, sensuous music. The magical "Queen Mab Scherzo" alone should predispose any one in its favor. No admirer will claim that the familiar orchestral excerpts are anything less than intoxicating. To an extent that few have had any way of appreciating, however, the usually missing vocal portions are far from expendable; so essential are they to full enjoyment of the music's contours that it is the greater tribute to Berlioz' genius that the excerpts have stood so long alone, like pillars without a floor or roof.

The bare fact is, half of the music has been missed.

At last, thanks to Munch-Boston-Victor, Berlioz' great edifice is for record collectors complete. And as with many wholes, the sum amounts to considerably more than twice the halves. Here is not a group of isolated orchestral essays, beautiful in themselves but without a context. Here, instead, is a musical drama (though neither a play nor an opera, Berlioz designating it a dramatic symphony) which is intense, impassioned, ethereally lyrical, and superbly unified and close-knit, with a perfect balance of instrument and voice which it is an architectural sacrilege to disturb.

Extent Is Plain

The extent of the sacrilege is plain from a mere list of what one generally is denied—the portentous opening orchestral depiction of tumult, stilled by the majesty of princely horns; the prologue, with orchestra, chorus and solo contralto establishing the Shakespearean setting and delineating musical and dramatic themes for later development; the verses for contralto and tenor solo, interludes preceding emotional storms; the choice, evocative little choral prelude to the soaring love music; the stately choral funeral march after Juliet's feigned death, and the entire turbulent, magnificent finale, in which Friar Laurence's intoning basso operates to calm the warring voices of Montagues and Capulets.

Add to all this what we already know—Romeo's reverie, the love scene, the scherzo—and the orchestral depiction of the lovers at the tomb, which was included in the recent Mitropoulos recording, and we can begin to appreciate what Berlioz was driving at.

Munch and his wonderful orchestra do a fine job. I am not especially taken with the contralto, Margaret Roggero, who seems rather too cool, and the other two soloists, Leslie Chabay and Yi-Kwei Sze, are merely good. The Harvard-Radcliffe choristers turn out surprisingly better than one might anticipate. Really, though, it's Munch's show, and minor flaws disappear in the success of the whole. As for the engineering, it's about the best the Boston Symphony has yet been accorded by Victor, which is to say it is excellent.

Personally, I have always hoped for a complete Toscanini recording, and Munch—successful as he is in invoking the Berlioзan image—doesn't quite erase the wish. But at this point its chances of fulfillment seem pretty slim, so there seems no good reason for delaying acquisition—a course hereby recommended.

One of the most diverting examples of the charm of the 17th century madrigal—about as far as you can go from Berlioзan lushness—yet to arrive is a piece called "Festino," by an Italian contemporary of Monteverdi's, Adriano Banchieri.

Cir. (D 149,465) (S 290,348)

This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS
SEP 27 1953

On the Records

More Hi-Fi Material

Of at least equal stature for sound quality (in fact, it bears the label Fo HI-Fi Fans) is RCA Victor's complete recording of Romeo and Juliet, dramatic symphony by Berlioz. It occupies two 12-inch long-playing discs.

This fine recording is by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch. Assisting are the Harvest Glee Club, the Ratcliffe Choral Society and three soloists, Margaret Roggero, contralto; Leslie Chabay, tenor, and Yi-Kwei Sze, an excellent basso, who sings Frair Laurence.

Charles Munch

This massive symphony is in four parts. The first and last parts are subdivided into four movements each, with voices, and are generally unfamiliar, since concert performances usually are confined to excerpts. These excerpts, all orchestral, are an incomplete picture of the Berlioz work, of course.

Accompanying the two-record album is a booklet containing explanatory text and the "libretto" of the vocal portions.

It's a composition which demands much from the listener, but which provides much in the way of rewards. And, as remarked before, the recording is exceptional for its fidelity.

This Clipping From
SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
EXPRESS
SEP 20 [illegible]

Universal Appeal in Victor's Latest Offerings

By BILL REDDELL

Berlioz' ROMEO AND JULIET was recorded in Boston's Symphony Hall, a fine recording room, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Chares Munch conducting.

The orchestra is assisted by Margaret Roggero, contralto; Leslie Chabay, tenor; and Yi-kwei Sze, bass; the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

There have been several excerpted versions of this work and popular writers have used themes from this symphony with great success. The symphony was drawn from Shakespeare's great story, the genius of Berioz making a stirring presentation of fighting families and their loving offspring.

These offerings are "must" in your next visit to the store.

9

Cir. (D 123,277) (S 151,479)

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

SEP 27 1953

MUSIC

LP Flood Finally Reaches All of 'Romeo and Juliet'

By PAUL AFFELDER

Ever since long-playing records have been coming out in such vast quantities, and with many of the releases devoted to relatively obscure music, there has existed the feeling among many collectors that the recordable repertoire would soon be exhausted. No one need have any fears along such lines for a long time to come.

With all the recording activity, for example, it has taken until now for a complete recorded version of Hector Berlioz' Dramatic Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," to make its appearance. Since this marvelous musical re-creation of the Shakespearean tragedy requires not only a full symphony orchestra but vocal soloists and chorus as well, it is seldom heard in its entirety. Recordings and live performances of the purely orchestral sections cannot do justice to this music; it must be heard as a whole in order to grasp the composer's development of the thematic material and fully to appreciate the work's emotional and dramatic significance.

We are fortunate, therefore, in having a wonderfully warm, sympathetic interpretation of this gigantic score by Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Margaret Roggero, contralto; Leslie Chabay, tenor; Yi-Kwei-Sze, basso; the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. The conductor is eminently suited to his task, and he has top-notch forces under his command. If he tends to emphasize the romantic rather than the dramatic aspects of the symphony, he still maintains a fine balance between these elements.

Furthermore, RCA Victor, which has packaged the work in a two-disc set, together with complete French-English text and lucid notes by Jacques Barzun, has also seen to it that the reproduction is the last word in fidelity. In fact, it is the most faithful recording we have yet had from this com-

---

Cir. (D 294,859) (S 252,207)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

SEP 24 1953

Fiedler Back After Visit To Ireland

BY TUCKER KEISER

Arthur Fiedler returned to Boston yesterday from a three-week vacation in Ireland, a "musician's holiday" in that he collected musical information as well as kissed the Blarney Stone.

"I was amazed at the quality of the Radio Eireann Orchestra, conducted by Milan Horvat. Mr. Horvat, of course, is not a genuine Hibernian with a name like that; he is a very capable Yugoslav musician. His assistant, however, Eimear O'Broin, is in name and fact very evidently Irish and the orchestra over which the two men preside is a credit to the Irish. The Minister of Post and Telegraph, Mr. Erskine Childers, under whose jurisdiction Radio Eireann falls, realizes that the orchestra must, like the Boston Symphony in its formative period, enlist the services of the finest conducting talent available."

Mr. Childers is the son of an Irish patriot and a Boston mother. Knowing that Mr. Fiedler was interested in securing new music, particularly for the Irish night at Pops under the direction of the Eire Society of Boston, he supplied him with tapes of previous broadcasts of the Radio Eireann Orchestra.

"Many of the talented young composers in Ireland are forwarding manuscripts for closer study, since I could not carry back as much as I might have liked. Baggage is, of course, limited on the airliners, and I did want to bring with me some of the splendid handwoven wool I had bought in Ireland," said Mr. Fiedler.

Socially, musically, and recreationally it was a very rewarding trip.

"I was so constantly meeting friends that it almost seemed that all roads lead to Dublin. Elliot Norton was passing through on the way to the Edinboro Festival. Jean Nolan, a fine soprano whom I accompanied years ago at her Boston appearances, I met again on this trip."

"My wife and I stayed with Countess Lily McCormick, whose husband, John McCormick, sang the Loeffler Irish songs for Karl Muck the first year I was a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. John was a close friend of my wife's father in those days. His widow has just published a book about the great Irish tenor called, appropriately enough, 'I Hear You Calling Me'."

By no means an obscure figure in Ireland, Mr. Fiedler was referred to as "the visiting fireman from Boston" and as the conductor of an organization known over there as the Boston Promenade Orchestra. HMV recordings, the equivalent of Victor recordings in America, list our Pops orchestra that way, with characteristic British reserve.

Enthusiastically Mr. Fiedler reported his discovery of an Irish pianist, Charles Lynch, with an impressive European reputation, although unknown in this country. Mr. Lynch, who has a phenomenal repertoire, may be expected to make his appearance in the United States at a Pops concert before very long.

The Fiedlers met Ambassador Taft during their sojourn in the Emerald Isle and found him a very gracious and capable diplomat. However, they were unable to drop in on another visiting American, Stan Kenton, because of conflicting schedules, although busloads of Kenton fans from Britain crossed the Irish Sea rather than miss their favorite.

Cir. (D 331,853) (S 567,298)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

SEP 27 1953

THE RECORD WORLD

By HERBERT KUPFERBERG

Berlioz and Compatriots

Before the days of LP, a complete collection of Berlioz records included little more than the three "Damnation of Faust" excerpts, the Fantastic Symphony and a couple of overtures. Nowadays Berlioz has a column to himself in the Schwann LP catalogue; several of his disks have attained best-seller status, and, as frequently happens, an upsurge of concert performances has followed the revival of records.

Currently at hand is the first complete recording of Berlioz' dramatic symphony "Romeo and Juliet," performed by Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony with Margaret Roggero, contralto; Leslie Chabay, tenor; Yi-kwei Sze, bass; the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society (R. C. A.-Victor, 2 disks, $11.44).

Last year Columbia issued a one-disk recording of the orchestral portions of this seething and moving score, with Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic. It was a fine job as far as it went, but in the face of this complete version one realizes that it didn't go half far enough.

* * *

One Man's "Romeo"; Berlioz, who wrote his "Romeo and Juliet" after seeing Shakespeare's on the stage (he also married the leading lady), said he tried to compose "a splendid work, full of passion and imagination." Jacques Barzun, who writes the notes that accompany the set, says that "Romeo" is the only large-scale work of Berlioz which makes the listener feel that he wants "nothing different, nothing removed, nothing shorter, longer, or in another place."

This music is full of excitement and tension from the restless instrumental opening—sensations which are magnificently conveyed by Mr. Munch in the recording. The voices, solo and choral alike, surge in and out of the orchestral background at irregular intervals, evoking the atmosphere rather than the action of the play.

Among the scenes depicted are the struggle of the Montagues and the Capulets, the ball at the Capulets, the balcony scene (for orchestra alone—Berlioz said he considered it a "challenge" to write a love duet without any voices), the Queen Mab interlude, and the death of the lovers.

Did Berlioz "understand" Shakespeare? The question, which was raised by his critics back in 1839, seems pretty academic today, even if one concludes, not unreasonably, that this "Romeo and Juliet" is more Byronic than Shakespeare. It still is an imposing and masterful work, and demonstrates that one man's "Romeo and Juliet" may be quite as exalted as another's.

The sound of the recording, incidentally, is crystal-clear, and the singers, while lacking the technical polish of the orchestra, perform with understanding and nobility.

* * *

Franck and Honegger: Tastes change, and poor Cesar Franck seems to be slipping down the popularity scale just as rapidly as Berlioz is climbing it. Nevertheless, the twelfth LP recording of the Belgian composer's masterpiece, the Symphony in D minor, has just been released by Capitol ($4.98), with Vladimir Golschmann conducting the St. Louis Symphony in a performance that dispenses with the sound and fury that others have found in it.

The sound is a little dry at times, but this is one of the most dignified D minors on records. Capitol has also released Franck's Piano Quintet in F minor, with the excellent Hollywood String Quartet and Victor Aller, pianist, in an expressive and fine-sounding performance ($4.98).

Arthur Honegger, born in Switzerland, like Franck, is a Frenchman by instinct and training. His symphony No. 3, "Liturgique," completed in 1946, gets its first LP performance from a rather unlikely source, the Dresden Philharmonic under Walter Stotschek (Urania, $5.95). This is a mass without voices, its three movements being labeled Dies Irae, De Profundis Clamavi and Dona Nobis Pacem.

The last two parts are the more impressive, with liturgy and lyricism going hand in hand in the De Profundis, and the Dona Nobis a rather terrifying march culminating in another lyrical section. It is a work that becomes more interesting with re-hearing, and the performance is commendable.

Finally, here is a delightful record issued by Fox ($4), and called "Favorite French Children's Songs," sung by Paulette Rollin with a choral and instrumental accompaniment. It may be designed for children, but at least one record reviewer is prone to sneak away from Messrs. Franck and Honegger occasionally to replay "Aupres de ma Blonde," "Sur le Pont d'Avignon" and even "Les Trois Petits Cochons."

Cir. (D 187,555) (S 192,261)

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

SEP 27 1953

Berlioz Romeo and Juliet Is Magic Under Munch

By Paul Hume

BERLIOZ: Romeo and Juliet. Boston Symphony Orchestra with Harvard-Radclife Choruses, soloists, under Charles Munch. Victor LM 6011. $11.44.

This is the greatest recorded achievement Victor has yet given Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is music Munch plays with magic effect. It is not music which every good conductor understands and can project. To it Munch brings the tension needed to prevent its falling into mild ennui. He knows what Berlioz intended but could not put into notes. And he has filled his performers with an inspired insight into his intentions.

The Boston Orchestra plays at its finest, which can still be thrilling. The familiar choruses singing with it have never sounded so mature yet so fresh. The music is of rarest beauty and subtle drama.

There have been complete performances of this work in recent years by Toscanini and by Mitropoulos, to name only two. Toscanini recorded only the instrumental sections, and of them, never permitted the Queen Mab Scherzo to be released, claiming imperfections in the playing. Mitropoulos recently came to discs with the full instrumental portion.

You must hear the Fete at the Capulets' and the singing of the departing guests to appreciate fully the ensuing love scene. And this scene, which has been called the "most perfect page in all French music," never attains its full height without the surrounding scenes.

The Bostonians do not seem to have trouble getting perfection with the Mab Scherzo, nor with the entire, scintillating score. Margaret Roggero sings all the music but not quite all the feeling. But Leslie Chabay and especially the great bass Yi-Kwei Sze reach Berlioz' fullest recordings to date. They are right. And, as in the case of Toscanini's "Otello" credit is due to Conductor Munch.

from Westminster, this set takes precedence over all rivals. We dare to pass over the fact that it is Toscanini playing music in which he is supreme. You have never seen so richly designed an album. Two-tone green photographs of Rome's most memorable scenes are accompanied by a text about the Eternal City, by Vincent Sheean. The entire set, housing only the single record, is one of rich beauty for any library or record collection.

Bach: Six Partitas. Heifetz. Victor LM 6105. $17.16.

You may have personal preferences about the violinist to play these sonatas. I have the feeling that when Heifetz decided to record them, he approached them afresh, giving them the finest concept in his musical approach, and, of course, blessing them with a splendor of sound unique in our times. The results are worthy to be the monument which they will forever be, of so distinctive an artist. RCA Victor's engineers have matched Heifetz, velvet for velvet.

Cir. (D 116,563) (S 98,717)

This Clipping From MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS

SEP 27 1953

Record Review

HECTOR BERLIOZ: Romeo and Juliet Symphony, Charles Munch conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by Margaret Roggero, contralto; Leslie Chaby, tenor; Yi-Kwei Sze, bass, with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Wadsworth, director. RCA-Victor, 12-inch, four sides, LM-6011

This difficult and lengthy dramatic symphony, despite its numerous pitfalls for the performers, is here given a sensitive and stimulating reading.

Seldom performed, possibly because of its extreme length and because of the considerable forces involved, this work like other of Berlioz' compositions, has an uneven quality, with moments of lofty inspiration alternating with pure bombast.

Yet so deft is Munch's treatment of this difficult and demanding work, that the bombast seems less bombastic and the inspiration all the more exalted.

Among the soloists, Margaret Roggero is outstanding in the important part allotted the contralto, and Leslie Chaby sings the briefer music of the tenor with good effect.

Yi-Kwei Sze displays a sonorous and impressive bass in Friar Laurence's concluding recitative and aria, and the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe singers provide a rich and capable choral background.

The work as a whole is given a superlative performance, and those who enjoy listening to fine music undoubtedly will find the eloquent treatment it is here given an exciting experience. The recorded sound is of high quality.

9

Cir. (D 123,277) (S 151,479)

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

SEP 27 1953

MUSIC

LP Flood Finally Reaches All of 'Romeo and Juliet'

By PAUL AFFELDER

Ever since long-playing records have been coming out in such vast quantities, and with many of the releases devoted to relatively obscure music, there has existed the feeling among many collectors that the recordable repertoire would soon be exhausted. No one need have any fears along such lines for a long time to come.

With all the recording activity, for example, it has taken until now for a complete recorded version of Hector Berlioz' Dramatic Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," to make its appearance. Since this marvelous musical re-creation of the Shakespearean tragedy requires not only a full symphony orchestra but vocal soloists and chorus as well, it is seldom heard in its entirety. Recordings and live performances of the purely orchestral sections cannot do justice to this music; it must be heard as a whole in order to grasp the composer's development of the thematic material and fully to appreciate the work's emotional and dramatic significance.

We are fortunate, therefore, in having a wonderfully warm, sympathetic interpretation of this gigantic score by Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Margaret Roggero, contralto; Leslie Chabay, tenor; Yi-Kwei-Sze, basso; the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. The conductor is eminently suited to his task, and he has top-notch forces under his command. If he tends to emphasize the romantic rather than the dramatic aspects of the symphony, he still maintains a fine balance between these elements.

Furthermore, RCA Victor, which has packaged the work in a two-disc set, together with complete French-English text and lucid notes by Jacques Barzun, has also seen to it that the reproduction is the last word in fidelity. In fact, it is the most faithful recording we have yet had from this company.

Cir. (D 294,859) (S 252,207)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

SEP 24 1953

Fiedler Back After Visit To Ireland

BY TUCKER KEISER

Arthur Fiedler returned to Boston yesterday from a three-week vacation in Ireland, a "musician's holiday" in that he collected musical information as well as kissed the Blarney Stone.

"I was amazed at the quality of the Radio Eireann Orchestra, conducted by Milan Horvat. Mr. Horvat, of course, is not a genuine Hibernian with a name like that; he is a very capable Yugoslav musician. His assistant, however, Eimear O'Broin, is in name and fact very evidently Irish and the orchestra over which the two men preside is a credit to the Irish. The Minister of Post and Telegraph, Mr. Erskine Childers, under whose jurisdiction Radio Eireann falls, realizes that the orchestra must, like the Boston Symphony in its formative period, enlist the services of the finest conducting talent available."

Mr. Childers is the son of an Irish patriot and a Boston mother. Knowing that Mr. Fiedler was interested in securing new music, particularly for the Irish night at Pops under the direction of the Eire Society of Boston, he supplied him with tapes of previous broadcasts of the Radio Eireann Orchestra.

"Many of the talented young composers in Ireland are forwarding manuscripts for closer study, since I could not carry back as much as I might have liked. Baggage is, of course, limited on the airliners, and I did want to bring with me some of the splendid handwoven wool I had bought in Ireland," said Mr. Fiedler.

Socially, musically, and recreationally it was a very rewarding trip.

"I was so constantly meeting friends that it almost seemed that all roads lead to Dublin. Elliot Norton was passing through on the way to the Edinboro Festival. Jean Nolan, a fine soprano whom I accompanied years ago at her Boston appearances, I met again on this trip."

"My wife and I stayed with Countess Lily McCormick, whose husband, John McCormick, sang the Loeffler Irish songs for Karl Muck the first year I was a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. John was a close friend of my wife's father in those days. His widow has just published a book about the great Irish tenor called, appropriately enough, 'I Hear You Calling Me'."

By no means an obscure figure in Ireland, Mr. Fiedler was referred to as "the visiting fireman from Boston" and as the conductor of an organization known over there as the Boston Promenade Orchestra. HMV recordings, the equivalent of Victor recordings in America, list our Pops orchestra that way, with characteristic British reserve.

Enthusiastically Mr. Fiedler reported his discovery of an Irish pianist, Charles Lynch, with an impressive European reputation, although unknown in this country. Mr. Lynch, who has a phenomenal repertoire, may be expected to make his appearance in the United States at a Pops concert before very long.

The Fiedlers met Ambassador Taft during their sojourn in the Emerald Isle and found him a very gracious and capable diplomat. However, they were unable to drop in on another visiting American, Stan Kenton, because of conflicting schedules, although busloads of Kenton fans from Britain crossed the Irish Sea rather than miss their favorite.

Cir. (D 331,853) (S 567,298)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

SEP 27 1953

THE RECORD WORLD

By HERBERT KUPFERBERG

Berlioz and Compatriots

Before the days of LP, a complete collection of Berlioz records included little more than the three "Damnation of Faust" excerpts, the Fantastic Symphony and a couple of overtures. Nowadays Berlioz has a column to himself in the Schwann LP catalogue; several of his disks have attained best-seller status, and, as frequently happens, an upsurge of concert performances has followed the revival of records.

Currently at hand is the first complete recording of Berlioz' dramatic symphony "Romeo and Juliet," performed by Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony with Margaret Roggero, contralto; Leslie Chabay, tenor; Yi-kwei Sze, bass; the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society (R. C. A.-Victor, 2 disks, $11.44).

Last year Columbia issued a one-disk recording of the orchestral portions of this seething and moving score, with Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic. It was a fine job as far as it went, but in the face of this complete version one realizes that it didn't go half far enough.

* * *

One Man's "Romeo"; Berlioz, who wrote his "Romeo and Juliet" after seeing Shakespeare's on the stage (he also married the leading lady), said he tried to compose "a splendid work, full of passion and imagination." Jacques Barzun, who writes the notes that accompany the set, says that "Romeo" is the only large-scale work of Berlioz which makes the listener feel that he wants "nothing different, nothing removed, nothing shorter, longer, or in another place."

This music is full of excitement and tension from the restless instrumental opening—sensations which are magnificently conveyed by Mr. Munch in the recording. The voices, solo and choral alike, surge in and out of the orchestral background at irregular intervals, evoking the atmosphere rather than the action of the play.

Among the scenes depicted are the struggle of the Montagues and the Capulets, the ball at the Capulets, the balcony scene (for orchestra alone—Berlioz said he considered it a "challenge" to write a love duet without any voices), the Queen Mab interlude, and the death of the lovers.

Did Berlioz "understand" Shakespeare? The question, which was raised by his critics back in 1839, seems pretty academic today, even if one concludes, not unreasonably, that this "Romeo and Juliet" is more Byronic than Shakespeare. It still is an imposing and masterful work, and demonstrates that one man's "Romeo and Juliet" may be quite as exalted as another's.

The sound of the recording, incidentally, is crystal-clear, and the singers, while lacking the technical polish of the orchestra, perform with understanding and nobility.

* * *

Franck and Honegger: Tastes change, and poor Cesar Franck seems to be slipping down the popularity scale just as rapidly as Berlioz is climbing it. Nevertheless, the twelfth LP recording of the Belgian composer's masterpiece, the Symphony in D minor, has just been released by Capitol ($4.98), with Vladimir Golschmann conducting the St. Louis Symphony in a performance that dispenses with the sound and fury that others have found in it.

The sound is a little dry at times, but this is one of the most dignified D minors on records. Capitol has also released Franck's Piano Quintet in F minor, with the excellent Hollywood String Quartet and Victor Aller, pianist, in an expressive and fine-sounding performance ($4.98).

Arthur Honegger, born in Switzerland, like Franck, is a Frenchman by instinct and training. His symphony No. 3, "Liturgique," completed in 1946, gets its first LP performance from a rather unlikely source, the Dresden Philharmonic under Walter Stotschek (Urania, $5.95). This is a mass without voices, its three movements being labeled Dies Irae, De Profundis Clamavi and Dona Nobis Pacem.

The last two parts are the more impressive, with liturgy and lyricism going hand in hand in the De Profundis, and the Dona Nobis a rather terrifying march culminating in another lyrical section. It is a work that becomes more interesting with re-hearing, and the performance is commendable.

Finally, here is a delightful record issued by Fox ($4), and called "Favorite French Children's Songs," sung by Paulette Rollin with a choral and instrumental accompaniment. It may be designed for children, but at least one record reviewer is prone to sneak away from Messrs. Franck and Honegger occasionally to replay "Aupres de ma Blonde," "Sur le Pont d'Avignon" and even "Les Trois Petits Cochons."

Cir. (D 187,555) (S 192,261)

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

SEP 27 1953

Berlioz Romeo and Juliet Is Magic Under Munch

By Paul Hume

BERLIOZ: Romeo and Juliet. Boston Symphony Orchestra with Harvard-Radclife Choruses, soloists, under Charles Munch. Victor LM 6011. $11.44.

This is the greatest recorded achievement Victor has yet given Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is music Munch plays with magic effect. It is not music which every good conductor understands and can project. To it Munch brings the tension needed to prevent its falling into mild ennui. He knows what Berlioz intended but could not put into notes. And he has filled his performers with an inspired insight into his intentions.

The Boston Orchestra plays at its finest, which can still be thrilling. The familiar choruses singing with it have never sounded so mature yet so fresh. The music is of rarest beauty and subtle drama.

There have been complete performances of this work in recent years by Toscanini and by Mitropoulos, to name only two. Toscanini recorded only the instrumental sections, and of them, never permitted the Queen Mab Scherzo to be released, claiming imperfections in the playing. Mitropoulos recently came to discs with the full instrumental portion.

You must hear the Fete at the Capulets' and the singing of the departing guests to appreciate fully the ensuing love scene. And this scene, which has been called the "most perfect page in all French music," never attains its full height without the surrounding scenes.

The Bostonians do not seem to have trouble getting perfection with the Mab Scherzo, nor with the entire, scintillating score. Margaret Roggero sings all the music but not quite all the feeling. But Leslie Chabay and especially the great bass Yi-Kwei Sze reach Berlioz' fullest recordings to date. They are right. And, as in the case of Toscanini's "Otello" credit is due to Conductor Munch.

Respighi: The Pines of Rome; also: Fountains of Rome. NBC Symphony under Toscanini. Victor LM 1768. $5.72.

In spite of great competition from Westminster, this set takes precedence over all rivals. We dare to pass over the fact that it is Toscanini playing music in which he is supreme. You have never seen so richly designed an album. Two-tone green photographs of Rome's most memorable scenes are accompanied by a text about the Eternal City, by Vincent Sheean. The entire set, housing only the single record, is one of rich beauty for any library or record collection.

Bach: Six Partitas. Heifetz. Victor LM 6105. $17.16.

You may have personal preferences about the violinist to play these sonatas. I have the feeling that when Heifetz decided to record them, he approached them afresh, giving them the finest concept in his musical approach, and, of course, blessing them with a splendor of sound unique in our times. The results are worthy to be the monument which they will forever be, of so distinctive an artist. RCA Victor's engineers have matched Heifetz, velvet for velvet.

Review

HECTOR BERLIOZ: Romeo and Juliet Symphony, Charles Munch conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by Margaret Roggero, contralto; Leslie Chaby, tenor; Yi-Kwei Sze, bass, with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Wadsworth, director. RCA-Victor, 12-inch, four sides, LM-6011

This difficult and lengthy dramatic symphony, despite its numerous pitfalls for the performers, is here given a sensitive and stimulating reading.

Seldom performed, possibly because of its extreme length and because of the considerable forces involved, this work like other of Berlioz' compositions, has an uneven quality, with moments of lofty inspiration alternating with pure bombast.

Yet so deft is Munch's treatment of this difficult and demanding work, that the bombast seems less bombastic and the inspiration all the more exalted.

Among the soloists, Margaret Roggero is outstanding in the important part allotted the contralto, and Leslie Chaby sings the briefer music of the tenor with good effect.

Yi-Kwei Sze displays a sonorous and impressive bass in Friar Laurence's concluding recitative and aria, and the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe singers provide a rich and capable choral background.

The work as a whole is given a superlative performance, and those who enjoy listening to fine music undoubtedly will find the eloquent treatment it is here given an exciting experience. The recorded sound is of high quality.

10

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1953

x Art—Music—Theater THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Bloch Concerto for Symphony

U.S. Première Promised For First Program

Charles Munch will return from France this week to open his fifth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His opening program of the season for the concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 9 and 10, will include the first American performance of Ernest Bloch's new Concerto Grosso No. 2 for String Orchestra with Solo String Quartet. The program will open with Handel's Concerto for Strings and Two Wind Choirs, and will include the Second Symphony by Brahms and Tchaikovsky's Overture, "Romeo and Juliet."

* * *

Mr. Munch will also present this program at the opening Tuesday evening concert on Oct. 13. The series of nine Tuesday evening concerts will have two pianists as soloists, Grant Johannesen and Alexander Brailowsky; the cellist, Paul Tortelier; and Pierre Monteux as guest conductor.

The series of six Sunday afternoon concerts, for which seats are still to be had (the other three series are fully subscribed), will open on Nov. 1. The soloists will be Grant Johannesen, Leon Fleisher, pianists, and the guest conductors Ferenc Fricsay and Guido Cantelli.

* * *

The soloists for the longer series of 24 Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts will include the pianists Samson François, Leon Fleisher, Alexander Brailowsky, and Zadel Skolovsky; the violinists Tossy Spivakovsky and Zino Francescatti; the cellists Pierre Fournier and Samuel Mayes; the soprano Margaret Harshaw, and the Helsinki University Chorus. Guest conductors will be Ferenc Fricsay, Pierre Monteux, and Guido Cantelli.

Cir. (D 89,838)

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

SEP 27 1953

BRAHMS SECOND TO BE HEARD AT SMITH COLLEGE

Boston Symphony Program For Oct. 19 Concert Announced

Northampton, Sept. 26 — Once more the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch will open the Smith College Concert Course, on Monday evening, Oct. 19, in John M. Greene Hall. For this opening concert Mr. Munch has selected a program of two concertos, one of the 18th century by Handel, another of the present day by Bloch, the Brahms second Symphony, Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin," and exerpts from Wagner's "Meistersinger."

Other Features

The other events in the Smith course will include the annual Cleveland Orchestra concert, the first appearance here of a brilliant Italian chamber orchestra, the "Virtuosi di Roma" under the direction of Renato Fasano, a recital by the gifted young American soprano, Adele Addison, and the long-awaited appearance of the great pianist Artur Rubinstein.

The Virtuosi di Roma, a group of 11 strings with oboe and piano, will be heard on Tuesday, Nov. 17. Adele Addison's concert is scheduled for Saturday, Jan. 16. The Cleveland Orchestra under George Szell will play on Saturday, Feb. 13, and the course will close with the Rubinstein recital on Tuesday, March 2.

Course tickets will be sold in John M. Greene Hall box office for one week beginning Tuesday, Oct. 13. Former subscribers who did not renew their tickets during the sale of last spring are urged to write to the Concert Committee at Sage Hall in advance of the date of public sale.

Cir. (D 294,859) (S 252,207)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

SEP 27 1953

Music

BY TUCKER KEISER

Charles Munch returns to Boston this week to begin rehearsals for the 73rd season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Munch's fifth season as regular conductor of the organization. Since he concluded his duties at Tanglewood, the conductor has been vacationing in Paris.

Symphony Hall plans for the season include many interesting novelties as well as works not heard for many years. Among the guest conductors will be Pierre Monteux, a former conductor of the Boston Symphony, and since his retirement, after 25 years with the San Francisco Symphony, a frequent visitor on the Boston podium. Later in the season the young Italian maestro, Guido Cantelli, will wield the baton for several concerts in the series. It will be remembered that Mr. Cantelli's debut here last season was hailed as the outstanding musical event of the year.

This 73rd season will witness the American debut of Ferenc Fricsay, the Hungarian conductor who, as musical mentor of the RIAS Orchestra (Radio in American Sector) in Berlin for the past six years, has established an impressive European reputation. This 39-year-old conductor and the RIAS Orchestra shared with Mr. Munch and the Boston Symphony honors at the Twentieth Century International Festival in Paris in 1951.

Mr. Fricsay is well known in this country through his many recordings. He is a champion of the composer Bela Bartok and will include the Bartok Divertimento in his Boston concerts.

* * *

Since the musical world is celebrating the 150th birthday of Hector Berlioz, Mr Munch has scheduled two long works by this composer employing chorus and soloists. We will have Berlioz' dramatic cantata, "The Damnation of Faust," with Suzanne Danco, soprano; David Poleri, tenor; Martial Singher, baritone, and Nicola Moscona, bass, as fine a quartet of singers as ever appeared in Boston. The choral parts will be sung by the Harvard and Radcliff choruses, which have sung so frequently with our orchestra as almost to be a part of that organization.

Mr. Munch will introduce to the symphony audiences another Berlioz score, "L'Enfance du Christ," in the pair of concerts before Christmas, with the New England Conservatory Chorus participating in the performance. This Berlioz work, scheduled for Christmas two seasons ago, had to be postponed due to the conductor's illness.

While not planning for the coming season, Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" is another large dramatic symphony which the Orchestra performed brilliantly last season at Tanglewood as a part of the Berlioz sesqui-centennial. The Boston performance was recorded and stands as the finest artistic achievement so far of the symphony under the present conductor.

Compositions employing large choral groups elicit the very best that Mr. Munch has to offer, and he does them with a restrained authority not always characteristic of his purely orchestral work. His first American performance of the Beethoven Ninth, scheduled for this season, is consequently apt to be of high quality, although Mr. Munch has been disappointing in previous readings of Beethoven, still the core of any symphony's repertoire. Two seasons ago, in fact, an eagerly anticipated performance of the Missa Solemnis was, in spite of its choral nature, very nearly a fiasco.

Of the instrumental soloists announced for this season three will be making their Boston debuts. They are the French pianist, Samson Francois, an unknown Gallic importation, Leo Fleisher, a pianist from San Francisco with a world-wide reputation, and Tossy Spivakovsky, a violinist. Other soloists include well-known artists: Zino Francescatti, Alexander Brailowsky, Pierre Fournier, Margaret Harshaw, Samuel Mayes and the Helsinki University Chorus, which sang with the orchestra here in 1938.

Cir. (D 81,951) (S 101,368)

This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD

SEP 27 1953

DISCussion:

Toscanini, Munch Imposing Musical

A veritable plethora of musical riches is to be found in RCA Victor's current release, one of the most notable in recent years. Four of the most ambitious projects are noted here.

Berlioz: Romeo and Juliet, Op. 17, A Dramatic Symphony (RCA Victor LM/WDM 6011)—The results of this first complete recording of the majestic Berlioz score are nothing less than superb. RCA Victor has done its corporate self proud in achieving as fine a realization as anyone had dared hope.

Here is a work, tremendous in scope, utilizing a full symphony orchestra, a huge chorus and three soloists. All are brought together with complete unity by conductor Charles Munch, who without question is the Berlioz interpreter of the day. To extol the virtues of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at this late date is almost pointless; but the tonal brilliance, the remarkable discipline of this virtuoso ensemble has rarely been shown to better advantage.

The choral ensemble of this recording is made up of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, and while one cannot expect the same degree of excellence here as is found in the orchestra, the splendid passages for ensembled voice are more than adequately realized.

If any defects are to be found at all, they are likely to be found in the soloists, Margaret Roggero, Leslie Chabay and Yi-Kwei-Sze. But even here the work is, in overall picture, satisfactory if only occasionally distinguished.

The accompanying notes, as is usual with most RCA Victor album sets, are wholly commendable. In adition to the entire solo and choral passages, there is a most intelligent evaluation of the music by Jacques Barzun, who is also responsible for the excellent translation from the French.

To produce a recording of such scope is an obviously difficult task; that the RCA Victor engineering staff was equal to the demands of the occasion is wholly evidence in the opulence of sound, the superb balance between soloists, chorus and orchestra, and in the luminous clarity of the reproduction. To sum it all up, this is a truly magnificent set, a definite feather in Victor's cap, and an absolute must for any serious record library.

tomary
cellent.
The clear, notes
aforen

Res
and Victo relea cou
tain last

Cir. (D 124,110) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

SEP 27 1953

Premiere of Ernest Bloch Work at Opening Symphony Concerts

Charles Munch, who returns from France this week to open his fifth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces the program for the season's opening concerts in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 9 and 10.

He will then perform for the first time in this country Ernest Bloch's new Concerto Grosso No. 2 for String Orchestra with Solo String Quartet. The program will open with Handel's Concerto for Strings and Two Wind Choirs and include the Second Symphony by Brahms and Tchaikovsky's Overture, "Romeo and Juliet."

Dr. Munch will also present this program at the opening Tuesday evening concert on Oct. 13. The series of nine Tuesday evening concerts will have as soloists two pianists, Grant Johannesen and Alexander Brailowsky, and the cellist, Paul Tortelier; Pierre Monteux will be guest conductor.

The series of six Sunday afternoon concerts, for which seats are still to be had (the other three series are fully subscribed), will open on Nov. 1. The soloists will be Grant Johannesen, Leon Fleisher, pianists, and guest conductors Ferenc Fricsay and Guido Cantelli.

The soloists for the longer series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts will include pianists Samson Francois, Leon Fleisher, Alexander Brailowsky and Zadel Skolovsky; violinists Tossy Spivakovsky and Zino Francescatti; the cellists Pierre Fournier and Samuel Mayes; soprano Margaret Harshaw, and the Helsinki University Chorus. Guest conductors will be Ferenc Fricsay, Pierre Monteux and Guido Cantelli.

11

Cir. (D. 155,205) (S 259,229)

This Clipping From
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

SEP 27 1953

Paganini's Investment in Berlioz Has Paid Handsome Dividends

By R. H. Hagan

"I SAW a young man full of genius, whose strength and courage might have ultimately broken down under the strain . . . I said to myself, 'It is my duty to help him.' When my claims to musical renown are reckoned up, it will not be the least that I was the first to recognize a genius and draw public attention to him."

That was Nicolo Paganini's own explanation of his gift of 20,000 francs to Hector Berlioz in 1838, as quoted by Jacques Barzun in his booklet of text and notes accompanying RCA Victor's new recording of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony, as performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and three soloists, under the direction of Charles Munch.

At the contemporary rate of exchange, I don't know what Paganini's 20,000 franc investment in Berlioz would be worth today, but I do know that it paid handsome dividends. First, in one of the most remarkable musical works produced in the Nineteenth Century. And second, in what is undoubtedly one of the greatest recorded performances of any musical work that I have ever heard.

Because Pierre Monteux was conductor of the San Francisco Symphony for 17 years, we, in San Francisco, have had one of the most complete seminars on Berlioz ever to be offered in the United States. I was present, for example, when Monteux conducted the complete "Romeo and Juliet" at the Opera House in 1949. And I remember the taut, graceful, and exactly Gallic interpretation he brought to the wiry, passionate, and phosphorescently glowing synthesis of Shakespeare's tragedy that is contained in Berlioz' music.

Yet Shakespeare was not a Nineteenth Century romantic and if a Nineteenth Century romantic (in fact, THE Nineteenth Century romantic) chose to limn in musical tones the pattern and the emotions of Shakespeare's star-crossed lovers, the plot and the characters have about as much to do with the music as the affairs of Scotland have to do with Berlioz' "Harold in Italy," which was originally conceived as "The Last Moments of Mary Stuart."

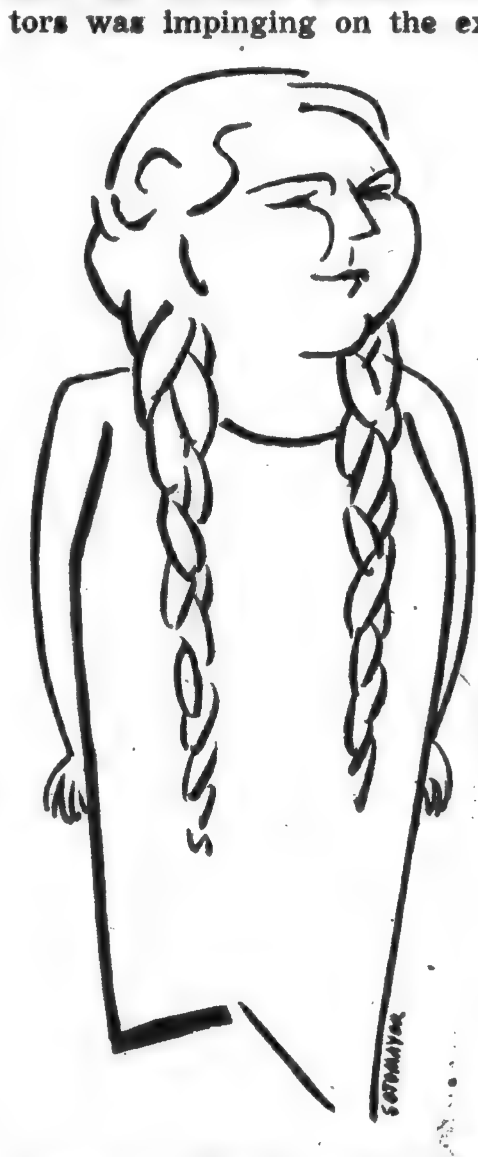
The point being that while Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" does follow a program that reacts to the emotional patterns of Shakespeare's plot, what one feels while listening to Berlioz' music is not music supported by a programmatic crutch, but music existing for its own sake.

IT IS A kind of music that has a particular and mighty appeal to at least this one member of the Twentieth Century. I was wondering why, last week when I put the record on my turntable. It was a night when, for some apparently classified reason, a multitude of airplanes were roaring in San Francisco's mild Indian summer skies, and the roar of those anxious motors was impinging on the exquisite and sinuous music written by Berlioz at a time when the steam engine was probably regarded in much the same fashion as we today regard the atom bomb. One listened to the music of Berlioz and realized (as the engines criss-crossed the skies) that in its taut and electric lyricism, its wild fits of woodwinds and its masterful orchestration (which still seems to make Stravinsky sound slightly plagiaristic), this is pure music in its unadulterated form, much as certain passages of Coleridge have been called "pure" poetry. Beethoven expressed the spirit of the romantic movement, and that spirit has long since evaporated into an intellectual concept. But Berlioz expressed its nerves—and, one hundred years later, they still persist.

Where they persist more than ever, of course, is in the interpreters of his music. Monteux, who conducted "Romeo and Juliet" the last time I heard it, is a musician of exact style and discipline. But Charles Munch is a conductor who has the incandescent flair and vitality that make Berlioz sound as legitimately alive today as Hindemith and Stravinsky. And the fact that the ensemble involved includes the well-nigh perfect string, brass and woodwind choirs of the Boston orchestra and the beautifully trained voices of the boys and girls from Harvard and Radcliffe, makes the whole achievement one of the greatest recordings of the year.

This is not to forget the excellent soloists—and it should be very difficult for local music-lovers to forget them, because they include Contralto Margaret Roggero, who is a leading singer with the San Francisco Opera Company this year; that marvelously mellow Chinese baritone, Yi-Kwei Sze, who sang a memorable Orator in a local production of "The Magic Flute," three years ago, and Tenor Leslie Chabay, who has sung many roles with the San Francisco Opera Company in past seasons.

Charles Munch



Gertrude Grob-Prandl will sing the role of Isolde in Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde" to be presented by the San Francisco Opera Company Friday at 8 p. m.

pold Stokowski conducting, in "Highlights from Boris Godounoff."

The other is a pressing (at long last) of the famous 1947 Toscanini-NBC Symphony broadcast of Verdi's "Otello," which stars such locally familiar singers as Ramon Vinay, Herva Nelli, Giuseppe Valdengo, Nan Merriman, Virginio Assandrai, Nicola Moscona and (again) Leslie Chabay.

Anyone who has seen Rossi-Lemeni keel over on the stage of the War Memorial Opera House in the death scene from "Boris" will appreciate his sensationally dramatic interpretation of the role. On the record, however, one becomes more precisely aware of the sensitivity and the beauty of his vocalism. And although it only contains some of the more memorable excerpts from the opera, Rossi-Lemeni's interpretations seem to me to be vocalistically superior to the excellent but (by comparison) fairly heavy negotiation of the same excerpts as sung by Boris Christoff in the recent edition of the complete "Boris," issued by RCA Victor under the "HMV" label.

Stokowski conducts the performance with the usual admixture of Stokowski admiring Stokowski and Stokowski admiring Moussorgsky; but for

Continued on Page 25

Cir. (D 124,110) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
SEP 27 1953

New Records: Boston Symphony in Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet"

By CYRUS DURGIN

When Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra revived the complete "Romeo and Juliet" of Hector Berlioz, last season, most of us hoped that the production would be recorded. It has been, in a typically clean engineering job by RCA-Victor, and we may all be thankful. The choral and solo participants are the same: the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, prepared by G. Wallace Woodworth; soprano Margaret Roggero; tenor, Leslie Chaby, and Yk-wei Sze, the superb Chinese bass. Berlioz is one of those spectacular romantic composers for whom Mr. Munch has a special gift of interpretation. In this recording all is sweet tone, emotional fire and executant brilliance.

Another cause for rejoicing is the Toscanini "Otello," recorded by RCA-Victor from the broadcasts of 1947 and at last released. This will spoil you for any other interpretation of Verdi's great opera. The orchestral performance is a marvel, the Otello of Ramon Vinay the best in my memory; the Desdemona of Herva Nelli womanly and most musical, and the Iago of Giuseppe Valdengo superbly eloquent. To my mind, this is indeed the true and definitive "Otello."

Schumann by Foldes

A selection of the piano music of Robert Schumann, including the early "Abegg" Variations, the "Papillons" and C major Toccata, and the little-known Impromptus on a Theme by Clara Wieck (the Clara who was to become his wife) have been performed in full-bloom romantic style and recorded with superb fidelity of tone. The pianist is virtuoso Andor Foldes, the company Mercury.

Some fine Beethoven playing (Trios in D major, Op. 70, No. 1, "The Ghost," and E-flat, No. 2) comes from the Albeneri Trio (Erich Itor Kahn, piano; Giorgio Ciompi, violin, and Benar Heifetz, cello). Here are both spirit and style. Excellent recording by Mercury.

If you especially like old music, get hold of EM's Elizabethan Keyboard Music, a miscellany of pieces by Thomas Morley, Martin Pearson, Robert Johnson, Richard Farnaby and John Bull. It is interesting if lesser stuff, ingratiating and flavorsome, nicely done by Pro Musica Antiqua's harpsichordist, Charles Koenig. Good recording.

A pleasant dish, indeed, is Sylvia Marlowe's meticulous playing, for Remington, of Sonatas by Domenico Scarlatti, Bach's D major Toccata, and Couperin's "Les Folies Francaises."

The superlative keyboard art of Ania Dorfmann was never more evident than in the miscellany she has recorded for RCA-Victor—Schumann's "Papillons," Mendelssohn's Andante and Rondo Capriccioso and two Songs Without Words. Three Ecossaises by Chopin, Liszt's "Un Sospiro," the Ravel Sonatine and Menotti's Ricercare and Toccata, unusual pieces by this contemporary theatre composer.

Copland and Piston

Aaron Copland's delightful "Appalachian Spring" Ballet and the equally delightful Piston score "The Incredible Flutist" are coupled on disc from Urania. Perhaps the Radio Berlin Symphony performances under Arthur Rother are a trifle ponderous. Even so, they sound beautiful.

A novelty is Couperin's "Le Parnasse ou l'Apotheose de Corelli," played, along with pieces of Frescobaldi and Rosenmueller, by the Harpsichord Quartet (Claude Monteux, flute, who announces the sections of Couperin's tribute to Corelli; Harry Shulman, oboe; Bernard Greenhouse, cello, and harpsichordist Sylvia Marlowe). Good, if trifle shrill, recording. Esoteric.

Spanish piano music by Falla, Granados, Albeniz and Infante, as ably if not spectacularly done by Leonard Pennario, makes pleasantly, relaxed listening. Capitol's recording is superior.

Mr. Pennario is also heard to good effect in Gershwin's once briefly popular but lesser Concerto in F, with William Steinberg conducting the Pittsburgh Symphony. Capitol.

Cir. (D 345,423) (S 633,364)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

SEP 30 1953

Judd Jr. To Be Philharmonic Aid

George E. Judd jr. will succeed Boris Sokoloff as assistant manager of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, it was announced yesterday by Arthur Judson and Bruno Zirato, managers of the orchestra. Mr. Sokoloff resigned to become manager of the Minneapolis Symphony.

Mr. Judd, twenty-nine, was graduated from Milton Academy, at Milton, Mass., and from Harvard University in 1947. In the latter year he entered the press department of the Boston Symphony, of which his father, George E. Judd sr. is manager. The same year he left to become manager of the Oklahoma City Symphony, where he remained until 1950, when he joined the Columbia Artists Management in charge of the press department of the Judson, O'Neill and Judd division.

Cir. (D 94,199) (S 158,249)

This Clipping From
ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER PRESS

SEP 27 1953

John H. Harvey—

Monteux Shines In Dwindling Company Of Grand Old Men

WHEN JACQUES THIBAUD was killed in an airplane crash Sept. 1, death took one more member of a narrowing circle of grand old men of music—men who have been noted alike as great artists and great gentlemen.

Artur Schnabel died a few years ago. Fritz Kreisler and Georges Enesco no longer are active. But happily there are a few—notably Bruno Walter and Pierre Monteux—who still are before the public.

Harvey

Bruno Walter was guest conductor in a memorable concert of the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra two seasons ago. And this season Monteux will assume command for one concert.

Pierre Monteux is not exactly a stranger here. His visit to St. Paul with the San Francisco Symphony orchestra in 1947 shines brightly in the memories of the many who heard that concert. But in general, he has not had from the public at large the recognition to which his artistic stature entitles him. "He is perhaps the most underrated conductor in the world," a musician who has played under many of the great once told me.

* * *

THIS SITUATION probably is attributable to the fact Monteux neither looks nor acts like the popular notion of a great conductor.

His roly-poly figure, his round, genial, walrus-mustached visage are more those of a maitre d'hotel of a fine restaurant. His podium demeanor is always calm and restrained. When he is conducting he displays none of the volcanic intensity of a Toscanini or the dedicated exaltation of a Walter. Rather, Monteux from time to time simply breaks forth with a beatific smile, a facial expression of one to whom music-making is the happiest of occupations.

Yet it is highly doubtful whether there exists any conductor who can surpass him in musicianship and technical knowledge of the orchestra, or who can set forth a piece of music with greater clarity, balance, structural sense or rhymic vitality.

Personally, he has many friends all over the world, though he is not abnormally gregarious. It is simply that his genial personality, his kindliness, his ready wit, his wide knowledge just naturally attract people. In San Francisco, where he reigned not only as conductor but as virtually a public institution from 1934 until his retirement two years ago, taxi drivers not infrequently greeted him on the street by his first name. The men in his orchestra called him "Pierre" too and so also the children in Hancock, Maine, where he has his summer home.

* * *

BORN IN PARIS 78 years ago, Pierre Monteux studied violin at the Conservatoire, then played in orchestras, coming up from the ranks to the podium. When he was a conductor of the famed Diaghilev ballet it was he who was intrusted with the premieres of such complex new works as Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" and "Rites of Spring" and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe."

He has been conductor of the Paris Symphony orchestra. For 10 years, in association with Willem Mengelberg, he led the world-famous Concertgebouw orchestra of Amsterdam. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra from 1919 to 1924. He has conducted at the Metropolitan Opera house—and this season he will do so again.

It was while he was at Boston that the late Horatio Parker, noted composer and one of America's finest critics, paid him a tribute which is doubly true today:

"It is not Mr. Monteux's way to blaze for a day. He prefers the steady, the cumulative glow."

Cir. (D 26,991)

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

SEP 23 1953

Fricsay, Cantelli and Monteux Are Invited To Conduct BSO

Ferenc Fricsay of Budapest, permanent leader of the RIAS Orchestra in Berlin, Germany, has been invited to be one of the three guest conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its 73d season. Pierre Monteux, former Boston Orchestra conductor, and Guido Cantelli, Italian conductor who was a guest last season, again were invited to occupy the podium by Charles Munch, who will terminate his vacation in France to prepare for the opening, Oct. 9, of his fifth season as music director. Mr. Fricsay will cross the ocean especially to make his first American appearance in Boston.

The orchestra's season, which will extend through May 1, will include 69 concerts in Boston and Greater Boston, of which all are fully subscribed in advance excepting a few seats in the shorter series of six Sunday afternoons. Six rehearsals will be open to the public.

From Oct. 19 to 26 the orchestra will tour, playing in Northampton, Springfield, Buffalo, Rochester, Ithaca and Troy, N.Y., and Ann Arbor and Detroit, Mich. Four concerts will be presented in Washington, D.C., 10 in New York City, 5 in Brooklyn and 5 in Providence, R.I. Other concerts will be given in Newark and New Brunswick, N.J., Philadelphia, and New Haven, Hartford and New London, Conn.

Zino Francescatti of Monterey again will play in a violin concerto, as will Tossy Spivakovsky. Guest pianists will be Samson Francois, Leon Fleisher, Alexander Brailowsky and Zadel Skolovsky. Cellists will be Pierre Fournier and Samuel Mayes, the orchestra's principal cellist. Margaret Harshaw, soprano, heard at Tanglewood in the past two seasons, will appear, in addition to singers engaged for choral works, which will include Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust" and "L'Enfance du Christ" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The Harvard and Radcliffe Choral Society, New England Conservatory Chorus and Helsink University Chorus from Finland will sing with the orchestra.

Cir. (D 189,738)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN

OCT 2 - 1953

Smart Set

Symphony Returns

By BETTY ALDEN

THE FRIDAY Symphony is as sacred to Proper Bostonians as codfish cakes and baked beans. A week from today will mark the continuance of this cherished tradition, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins a new season of Friday concerts.

Tickets are handed down from one generation to another like family diamonds and heirloom silver. And one of the most serious social errors a hostess can make is to plan any entertainment which would interfere with the regular Friday Symphony.

Many of the subscribers are still at their summer homes, but they wouldn't think of missing next week's opening concert. It's a time to greet their friends and officially open the autumn social and musical season. Mrs. Harris Nelson, Mrs. S. V. R. Crosby and Mrs. Boylston Beal will be among those coming in from Manchester. The Edward Guilds will be in town from Wianno, Dorothy and Priscilla Cornish from Centerville and the C. Handasyde Whitneys from Marion.

TOASTS from the brides-

---

the Exeter Theatre.

drama at Loew's State Theatre.

Charles Munch Will Open 73d Season of Boston Symphony Orchestra Oct. 9

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 73d season in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon, Oct. 9. Charles Munch will return for his fifth year as music director.

The double series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts in Symphony Hall are completely subscribed, as well as the series of 9 Tuesday evening concerts, which will begin on Oct. 13. A few seats are still to be had for the Sunday afternoon series of six concerts which begin Nov. 1. Six rehearsals in the course of the season will be open to the public, according to a now-established custom.

Munch has invited three conductors to appear as guests. The first will be Ferenc Fricsay, from Budapest. He is the permanent leader of the R. I. A. S. Orchestra in Berlin and will make his first American appearance. Pierre Monteux, former conductor of the Boston Orchestra, will again be a guest, and Guido Cantelli who conducted in Boston last season, will return.

The Soloists

Of the instrumental soloists, three will be heard at these concerts for the first time, Samson Francois, French pianist; Leon Fleisher, pianist from San Francisco and Tossy Spivakovsky, violinist of national reputation. Zino Francescatti, a violinist familiar to Boston audiences, will return, and likewise pianists Alexander Brailowsky and Zadel Skolovsky.

Cellists will be Pierre Fournier and Samuel Mayes. Margaret Harshaw of the Metropolitan Opera has been engaged as a soloist. The Helsinki University Chorus which sang with this orchestra in 1938, will return.

Soloists for the Sunday series will be pianists Grant Johannesen and Leon Fleisher. Guest conductors will be Ferenc Fricsay and Guido Cantelli. Messrs. Johannesen and Brailowsky will appear in the Tuesday series, and Pierre Monteux will conduct a concert as guest.

Choral works for the season will include Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust," with Suzanne Danco, soprano, David Poleri, tenor, Martial Singher, baritone, and Nicola Moscona, bass. The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses will participate in this work and in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which will close the season May 1.

Mr. Munch will introduce to these concerts Berlioz' L'Enfance du Christ" in the pair of concerts before Christmas, with the New England Conservatory Chorus participating. The Garde Republicain Band of Paris, Capt Francois Julien-Brun, conductor, is to make a tour of the United States and will give a Boston concert for the benefit of this orchestra's pension fund Friday evening, Dec. 11. Charles Munch will conduct a part of the program.

The usual series of five each will be given in New York city on Wednesday evenings and Saturday afternoons, in Brooklyn and Providence. There will be four concerts in Washington, six in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, and visits to Newark, Philadelphia, New Haven, Hartford, New London and New Brunswick. A tour from Oct. 19-26 will include Northampton, Springfield, Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Detroit, Rochester, Ithaca and Troy.

Cir. (D 172,699)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
Christian Science Monitor

OCT 3 - 1953

David Nilsson

In Boston the drawing-power of music for children has been amply proved by Conductor Arthur Fiedler in his Wednesday morning Children's Concerts, which he added to the series of outdoor Esplanade Concerts many years ago. Players are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Here three smaller tots in the children's audience get close to the music. Music appreciation classes in the schools and children's concerts by symphony orchestras are paying off in a nation of music lovers wherever carried through.

Cir. (D 94,199) (S 188,249)

This Clipping From

ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER PRESS

SEP 27 1953

John H. Harvey—

Monteux Shines In Dwindling Company Of Grand Old Men

WHEN JACQUES THIBAUD was killed in an airplane crash Sept. 1, death took one more member of a narrowing circle of grand old men of music—men who have been noted alike as great artists and great gentlemen.

Harvey

Artur Schnabel died a few years ago. Fritz Kreisler and Georges Enesco no longer are active. But happily there are a few—notably Bruno Walter and Pierre Monteux—who still are before the public.

Bruno Walter was guest conductor in a memorable concert of the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra two seasons ago. And this season Monteux will assume command for one concert.

Pierre Monteux is not exactly a stranger here. His visit to St. Paul with the San Francisco Symphony orchestra in 1947 shines brightly in the memories of the many who heard that concert. But in general, he has not had from the public at large the recognition to which his artistic stature entitles him. "He is perhaps the most underrated conductor in the world," a musician who has played under many of the great once told me.

* * *

THIS SITUATION probably is attributable to the fact Monteux neither looks nor acts like the popular notion of a great conductor.

His roly-poly figure, his round, genial, walrus-mustached visage are more those of a maitre d'hotel of a fine restaurant. His podium demeanor is always calm and restrained. When he is conducting he displays none of the volcanic intensity of a Toscanini or the dedicated exaltation of a Walter. Rather, Monteux from time to time simply breaks forth with a beatific smile, a facial expression of one to whom music-making is the happiest of occupations.

Yet it is highly doubtful whether there exists any conductor who can surpass him in musicianship and technical knowledge of the orchestra, or who can set forth a piece of music with greater clarity, balance, structural sense or rhymic vitality.

Personally, he has many friends all over the world, though he is not abnormally gregarious. It is simply that his genial personality, his kindliness, his ready wit, his wide knowledge just naturally attract people. In San Francisco, where he reigned not only as conductor but as virtually a public institution from 1934 until his retirement two years ago, taxi drivers not infrequently greeted him on the street by his first name. The men in his orchestra called him "Pierre" too and so also the children in Hancock, Maine, where he has his summer home.

* * *

BORN IN PARIS 78 years ago, Pierre Monteux studied violin at the Conservatoire, then played in orchestras, coming up from the ranks to the podium. When he was a conductor of the famed Diaghilev ballet it was he who was intrusted with the premieres of such complex new works as Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" an
and Ravel's Chloe."

He has bee
Paris Symph
10 years, in Willem Meng world - famo orchestra of A conductor of th orchestra fro
He has condu politan Oper season he wi

It was whi ton that the er, noted con
America's fi him a tribut true today:

"It is not to blaze for the steady, t glow."

---

artists to be featured at this concert will be Jan Peerce, Metropolitan Opera tenor, and Eileen Farrell, American dramatic soprano.

Other soloists in this program of music of J. S. Bach will be Julius Baker, flute; Robert Bloom, oboe; Carol Smith, alto; Bernard Greenhouse, 'cello; Norman Farrow, bass-baritone, and Maurice Wilk, violin. The company will be joined by a chorus and the Zimbler Sinfonietta.

---

ly effective as a setting of the beautiful text. The other side contains, as what you might call a contrast in similarities, the duet from Gounod's opera, "Romeo and Juliet," sung, as in Tchaikovsky, by soprano Jean Fenn and Raymond Manton, tenor. The orchestra was the Los Angeles Orchestral Society. Katherine Hilgenberg, mezzo-soprano, took the small part of the warning Nurse in Tchaikovsky's setting. A nice record, indeed. Capitol.

The C-sharp minor Quartet, Op. 131, of Beethoven, has been done again, this time by the esteemed Paganini Quartet in a typically polished and clearly voiced reading. RCA-Victor.

It seems strange that Howard

Nov. 2, Canada, for instance, will replace its present 50c design with a new stamp. It is part of the Canadian use of stamps for publicizing Canadian commerce.

The new 50c stamp will represent the textile industry. It shows a bobbin from which threads unwind through an old-fashioned spinning wheel. It will replace the oil industry stamp that has been in use since 1950.

This change in Canadian stamps reemphazies the fact the United States does little in the way, with the exception of occasional commemoratives, of utilizing stamps for native-product publicity. It also stresses the advisability of a move, strongly being pushed, for an entirely new set of United States definitive stamps.

★ ★ ★

Ever-popular Iceland has announced that on Oct. 1 it will release a new set of regular stamps. As usual, they will deal in design with Icelandic history. The most famous of the Icelandic sagas, dating from 1300 will be shown on the lowest denomination. This manuscript motif is used on the other stamps of the interesting issue.

There's an illustrated manuscript from the 15th century called the "Stjorn." On the 10 kronar there's a page from the illustrated manuscript "Skarosbok" written in 1363.

★ ★ ★

The French colony of New Caledonia, known to many American G.I.'s, this week will release a new four-stamp set of commemoratives to mark the 100th anniversary of the French association with that territory. It presents personages identified with the exploration and development of

---

Cir. (D 172,699)

This Clipping From

BOSTON, MASS.
Christian Science Monitor

OCT 3 - 1953

David Nilsson

In Boston the drawing-power of music for children has been amply proved by Conductor Arthur Fiedler in his Wednesday morning Children's Concerts, which he added to the series of outdoor Esplanade Concerts many years ago. Players are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Here three smaller tots in the children's audience get close to the music. Music appreciation classes in the schools and children's concerts by symphony orchestras are paying off in a nation of music lovers wherever carried through.

Cir. (D 26,991)

This Clipping From

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

SEP 23 1953

Fricsay, Cantelli and Monteux Are Invited To Conduct BSO

Ferenc Fricsay of Budapest, permanent leader of the RIAS Orchestra in Berlin, Germany, has been invited to be one of the three guest conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its 73d season. Pierre Monteux, former Boston Orchestra conductor, and Guido Cantelli, Italian conductor who was a guest last season, again were invited to occupy the podium by Charles Munch, who will terminate his vacation in France to prepare for the opening, Oct. 9, of his fifth season as music director. Mr. Fricsay will cross the ocean especially to make his first American appearance in Boston.

The orchestra's season, which will extend through May 1, will include 69 concerts in Boston and Greater Boston, of which all are fully subscribed in advance excepting a few seats in the shorter series of six Sunday afternoons. Six rehearsals will be open to the public.

From Oct. 19 to 26 the orchestra will tour, playing in Northampton, Springfield, Buffalo, Rochester, Ithaca and Troy, N.Y., and Ann Arbor and Detroit, Mich. Four concerts will be presented in Washington, D.C., 10 in New York City, 5 in Brooklyn and 5 in Providence, R.I. Other concerts will be given in Newark and New Brunswick, N.J., Philadelphia, and New Haven, Hartford and New London, Conn.

Zino Francescatti of Monterey again will play in a violin concerto, as will Tossy Spivakovsky. Guest pianists will be Samson Francois, Leon Fleisher, Alexander Brailowsky and Zadel Skolovsky. Cellists will be Pierre Fournier and Samuel Mayes, the orchestra's principal cellist. Margaret Harshaw, soprano, heard at Tanglewood in the past two seasons, will appear, in addition to singers engaged for choral works, which will include Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust" and "L'Enfance du Christ" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The Harvard and Radcliffe Choral Society, New England Conservatory Chorus and Helsink University Chorus from Finland will sing with the orchestra.

Cir. (D 189,738)

This Clipping From

BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN

OCT 2 - 1953

Smart Set

Symphony Returns

By BETTY ALDEN

THE FRIDAY Symphony is as sacred to Proper Bostonians as codfish cakes and baked beans. A week from today will mark the continuance of this cherished tradition, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins a new season of Friday concerts.

Tickets are handed down from one generation to another like family diamonds and heirloom silver. And one of the most serious social errors a hostess can make is to plan any entertainment which would interfere with the regular Friday Symphony.

Many of the subscribers are still at their summer homes, but they wouldn't think of missing next week's opening concert. It's a time to greet their friends and officially open the autumn social and musical season. Mrs. Harris Nelson, Mrs. S. V. R. Crosby and Mrs. Boylston Beal will be among those coming in from Manchester. The Edward Guilds will be in town from Wianno, Dorothy and Priscilla Cornish from Centerville and the C. Handasyde Whitneys from Marion.

TOASTS from the brides-

13

Cir. (D 145,494) (S 272,052)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

OCT 4 - 1953

Symphony Season Opens on Friday

Having returned from his summer in France, Charles Munch will assemble the Boston Symphony Orchestra for rehearsal tomorrow morning in Symphony Hall in preparation for his fifth season as conductor. Mr. Munch will introduce to America Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso No. 2 for String Orchestra with Solo String Quartet. The piece was composed in 1952 and first performed in London.

The program will open with Handel's Concerto in F for Strings and Two Wind Choirs, unheard at these concerts for many years, and will also include Brahms' Second Symphony and Tchaikovsky's Overture, Romeo and Juliet. This program will also open the series of nine Tuesday evening concerts on Oct. 13.

The series of six Sunday afternoon concerts, beginning Nov. 1, will have as soloists Grant Johannesen and Leon Fleisher, pianists, and as guest conductors, Ferenc Fricsay, Pierre Monteux and Guido Cantelli.

Cir. (D 124,110) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

OCT 4 - 1953

Munch Returns for Opening of Symphony Season Friday

Having returned from his late Summer respite in France, Charles Munch will assemble the Boston Symphony Orchestra for rehearsal tomorrow morning in Symphony Hall in preparation for his fifth season as conductor. Mr. Munch will introduce to America at the opening concerts Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:30, Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso No. 2 for String Orchestra with Solo String Quartet. The piece was composed in 1952 and first performed in London.

The program will open with Handel's Concerto in F for Strings and Two Wind Choirs, unheard at these concerts for many years, and will also include Brahm's Second Symphony and Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet." This program will also open the series of nine Tuesday evening concerts Oct. 13.

The series of six Sunday afternoon concerts, beginning Nov. 1, will have as soloists Grant Johannesen and Leon Fleischer, pianists, and as guest conductors, Ferenc Fricsay (new to Boston), Pierre Monteux and Guido Cantelli.

Since the other three series are fully subscribed, this series will offer the only opportunity for newcomers to hear the orchestra a regular intervals except the serie of six Open Rehearsals, which wil be given Thursday or Wednesda evenings at 7:30 p. m., beginnin Oct. 29.

CHARLES MUNCH

Cir. (D 639,869)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
ADVERTISER

OCT 4 - 1953

Symphony In Rehearsal

Having returned from his sumner in France, Charles Munch vill assemble the Boston Symhony Orchestra for rehearsal tonorrow morning in Symphony Iall in preparation for his fifth eason as conductor.

Munch will introduce to Amer:a Ernest Bloch's Concerto Groso No. 2 for string orchestra with olo string quartet.

The program will open with Iandel's Concerto in F for stfings nd two wind choirs, not heard t these concerts for many years, nd will also include Brahms' Second Symphony and Tchaikovky's Overture, Romeo and Juliet. This program will also open the eries of nine Tuesday evening oncerts on Oct. 13.

The series of six Sunday afteroon concerts, begining Nov. 1, vill have as soloists Grant Johanlesen and Leon Fleisher, pianists, nd as guest conductors, Ferenc Fricsay, Pierre Monteux and Guido Cantelli. Since the other hree series are fully subscribed, this series offers the only opporunity for newcomers to hear the orchestra at regular intervals exept the series of six open reiearsals, which will be given on Thursday or Wednesday evenings it 7:30 p. m., beginning Oct. 29.

Cir. (D 189,738)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN

OCT 3 - 1953

Symphony Rehearsal

Boston Symphony Orchestra members will assemble for the season's first rehearsal Monday morning in Symphony Hall, with Charles Munch conducting. Mr. Munch, refreshed after a summer in France, will initiate his fifth season as conductor at next week's Friday afternoon concert.

He will introduce to America Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso No. 2 String Orchestra with Solo String Quartet. The piece was composed in 1952 and first performed in London.

The program will open with Handel's Concerto in F for Strings and Two Wind Choirs, unheard at these concerts for many years.

The series of six Sunday afternoon concerts, beginning Nov. 1, will have as soloists Grant Johanneseff and Leon Fleisher, pianists, and as guest conductors, Ferenc Fricsay, Pierre Monteux and Guido Cantelli.

Since the other three series are fully subscribed, this series offers the only opportunity for newcomers to hear the Orchestra at regular intervals except the series of six Open Rehearsals. These latter will be given on Thursday or Wednesday evenings at 7:30, beginning Oct. 29.

Cir. (D 15,781)

This Clipping From
MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD

OCT 5 - 1953

Il Trovatore At Loew's, Waterbury

ELINOR WARREN

When the Charles L. Wagner Production of IL TROVATORE plays Tuesday, Oct. 16th at the Loew's Poli Theatre Waterbury, the role of the gypsy, Azucena will be played by the young American mezzo soprano, Elinor Warren.

A native of New York City, Miss Warren received all her musical training there. She was the recipient of Scholarships at the Tanglewood Berkshire Festival in Massachusetts, and the Kathryn Turney Long Scholarship with the Metropolitan Opera Association in 1949 and 1950.

Miss Warren has recently concluded a highly successful concert tour which took her into almost every one of the 48 states and Canada, under the sponsorship of the Civic Concert Association with the Bakaleinikoff Sinfonietta. She has also appeared on radio, television and in oratorio.

Cir. (D 215,218)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER

OCT 5 - 1953

Boston Symphony Rehearsal Today

Charles Munch called the Boston Symphony Orchestra into rehearsal today in preparation for his fifth season as conductor.

At the first concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday night, Mr. Munch will introduce to America Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso No. 2 for String Orchestra with Solo String Quartet, which was performed in London shortly after it was composed last year.

Also on the program, which will open the Tuesday evening concerts Oct. 13, too, will be Handel's Concerto in F for Strings and Two Wind Choirs, Brahms' Second Symphony and Tchaikovsky's Overture, Romeo and Juliet.

Only seats available now are for the Sunday afternoon concerts starting November 1 and for the six open rehearsals, beginning Oct. 29.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

OCT 4 - 1953

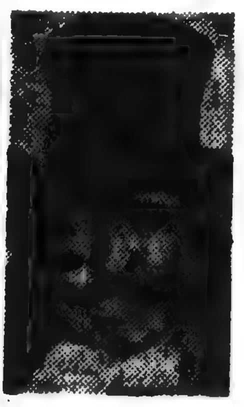
On the Record

Shakespeare a la Toscanini and Verdi, Munch, and Berlioz

By Claudia Cassidy

SALUTING a giant, both Verdi and Berlioz crossed Shakespeare's threshold with a thunderclap of sound. That is about all the resemblance you will find between the Italian's "Otello" and the Frenchman's "Romeo and Juliet," for the one reciprocates the poet's genius, the other reacts to it as violently as an emotional seismograf. Unique in themselves, the scores are fascinating in juxtaposition, and Victor is underscoring the contrast by simultaneous release of the "Otello" of Arturo Toscanini and the "Romeo and Juliet" of Charles Munch.

Berlioz



Verdi

"Otello" [LM-6107; three records] is a belated release from the NBC orchestra broadcasts in December, 1947, with their strong points and their weaknesses, the blaze of Toscanini compelling fusion. It is not the glory an "Otello" should be with such a Verdi man at the helm, for the lack of great singing actors dilutes tragedy to poignancy and blunts the rapier edge of ironic jest. But it is musically authentic, which means Verdi as rare as it is revealing, for Verdi's orchestra speaks straight from the opera's heart.

Ramon Vinay's Otello, a new venture in those days, has the basic voice and the elemental qualities for which he was chosen. He also has a bad wobble and a tepid death scene. Herva Nelli is a weak Desdemona, best when she can float a line of childlike innocence. Giuseppe Valdengo is the baritone, but no Iago. The chorus, like the orchestra, speaks Toscanini's language. The recording is good, and the handsome libretto gives the text in Boito's Italian, in English, and, in a third column, the Shakespearean source.

"Romeo and Juliet" [LM-6011] was recorded by Munch and the Boston orchestra in Boston's Symphony hall last February, with Margaret Roggero, contralto, Leslie Chabay, tenor, Yi-Kwei Sze, bass, the Harvard Glee club, and the Radcliffe Choral society. Like the score itself, this is a bold, audacious, febrile performance, recorded so brilliantly it slashes the air with glittering sound. In this uncut "dramatic symphony" the orchestra — Berlioz' fabulous orchestra—is the protagonist, soloists and chorus being content with narration and commentary until Yi-Kwei Sze as a notable Friar Laurence commands the fugal furies of the finale. In this "Romeo and Juliet" feeling runs strong rather than deep. It is Munch at his seismografic best, plus notes and translation by Jacques Barzun.

• • •

Chopin: Sonata in B minor, Barcarolle in F sharp major, Nocturne in D flat major, Mazurka No. 32, in C sharp minor, played by Dinu Lipatti [Columbia ML-4721]. Recorded in 1947 and 1948, this is not up to the high standard of the extraordinary young pianist most of us know only by records released after his death. He often was desperately ill in those last years, and the sonata in particular sounds as if he could not summon the strength to be more than a shadow of himself. Passages emerge, notably in the feathery scherzo, but don't take this Chopin as Lipatti's measure. He was bigger than that.

• • •

Andres Segovia: Plays Castelnuovo-Tedesco's Concerto for Guitar and Orchestra, with Alec Sherman conducting the New London orchestra, plus Ponce's Rondo on a Theme by F. Sor, Two Studies by Villa-Lobos, Ponce's Sonatina Meridional, and Turina's Fandanguilla [Columbia ML-4732]. Homesick for his Tuscan hills, the Florentine has written more than one nostalgic memoir for his friend of the Spanish guitar. His concerto is light of texture but not altogether light of heart—it has the sound of troubadours, who must sometimes sing sad songs. Along with more traditional Segovia fare it is beautifully done in true Segovia fashion.

• • •

Respighi Resplendent: "The Pines of Rome" and "The Fountains of Rome," played by the NBC orchestra, Arturo Toscanini conducting [Victor LM-1768]. Was ever one record so handsomely housed? Bernini fountains and Roman pines beautifully photografed, along with the maestro. Text by Vincent Sheean, who knows when to stop. And two of Toscanini's dazzlers, so shimmering they almost make you shelve your conviction that the music may not last as long as Rome.

Cir. (D 145,494) (S 272,057)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

OCT 4 - 1953

CHARLES MUNCH, who starts his fifth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts at Symphony Hall this week.

13

Cir. (D 145,494) (S 272,057)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

OCT 4 - 1953

Symphony Season Opens on Friday

Having returned from his summer in France, Charles Munch will assemble the Boston Symphony Orchestra for rehearsal tomorrow morning in Symphony Hall in preparation for his fifth season as conductor. Mr. Munch will introduce to America Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso No. 2 for String Orchestra with Solo String Quartet. The piece was composed in 1952 and first performed in London.

The program will open with Handel's Concerto in F for Strings and Two Wind Choirs, unheard at these concerts for many years, and will also include Brahms' Second Symphony and Tchaikovsky's Overture, Romeo and Juliet. This program will also open the series of nine Tuesday evening concerts on Oct. 13.

The series of six Sunday afternoon concerts, beginning Nov. 1, will have as soloists Grant Johannesen and Leon Fleisher, pianists, and as guest conductors, Ferenc Fricsay, Pierre Monteux and Guido Cantelli.

Cir. (D 124,110) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

OCT 4 - 1953

Munch Returns for Opening of Symphony Season Friday

Having returned from his late Summer respite in France, Charles Munch will assemble the Boston Symphony Orchestra for rehearsal tomorrow morning in Symphony Hall in preparation for his fifth season as conductor. Mr. Munch will introduce to America at the opening concerts Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:30, Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso No. 2 for String Orchestra with Solo String Quartet. The piece was composed in 1952 and first performed in London.

The program will open with Handel's Concerto in F for Strings and Two Wind Choirs, unheard at these concerts for many years, and will also include Brahm's Second Symphony and Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet." This program will also open the series of nine Tuesday evening concerts Oct. 13.

The series of six Sunday afternoon concerts, beginning Nov. 1, will have as soloists Grant Johannesen and Leon Fleischer, pianists, and as guest conductors, Ferenc Fricsay (new to Boston), Pierre Monteux and Guido Cantelli.

Since the other three series are fully subscribed, this series will offer the only opportunity for newcomers to hear the orchestra at regular intervals except the series of six Open Rehearsals, which will be given Thursday or Wednesday evenings at 7:30 p. m., beginning Oct. 29.

CHARLES MUNCH

Cir. (D 639,869)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
ADVERTISER

OCT 4 - 1953

Symphony In Rehearsal

Having returned from his summer in France, Charles Munch will assemble the Boston Symphony Orchestra for rehearsal tomorrow morning in Symphony Hall in preparation for his fifth season as conductor.

Munch will introduce to America Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso No. 2 for string orchestra with solo string quartet.

The program will open with Handel's Concerto in F for strings and two wind choirs, not heard at these concerts for many years, and will also include Brahms' Second Symphony and Tchaikovsky's Overture, Romeo and Juliet. This program will also open the series of nine Tuesday evening concerts on Oct. 13.

The series of six Sunday afternoon concerts, begining Nov. 1, will have as soloists Grant Johannesen and Leon Fleisher, pianists, and as guest conductors, Ferenc Fricsay, Pierre Monteux and Guido Cantelli. Since the other three series are fully subscribed, this series offers the only opportunity for newcomers to hear the orchestra at regular intervals except the series of six open rehearsals, which will be given on Thursday or Wednesday evenings at 7:30 p. m., beginning Oct. 29.

This Clipping From
MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD

OCT 5 - 1953

Il Trovatore At Loew's, Waterbury

ELINOR WARREN

When the Charles L. Wagner Production of IL TROVATORE plays Tuesday, Oct. 16th at the Loew's Poli Theatre Waterbury, the role of the gypsy, Azucena will be played by the young American mezzo soprano, Elinor Warren.

A native of New York City, Miss Warren received all her musical training there. She was the recipient of Scholarships at the Tanglewood Berkshire Festival in Massachusetts, and the Kathryn Turney Long Scholarship with the Metropolitan Opera Association in 1949 and 1950.

Miss Warren has recently concluded a highly successful concert tour which took her into almost every one of the 48 states and Canada, under the sponsorship of the Civic Concert Association with the Bakaleinikoff Sinfonietta. She has also appeared on radio, television and in oratorio.

Cir. (D 215,218)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER

OCT 5 - 1953

Boston Symphony Rehearsal Today

Charles Munch called the Boston Symphony Orchestra into rehearsal today in preparation for his fifth season as conductor.

At the first concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday night, Mr. Munch will introduce to America Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso No. 2 for String Orchestra with Solo String Quartet, which was performed in London shortly after it was composed last year.

Also on the program, which will open the Tuesday evening concerts Oct. 13, too, will be Handel's Concerto in F for Strings and Two Wind Choirs, Brahms' Second Symphony and Tchaikovsky's Overture, Romeo and Juliet.

Only seats available now are for the Sunday afternoon concerts starting November 1 and for the six open rehearsals, beginning Oct. 29.

Cir. (D 189,738)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN

OCT 3 - 1953

Symphony Rehearsal

Boston Symphony Orchestra members will assemble for the season's first rehearsal Monday morning in Symphony Hall, with Charles Munch conducting. Mr. Munch, refreshed after a summer in France, will initiate his fifth season as conductor at next week's Friday afternoon concert.

He will introduce to America Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso No. 2 String Orchestra with Solo String Quartet. The piece was composed in 1952 and first performed in London.

The program will open with Handel's Concerto in F for Strings and Two Wind Choirs, unheard at these concerts for many years.

The series of six Sunday afternoon concerts, beginning Nov. 1, will have as soloists Grant Johannesen and Leon Fleisher, pianists, and as guest conductors, Ferenc Fricsay, Pierre Monteux and Guido Cantelli.

Since the other three series are fully subscribed, this series offers the only opportunity for newcomers to hear the Orchestra at regular intervals except the series of six Open Rehearsals. These latter will be given on Thursday or Wednesday evenings at 7:30, beginning Oct. 29.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

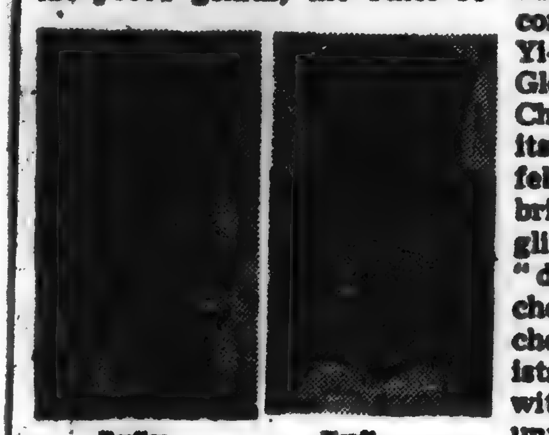
OCT 4 - 1953

On the Record

Shakespeare a la Toscanini and Verdi, Munch, and Berlioz

By Claudia Cassidy

SALUTING a giant, both Verdi and Berlioz crossed Shakespeare's threshold with a thunderclap of sound. That is about all the resemblance you will find between the Italian's "Otello" and the Frenchman's "Romeo and Juliet," for the one reciprocates the poet's genius, the other reacts to it as violently as an emotional seismograf. Unique in themselves, the scores are fascinating in juxtaposition, and Victor is underscoring the contrast by simultaneous release of the "Otello" of Arturo Toscanini and the "Romeo and Juliet" of Charles Munch.



Berlioz Verdi

"Otello" [LM-6107; three records] is a belated release from the NBC orchestra broadcasts in December, 1947, with their strong points and their weaknesses, the blaze of Toscanini compelling fusion. It is not the glory an "Otello" should be with such a Verdi man at the helm, for the lack of great singing actors dilutes tragedy to poignancy and blunts the rapier edge of ironic jest. But it is musically authentic, which means Verdi as rare as it is revealing, for Verdi's orchestra speaks straight from the opera's heart.

Ramon Vinay's Otello, a new venture in those days, has the basic voice and the elemental qualities for which he was chosen. He also has a bad wobble and a tepid death scene. Herva Nelli is a weak Desdemona, best when she can float a line of childlike innocence. Giuseppe Valdengo is the baritone, but no Iago. The chorus, like the orchestra, speaks Toscanini's language. The recording is good, and the handsome libretto gives the text in Boito's Italian, in English, and, in a third column, the Shakespearean source.

"Romeo and Juliet" [LM-6011] was recorded by Munch and the Boston orchestra in Boston's Symphony hall last February, with Margaret Roggero, contralto, Leslie Chabay, tenor, Yi-Kwei Sze, bass, the Harvard Glee club, and the Radcliffe Choral society. Like the score itself, this is a bold, audacious, febrile performance, recorded so brilliantly it slashes the air with glittering sound. In this uncut "dramatic symphony" the orchestra — Berlioz' fabulous orchestra—is the protagonist, soloists and chorus being content with narration and commentary until Yi-Kwei Sze as a notable Friar Laurence commands the fugal furies of the finale. In this "Romeo and Juliet" feeling runs strong rather than deep. It is Munch at his seismografic best, plus notes and translation by Jacques Barzun.

• • •

Chopin: Sonata in B minor, Barcarolle in F sharp major, Nocturne in D flat major, Mazurka No. 32, in C sharp minor, played by Dinu Lipatti [Columbia ML-4721]. Recorded in 1947 and 1948, this is not up to the high standard of the extraordinary young pianist most of us know only by records released after his death. He often was desperately ill in those last years, and the sonata in particular sounds as if he could not summon the strength to be more than a shadow of himself. Passages emerge, notably in the feathery scherzo, but don't take this Chopin as Lipatti's measure. He was bigger than that.

• • •

Andres Segovia: Plays Castelnuovo-Tedesco's Concerto for Guitar and Orchestra, with Alec Sherman conducting the New London orchestra, plus Ponce's Rondo on a Theme by F. Sor, Two Studies by Villa-Lobos, Ponce's Sonatina Meridional, and Turina's Fandanguilla [Columbia ML-4732]. Homesick for his Tuscan hills, the Florentine has written more than one nostalgic memoir for his friend of the Spanish guitar. His concerto is light of texture but not altogether light of heart—it has the sound of troubadours, who must sometimes sing sad songs. Along with more traditional Segovia fare it is beautifully done in true Segovia fashion.

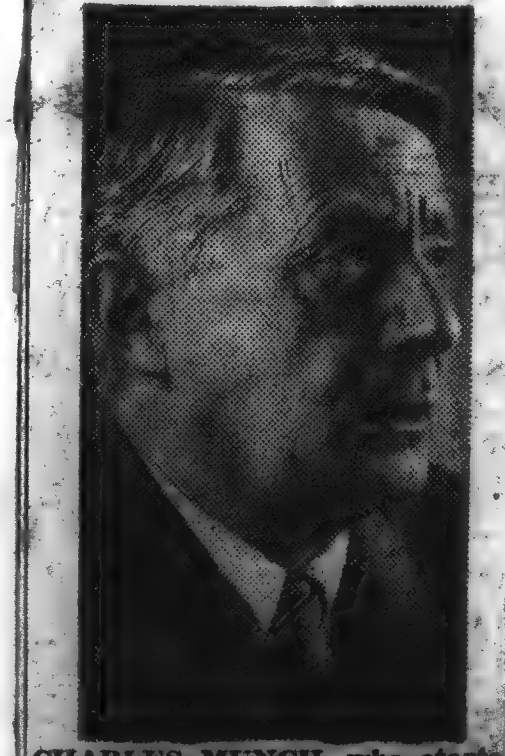
• • •

Respighi Resplendent: "The Pines of Rome" and "The Fountains of Rome," played by the NBC orchestra, Arturo Toscanini conducting [Victor LM-1768]. Was ever one record so handsomely housed? Bernini fountains and Roman pines beautifully photografed, along with the maestro. Text by Vincent Sheean, who knows when to stop. And two of Toscanini's dazzlers, so shimmering they almost make you shelve your conviction that the music may not last as long as Rome.

Cir. (D 145,494) (S 272,057)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

OCT 4 - 1953



CHARLES MUNCH, who starts his fifth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts at Symphony Hall this week.

14

— Bloch for Opening Symphony

John Brook

Rehearsal view of Charles Munch, who will open his fifth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon.

Second Concerto Grosso To Have First U.S. Hearing

By Klaus George Roy

The seventy-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens Friday and Saturday. For the first pair of concerts, Charles Munch has chosen a program including the Second Symphony of Brahms and Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Overture, as well as two concertos in baroque style: one by Handel, the other by Bloch.

We say "in the baroque style" rather than "from the baroque period." While Handel, of course, was an 18th-century master, Ernest Bloch is a creative artist of our day. Yet, within a minute after the beginning of Bloch's Concerto Grosso No. 2 for String Orchestra, it will be clear to listeners that the spirit as well as the method of the so-called baroque period in music is being evoked, partially in terms of the 20th century.

From now on, it will no longer be possible to speak simply of "Bloch's Concerto Grosso," as has been the custom in the past. This work is the composer's second essay in the medium, where a smaller instrumental body collaborates with (not competes with) a larger orchestral group. In his first composition of this type, dated 1925, Bloch utilized an obbligato piano as his contrast to the strings; here, he employs a concertante string quartet as a textural foil to the massed strings.

* * *

Both works, the one of almost 30 years ago and the present one, are purposely conservative. Those who heard the composer's Third String Quartet in Cambridge last February will be aware how dissonant, intense, even ferocious, Bloch's music can be.

The Concerto was begun in April of 1952, immediately upon the completion of the Quartet. Remembering the composer's unsystematic approach to the problems of a unified and consistent style, we might thus take the Concerto as a conscious reaction, maybe even as an attempt to prove that the old forms and sounds are not yet exhausted.

The Concerto Grosso No. 2 was completed at Agate Beach in Oregon on Aug. 1, 1952, and first performed in London on April 11, 1953, by the BBC Orchestra under Sir Malcolm Sargent. The work is in four movements. The first, in G minor, is a Maestoso (much resembling the baroque Grave's or Largo's), with a full-fledged fugue, marked allegro, as a central section. By means of a mysterious thematic "announcement," the music goes directly into the second movement, Andante.

In themes and in key, the first and second movements are strongly related. In the latter, the musical speech becomes modal, harking back to a period even before Bach's and Handel's day—perhaps as far back as the 16th century or the ageless modal folksong tradition.

* * *

The third movement, Allegro, in E minor, is a lively and sharply accented kind of scherzo, with a "trio" of chromatic lines. The finale, moving in or on the tonality of B, is a Theme and Variations. In the slower sections, the chromatic, semi-romantic manner of melody and harmony takes precedence; a more angular expression prevails in the two fast ones. The solo string quartet is never used as a means for virtuoso display, but merely as a device to lighten and contrast the texture, adhering to the well tested formal patterns of the historic Concerto Grosso.

Listeners will notice how the theme of the first movement returns at one point in the variations, and we may assume many other such devices which "tie up" the musical material of the work.

In a program note, the composer apparently warns us not to regard his method of writing here as naïve imitation. "This work," he says, "will seem very 'classical' to the superficial observer, but it is much more subtle, technically, than it appears."

Cir. (D 145,494) (S 272,057)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

OCT 8 - 1953

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

New England Hit The Operatic Road

Now about that tour of Boris Goldovsky's Opera Theater. It is really quite a thing and quite a credit both to Mr. Goldovsky and the community.

In the first place, the New England Opera Theater is the longest-lived opera company ever founded in Boston, being now in its eighth season. The Boston Opera Company, which made its debut in the Boston Opera House built for it late in 1909, folded with a deficit of $215,000 only five years later. To be sure, Mr. Goldovsky's company has never had either the grand opera character of the old Boston company nor the pretention to present great singers before the glittering diamond horseshoe that still existed in 1910 in Boston (though not abundantly enough to pick up the enormous check). There never was any notion of creating a little Met in Boston or even a San Francisco type of operation.

Goldovsky, who has never subscribed to the theory of the survival of the fattest among his singers (and has done as much as anyone to demonstrate that a fine voice need not be lodged in a mountain of flesh), has aimed from the beginning for a compromise between the vocal and the visual, with real audience communication in every level the criterion. That is to say, he has insisted on attractive people with attractive, well schooled voices; on the English language; on absolute clarity of narrative on the stage; on a fundamental regard for story values in the libretto; on the liberation of the singer from his historical dependence on conductor or prompter for his cues; and on overall musico-dramatic veracity insofar as this quality was achieved by the composer of the opera.

Producing Costs Have Risen

That he has insisted on it doesn't mean he's always achieved it. It is a goal, and one more plastered with obstacles than an Olympic decathlon. The most formidable obstacle, of course, and one that faces all musical organizations from the Met to the Boston Symphony, is that although there is a far greater market for music today than for baseball, the producing costs for music have risen (and justly risen, in most cases, for the lot of the musician and stagehand has always been notoriously precarious) beyond the capacity of the musical public to pay. Nonetheless, through his own ability to examine every detail of a budget and cut corners everywhere, as well as through the prodigious efforts of the directors of the Opera Theater and the Opera Theater Guild, he has achieved the impossible in opera of coming within reasonable sight of the cost.

A more curious obstacle, and one that will diminish in time, is what might only be termed snobism in regard to the English language. It is perfectly understandable that the people of the older musical cultivation who, perhaps, in their early years, studied and traveled abroad and knew opera in what they insist was its golden day, might find the NEOT pale and slim and unsatisfactory. But that they and even some of the younger people object to the English language is exceedingly hard to understand, especially since they cannot have failed to notice, in their travels, that no other country in the world presents, as a regular thing, an opera in any language but its own no matter how inept the translation.

THE NEOT grants (or rather, I grant) that it doesn't have name singers, though they very often go on to be name singers; that it doesn't have opulent sets and dazzling costumes and hordes of choristers and extras. But what it does have is an esprit de corps and an ideal. And that in a mere eight years it has established sufficient national prestige to allow a concert bureau (NCAC) to guarantee a budget of $8100 a week for six weeks to tour from here to Oklahoma, to Wisconsin and back is, from any point of view, a remarkable accomplishment.

Logistics Fantastic

The logistics of the tour are fantastic, however. The company of 28 travels by bus; the props and scenery travel by truck (and an early disaster was the discovery the original truck couldn't take all the gear which necessitated engaging a larger truck at $600 more). Three production techniques were worked out for all eventualities, a maximum production for a fully equipped theater, a similar production for a badly equipped theater, provided the company gets there in time, and a minimum production that can be mounted and prepared provided the company arrives within two hours of curtain time.

Since the company performs nearly every night, each singer of the cast had to learn at least two roles in order to understudy in cases of sore throats, etc., and to allow days off; for singers, like pitchers, can't work every day. They all had to learn make-up, too, and to plan for dry-cleaning costumes en route. They even had to have the orchestra parts re-copied to allow each musician to turn over his own pages. And, sadly enough, they had to make special arrangements for Adele Addison in the South, for, being colored, she can neither stay with the company nor sing in six cities, including Baltimore.

So, whether or not the NEOT can compare to the Met (and it has never tried to), whether or not it can do all the works it attempts full justice (and it has never said that it could) and whether or not it is on the main line of musical endeavors, it does deserve the good wishes of all on its first venture outside New England, and the support of all on its return. Or must it, too, find that its real place is not Boston at all?

Cir. (D 124,110) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

OCT 9 - 1953

Munch Returns to Podium Today After Vacation of Sport, Writing

By CYRUS DURGIN

A chipper, healthy and tanned Charles Munch has returned to Boston for the 73rd season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which begins this afternoon at Symphony Hall. The conductor greeted representatives of the press with his usual smile after the conclusion of the morning rehearsal yesterday, and told them something of his plans for the new season.

But first he explained how he had spent his five weeks of vacation in France after the recent Tanglewood Festival.

"I played golf a lot at Cannes. I went sailing, too. No, I don't own a boat. I hired one, with a man to help sail her."

But when he was questioned about his golfing scores, the answer was just another wide smile. This was the first real vacation he had enjoyed in some time, and even that was punctuated with work. But work of a different sort for him.

"I finished a book, too. It is called 'I Am a Conductor,' and it is one volume in a series, what you might call an 'I Am' series. There are, or will be, others, by a composer, a tenor, a lawyer, an author and so on. Honegger has written the composer book, and it is splendid. Mine is an account of my own experiences conducting. No, I did not write it either in longhand or on a typewriter. I dictated it. It will be published first in French, later in English.

"But although this was a very pleasant vacation, five weeks was a long time to go without music. I am glad to be back."

4 Large Choral Scores

Four large choral scores figure importantly on the Munch agenda for the months to come. Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ" (which this orchestra has never done) will come at Christmas; the Brahms Requiem will be presented at a pension fund concert, and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will end the season. Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust" will also be given. For this score, as well as the Brahms and Beethoven, the chorus will consist of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. The New England Conservatory Chorus will participate in "L'Enfance du Christ."

Roy Harris' Seventh Symphony, and the Seventh Symphony by the late Serge Prokofieff are scheduled, along with revivals of Richard Strauss' "Alpine" Symphony, unheard here since 1930, and the First Symphony of Honegger ("... it is never played now," said Mr. Munch) which was written upon commission of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its 50th anniversary season of 1930-31. There further will be a Piano Concerto by Darius Milhaud, and a new score for English horn and orchestra by Walter Piston, with Louis Speyer as soloist.

In the near future Mr. Munch will conduct two works in memory of Jacques Thibaud, the great French violinist who was killed in an airplane crash last August. They are the Mozart Violin Concerto in D major, and the Chausson Poeme. The soloist, appropriately, will be Ruth Posselt, who was a pupil of Thibaud.

Munch Plans Symphony's Hub Season

Post
10-9-53

BY TUCKER KEISER

"No, I have not yet cracked 70," exclaimed Charles Munch yesterday, referring to his success in the presidential sport—golf. The conductor, who begins his fifth season this afternoon as artistic director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, spent the time between Tanglewood and the opening of the symphony season at Cannes, where he relaxed in the mild Mediterranean air by golfing and sailing.

"On my trip to Paris earlier in the summer I conducted five concerts, but after Tanglewood, no conducting. I wrote a book instead. It is called 'I Am a Conductor,' and it will be published in France before Christmas. The music critic of 'Figaro' will then prepare an English translation."

Mr. Munch, looking hearty and tanned after his late summer vacation, met the press for the first time this season in the Green Room at Symphony Hall. He continued, "This is my formula for program building: 75 per cent familiar music and 25 per cent revivals and new music."

His eyes lighted up in anticipation of the new works as he commented on them. "I will play Honegger's Symphony No. 1, originally commissioned for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony in 1930, and not played here since. I will also revive Richard Strauss' Alpine Symphony and introduce Prokofieff's Symphony No. 7."

Tour Big Success

This last-named composition has been the centre of some controversy since its premiere last winter in Philadelphia. Prokofieff, a victim of the Kremlin's dabbling in the arts, has been severly criticised for the writing in this work, some maintain that it is hardly up to his former high artistic standards. We shall see when it is played here.

Mr. Munch promises us Roy Harris' new Symphony No. 7 and a new piano concerto by Milhaud. This afternoon he is playing Bloch's Concerto Grosso No. 2.

Cir. (D 215,218)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER

OCT 9 - 1953

CHARLES MUNCH starts his first season as director of the Boston Symphony at the first of the regular Friday concerts in Symphony Hall today.

15

Cir. (51,380)

This Clipping From BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO

1953

Packaged Record Review Ratings

CLASSICAL LP'S

SYMPHONY

BERLIOZ: ROMEO AND JULIET SYMPHONY (Complete) (2-12") — Boston Symphony; C. Munch, Cond. RCA Victor LM [illegible]	75

COMPLETE OPERAS

VERDI: OTELLO (Complete) (2-12") — NBC Symphony, Chorus and Soloists; A. Toscanini, Cond. RCA Victor LM 6107	85
MASCAGNI: CAVALLERIA RUSTICANA; LEONCAVAALO: I PAGLIACCI: (3-12") — Robert Shaw Chorale, RCA Victor Ork. R. Cellini, Cond. RCA Victor LM 6106	80

EXTENDED ORCHESTRAL WORKS

PROKOFIEFF: PETER AND THE WOLF; SAINT-SAENS: CARNIVAL OF THE ANIMALS (1-12")—Boston Pops; A. Fiedler, Cond., RCA Victor LM 1761	75
HANDEL: THE TWELVE CONCERTI GROSSI, OP. 6 (4-12")—Bamberg Symphony; F. Lehman, Cond. Decca DX 126	72

INSTRUMENTAL

BACH: SONATAS AND PARTITAS FOR UNACCOMPANIED VIOLIN (Complete) (3-12")—Jascha Heifetz. RCA Victor LM [illegible]	75

2

DRAMATIC WORKS

SHAKESPEARE'S MACBETH (Complete) (2-12") — Old Vic Company. RCA Victor LM 6010	78

POPULAR ALBUMS

DANCE BAND

SOUVENIR ALBUM (1-10")—Lawrence Welk Ork. Coral 56088	79
TIN PAN ALLEY (1-10") — Sammy Spear Ork. Mercury MG [illegible]	68

VOCALS

NEW ORLEANS (1-10") — Jo Stafford, Frankie Laine, Paul Weston Ork. Columbia CL 6268	85
WILLARD ROBISON AND HIS DEEP RIVER MUSIC (1-10") Coral CRL 56096	70
'DEED I DO (1-EP)—Lena Horne. M-G-M X 1027	64

CHILDREN'S RECORDS

THE LITTLE BALLERINA (1-10") — Leopold Stokowski Symphony Ork. RCA Victor LRY 8000	80
TCHAIKOVSKY: THE NUTCRACKER SUITE; ROSSINI: WILLIAM TELL OVERTURE (1-12")—NBC Symphony; A. Toscanini, Cond. RCA Victor LRY 9000	75
SHLOIMY THE SUBWAY TRAIN; THE HAPPY HIPPO (1-10") —(78 r.p.m.) Arnold Stang. Coral 1321	65
OLD KING COLE; HUMPTY DUMPTY (1-10") — (78 r.p.m.) Leon Janney. Coral 1318	60

COUNTRY & WESTERN

PINETOPPERS ON PARADE (1-10")—Coral CRL 56087	71

LATIN AMERICAN

GUARACHAS FROM CARACAS (1-10")—Billos Caracas Boys. Montilla LR 2004	68

INTERNATIONAL

LE PETIT MONDE DE DON CAMILLO (1-10") — Fernandel. Decca DL 7024	65

Oct.7
1953

[From Late Editions of Yesterday's Times.]

CAROL, 24, EXCELS IN VIOLIN RECITAL

Former Service Man Returns to Town Hall, Displays Rich, Natural Gift for Music

NORMAN CAROL, violinist. At Town Hall.

Chaconne	Vitali
Sonata in A, No. 2	Brahms
Concerto in D minor, No. 2	Wieniawski
Sonatina in G minor, No. 3	Schubert
Variations on a Theme of Corelli	Kreisler
Mazurka	Chopin-Kreisler
Tambourin Chinois	Kreisler
Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso	Saint-Saens

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

It is not supposed to happen. Recitals this early in the season are supposed to be the efforts of hopeful, well-intentioned and at best promising performers. But Norman Carol, who played the violin last night at Town Hall, seems not to have heard of these concert-hall proprieties. He gave a series of performances that were positively exhilarating, that would, indeed, have been an ornament of any part of the season.

Mr. Carol made his Town Hall debut in April, 1949, and gave a rousing account of himself. In the last two years he has seen service in the armed forces, and last night he was back in his working uniform—full-dress suit—as a concert artist. Now at 24 he may be pronounced as the best young violinist to come along since Isaac Stern was a fiddle firebrand of 20.

Mr. Carol has an affinity for the violin and, even more important, a rich, natural gift for music. His playing does not represent a discipline and skill imposed from without; the central impulse comes from within, and it has enabled this young man to absorb fiddling and music in a glowing, healthy manner.

Freshness Is Striking

The most striking aspect of Mr. Carol's work last night was its freshness. It was filled with the sunniness and vitality of confident youth. The tone, warm and lyrical, was colored with resourcefulness. There was life in the rhythms. Everything was articulated with orderliness and clarity and—praise be—without prissiness. Best of all, Mr. Carol had an almost instinctive good taste for the musical phrase.

One could differ occasionally with a tempo Mr. Carol chose. The andante of the Schubert sonatina seemed a shade too slow, and the first of the Kreisler pieces started a bit too briskly. But a little excess of sentiment or of virtuosity suits a young musician, and what Mr. Carol did seemed always to stem from a consistent point of view.

His playing of the Vitali Chaconne was classical in its outlines but it had not been drained of juice. His Brahms stressed values of youth rather than maturity, but it was charming all the same. His Wieniawski, which could have been a virtuoso's holiday, turned out to be music. His Schubert was poetic. With Julius Levine as the excellent accompanist, Mr. Carol made the trip to Town Hall a pleasure.

Someone observed last night that in October one could bring fresh ears to a young recitalist. A recitalist like young Mr. Carol would refresh the ears at any time of the year.

Cir. (D 124,110) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

OCT 10 1953

SOCIETY: Saturday Symphony Attracts People of Letters

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

One of the most interesting audiences in the world will be at Symphony Hall promptly at 8:15 tonight to open the 73d season of the Saturday concerts which Henry Lee Higginson made possible in 1881. There are still Higginson seats listed at Symphony Hall as there are seats reserved each year for many of New England's most famous private schools (Groton on Fridays, St. Mark's on Saturdays). There will be more distinguished doctors in Symphony Hall tonight when Charles Muench begins his fifth season as successor to the late, great Serge Koussevitzky, than are ever gathered together for any other occasion, and the judges and professors of note would make a Who's Who edition of their own. Harvard, Tech, the Conservatory of Music, the Museum of Fine Arts, and the Institute of Contemporary Art, and many another revered Boston institution will be represented in this handsome audience, which is sold out from one season right through the next. Some of Boston's oldest firms (Godfrey L. Cabot Company, for instance) have made it a practice for years to keep a block of seats for Symphony guests, and some hospital bequests make it possible for nurses to hear these world-famous concerts. The Boys Club Foundation has Saturday seats, and others are given each year by a well-known Bostonian so that medical students may have a chance to go to Symphony. Last year a man wrote from South Africa to save a seat for him for this season if possible as he was returning to Boston especially for these concerts.

Regular Saturday night subscribers come from greater distances usually than the fashion-

h has to ept the e family had to nd were

FAMILIAR Symphony-goer for more than half a century of seasons is Mrs. Alexander Steinert.

higher if they were anywhere near Mrs. Jack Gardner's fabulous hats.

Mrs. Koussevitzky and her nice, Mrs. Joseph Pasquala, go on Saturday nights, and many of the names notable in music circles, like Henrich Gebhardt, are on the Saturday season lists, as is Edward Weeks, editor of the Atlantic Monthly, Mischa Tulin, composer, sculptor Joseph Colatti, Dr. Reoger I. Lee, Walter Piston, William G. Saltonstall, headmaster of Phillips Exeter Academy, Jose de Varon, Judge Charles Rome, Judge David Rose, Mrs. Jennie Loitman Barron, Dr. Joseph Aub, Ernest Dane Jr., who has both Friday and Saturday seats, Dr. Peter Sweetser, who comes up from New Bedford for the Saturday night concerts, Dr. Merrill Sosman, Prof. Jerome Wiesner, Prof. Crane Brinton, Prof. A. M. Gaudin, Prof. Arthur Gardner, Mrs. Louis Speyer, James Hobbs, who has heard every Saturday concert for years.

Mrs. Carlton Gifford has heard every conductor since she first reserved her Saturday season seat, and Samuel Endicott and Robert Peabody are also among the long-time subscribers. Mrs. Alexander Steinnert, Mrs. Charles E. Bacon, Dr. Leory Miner and his son, Dr. Richard Miner, Dr. Alfred Pope, Mrs. Langdon Frothingham and her daughter, Mrs. E. Frothingham Lombard, Mrs. Charles Toppan are still others. Also Prof. Max Peterson, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Slosberg, Rev. Massey Shepherd, Charles O. Richardson, Dr. Sidney Ingbar, Dr. William Dameshek, Dr. Edward Frank, Dr. John Irwin, David Berkman, Mrs. Arthur D. Hill, Rabbi Sedar Moses, Mrs. Richard Sears, Emily Hallowell, Mrs. James Dearborn, Mrs. Charles Rice, and many many more

IN NEW YORK TODAY, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Paul of East 75th st. are announcing the engagement of their daughter, Adeline Van Nostrand, to Myron Arms Hofer 2d, son of Mr. and Mrs. Philip Hofer of Cambridge.

Miss Paul, who was a debutante of the 1951-52 season, graduated from Putney School and is a member of the junior class at Radcliffe. She is a granddaughter of Henry Neill Paul of Philadelphia and of Mrs. Joseph Delano Hitch of New York.

Mr. Hofer prepared at Groton for Harvard, where he is now in his senior year. His clubs include the Porcellian and the Signet Society. He is a grandson of Mrs. John N. P. Thatcher of New York.

Cir. (D 26,991)

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

OCT 7 - 1953

$5,000 Being Sought in County For Koussevitzky Memorial Fund

As a memorial to the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 25 years and founder of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, a group of Berkshire County residents have organized a committee to create a $5,000 Koussevitzky memorial fund.

Income from the fund will provide an annual conductor's scholarship at the Music Center. Contributions to the fund are being received by Paul K. Fodder, trust officer of the Agricultural National Bank in this city.

Plans for the fund were disclosed in letters sent to many Berkshire residents this week by Mrs. William M. Crane of Richmond.

Also serving on the memorial fund committee are Miss Anna M. Alexandre of Lenox, Mrs. Winthrop M. Crane III of Dalton, Mrs. George W. Edman, Jay C. Rosenfeld, Mrs. John H. Rice, Mrs. Albert C. England, Paul K. Fodder, Lawrence K. Miller of this city; Mrs. C. D Jackson of Lenox; Mrs. Shaun Kelly of Richmond; Mrs. John L. Senior of Lenox; Robert K. Wheeler and Mrs. Martin L. Straus II of Great Barrington; Mrs. Albert Sterner of Richmond; Mrs. Robert C. Sprague of Williamstown; Miss Irene M. Poirier of Lenox; Mrs. James W. Hull of North Adams; Mrs. David B. Karrick of Stockbridge, and Mrs. Bruce W. Sanborn of Lenox, and Mrs. F. Bayard Rives.

Cir. (D 145,494) (S 272,057)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

OCT 10 1953

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

BOSTON'S WINTER SEASON began officially yesterday afternoon with the opening of the 73d season of Symphony concerts. Symphony Hall was filled to the roof, and from now on until spring, nothing will interfere with attendance at these Friday afternoon concerts. A Handel concerto and Brahms' second symphony satisfied devotees of the traditional, and also on the program were a concerto by Bloch and the overture-fantasia from Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet."

* * *

FURS AND FLOWERS were worn with smart tailored suits for the Symphony opening. Mrs. Robert Morris had tiny yellow orchids pinned to her gray suit. Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, in a gray tailleur and sable stole, was greeting Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky in the lobby before the concert. Mrs. Edward A. Taft and Mrs. Alfred R. McIntyre wore red hats with their suits and furs, and Mrs. Charles F. Hovey wore a black velvet pixie hat with her blue suit.

MRS. HOVEY

* * *

MOTHERS AND DAUGHTERS attending the concert together included Mrs. William Dexter and Mary Ann and Mrs. Paul F. Clark and Mrs. Robert Boas, the former Jean Clark. Mrs. Sydney Harwood was accompanied by her son, Bartlett Harwood. Mrs. John King (Hilda Ayer) carried her knitting bag. The Rev. and Mrs. Abbott Hastings came from Beverly Farms, and Mrs. Edward W. Grew, Jr., came in from Dover. Among others in the large audience were Mrs. Edward Jackson Holmes, Mrs. Edwin S. Webster, Mrs. William Dana Orcutt, Mrs. George Putnam, Mrs. Palfrey Perkins, Mr. and Mrs. Albert C. Titcomb, Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs, Mrs. M. Upton Terry, Mrs. Faneuil Adams, Mrs. Howard S. Hayward, Mrs. John T. Bottomley, Mrs. John Whitney and Maxim Karolik.

* * *

A CHANGE IN PLANS has resulted in the cancellation of [illegible] enrollment at the Leland Powers School this [illegible] instead. Adele, debut[illegible] was marri[illegible]

Cir. (51,380)

This Clipping From BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO

[illegible] 1953

Packaged Record Review Ratings

CLASSICAL LP'S

SYMPHONY

BERLIOZ: ROMEO AND JULIET SYMPHONY (Complete) (2-12") — Boston Symphony; C. Munch, Cond. RCA Victor LM 6011	75

COMPLETE OPERAS

VERDI: OTELLO (Complete) (2-12") — NBC Symphony, Chorus and Soloists; A. Toscanini, Cond. RCA Victor LM 6107	85
MASCAGNI: CAVALLERIA RUSTICANA; LEONCAVAALO: I PAGLIACCI: (3-12") — Robert Shaw Chorale, RCA Victor Ork. R. Cellini, Cond. RCA Victor LM 6106	80

EXTENDED ORCHESTRAL WORKS

PROKOFIEFF: PETER AND THE WOLF; SAINT-SAENS: CARNIVAL OF THE ANIMALS (1-12")—Boston Pops; A. Fiedler, Cond., RCA Victor LM 1761	75
HANDEL: THE TWELVE CONCERTI GROSSI, OP. 6 (4-12")—Bamberg Symphony; F. Lehman, Cond. Decca DX 126	72

INSTRUMENTAL

BACH: SONATAS AND PARTITAS FOR UNACCOMPANIED VIOLIN (Complete) (3-12")—Jascha Heifetz, RCA Victor LM 6105	75

DRAMATIC WORKS

SHAKESPEARE'S MACBETH (Complete) (2-12") — Old Vic Company. RCA Victor LM 6010	78

POPULAR ALBUMS

DANCE BAND

SOUVENIR ALBUM (1-10")—Lawrence Welk Ork. Coral 56088	79
TIN PAN ALLEY (1-10") — Sammy Spear Ork. Mercury MG 25177	66

VOCALS

NEW ORLEANS (1-10") — Jo Stafford, Frankie Laine, Paul Weston Ork. Columbia CL 6268	85
WILLARD ROBISON AND HIS DEEP RIVER MUSIC (1-10") —Coral CRL 56096	70
'DEED I DO (1-EP)—Lena Horne. M-G-M X 1027	64

CHILDREN'S RECORDS

THE LITTLE BALLERINA (1-10") — Leopold Stokowski Symphony Ork. RCA Victor LRY 8000	80
TCHAIKOVSKY: THE NUTCRACKER SUITE; ROSSINI: WILLIAM TELL OVERTURE (1-12")—NBC Symphony; A. Toscanini, Cond. RCA Victor LRY 9000	75
SHLOIMY THE SUBWAY TRAIN; THE HAPPY HIPPO (1-10") —(78 r.p.m.) Arnold Stang. Coral 1321	65
OLD KING COLE; HUMPTY DUMPTY (1-10") — (78 r.p.m.) Leon Janney. Coral 1318	60

COUNTRY & WESTERN

PINETOPPERS ON PARADE (1-10")—Coral CRL 56067	71

LATIN AMERICAN

GUARACHAS FROM CARACAS (1-10")—Billos Caracas Boys. Marilu LR 2004	66

INTERNATIONAL

LE PETIT MONDE DE DON CAMILLO (1-10") — Fernandel. Decca DL 7024	65

Oct. 7
1953

[From Late Editions of Yesterday's Times.]

CAROL, 24, EXCELS IN VIOLIN RECITAL

Former Service Man Returns to Town Hall, Displays Rich, Natural Gift for Music

NORMAN CAROL, violinist. At Town Hall.
Chaconne	Vitali
Sonata in A, No. 2	Brahms
Concerto in D minor, No. 2	Wieniawski
Sonatina in G minor, No. 3	Schubert
Variations on a Theme of Corelli	Kreisler
Mazurka	Chopin-Kreisler
Tambourin Chinois	Kreisler
Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso	Saint-Saens

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

It is not supposed to happen. Recitals this early in the season are supposed to be the efforts of hopeful, well-intentioned and at best promising performers. But Norman Carol, who played the violin last night at Town Hall, seems not to have heard of these concert-hall proprieties. He gave a series of performances that were positively exhilarating, that would, indeed, have been an ornament of any part of the season.

Mr. Carol made his Town Hall debut in April, 1949, and gave a rousing account of himself. In the last two years he has seen service in the armed forces, and last night he was back in his working uniform—full-dress suit—as a concert artist. Now at 24 he may be pronounced as the best young violinist to come along since Isaac Stern was a fiddle firebrand of 20.

Mr. Carol has an affinity for the violin and, even more important, a rich, natural gift for music. His playing does not represent a discipline and skill imposed from without; the central impulse comes from within, and it has enabled this young man to absorb fiddling and music in a glowing, healthy manner.

Freshness Is Striking

The most striking aspect of Mr.
Carol's work las freshness. It wa
sunniness and vit
youth. The tone, was colored with
There was life
Everything was orderliness and cl be—without prissi
Mr. Carol had an tive good taste phrase.

One could diff
with a tempo Mr.
andante of the Sc seemed a shade to first of the Kreisle
a bit too briskly.
cess of sentiment
suits a young mus
Mr. Carol did see

Cir. (D 124,110) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

OCT 10 1953

SOCIETY: Saturday Symphony Attracts People of Letters

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

FAMILIAR Symphony-goer for more than half a century of seasons is Mrs. Alexander Steinert.

One of the most interesting audiences in the world will be at Symphony Hall promptly at 8:15 tonight to open the 73d season of the Saturday concerts which Henry Lee Higginson made possible in 1881. There are still Higginson seats listed at Symphony Hall as there are seats reserved each year for many of New England's most famous private schools (Groton on Fridays, St. Mark's on Saturdays). There will be more distinguished doctors in Symphony Hall tonight when Charles Muench begins his fifth season as successor to the late, great Serge Koussevitzky, than are ever gathered together for any other occasion, and the judges and professors of note would make a Who's Who edition of their own. Harvard, Tech, the Conservatory of Music, the Museum of Fine Arts, and the Institute of Contemporary Art, and many another revered Boston institution will be represented in this handsome audience, which is sold out from one season right through the next. Some of Boston's oldest firms (Godfrey L. Cabot Company, for instance) have made it a practice for years to keep a block of seats for Symphony guests, and some hospital bequests make it possible for nurses to hear these world-famous concerts. The Boys Club Foundation has Saturday seats, and others are given each year by a well-known Bostonian so that medical students may have a chance to go to Symphony. Last year a man wrote from South Africa to save a seat for him for this season if possible as he was returning to Boston especially for these concerts.

Regular Saturday night subscribers come from greater distances usually than the fashionable Friday audience which has to an astonishing extent kept the same seat locations in the family since the days when they had to be bought at auction and were higher if they were anywhere near Mrs. Jack Gardner's fabulous hats.

Mrs. Koussevitzky and her nice, Mrs. Joseph Pasquala, go on Saturday nights, and many of the names notable in music circles, like Henrich Gebhardt, are on the Saturday season lists, as is Edward Weeks, editor of the Atlantic Monthly, Mischa Tulin, composer, sculptor Joseph Colatti, Dr. Reoger I. Lee, Walter Piston, William G. Saltonstall, headmaster of Phillips Exeter Academy, Jose de Varon, Judge Charles Rome, Judge David Rose, Mrs. Jennie Loitman Barron, Dr. Joseph Aub, Ernest Dane Jr., who has both Friday and Saturday seats, Dr. Peter Sweetser, who comes up from New Bedford for the Saturday night concerts, Dr. Merrill Sosman, Prof. Jerome Wiesner, Prof. Crane Brinton, Prof. A. M. Gaudin, Prof. Arthur Gardner, Mrs. Louis Speyer, James Hobbs, who has heard every Saturday concert for years.

Mrs. Carlton Gifford has heard every conductor since she first reserved her Saturday season seat, and Samuel Endicott and Robert Peabody are also among the long-time subscribers. Mrs. Alexander Steinnert, Mrs. Charles E. Bacon, Dr. Leory Miner and his son, Dr. Richard Miner, Dr. Alfred Pope, Mrs. Langdon Frothingham and her daughter, Mrs. E. Frothingham Lombard, Mrs. Charles Toppan are still others. Also Prof. Max Peterson, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Slosberg, Rev. Massey Shepherd, Charles O. Richardson, Dr. Sidney Ingbar, Dr. William Dameshek, Dr. Edward Frank, Dr. John Irwin, David Berkman, Mrs. Arthur D. Hill, Rabbi Sedar Moses, Mrs. Richard Sears, Emily Hallowell, Mrs. James Dearborn, Mrs. Charles Rice, and many many more

IN NEW YORK TODAY, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Paul of East 75th St. are announcing the engagement of their daughter, Adeline Van Nostrand, to Myron Arms Hofer 2d, son of Mr. and Mrs. Philip Hofer of Cambridge.

Miss Paul, who was a debutante of the 1951-52 season, graduated from Putney School and is a member of the junior class at Radcliffe. She is a granddaughter of Henry Neill Paul of Philadelphia and of Mrs. Joseph Delano Hitch of New York.

Mr. Hofer prepared at Groton for Harvard, where he is now in his senior year. His clubs include the Porcellian and the Signet Society. He is a grandson of Mrs. John N. P. Thatcher of New York.

Cir. (D 26,991)

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

OCT 7 - 1953

$5,000 Being Sought in County For Koussevitzky Memorial Fund

As a memorial to the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 25 years and founder of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, a group of Berkshire County residents have organized a committee to create a $5,000 Koussevitzky memorial fund.

Income from the fund will provide an annual conductor's scholarship at the Music Center. Contributions to the fund are being received by Paul K. Fodder, trust officer of the Agricultural National Bank in this city.

Plans for the fund were disclosed in letters sent to many Berkshire residents this week by Mrs. William M. Crane of Richmond.

Also serving on the memorial fund committee are Miss Anna M. Alexandre of Lenox, Mrs. Winthrop M. Crane III of Dalton, Mrs. George W. Edman, Jay C. Rosenfeld, Mrs. John H. Rice, Mrs. Albert C. England, Paul K. Fodder, Lawrence K. Miller of this city; Mrs. C. D Jackson of Lenox; Mrs. Shaun Kelly of Richmond; Mrs. John L. Senior of Lenox; Robert K. Wheeler and Mrs. Martin L. Straus II of Great Barrington; Mrs. Albert Sterner of Richmond; Mrs. Robert C. Sprague of Williamstown; Miss Irene M. Poirier of Lenox; Mrs. James W. Hull of North Adams; Mrs. David B. Karrick of Stockbridge, and Mrs. Bruce W. Sanborn of Lenox, and Mrs. F. Bayard Rives.

Cir. (D 145,494) (S 272,057)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

OCT 10 1953

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

BOSTON'S WINTER SEASON began officially yesterday afternoon with the opening of the 73d season of Symphony concerts. Symphony Hall was filled to the roof, and from now on until spring, nothing will interfere with attendance at these Friday afternoon concerts. A Handel concerto and Brahms' second symphony satisfied devotees of the traditional, and also on the program were a concerto by Bloch and the overture-fantasia from Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet."

* * *

FURS AND FLOWERS were worn with smart tailored suits for the Symphony opening. Mrs. Robert Morris had tiny yellow orchids pinned to her gray suit. Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, in a gray tailleur and sable stole, was greeting Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky in the lobby before the concert. Mrs. Edward A. Taft and Mrs. Alfred R. McIntyre wore red hats with their suits and furs, and Mrs. Charles F. Hovey wore a black velvet pixie hat with her blue suit.

* * *

MRS. HOVEY

MOTHERS AND DAUGHTERS attending the concert together included Mrs. William Dexter and Mary Ann and Mrs. Paul F. Clark and Mrs. Robert Boas, the former Jean Clark. Mrs. Sydney Harwood was accompanied by her son, Bartlett Harwood. Mrs. John King (Hilda Ayer) carried her knitting bag. The Rev. and Mrs. Abbott Hastings came from Beverly Farms, and Mrs. Edward W. Grew, Jr., came in from Dover. Among others in the large audience were Mrs. Edward Jackson Holmes, Mrs. Edwin S. Webster, Mrs. William Dana Orcutt, Mrs. George Putnam, Mrs. Palfrey Perkins, Mr. and Mrs. Albert C. Titcomb, Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs, Mrs. M. Upton Terry, Mrs. Faneuil Adams, Mrs. Howard S. Hayward, Mrs. John T. Bottomley, Mrs. John Whitney and Maxim Karolik.

* * *

A CHANGE IN PLANS has resulted in the cancellation of A [illegible] enrollment at the Leland Powers School this [illegible] instead. Adele, debut [illegible] was marri

TIGHT BINDING

16

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1953 Art—Music—Theater 11

Cir. (D 124,110) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
OCT 10 1953

"End of a Tonal Drought"

Munch, Symphony Brilliant in Opening of 73d Season

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch is back at Symphony Hall and all's well with the local world of music. This, if you don't mind rewriting a gobbett of Robert Browning, is one way of saying that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is back in glorious operation. The opening of the 73d season, yesterday afternoon, was an occasion of familiar sight and brilliant sound, and for many Bostonians the end of a tonal drought which only this orchestra can relieve.

Although for many years it has been the custom for the orchestra to rise, closely followed by the audience, when the conductor first appears on stage at an opening concert, the ritual has not become stale. People really mean it as homage to a fine man and great musician, and there was nothing perfunctory about the rising tribute to smiling Charles Munch yesterday.

The new season begins with some changes in the orchestra. Since this time a year ago, violinist Harry Dubbs and cellist Enrico Fabrizio have died, and first bassoon Raymond Allard and cellist Hippolyte Droeghmans have retired. The new first bassoon is Sherman Walt. Leonard Moss has joined the violins, and the two new cellists are Martin Hoherman and Louis Berger. There is also a new member of the board of trustees, Rev. Palfrey Perkins.

Munch's initial program for 1953-54 followed exactly his formula for good concerts, of one-quarter new music and three-quarters familiar. The new piece was Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso No. 2 for Strings; the "standard" items were the Handel F major Concerto for Two Wind Choirs and Strings, Brahms' Second Symphony, and the Tchaikovsky Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet."

To work somewhat backwards from this point, let it be said that the tempestuous account of "Romeo and Juliet" which Munch achieved, was a real stunner. Never before have I heard the work end with such a dramatic thunder of the kettledrums, nor have the musical descriptions of the Montague and Capulet brawls been more vivid. This was not, however, a grossly exaggerated performance, it was simply one of heroic size, in which the love scenes were quite as transcendent as all the rest, and at the same time sensitive.

Munch did not stifle horns, trumpets and trombones, but neither did he bring them up too high, as occasionally he is inclined to do, trumpets especially. This was a passionate reading, and a personal one, and if you conceive Shakespeare to be profound, moving, full of the roar and tumult of life, and full of poetry too, it was likewise very Shakespearean.

Apart from an unaccountable near-catastrophe in the horns at the outset of Brahms' Second Symphony, the gracious and summery masterpiece went smoothly and with great beauty of tone and architectural symmetry.

Bloch's new Concerto Grosso, which received first performance in America and which had had but one previous hearing, in London, is a fine modern example of the archaic concerto grosso form. The little concertino of four strings is nicely contrasted with the larger mass of instruments, the music sings and has that quality so often missing from contemporary music: Real rhythmic life and inner motion. There is a rousing five-voice fugue and for finale, a set of engaging variations whose foremost interest, as in Beethoven variations, is rhythmic change.

The harmony is neither lush nor acid, but something in between, flavorsome and lively, like one of those Neufchatel wines of Bloch's native Switzerland. When all is said, the Concerto Grosso gives us nothing new; other composers have done much the same thing and in the same manner. But this is engaging and pleasant music, worthy to be heard again. The strings played gorgeously, with something of that dark richness of the Koussevitzky days.

As for Handel's bracing piece, the epitome of healthy and abstract music, with two wind choirs cleverly set against the other, it was pleasure from first measure to last.

Cir. (D 124,110) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
OCT 11 1953

B. S. O. Open Rehearsals More Popular Than Ever

A student-inspired experiment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has become an important annual activity of the world-famous ensemble. This is the set of a half-dozen Open Rehearsals in Symphony Hall, which resumes for its fourth season on Thursday evening, October 29 at 7:30.

The series was initiated by conductor Charles Munch as a result of a plea by college students. As they put it, many attending Greater Boston educational institutions counted the Boston Symphony as one of the cultural advantages. They would speedily learn, however, that pre-seasonal subscriptions to the concerts left tickets rarely obtainable. They suggested a new series to be played especially for students. Since this was not feasible because of the orchestra's already heavy concert schedule, Mr. Munch hit on the idea of a series of Open Rehearsals, to take place about once a month, with a special reduced rate for tickets.

Student enthusiasm for the series has mounted steadily, and spread to the general public. First of all, a ticket-holder may hear the great orchestra from any seat, downstairs or upstairs. The doors open at quarter to seven, and the audience distributes itself according to individual preferences for location. Conductor, orchestra, and a soloist from time to time, are heard both in periods of straight playing, and also in repetitions to perfect vital phrases. Audiences are fascinated to be let in on the secrets of working out a distinguished performance.

Until October 20, tickets may be obtained at Symphony Hall at the subscription rate of six rehearsals for $7 and (if any remain) at $2 for separate rehearsals. Starting Thursday, Oct. 29, the series continues on Thursday, Dec. 10; Wednesday, Jan. 6; Wednesday, Jan. 27; Thursday, Feb. 18; Thursday,

---

Symphony Opens 73rd Season

Munch Conducts Bloch American Premièr

By Harold Rogers

Fired with athletic energy and musical enthusiasm, Charles Munch opened the Boston Symphony Orchestra's new season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall and gave us an American première. This concert signalized Mr. Munch's fifth year as conductor, the Boston Symphony's seventy-third year, and the first American performance of Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso No. 2 for String Orchestra.

Written in 1952 at the composers Agate Beach home in Oregon, the concerto was first performed in April of this year in London by the BBC Orchestra under Sir Malcolm Sargent. In Mr. Munch's reading we found it to be a vital work that is excellently put together with scholarship, craftsmanship, and musicianship.

* * *

Bloch draws his materials and inspiration mainly from the baroque era, as was evident in the Bachian fugue of the first movement. (And how many composers today can write a fugue as convincing as this?) In the Andante, however, he harks back still farther into the musical past, drawing serene modal harmonies from the Renaissance. Through the lush fabric of the string orchestra is woven a clear-voiced concertino—a quartet composed of Richard Burgin, first violin; Alfred Krips, second violin; Joseph de Pasquale, viola; and Samuel Mayes, cello.

Exuberantly dancelike, the third movement is an Allegro that returns to the baroque style; and the fourth movement (modal again) is a theme heard in four variations. The work stands up well at the first hearing and promises to sustain interest when repeated. Those who recoil at contemporary music will have nothing to fear from this piece. It is an antique work by a contemporary master.

* * *

The rest of the program is drawn from standard composers — Handel, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Handel's Concerto in F major for Two Wind Choirs and Strings served as a good opening piece, though not a work of greatness. The wind players performed with accuracy and spirit, and in the final Allegro the French horns tooted merrily in the hunting call manner. (What else could the valveless French horns do in Han day?)

Mr. Munch gave us a Brahms Second, though no Germanic as one could wish so it has been whenever Munch has turned to Teu composers, and so perhap will continue to be. While bri ing the finale to a pitch of citement he snapped his ba on the music desk and finis with the stub in his hand.

But the Brahms finale nothing compared to the fire brilliance that Mr. Mu poured into the "Romeo and Juliet" Overture of Tch kovsky. The Shakespear scenes are distilled in this w and each was summoned with pristime clarity. It wa refreshing reading that the listener believe he ha new pair of ears.

Cir. (D 145,494) (S 272,057)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
OCT 10 1953

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the first program of its 73d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, performing the following program:

Concerto Grosso in F for Two Wind Choirs and Strings	Handel
Symphony No. 2 in D, Op. 73	Brahms
Concerto Grosso No. 2 for Strings	Bloch
Romeo and Juliet	Tchaikovsky

By RUDOLPH ELIE

You cannot help but be struck by the incredible youth of the men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the orchestra enters its 73d season.

I studied each face yesterday afternoon and, in a wholly casual exercise of elementary arithmetic came to the conclusion that the average age of the personnel of the Boston Symphony orchestra is now well below 40, perhaps even below 35. One night legitimately inquire what all this has to do with so interesting, so important and so significant a moment as the opening concert of the season but it has, I think, a very great deal to do with it.

For as he begins his fifth season Charles Munch has achieved a new Boston Symphony orchestra, an orchestra composed in large measure of men he has personally selected and of men who, so far is I know, were born and trained in the United States. He didn't do this out of any notion or conceit to create his own orchestra; he did it because of the natural course of events that found the Koussevitzky cycle coming to an end.

It will be remembered that within a few years of Koussevitzky's arrival in Boston he too engaged a mostly new orchestra. His men were of European birth and tradition, and with them he created an instrument of incomparable quality. But that was 29 years ago, a generation ago, and on Koussevitzky's departure his organization slowly departed after him. How many who sat on the stage of Symphony Hall, Oct. 10, 1924 sat there today?

New Orchestra

So in truth this is a new orchestra, a young orchestra, an American orchestra, and that it is also a very different orchestra is the particular impact it made on me yesterday to the exclusion of nearly everything else. It is an orchestra of immense dynamism, of great virility and strength and power of utterance. It is an orchestra of lightning response with a capacity for prodigious technical achievement. It has verve, animation, fervor, impetuosity, high spirits, inexhaustible reserves; all the qualities, in short, of fiery youthfulness.

Yet fiery youthfulness has its imperfections, and boisterousness is one of them. It is perfectly true "Romeo and Juliet" and sections of Brahms' Second lend themselves to the boisterous response, and it is equally true that Mr. Munch in moments of excitement is inclined to press for ever greater galaxies of sound and fury. But there would seem to be no doubt that the youthfulness, the ebullience, the dynamic response went a little too far yesterday afternoon for the good of the esthetic values of the music—if "Romeo" may be said to have any.

Nonetheless, I found this far more exciting and far more exhilarating and certainly far more promising for the future than that overly mature or overly listless quality one encounters so often. What we have here, in short, is a great new team that (and how peculiar that sounds!) needs more seasoning, more spaciousness, more introspection, more profundity of utterance, more depth of feeling to speak as it can speak.

All in Balance

That Mr. Munch himself has all these maturer qualities goes without saying, for it is only in the most violent passages that the orchestra's youth betrays itself. In the two lovely inner movements of the Brahms, for instance, as well as in the familiar lyric romance of "Romeo," spaciousness and tenderness and radiance were everywhere; the sound was magnificent as only the Boston Symphony can make it magnificent. All the voices could be heard, all was in balance and in proportion. In the Handel Concerto, and a truly exquisite thing it is, too, all the nobility and precision of the orchestra were there in abundance, to make it very clear indeed that once in control this orchestra will continue to amaze us with its estheticism as well as its virtuosity.

Receiving its American premiere at this concert was Bloch's Concerto Grosso No. 2 for String Orchestra, and a rather curious piece it is at that. The first movement might well have been written by Handel himself so baroque its sound, its procedure and its effect though the melodic inspiration seemed to have sprung directly from Purcell and the early English composers. With the two closing movements an entirely different quality appears, being more in the contemporary vein, but nowhere appears a clue that the Bloch of "Schelomo" had anything to do with it at all save in the mastery of the materials the whole work displayed. I enjoyed it, but on the whole it didn't seem to maintain the great promise of the first two movements. The idea of the piece, I thought, might be the mirroring of two centuries of concerto grosso procedures in one piece, but maybe that is going a little too far.

The concert next week offers a varied program with Mozart's D major Divertimento (K.136), Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin," Copland's Concerto for Piano (Leo Smit, soloist), Smit's Overture in C sharp minor and Beethoven's Second Symphony.

Boston Post 10/10/53 **

Music in Review

Symphony Opens

BY TUCKER KEISER

A standing ovation greeted the return of Charles Munch to the podium at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon for his fifth year with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the 73rd season for the organization. Neither wars nor rumors of war have retarded the tempo of musical activity in Boston for three generations, and the axis about which the turbulent musical season revolves has long been Boston's splendid orchestra.

So stable an organization establishes not only a fine esprit de corps within itself, but also a rapport with audiences which regard the persons on stage almost as part of the family. There are only four new members of that family this year: Sherman Walt, bassoonist; Leonard Moss, violinist, and Martin Hoherman and Louis Berger, cellists.

In accordance with the practice explained at his Thursday press conference, Mr. Munch chose to play three comparatively familiar pieces and one new work.

Not only was Ernest Bloch's "Concerto Grosso No. 2 for String Orchestra" a new experience but it received the best performance of the afternoon. Yesterday was the American premiere of this work, which should become a standard part of the repertoire. Deceptively Handelian at the beginning, the concerto unobtrusively employs more and more of the contemporary idioms until it reaches a climax of unmistakable modernity in the Passacaglia.

Melancholy Overtones Deepen

Employing the concerto grosso principle of a small instrumental combination opposing a larger one, Mr. Bloch here makes use of a string quartet for his concertino, the remaining members of the string section serving for the tutti. The melancholy overtones introduced as early as the fugue in the first movement, deepen rapidly to the profoundly tragic variations of the final movement, with only a brief respite during the pathetically light-hearted allegro. This is a score which will undoubtedly reward repeated hearings; only with greater familitarity will we catch all its musical subtleties and emotional depths.

Movements from Handel's "Concerto in F Major for Strings and Two Wind Choirs" opened the program. This good-humored work, while performed with gusto, was not performed with impeccable technique. The vacation period is over for the orchestra, but this is apparently their Indian summer.

Mr. Munch's performance of Brahms' Second Symphony emphasizes the drama in a non dramatic work. The symphony is the most tuneful of Brahms' four essays in this field. When the transition passages are hammered home the whole work assumes a new structure. Mr. Munch, who obviously feels that the patterns need underlining, gives us a highly individualized reading De gustivus.

The final item on the program, a fugitive from a Boston "Pops" concert, was Tschaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet Overture-Fantasia. The rapport between Tschaikovsky and Munch is as close as that between Verdi and Toscanini, so that a performance of the Russian by the Frenchman brings out the essential quality of both the composer and the conductor.

This Clipping
CHARLOTTE OBSERV
OCT 11 1

Berlioz Use Resources I

17

Feb 27, 1954

Cir. (D 138,183) (S 145,050)

This Clipping From
CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER

OCT 11 1953

Berlioz Used All Dramatic Symphony Resources In His 'Romeo And Juliet'

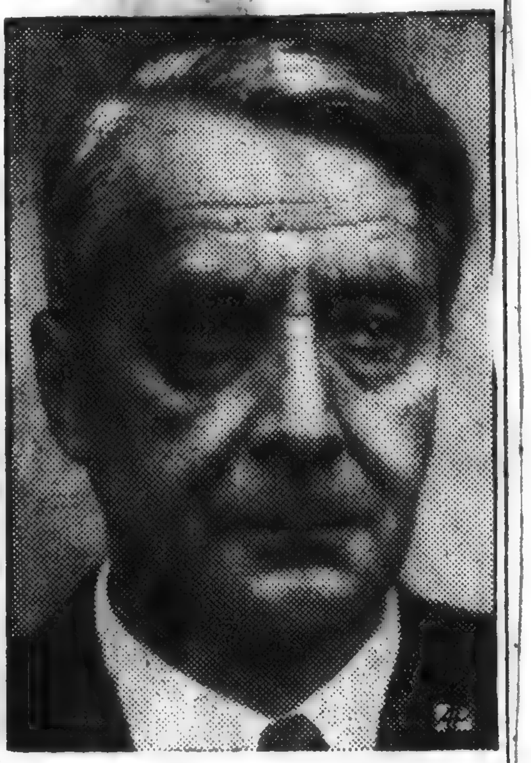
Completely entranced by Shakespeare's genius, Hector Berlioz for years was haunted by his "Romeo and Juliet" and its musical possibilities.

Finally in 1839 he settled down to doing something about it and, sustained by a princely gift from the great violinist Paganini, he immersed himself for seven months in writing his "Romeo and Juliet" dramatic symphony.

In its complete form, it is an expansive and beautiful work for chorus, solos and orchestra in which are exhibited for the first time in one form all the resources of the dramatic symphony.

Making the most of these resources in a new RCA Victory Red Seal album of two long-playing records are Conductor Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by Margaret Roggero, contralto; Leslie Chabay, tenor; Yi-Kwei Sze, bass; the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, with G. Wallace Woodworth directing.

The orchestra is particularly brilliant in the "Love Scene," the glistening "Queen Mab" scherzo, and "Romeo's Death." Here is some wonderful music.



CHARLES MUNCH

conductor — Columbia Masterworks — This world-famed guitarist is one of the most distinguished musicians of his day, with transcendent powers of execution and imagination. Virgil Thomson wrote, "There is no guitar but the Spanish guitar and Andres Segovia is its prophet." High praise but deserved for such superlative artistry.

Sonata No. 3 in B Minor, Barcarolle in F-sharp Major, Nocturne No. 8 in D-flat Major, Mazurka No. 32 in C-sharp minor (Chopin) — Dinu Lipatti, piano — Columbia Masterworks — Dinu Lipatti's talent was one of the greatest of his generation, and his death just before his 33rd birthday was a tragic loss to music. Fortunately, his consummate art has been preserved on a number of Columbia Masterworks records. His performance of the four Chopin works on this recording leaves little doubt as to his musicianship, virtuosity and poetic spirit.

Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Egmont Overture, Coriolan Overture, Leonore Overture (Beethoven) — Minneapolis Symphony orchestra, Antal Dorati, conductor — Mercury Classics Olympian — The musical packaging of the Beethoven Fifth and the three most popular Beethoven overtures on a single LP disc will be gratifying to record buyers. Ranking with the best performances of the Fifth, Dorati's interpretation is outstanding, the orchestra's response is impressive, and the "Living Presence" technique brings out clearly and cleanly every fine point of both score and performance.

Symphony in D Minor (Franck) — St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, Vladimir Golschmann, conductor — Capitol Classics — Cesar Franck cared little what the critics said. It is well that he did not, for they scorned his music. They called this symphony "amoral." Today this cyclical work has become something of a favorite. This release also marks the recording debut of the St. Louis and Conductor Golschmann, whose penchant for French-Belgian music is well known.

Quintet in F Minor (Franck) — Hollywood String Quartet — Victor Aller, piano — Capitol Classics — In this work Franck also used the so-called cyclic form, in which the same theme reappears in each movement, so that the entire work possesses a continuity and cohesiveness that is sometimes missing in the traditional sonata form. Like his D Minor Symphony, too, this piano quintet is a moving synthesis of strong earthly emotions and religious exaltation. Each member of the Hollywood String Quartet possesses a large tone, and Pianist Aller knows just when and how to subordinate his playing to that of the quartet. An expert performance.

The Nutcracker Suite (Tchaikovsky); The Skaters Waltz (Waldteufel); William Tell Overture (Rossini) — Arturo Toscanini conducting the NBC Symphony Orchestra — RCA Victor Red Seal — A large part of the output of Russian-born composers consists of music for the ballet. Of all this production, the most universally popular is no doubt the music Tchaikovsky wrote for the ballet, "The Nutcracker" — music known and loved by thousands who have never seen a ballet or even been inside a formal concert hall. And there are any who think [illegible]

Cir. (D 323,939) (S 700,668)

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CAL.
EXAMINER

OCT 11 1953

Classical

'Romeo and Juliet' Recording Triumph

By Patterson Greene
Examiner Drama-Music Editor

RECORD OF THE WEEK: Berlioz, "Romeo and Juliet," played by the Boston Symphony under Charles Munch, with chorus and vocal soloists.

Another recording triumph is scored by RCA-Victor with the complete dramatic symphony that Hector Berlioz fashioned from his meditations on Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet."

Excerpts from this massive work have previously been available, but this is the first recording to include all the choral and solo voice sections along with the orchestral passages.

First performed in 1839, this symphony is still abreast of the times in 1953. Not even Stravinsky has surpassed the technical wizardry of Berlioz' orchestration.

* * *

The thematic material and the harmonic progressions sound conservative now, and some of the episodes seem long winded except to the most fanatical Berlioz devotee. But all in all it is an arresting, dramatic, moving score.

The high fidelity fan will have a holiday with this set. Take, as a single instance, the orchestral Scherzo that portrays the tricksome flight of the fairy Queen Mab: Every detail of the elaborate but delicate percussion scoring is distinct and identifiable.

Elsewhere there is the effect of distant tambourines sounding through Romeo's meditations, leading to the scene of the ball at the Capulets', with the festive but stately procession of the brasses through the skippings and the leapings of the strings.

* * *

The soloists are excellent, particularly contralto Margaret Roggero in the soliloquy about first love, with its haunting violin obbligato. There is a fine rendition of Friar Laurence's final oration by Yi-Kwei Sze, the gifted Chinese basso who has distinguished himself with the San Francisco Opera.

The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, traditional choral adjuncts of the Boston Symphony, give a well disciplined account of themselves.

A booklet accompanying the discs has the French text along with an English translation and a preface by Jacques Barzun, whose biography of Berlioz, though slightly hysterical, is still the most exhaustive and the best documented on the market. (Album of two double-faced 12-inch RCA Victor discs, LP.)

* * *

Moussorgsky, "Pictures at an Exhibition," and Stravinsky, suite from "The Firebird," played by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy.

Of the various orchestrations of Moussorgsky's vivid "Pictures at an Exhibition," originally written for piano, Ravel's has had the greatest success. Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra give an engrossing performance of it, backed by the suite that Stravinsky has arranged from his most popular ballet, "The Firebird." (One double-faced 12-inch Columbia disc, LP.)

* * *

Castelnuovo-Tedesco, Concerto for Guitar and Orchestras, and five guitar solos, played by Andres Segovia.

When Andres Segovia plays the guitar, it becomes a valid concert instrument, and his artistry has encouraged important composers to provide him with fresh material.

Catching the singular mellow sweetness and dynamic variety of Segovia's tone, this recording presents, on one side, Castelnuovo-Tedesco's tastefully engaging Concerto, with a lovely, lonely theme in the slow movement that the composer has recently transcribed as an orchestral number; and on the other some shorter items by Ponce, Villa-Lobos and Turina.

There are no signs of a successor to Segovia, and it is well that his playing should be preserved on the discs. (One double-faced Columbia disc, LP.)

Welcome Home

Charles Munch, left, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is welcomed by manager George E. Judd after a vacation in Europe. On Friday, Oct. 9, Mr. Munch opened the orchestra's 73rd season. It marked the start of his fifth year as conductor.

< [illegible] GLOBE [illegible]

Cir. (D 145,494) (S 272,057)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

OCT 11 1953

Brass Ensemble Is Formed by Voisin

Roger Vosin, first trumpet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has just organized The Brass Ensemble, which will present music written especially for this class of instruments. The repertoire is surprisingly large. The composers include such names as: Adson, Bach, Banchieri, Beethoven, Berlioz, Enesco, Gabrieli, Handel, Hindemith, Monteverdi, Prokofiev, Purcell, Schubert, Tscherepnine. Besides Mr. Voisin, the ensemble consists of the following Boston Symphony musicians: Armando Ghitalla, trumpet; Harold Meek and Paul Keaney, horns; William Moyer and Kauko Kahila, trombones; Vinal Smith, tuba.

Cir. (S 89,838)

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 11 1953

BURGIN TO CONDUCT STUDENT ORCHESTRA

Boston, Oct. 10—Harrison Keller, president of the New England Conservatory of Music, announces the following appointments at the beginning of the 87th year of the conservatory. Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and member of the faculty of the conservatory, has been named conductor of the Conservatory Orchestra. Burgin will continue to head the string department of the conservatory and will be in complete charge of all orchestral activities.

Chester Weldon Williams, a member of the faculty since 1946, has been appointed dean of the conservatory. Williams has been a member of the theory department. Doriot Anthony, flutist, has been appointed to the faculty of the conservatory. Miss Anthony came to Boston last year as first flutist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In addition to the above appointments, G. Wright Briggs, supervisor of the Department of Popular Music at the conservatory, has been appointed conductor of the Harvard Band. He succeeds the late Malcolm Holmes, former dean of the conservatory.

Cir. (D 639,869)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
ADVERTISER

OCT 11 1953

Handel, Brahms At Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Charles Munch, enters upon the second week of its season with concerts next Tuesday evening and Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall. On the Tuesday program are Handel's Concerto in F major, for Two Wind Choirs and Strings, Brahms' Symphony No. 2, Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso No. 2 for String Orchestra, and Tchaikovsky's Overture-Fantasia, Romeo and Juliet.

At the Friday and Saturday concerts Munch will conduct the Mozart Divertimento in D major, for String Orchestra, K. 136, which will have its first performance at these concerts. The second number will be Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" Suite.

---

emière

do in Hande gave us a f
, though not e could wish.
whenever rned to Teuto so perhaps be. While brin
o a pitch of apped his bat desk and finish in his hand.
ahms finale
red to the fire at Mr. Mun
the "Romeo verture of Tch Shakespeare
illed in this wo summoned clarity. It was ding that believe he had ars.

---

ly a brief res-etically light-his is a score tedly reward
; only with will we catch ubtleties and om Handel's jor for Strings hoirs" opened good-humored rformed with erformed with

ue. The vacar for the or-is apparently er.
erformance of Symphony em-na in a son
he symphony is f Brahms' four
d. When the es are ham-whole work as-ructure. Mr.
usly feels that
d underlining, individualized us.
n the program,
Boston "Pops"
Tschaikovsky's et Overture" pport between Munch is as veen Verdi and a performance the Frenchman
ntial quality of oser and the

Cir. (D 145,494) (S 272,067)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

OCT 11 1953

Charles Munch Returns 'Home'
The Happy Return Home--Charles Munch's Fifth Year

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Charles Munch held his annual press conference last week, an ordeal the conductor and music director of the Boston Symphony dreads more than any other, and it would seem that as he enters his fifth year in the world's most arduous and difficult musical post (a virtually indisputable statement), he has at last found the return to Boston a homecoming. He did not say so; indeed, he was not questioned on the point at all. He merely suggested by his warm presence, his unmistakably cordial greeting to all and his attitude to the men of the orchestra that he was very happy to be back in Boston. To be, in short, home.

Unlike his predecessor, who embraced the city and its society from the outset, and who almost immediately revealed himself as a tireless, powerful and significant cultural leader, Mr. Munch has never made it clear that his heart was really with us.

ENJOYS APPLAUSE TOO

There are many reasons for this, too, and they largely spring from the fact that where Koussevitzky was essentially a man with an insatiable appetite for public and private adulation (and I do not mean that as a reproach), Munch is essentially a man of immense humility. Koussevitzky needed, in fact, demand reassurance every step of the way.

Again and again he performed feats of truly incredible endurance, as in conducting when ill and weary enough to die, not out of an overwhelming sense of responsibility but of an overwhelming need of his audience, of that magical nostrum to all performers and artists, the ovation. It is a legitimate and, in fact, a wonderful motivation, and some of the world's greatest feats in and out of music have sprung from this compulsive need for public reassurance.

In a sense Mr. Munch needs it too, and certainly enjoys it to the full. But he is fundamentally oriented to the music and not to the audience. He has proved this again and again by disregarding one of the major facts in a conductor's life: no tumultuous musical ending to a concert, no tumultuous ovation. Munch does not need an ovation to know he has conducted a superb work in superb style. If it closes quietly, as the composer intended it to, Munch closes it quietly well aware that he will not be called back to the stage again and again.

I will not call that honesty, for I would not suggest that Koussevitzky wasn't. It is simply that Koussevitzky was basically aligned to the audience even when — as Munch does not—he brought out endless numbers of contemporary works that were certain to fail with the audience. Koussevitzky knew that they wouldn't fail with the composers, and they, too, were in a sense his audience, a very influential one in spreading his renown, too.

There are other fundamental differences that make it difficult for Munch to express himself as a man wholly at home away from home as Koussevitzky could. Koussevitzky was a superb, if difficult, executive to whom no matter of detail, of management, of red tape was too insignificant. It was, as he always said, "my organization," and he was tireless in every field from personnel to money raising. Mr. Munch, on the contrary, is appalled by such details; he cannot accept, or rather happily accept, the singularly American concept that the conductor of a symphony orchestra is also its chief executive. As he sees it he is here to make music; must he also endure the endless wearisome details of policy, of personnel, of management?

SENSE OF BELONGING NOW

Still another fundamental difference is Mr. Munch's social attitude. Where Koussevitzky loved the bright warm ceremony of receiving anyone who loved and admired him in the green room no matter how exhausted he was or how unimportant his visitor may be, Mr. Munch finds it genuinely frightening and disturbing. He is by no means a shy man (though that term is invariably and faultily applied to him by those who don't know him); but he simply does not enjoy the conventional compliment. It disconcerts and, if pressed, dismays him. He hates mob scenes, and he hates dinners or functions or anything that even threatens to cause him to have to speak or do anything except make music.

He hates parties in his honor (but he loves to be casually and intimately entertained provided he can remain on a wholly informal or even en famille basis, and he is a charming guest). He hates, in short, to be made of in any way, and this is strength, not animosity, humility, not heedlessness. It is true he is not an outwardly gregarious man, but the very nature of a conductor's role, demanding as it does endless hours of solitary study denies him that. It is also true he is not an easy man to know, but is any man of extraordinary talent easy to know? For that matter, why should being easy to know have anything to do with it?

And so, as he begins his fifth season after a six-week vacation in southern France golfing, sailing and writing (he has completed a book entitled "I Am a Conductor" in a French series of a number of similar occupational revelations, and when it appears here we may learn much more about this remarkable man, Mr. Munch remains pretty much of a sphinx to Boston. Nonetheless, as he begins his fifth year, there is every evidence of a warmer feeling towards us as a people, of a deeper regard for the smaller values of green room contact, of a sense of belonging and of enjoying belonging. He has given us of his music all along, and won over the city in as difficult a situation as a man can find himself in. Now he stands ready perhaps, to look upon us not as cool Anglo-Saxons in a foreign land but as his own people who, in loving him, seek also his sign that he loves us.

Cir. (D 215,218)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER

OCT 12 1953

Handel Concerto At the Symphony

Charles Munch announces that the Tuesday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will include Handel's Concerto in F major for Two Wind Choirs and Strings, Brahms' Symphony No. 2, Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso No. 2 for String Orchestra and Tchaikovsky's Overture - Fantasia, Romeo and Juliet.

At the Friday and Saturday concerts Mr. Munch will conduct the Mozart Divertimento in D major, for String Orchestra, K. 136, which will have its first performance at these concerts. The second number will be Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" Suite.

Leo Smit, the pianist who introduced Haieff's Concerto at these concerts last season and who repeated it last summer at the Venice Festival with outstanding success, will be heard in a revival of Aaron Copland's Piano Concerto, in one movement. This will be followed by Mr. Smit's Overture in C-sharp minor, which will have its first public performance. Mr. Munch will conclude the program with Beethoven's Symphony No. 2, in D major, which he has not yet conducted with this Orchestra.

Cir. (D 189,181)

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CAL.
DAILY NEWS

OCT 12 1953

Records in the News

By MILDRED NORTON
Drama & Music Editor

RCA Victor's new release of Respighi's Pines and Fountains of Rome by Toscanini and the NBC Symphony, and enclosed in an album containing a handsome folio of photographs of Rome with a text by Vincent Sheehan, has eye no less than ear appeal that is impressive.

Visually, the large blue-toned photographs direct one's imagination to that postponed trip abroad rather than to the business of listening to the single record buried modestly in the back of the album. After listening, however, one realizes that the correlation between pictures, text and music, is no correlation at all. The music alone remains sovereign, as it always will when given a performance such as this.

No previous reading of these works on records has ever produced so powerful an impact or revealed more effectively their usually hidden beauties, and it is not likely that anyone will soon eclipse, or even approach, the grandeur and illumination achieved here by Toscanini.

Soundwise, the recording represents a major achievement that atones for many of the recording sins committed against Toscanini in the past, and one which supersedes the long time Hi-Fi favorites of these tone poems on Westminster and Mercury.

FEW CONDUCTORS are capable of conveying the dramatic power of Berlioz' music as does Charles Munch, as many Angelenos must remember with a certain nostalgia. His new recording of Berlioz' dramatic choral symphony, Romeo and Juliet, with the Boston Symphony, Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society, and soloist Margaret Roggero, Leslie Chabay and Yi-Kwei Sze, once again underlines Munch's feelings for and insight into the French composer's grandiloquent style. But there is also fine perception and taste in the way Munch underplays the more banal moments and accents the high points of the symphony's literary implications, which are left more to musical imagination than to the literal portrayals that often tempt lesser conductors. Vocal and choral work is handled deftly as an inseparable element of the music's framework and reproduction is clean, spacious, and well balanced for maximum effect (RCA Victor LP).

THE PLAYING of Bach's sonotas and partitas for unaccompanied violin are admittedly one of the supreme tests of a violinist's skill and musical acumen. Since no one today can say with complete authority how Bach should be played, one basis of evaluation is the facility with which a violinist can scale the numerous obstacles presented by these works, and in this department Heifetz is unique in his new recording (RCA Victor LP).

Whether Heifetz' Bach is the kind of Bach that approaches a definitive quality is something which can never be more than conjectural; there are those who will object to occasional lyric elements he imposes on music which they think should be purely abstract, and still others who will find him dry. But in due justice it must be said that Heifetz has given the best of his musical intelligence and his incomparable skill to this performance. Recording sound is very good.

OTHER ITEMS of interest on Red Seal LP: Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 3 with pianist-conductor Jose Iturbi and the RCA Symphony Orchestra; Anja Dorfmann, pianist, playing Schumann, Chopin, Ravel, Mendelssohn. Liszt, and Menotti: the orchestral suite from NBC's television production, Victory at Sea, played by members of the NBC orchestra conducted by Robert Russell Bennett; and Kathryn Grayson singing selections from the motion picture, "So This Is Love."

Cir. (D 4,983)

This Clipping From
BENNINGTON, VT.
BANNER

OCT 13 1953

ANGELS WITH A DEVIL of a big job are these two gals, who will find themselves as usual vastly outnumbered but not outplayed by the 100 male members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it appears at the RPI Field House in Troy October 26. Flutist Miss Doriot Anthony is the on'y woman in the history of the famous Boston orchestra ever to hold a major desk. She is first flutist. Not far behind is Olivia Leutcke, who plays second harp like an angel.

Cir. (D 96,447)

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 15 1953

Boston Symphony Orchestra Starts 73d Season

By FEROL AUSTEN
Special to The Hartford Times

Boston—The lid was officially lifted off the Boston music season last Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall with Charles Munch directing the members of the Boston Symphony in their first concert. This is the 73rd season for the orchestra: the fifth season for Mr. Munch.

Competent musicians of the virtuoso type, inspiring leadership, expert management—all of these make the Boston Symphony one of the most outstanding musical aggregations in the world. It ought to be noted, however, that one of the most important reasons for Boston's long reign of musical leadership is the recognition given to new composers and new works.

* * *

A COMPOSER—as the writer, the actor, and the artist—needs an audience. The Boston Symphony with Koussevitzky and, later, Charles Munch, has provided that audience time and time again.

There have been a few bumps in the road. There haven't been as many American works played as one might have liked; many of the new works haven't been of tremendous value; but over the years they have added up to enormous strides for the B. S. O. and have established a new criterion for other topflight orchestras to follow. Furthermore, smugness and complacency—two attitudes that often accompany long tenures of leadership—are noticeably lacking in the ranks of the B. S. O., and this could perhaps be the greatest tribute of all.

This season's initial concert took up the reins where they were dropped in the spring. Mr. Munch presented the first American performance of Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso No. 2 for String Orchestra. It had been performed in the spring by Sir Malcolm Sargent and the BBC Orchestra in London. The work is a masterful piece of composition. Although completely contemporary architecturally, it is an interesting link with the past—a thread of the baroque period weaving its way in and out of the basic structure of the work.

* * *

THE FIRST MOVEMENT is mainly concerned with a fugue—a real delight to listen to, the second movement was notable for its use of a quartet of four first-chair members of the orchestra — Richard Burgin, violin, Alfred Krips, second violin, Joseph de Pasquale, viola, and Samuel Mayes, cellist; the third movement is a simple allegro; and the finale consists of a theme and variations.

The rest of the program was devoted to Handel's Concerto in F major for Two Wind Choirs and Strings—a good exercise for the horn players; Brahms' Second Symphony au feu; and Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Overture.

The Boston Orchestra will appear at the Bushnell Memorial, March 8, 1954, as part of the Bushnell Symphony Series.

Daily Record 10/15/53

REHEARSAL SERIES OF SYMPHONY NOW READY

The Open Rehearsals in Symphony Hall resume Thursday evening, Oct. 29, at 7:30.

The series was initiated by Charles Munch as a result of pleas by college students. Mr. Munch hit on the idea of open rehearsals, to take place about once a month, with a reduced rate for tickets.

Any ticket-holder may hear the great orchestra from any seat, downstairs or upstairs. The doors open at quarter to seven, and the audience distributes itself according to individual preference for location.

Conductor, orchestra, and a soloist from time to time, are heard both in periods of straight to perfect vital phrases. Audiences are fascinated to be let in on the secrets of working out a distinguished performance.

Until Oct. 20, tickets may be obtained at Symphony Hall at the subscription rate of six rehearsals for $7, and (if any remain) at $2 for separate rehearsals. Starting Thursday, Oct. 29, the series continues on Thursday, Dec. 10; Wednesday, Jan. 6; Wednesday, Jan. 27; Thursday, Feb. 18; Thursday, April 1.

Christian Science Monitor

, OCTOBER 17, 1953 Art—Music—Theater 13

Leo Smit at the Symphony

Première of Overture by Composer-Pianist

By Harold Rogers

It was Leo Smit's day in Symphony Hall yesterday. The young and scholarly looking musician gave a good account of himself in two activities—as a pianist and as a composer.

First he appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as soloist in Aaron Copland's Piano Concerto. Then Mr. Smit's Overture, "The Parcae," was given its world première with Charles Munch at the helm. After the concerto Mr. Smit took bows from the stage. After the overture he took them from a seat in the audience.

That Mr. Smit is a man of talent is readily discernible in his overture, a work that carries within it a dominant poetic mood and is constructed along thoughtful neo-classical lines. But we find the composer midway in his development. There is a certain "hommage à Stravinsky," an understandable influence among younger composers.

The piece is overwrought; the musical ideas occasionally tumble over one another, though there are times when the lines simplify and emerge with clarity. In this short work Mr. Smit has given us enough evidence to show that he has the makings of a major composer.

* * *

The dominant mood of his overture is derived from its title, "The Parcae"—the three Fates of mythology who were supposed to determine the course of a man's life. There is a strong, pervading sense of elemental fatalism. Some tricky syncopations were not played too accurately.

The Copland Concerto was a shocker, as the composer doubtless intended it to be when he wrote it in 1926. Today it is staggering to imagine how the listeners must have felt at its première by the Boston Symphony in 1927 (with Koussevitzky conducting and the composer at the keyboard).

Here we find Mr. Copland in the period when he was an iconoclast, and it is the willful naughtiness of this music that the listener is tempted either to resent or to ignore. It is as if the composer deliberately employed every honky-tonk device that would be alien to the concert hall, simply for a dramatically incongruous effect. It is like asking a skid-road songstress to entertain in a Beacon Hill drawing room.

* * *

In the second half of the two-part work we are astonished by a raw, rebellious ragtime, annunciated by the piano. While there is nothing wrong with ragtime, per se, here Mr. Copland submits it to a disintegrating process that amounts to little more than a joke. Surely he must look back on it as a joke. If he ever took it seriously, he should be ashamed of himself. And it seemed—whether a joke or not—interminable. Mr. Smit's pianism was appropriately aggressive, explosive, and stunning.

The rest of Mr. Munch's program was in stark contrast to the Copland. He gave us another of his rarefied and fine-spun readings of Ravel's suite, "Le Tombeau de Couperin." The Prélude was like scintillating dinner talk at a table ornamented by cut-glass pendants in candlelight. And the Forlane moved with beauty until one of the woodwinds at one spot was a few beats off. Mr. Munch used more rubato in the Menuet than one would expect to find, but there is no good reason why he shouldn't if he wishes. Ralph Gomberg's oboe solo in the Rigaudon, spun out with lovely eloquence, won him two bows afterwards.

And what more? Mr. Munch opened with an exuberantly joyous performance of Mozart's sunny Divertiment in D major for Strings, heard last summer at Tanglewood. We also heard the Beethoven Symphony No. 2 for the first time under Mr. Munch's baton, and though he sometimes rode the orchestra rather hard and fast, he took the hurdles neatly.

Cir. (D 215,218)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER

OCT 15 1953

Seats Available For Rehearsals

Series tickets at a special rate are available until Tuesday for the set of six Open Rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra starting Thursday, Oct. 29, at 7:30 p.m.

The series, now in its fourth season, was started by Conductor Charles Munch in answer to requests from students in the area for opportunities to hear the orchestra, already carrying a heavy concert schedule.

Student enthusiasm for the once-a-month rehearsals has mounted steadily, and generally are fascinated to be let in on the secrets of working out a distinguished performance. Doors open at 6:45 and ticket holders may pick preferred locations anywhere in the hall.

Tickets may be obtained at Symphony Hall at the subscription rate of six for $7. Any remaining will be sold at $2 each. Other rehearsals will be Dec. 10, Jan. 6, Jan. 27, Feb. 18 and April 1.

Cir. (D 124,110) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

OCT 18 1953

Boston Symphony on Tour This Week; Returns for Open Rehearsal Oct. 29

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make a tour during the coming week as far west as Ann Arbor, and return to present the third program of the Friday afternoon, Saturday evening series on Oct. 30 and 31, and the opening program of the Sunday afternoon series on Nov. 1. The first "Open Rehearsal" will be on Thursday, Oct. 29, at 7:30 p.m.

At the Friday and Saturday concerts, Charles Munch will present a new cello concerto by Dmitri Kabalevsky, which is to have its first performance in Boston. The soloist will be Samuel Mayes. The program will begin with Debussy's "Iberia" and end with Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, No. 3.

Mr. Munch announces the following program for the Sunday afternoon concert: Mozart's Divertimento for Strings, K. 136; Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin"; Excerpts from Act III of Wagner's "Die Meistersinger"; and Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony.

Cir. (D 124,110) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

OCT 11 1953

Leo Smit Is Symphony Soloist This Week in Copland Concerto

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch, enters upon the second week of its season with concerts next Tuesday evening at 8:30 and Friday afternoon at 2:15 and Saturday evening at 8:30 in Symphony Hall. Mr. Munch announces for the Tuesday program Handel's Concerto in F major, for Two Wind Choirs and Strings; Brahms' Symphony No. 2, Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso No. 2 for String Orchestra, and Tchaikovsky's Overture-Fatasia, Romeo and Juliet.

At the Friday and Saturday concerts Mr. Munch will conduct the Mozart Divertimento in D major, for String Orchestra, K. 136, which will have its first performance at these concerts. The second number will be Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" Suite.

Leo Smit, the pianist who introduced Haieff's Concerto at these concerts last season and repeated it last Summer at the Venice Festival with outstanding success, will be heard in a revival of Aaron Copland's Piano Concerto in one movement. This will be followed by Mr. Smit's Overture in C-sharp minor, which will have [illegible] first public performance. [illegible] Munch will conclude the pro[illegible] with Beethoven's Symphony [illegible] 2, in D major, which he ha[illegible] yet conducted with this orch[illegible]

Cir. (D 131,670) (S 258,529)

JD

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

OCT 17 1953

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the second program of its 73d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Leo Smit, pianists, was soloist in the following program:

Divertimento in D for Strings (K.136)	Mozart
"Le Tombeau de Couerin"	Ravel
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra	Copland
Overture: The Parcae	Smit
Symphony No. 2 in D. Op. 36	Beethoven

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It was 1926, the year of "flaming youth."

It that year Rudolph Valentino died, mourned at the bier by the mysterious "woman in black." Richard Byrd flew over the North Pole in that year, too. Tunney beat the hitherto invincible Dempsey, and Gertrude Ederle became the first woman to swim the English channel. Contract bridge was replacing auction and those in the know were dancing the Black Bottom. Those in the know were also reading Hemingway's "The Sun Also Rises:" seeing O'Neill's "Great God Brown and singing "Valencia," "In a Little Spanish Town" and "Where Do You Work-a John?" Those not in the know were dying of poison bootleg liquor at $85 a case . . . 2000 in a few months. The roaring 20's, in short, were roaring loudest in 1926, and the roaring could not be ignored by a 26-year-old composer from Brooklyn, who in that year completed his first Piano Concerto.

That Concerto was heard again yesterday afternoon in a tumultuous evocation of a period that has been more unmistakably captured in music than any other in history. From the first blue phrase, reminiscent of the then year-old "Rhapsody in Blue" to the final "dirty" trills of the muted trumpets in a colossal final chord, this music could have sprung from no other era and from no other nation. It was then, as it is now, as indigenous as the Truman shirt, as native as the hot dog.

In 1927, when it was first performed by Serge Koussevitsky with the composer himself as soloist, it brought down the wrath of the godly critics everywhere. And to read their invective in Nicholas Slonimsky's lexicon of invective is to smile, not at their wrath but at their sense of personal outrage: who was this creature who had so brazenly affronted us?

Period Piece

They are not to be blamed or reproached or jollied for having missed; actually, they were closer to being right than they suspected. It is an outrage still, though the shock value has long since diminished, but it is an historical outrage. It is a genre piece, a period piece, a spontaneous and deeply felt expression of a brawling, turbulent and violent time when America, though 150 years old that very year and feeling very mature indeed, was actually still an adolescent, as it has come most painfully to learn.

In this light, Copland's Piano Concerto is, in fact, a both a milestone and a masterpiece. Today its blatancy, its jazzical cliches, its rhythmic eccentricities parodying but extending the jungle beat, its blue intervals, its grotesque soprano saxophone, its (unconscious?) quotations of truly beautiful despite their obviously Gershwin derivation.

It is easy enough to see, in retrospect, that it was composed by one who ranks with the most important American composers of the generation. The critics of 1926 didn't see it that way, nor could they have. The true creative artist is always ahead of his time; that he can capture the essence of an era long bfeore that essence is discernible among historians, philosophers and sociologists is, indeed, one of the mysteries of the creative spirit. Still the technique is there for all, now, to wonder at. The orchestral procedures, the command of textures, the out-and-out virtuosity of it all would surely have impressed the reviewers of 1927 had they not been so indignant. Mr. Copland has long outgrown this phase, of course, but I am not any too everything from "I Hate to See the Evening Sun Go Down" to the "Charleston," is, if I may employ the term, merely corney. Nonetheless, it has a potency and a life force that carries everything (though certainly not everyone) before it. Moreover, it does have some meditative, some luminous passages that are sure he has ever since captured the sheer uninihibition this strangely terrible yet strangely fascinating piece displays.

Great Testimony

That Leo Smit, after giving us the Alexei Haieff concerto last season, would return again with a work that cannot impress the conventional audience with his possibilities, say, in Brahms; is a great testimony to his integrity as a musician. One can only say he performed this fearfully difficult work with force, conviction and immense skill, supported by Mr. Munch and the orchestra in what often seemed to me a slightly ragged but right way.

After the interval Mr. Smit's own Overture "The Parcae" was given a hearing. I was much impressed by the introduction, which had the solemnity and often some of the sound and procedures of the late Beethoven. The Beethovenate atmosphere indeed, continued throughout, now through technical devices, again through moodes. I found it an interesting work revealing an original mind, but more promising as an example of what the future might bring in a more extended vein than a pronounced success itself.

This somewhat longish concert began with a first local performance of an exquisite Mozart Divertimento for strings that brought up the question why we don't hear more of these things; continued with a marvelously poetic reading of Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" and ended with an eminently just and lovely performance of Beethoven's Second. The orchestra never sounded better nor responded more subtly than in this and the Ravel, and leaves next week for its first out of town series in absolutely top form.

Cir. (D 294,859) (S 252,207)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

OCT 17 1953

Music in Review

BY TUCKER KEISER

Symphony Concert

The first performance of Leo Smit's Overture: The Parcae, the first performance in the Friday-Saturday series of Mozart's Divertimento in D major for strings, K 136, and Charles Munch's first Boston reading of Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D major were features of yesterday's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. However, the Copland Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, not heard here since 1927, was by far the most exciting item on the day's program.

A generation ago, the critical fraternity of Boston and New York found the Copland concerto showing "a shocking lack of taste," a "concatention of meaninglessly ugly sounds and distorted rhythms," "raucous modernistic fury," and "a harrowing horror from beginning to end."

Nobody seemed to be shocked, infuriated or harrowed by the revived "horror" yesterday. I found the score singularly tuneful, in fact, whenever the composer was not being prankishly discordant. Far from being "raucously modernistic" the music has a dated and wistful air, recalling the quaint period in our annals when people carried hip flasks, wore cloche hats and knock-kneed their way through the Charleston.

Leo Smit, who played a genuinely jazzy solo piano, could not, even in these more enlightened days, be called a "square"; Mr. Munch, however, seemed rather perplexed by the "crazy" doings. The conductor's interpretation was strictly rectangular.

The Divertimento, which opened the program, a youthful Mozart essay, gave the string section an opportunity to prove once again that it is the finest such group in the world. The three-movement work possessed an elegance characteristic of both Mozart and of Munch at his Gallic beat.

Ravel's Le Tombeau de Couperin Suite, an orchestral version of the piano piece in which he paid homage to the earlier French composer, masterfully employs all the resources of the instrumental palette. The pastel shades of this exquisite morceau were, unfortunately, so pallidly interpreted as to approach being washed out.

Smit's appearance as a composer on the program was not as impressive as his performance as a pianist. The Overture: The Parcae, is cast in the French overture style of the 17th century, beginning with the recitative slow introduction and concluding with a movement in fugal style. The composition begins pompously and ends hesitantly; having little emotional content, it is evidently an academic exercise.

The Second Symphony is second-rate Beethoven; Mr. Munch's performance was adequate.

Cir. (D 124,110) (S 302,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

OCT 17 1953

MUSIC

Leo Smit at Symphony as Soloist and Composer

Second "regular" program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conductor, at Symphony Hall. The program: Mozart: Divertimento in D major for Strings (K. 136) (first time at these concerts); Ravel: "Le Tombeau de Couperin;" Aaron Copland: Piano Concerto (Leo Smit, soloist); Leo Smit: Overture, "The Parcae" (first performance); Beethoven: Second Symphony.

By CYRUS DURGIN

As matters turned out, the season's program No. 2 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra proved to be not only diversified but novel in two of its items, and interesting in all. It had not been planned, originally, in just the manner that it was given. Samson Francois had been expected as soloist, but could not appear. But the revised list, with Leo Smit represented both as soloist and composer, was considerably better, and thus we all gained.

Smit had made a good impression, last season, when he made his Boston debut playing the percussive Concerto by Alexei Haieff. Yesterday his piano technique and his musicianship were tested to a higher degree with Aaron Copland's Piano Concerto of 1926, and the results were good in every way. The Concerto itself, largely neglected since the premiere of 1927, is a curious work, its first portion slow and romantic, the second bright, rythmic and an essay in treating the jazz idiom symphonically.

In a sense this is a synthetic piece, for the symphonic manner and the jazz manner do not get on well together; each is inclusive in its own way. They discourage attempts to blend them. Nor was Aaron Copland at 26 (or at any other age) a composer to whom jazz was a natural or easy medium. Yet, and still and still, this Concerto does a great deal with syncopation, the blues melodic style, and an orchestration involving the flesh-pot voice of the saxophone. It is bouncy and alive, there is solid continuity, the Concerto is at once symphonic and jazzy.

That is quite an accomplishment, especially when the jazz rhythms can be played as well as yesterday. Munch caught the feeling; and he made the orchestra get it, too. As for Smit, he had no difficulty whatever, and his playing was a most enjoyable and poised example of what a young American musician of high gifts can do with two disparate idioms. Perhaps Copland is no longer much interested in this piece. Certainly revision of art after many years is often a futile business. Yet I am convinced that, if the composer agrees, the Concerto could be improved by dropping the first section altogether or recasting it in a wholly jazz style. The Friday audience, usually reserved, received the Concerto most enthusiastically.

Smit's Overture, involved in its title, at least, with the mythological image of the Fates depicted as three old women spinning, is decidedly good music. It is a sort of neo-classical overture, structurally sound, clearly set forth in an idiom that is often dissonant but, never messy or confused, and inherently dramatic. If the form and the treatment are basically academic, the Overture is none the less living and contemporary, and it deserves to be heard again.

I suppose the reason why Mozart's young and tender Divertimento had never been played by this orchestra before is that no one had thought of doing it. Sounds amazing, but such has been the case with many a piece of neglected 18th Century music. Now, I hope, we may expect it to re-appear as a new-found friend.

Especial curiosity surrounded Munch's performance of the Beethoven Second Symphony, which he had not played with this orchestra before. He gave it, as you might have expected, a hearty and vigorous reading, personal in certain details, but consistently in the right Beethoven style, with no exaggerations of tempo or emphasis. Very good, indeed! Ravel's jeweled little Suite he conducted faster than he had in the Berkshires last Summer, which was all to the good. At the end he singled out first oboe, Ralph Gomberg, for deserved applause.

Cir. (D 215,218)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER

OCT 19 1953

Boston Symphony On Short Tour

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make a tour through the coming week as far west as Ann Arbor, and return to present the third program of the Friday afternoon, Saturday evening series on October 30, 31, and the opening program of the Sunday afternoon series on the following Sunday, November 1. The first "Open Rehearsal" will be on Thursday, October 29, at 7:30 P. M.

At the Friday and Saturday concerts, Charles Munch will present a new cello concerto by Dmitri Kabalevsky, which is to have its first performance in Boston. The soloist will be Samuel Mayes. The program will begin with Debussy's "Iberia" and end with Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphone, No. 3.

Mr. Munch announces the program for the Sunday afternoon concert: Mozart's Divertimento for Strings, K. 136, Havels "Le Tombeau de Couperin", Excerpts from Act III of Wagner's "Die Meistersinger", and Beethoven's "Eroica" Sympohny.

Cir. (D 68,783)

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

OCT 20 1953

Boston Symphony In Exciting Concert At Smith College

Northampton, Oct. 19—With the majestic music of the "Assemblage of the Master Singers" from the third act of Wagner's "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" ringing in their ears, a capacity audience left John M. Greene Hall tonight following the opening concert of the 1953-54 Smith College concert course given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch.

In their first non-Boston concert of this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave no encores. Their Smith College program opened with the always enjoyable "Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Opus 73" by Brahms. The brilliant rendition of the fourth movement was the climax of the first half of the program.

The disonant music of "Symphony No. 2 for String Orchestra" by Honegger, the one modern selection, was in sharp contrast with the rest of the program. This was first played in America by the Boston Symphony with Mr. Munch conducting in 1946.

It was followed by another French selection, "Le Tombeau de Couperin" by Ravel, performed in Munch's typical mastery of French music. Many considered this a highlight of the program.

With energy and precision the orchestra of 104 men concluded the program with three stirring excerpts from Wagner's "Meistersinger"—the Introduction, the Dance of the Apprentices, and the Assemblage of the Master Singers.

Cir. (D 131,670) (S [illegible])

JD

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

OCT 17 1953

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the second program of its 73d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Leo Smit, pianists, was soloist in the following program:

Divertimento in D for Strings (K.136) .... Mozart
"Le Tombeau de Couerin" ..... Ravel
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra .... Copland
Overture: The Parcae .... Smit
Symphony No. 2 in D. Op. 36 .. Beethoven

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It was 1926, the year of "flaming youth."

It that year Rudolph Valentino died, mourned at the bier by the mysterious "woman in black." Richard Byrd flew over the North Pole in that year, too. Tunney beat the hitherto invincible Dempsey, and Gertrude Ederle became the first woman to swim the English channel. Contract bridge was replacing auction and those in the know were dancing the Black Bottom. Those in the know were also reading Hemingway's "The Sun Also Rises:" seeing O'Neill's "Great God Brown and singing "Valencia," "In a Little Spanish Town" and "Where Do You Work-a John?" Those not in the know were dying of poison bootleg liquor at $85 a case . . . 2000 in a few months. The roaring 20's, in short, were roaring loudest in 1926, and the roaring could not be ignored by a 26-year-old composer from Brooklyn, who in that year completed his first Piano Concerto.

That Concerto was heard again yesterday afternoon in a tumultuous evocation of a period that has been more unmistakably captured in music than any other in history. From the first blue phrase, reminiscent of the then year-old "Rhapsody in Blue" to the final "dirty" trills of the muted trumpets in a colossal final chord, this music could have sprung from no other era and from no other nation. It was then, as it is now, as indigenous as the Truman shirt, as native as the hot dog.

In 1927, when it was first performed by Serge Koussevitsky with the composer himself as soloist, it brought down the wrath of the godly critics everywhere. And to read their invective in Nicholas Slonimsky's lexicon of invective is to smile, not at their wrath but at their sense of personal outrage: who was this creature who had so brazenly affronted us?

Period Piece

They are not to be blamed or reproached or jollied for having missed; actually, they were closer to being right than they suspected. It is an outrage still, though the shock value has long since diminished, but it is an historical outrage. It is a genre piece, a period piece, a spontaneous and deeply felt expression of a brawling, turbulent and violent time when America, though 150 years old that very year and feeling very mature indeed, was actually still an adolescent, as it has come most painfully to learn.

In this light, Copland's Piano Concerto is, in fact, a both a milestone and a masterpiece. Today its blatancy, its jazzical cliches, its rhythmic eccentricities parodying but extending the jungle beat, its blue intervals, its grotesque soprano saxophone, its (unconscious?) quotations of truly beautiful despite their obviously Gershwin derivation.

It is easy enough to see, in retrospect, that it was composed by one who ranks with the most important American composers of the generation. The critics of 1926 didn't see it that way, nor could they have. The true creative artist is always ahead of his time; that he can capture the essence of an era long bfeore that essence is discernible among historians, philosophers and sociologists is, indeed, one of the mysteries of the creative spirit. Still the technique is there for all, now, to wonder at. The orchestral procedures, the command of textures, the out-and-out virtuosity of it all would surely have impressed the reviewers of 1927 had they not been so indignant. Mr. Copland has long outgrown this phase, of course, but I am not any too everything from "I Hate to See the Evening Sun Go Down" to the "Charleston," is, if I may employ the term, merely corney. Nonetheless, it has a potency and a life force that carries everything (though certainly not everyone) before it. Moreover, it does have some meditative, some luminous passages that are sure he has ever since captured the sheer uninihibition this strangely terrible yet strangely fascinating piece displays.

Great Testimony

That Leo Smit, after giving us the Alexei Haieff concerto last season, would return again with a work that cannot impress the conventional audience with his possibilities, say, in Brahms; is a great testimony to his integrity as a musician. One can only say he performed this fearfully difficult work with force, conviction and immense skill, supported by Mr. Munch and the orchestra in what often seemed to me a slightly ragged but right way.

After the interval Mr. Smit's own Overture "The Parcae" was given a hearing. I was much impressed by the introduction, which had the solemnity and often some of the sound and procedures of the late Beethoven. The Beethovenate atmosphere indeed, continued throughout now through technical devices, again through moodes. I found it an interesting work revealing an original mind, but more promising as an example of what the future might bring in a more extended vein than a pronounced success itself.

This somewhat longish concert began with a first local performance of an exquisite Mozart Divertimento for strings that brought up the question why we don't hear more of these things; continued with a marvelously poetic reading of Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" and ended with an eminently just and lovely performance of Beethoven's Second. The orchestra never sounded better nor responded more subtly than in this and the Ravel, and leaves next week for its first out of town series in absolutely top form.

Cir. (D 124,110) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

OCT 17 1953

MUSIC

Leo Smit at Symphony as Soloist and Composer

Second "regular" program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conductor, at Symphony Hall. The program: Mozart: Divertimento in D major for Strings (K. 136) (first time at these concerts); Ravel: "Le Tombeau de Couperin;" Aaron Copland: Piano Concerto (Leo Smit, soloist); Leo Smit: Overture, "The Parcae" (first performance); Beethoven: Second Symphony.

By CYRUS DURGIN

As matters turned out, the season's program No. 2 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra proved to be not only diversified but novel in two of its items, and interesting in all. It had not been planned, originally, in just the manner that it was given. Samson Francois had been expected as soloist, but could not appear. But the revised list, with Leo Smit represented both as soloist and composer, was considerably better, and thus we all gained.

Smit had made a good impression, last season, when he made his Boston debut playing the percussive Concerto by Alexei Haieff. Yesterday his piano technique and his musicianship were tested to a higher degree with Aaron Copland's Piano Concerto of 1926, and the results were good in every way. The Concerto itself, largely neglected since the premiere of 1927, is a curious work, its first portion slow and romantic, the second bright, rythmic and an essay in treating the jazz idiom symphonically.

In a sense this is a synthetic piece, for the symphonic manner and the jazz manner do not get on well together; each is inclusive in its own way. They discourage attempts to blend them. Nor was Aaron Copland at 26 (or at any other age) a composer to whom jazz was a natural or easy medium. Yet, and still and still, this Concerto does a great deal with syncopation, the blues melodic style, and an orchestration involving the flesh-pot voice of the saxophone. It is bouncy and alive, there is solid continuity, the Concerto is at once symphonic and jazzy.

That is quite an accomplishment, especially when the jazz rhythms can be played as well as yesterday. Munch caught the feeling; and he made the orchestra get it, too. As for Smit, he had no difficulty whatever, and his playing was a most enjoyable and poised example of what a young American musician of high gifts can do with two disparate idioms. Perhaps Copland is no longer much interested in this piece. Certainly revision of art after many years is often a futile business. Yet I am convinced that, if the composer agrees, the Concerto could be improved by dropping the first section altogether or recasting it in a wholly jazz style. The Friday audience, usually reserved, received the Concerto most enthusiastically.

Smit's Overture, involved in its title, at least, with the mythological image of the Fates depicted as three old women spinning, is decidedly good music. It is a sort of neo-classical overture, structurally sound, clearly set forth in an idiom that is often dissonant but, never messy or confused, and inherently dramatic. If the form and the treatment are basically academic, the Overture is none the less living and contemporary, and it deserves to be heard again.

I suppose the reason why Mozart's young and tender Divertimento had never been played by this orchestra before is that no one had thought of doing it. Sounds amazing, but such has been the case with many a piece of neglected 18th Century music. Now, I hope, we may expect it to re-appear as a new-found friend.

Especial curiosity surrounded Munch's performance of the Beethoven Second Symphony, which he had not played with this orchestra before. He gave it, as you might have expected, a hearty and vigorous reading, personal in certain details, but consistently in the right Beethoven style, with no exaggerations of tempo or emphasis. Very good, indeed! Ravel's jeweled little Suite he conducted faster than he had in the Berkshires last Summer, which was all to the good. At the end he singled out first oboe, Ralph Gomberg, for deserved applause.

Cir. (D 294,859) (S 252,207)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

OCT 17 1953

Music in Review

BY TUCKER KEISER

Symphony Concert

The first performance of Leo Smit's Overture: The Parcae, the first performance in the Friday-Saturday series of Mozart's Divertimento in D major for strings, K 136, and Charles Munch's first Boston reading of Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D major were features of yesterday's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. However, the Copland Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, not heard here since 1927, was by far the most exciting item on the day's program.

A generation ago, the critical fraternity of Boston and New York found the Copland concerto showing "a shocking lack of taste," a "concatention of meaninglessly ugly sounds and distorted rhythms," "raucous modernistic fury," and "a harrowing horror from beginning to end."

Nobody seemed to be shocked, infuriated or harrowed by the revived "horror" yesterday. I found the score singularly tuneful, in fact, whenever the composer was not being prankishly discordant. Far from being "raucously modernistic" the music has a dated and wistful air, recalling the quaint period in our annals when people carried hip flasks, wore cloche hats and knock-kneed their way through the Charleston.

Leo Smit, who played a genuinely jazzy solo piano, could not, even in these more enlightened days, be called a "square"; Mr. Munch, however, seemed rather perplexed by the "crazy" doings. The conductor's interpretation was strictly rectangular.

The Divertimento, which opened the program, a youthful Mozart essay, gave the string section an opportunity to prove once again that it is the finest such group in the world. The three-movement work possessed an elegance characteristic of both Mozart and of Munch at his Gallic beat.

Ravel's Le Tombeau de Couperin Suite, an orchestral version of the piano piece in which he paid homage to the earlier French composer, masterfully employs all the resources of the instrumental palette. The pastel shades of this exquisite morceau were, unfortunately, so pallidly interpreted as to approach being washed out.

Smit's appearance as a composer on the program was not as impressive as his performance as a pianist. The Overture: The Parcae, is cast in the French overture style of the 17th century, beginning with the recitative slow introduction and concluding with a movement in fugal style. The composition begins pompously and ends hesitantly; having little emotional content, it is evidently an academic exercise.

The Second Symphony is second-rate Beethoven; Mr. Munch's performance was adequate.

Cir. (D 215,218)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER

OCT 19 1953

Boston Symphony On Short Tour

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make a tour through the coming week as far west as Ann Arbor, and return to present the third program of the Friday afternoon, Saturday evening series on October 30, 31, and the opening program of the Sunday afternoon series on the following Sunday, November 1. The first "Open Rehearsal" will be on Thursday, October 29, at 7:30 P. M.

At the Friday and Saturday concerts, Charles Munch will present a new cello concerto by Dmitri Kabalevsky, which is to have its first performance in Boston. The soloist will be Samuel Mayes. The program will begin with Debussy's "Iberia" and end with Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphone, No. 3.

Mr. Munch announces the program for the Sunday afternoon concert: Mozart's Divertimento for Strings, K. 136, Havels "Le Tombeau de Couperin", Excerpts from Act III of Wagner's "Die Meistersinger", and Beethoven's "Eroica" Sympohny.

Cir. (D 68,783)

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

OCT 20 1953

Boston Symphony In Exciting Concert At Smith College

Northampton, Oct. 19—With the majestic music of the "Assemblage of the Master Singers" from the third act of Wagner's "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" ringing in their ears, a capacity audience left John M. Greene Hall tonight following the opening concert of the 1953-54 Smith College concert course given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch.

In their first non-Boston concert of this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave no encores. Their Smith College program opened with the always enjoyable "Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Opus 73" by Brahms. The brilliant rendition of the fourth movement was the climax of the first half of the program.

The disonant music of "Symphony No. 2 for String Orchestra" by Honegger, the one modern selection, was in sharp contrast with the rest of the program. This was first played in America by the Boston Symphony with Mr. Munch conducting in 1946.

It was followed by another French selection, "Le Tombeau de Couperin" by Ravel, performed in Munch's typical mastery of French music. Many considered this a highlight of the program.

With energy and precision the orchestra of 104 men concluded the program with three stirring excerpts from Wagner's "Meistersinger"—the Introduction, the Dance of the Apprentices, and the Assemblage of the Master Singers.

Cir. (D 68,783)

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

OCT 21 1953

Concert Season Opens

Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is shown with Mrs. Frederick W. Fuller, Jr., chairman of the Community Concert Committee of the Junior League of Springfield, before the concert last night in Municipal Auditorium.

Cir. (D 68,783)

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

OCT 21 1953

HUB SYMPHONY OPENS LEAGUE'S CONCERT SERIES

Charles Munch Conducts Boston Orchestra in Fine Program

By WILLARD M. CLARK

The 1953-1954 season of the Community Concert Association sponsored by the Junior League of Springfield opened last night with a tremendously exciting concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting. We heard the Boston orchestra many times last summer at Tanglewood, but they never played with such brilliance, polish and responsiveness as we noted last night.

Original Reading

The programs opened with the second symphony of Brahms and it was given a reading so original and exhilirating that one might be hearing it for the first time. Apparently Charles Munch is no stickler for tradition. Why should he be when his own feeling can translate the music of Brahms so that its beauty is enhanced and its meaning made clear.

We have never felt the propulsion of this music as we did last night, particularly in the opening movement and the joyous affirmation of the finale. This was a performance that was alive, vivid and strong in its entirety. It is doubtful if a Springfield audience has ever heard a more persuasive performance of this work.

Mr. Munch could have chosen no greater contrasting work than Honogger's "Symphony No. 2 for String Orchestra." It takes the rare qualities of the Boston Symphony strings to provide a complete realization of this work. While there are complexities and dissonance aplenty, the work, on the whole, is entirely listenable and we think it means something different to each listener. Much of the music is dark and brooding. One listener found it "lonesome" music. There are frequent outbursts, as if of anger. The adagio has moments of exquisite lyricism, but these too seem anticipatory of ills to come. Only in the magnificent trumpet chorale in the finale, does the brooding cease and one feels that all is well that ends well. Incidentally the ad libitum trumpet part in the chorale doubles the first violins. A program note stated that the choral theme was the composer's own.

Note of Gaity

The first note of gaity and relaxation was heard in the lovely music of "Le Tombeau de Couperin" by Ravel. Charles Munch has made this suite very much his own and he brings to it the deft touch which only a Frenchman can give French music. The four movements, Prelude, Forlane, Menuet and Rigaudon are happily contrasted and each bears the magic of the Ravel skill in coloration and melodic facility. It was played with rare beauty of tone and it was no surprise that the audience took to it. Mr. Munch shared the applause with his orchestra and signaled first oboeist Ralph Gomberg for particular acknowledgement.

The concert concluded with the introduction, Dance of the Apprentices and Entrance of the Mastersingers, all from the third act of Wagner's "Die Meistersingers von Nurmberg." It was a brilliant conclusion to a concert which opened the season of the Community Concerts Association in truly memorable fashion.

Cir. (D. 91,577)

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. NEWS

OCT 21 1953

Boston Symphony Excels Again in Appearance Here

Remarkable Musical Organization Once More Demonstrates Excellence to Open the 1953-54 Community Concert Series

By W. HARLEY RUDKIN

A deep bow to the old; a friendly nod for the new, and a cordial handshake for the in-between—that was the programming of Charles Munch for the appearance of the Boston Symphony at the Auditorium last evening, in the opening concert of the 1953-54 series under the sponsorship of the Junior League of Springfield.

It was a wide and varied evening, ranging all the way from Brahms to Honegger and from Wagner to Ravel; an evening of great sonorities, and soft glissandos; an evening to make a man feel like standing up and cheering one of the world's most remarkable musical organizations.

One thing you can always be sure of with the Boston Symphony—it comes prepared to play. It knows what it is about, and last night it offered just about as perfect playing of the Brahms Second Symphony as this reporter, at any rate, ever expects to hear. From the appealing horn solo that opened the initial allegro, to the vast sounds that filled the hall for the closing allegro, it was music that rose and soared; that sang and whispered; that was completely enchanting. Mr. Munch could have played it right over again, with no complaint from this corner.

Great String Section

In between hearings, it is possible to forget, a little, just how remarkable the Boston Symphony string section can be. It is a wonderful, collective instrument for the transmission of great music, and, if the Brahms gave it wide scope last night, it was scope that this gifted musical giant was well able to utilize.

Everywhere, there was lavish beauty, and, had the Brahms been the sole occupant of the program, it would still have been an evening most excellently spent.

Vivid Contrast

The contrast, which came immediately after the intermission, was provided by the Arthur Honegger symphony for string orchestra, which had its first American performance in December, 1946, by the Boston Symphony under Conductor Munch. Honegger is not everyone's cup of tea. He takes getting used to, and perhaps there are a lot of people who don't feel it is worth the effort, but preseverance will bring its own reward.

This was followed by Ravel's four-movement "Le Tombeau de Couperin," one of those little personality pieces the French composer delighted in, and the concluding music embodied excerpts from "Meistersinger," to complete an evening that was full of life and beauty and left the listener feeling thankful once again that there IS a Boston Symphony, a Charles Munch to direct it, and an organization which makes it possible for it to be heard here.

Cir. (D 96,447)

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 22 1953

Smit Soloist With Symphony

By FEROL AUSTEN
Special to The Hartford Times

Boston—Sometimes when new works are played for the first time, the music is bad and the soloist is good; or perhaps the music is good and the soloist is bad; or the conductor is under the weather and the orchestra is off. Seldom is everything equally sharp.

This week at Symphony was one of those instances where everybody clicked at once—and it couldn't happen to a nicer guy, as the saying goes.

* * *

LEO SMIT was the lucky man. First he was soloist with the Boston Symphony in Aaron Copland's Piano Concerto, with, of course, Charles Munch directing the accompaniment. The Concerto isn't deathless, by any means, but Mr. Smit gave it respectful treatment, showing off his bristling technique in grand style.

Then Mr. Smit heard his own work, Overture to "The Parcae," played by the orchestra. The Parcae were, in mythology, the three Fates who allegedly planned out each man's life to its inevitable conclusion.

* * *

AS MUSIC, "The Parcae" is not "very new" music, but is written along more or less accepted classical lines. However, what IS important is the interesting glimpse it gives us of the composer's potential talents which—if this piece is any indication—are considerable.

Cir. (D 96,447)

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 17 1953

Fritz Mahler Finds A Concerto, Soloist

Competition exists in the musical field just as it does in most other lines of endeavor, and it is always a feather in a conductor's cap if he can sneak the premiere of a new composition away from one of his rivals.

Hartford will be recipient of one of these musical steals when Fritz Mahler conducts the United States premiere of Dimitri Kabalevsky's Concerto for Cello and Orchestra, Opus 49, at the first Hartford Symphony Orchestra concert of the season Oct. 28 in Bushnell Memorial.

* * *

SOLOIST for the concerto will be, in a sense, the man from whom the premiere was stolen. Thereby, obviously, hangs a tale.

It begins back in 1949 when Kabalevsky, one of Soviet Russia's leading composers, first composed his concerto. It received performances in Russia, of course, and came to this country along with a batch of other Russian scores in a shipment to the Leeds Music Corp., licensed publishers of Soviet music in America.

One day, when Mr. Mahler was making the rounds of the New York publishers, his eye sharply on the lookout for new scores to play, he came across the Kabalevsky Concerto. He liked what he saw and was surprised to find that it had been there for quite some time. Nobody had run across it with enough enthusiasm to give it a public performance.

Mr. Mahler then made arrangements with the publishers for rights to the first American performance, and he set about finding the proper soloist for its presentation with the Hartford Symphony.

On a visit to Tanglewood last Summer, he approached Samuel Mayes, the Boston Symphony's distinguished ~~first cel~~list. He broached to Mr. Mayes the idea of coming down to Hartford to play the premiere. Mayes liked the idea and accepted.

* * *

MEANWHILE, the concerto had come to the attention of Charles Munch, the Boston orchestra's famed conductor. He too, liked what he saw and scheduled it as a United States premiere for the Boston Symphony. The man who was to be the soloist at the premiere was —yes, Samuel Mayes.

This, naturally, caused all sorts of confusion. Mr. Mahler indubitably held the first performance rights. He also indubitably wanted Mr. Mayes to be the soloist. Consultations carried on most amicably resulted in the following decision:

Mr. Munch had the concerto down for Mr. Mayes on Oct. 30 in Boston and for the first part of December in New York. So Mr. Mahler, who had been planning to use the concerto later in the season, moved his performance up to Oct. 28, thus giving the Hartford Symphony the United States premiere and still giving Mr. Mayes his three chances for solo work. It also left the first Boston and New York performances for the Boston Symphony. Mr. Mayes set to work to learn the piece.

SAMUEL MAYES

Later it was learned that Maestro Arturo Toscanini had also run across the work. He, too, liked what he saw, and he will be playing it this season with the NBC Symphony using that orchestra's first cellist, Frank Miller, as soloist.

And so, on Oct. 28 at 8:15 p. m. in Bushnell Memorial, Fritz Mahler and the Hartford Symphony Orchestra will present the United States premiere of Dimitri Kabalevsky's Concerto for Cello and Orchestra, and the rest of the country will follow along behind.

THE ANN ARBOR NEWS, ANN ARBOR, MICH.

Friday. Oct. 23, 1953

PAGE TWENTY-FOUR

Munch Conducts Orchestra In Memorable Performance

By Oliver Edel

Standing room only was the order of the evening at last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Hill Auditorium. And most appropriately so, for in this second concert of the current Choral Union Series, Charles Munch led his magnificent organization to heights of music-making rarely achieved by even the greatest of performers. To begin this memorable evening, Munch chose Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D major, Opus 73. The Second Symphoney of Honegger, Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," and excerpts from the third act of Wagner's "Meistersinger" followed in order.

In selecting the D major Symphony of Brahms for performance, Munch challenged the well-established, though possibly weakened aversion for that composer commonly held by most French musicians and audiences. His choice was fortuitous, his understanding of Brahms was quickly revealed. More, in his own unique fashion, he brought to the work at hand a concept unusual in its dramatic scope, and irrevocable in the carrying out of his dramatic premise.

Relationships Well Established

Though tempo change and rubato were in consequence rather extreme, there can be little question as to the justness of the masterly relationships established. The expressive gamut was large. Free, persuasive lyricism was offset by rhythmic passages sharply, even severely declaimed; pianissimo and fortissimo had their due. Miraculously, each successive mood of the music found its inevitably just tempo and expressiveness.

If the conductor was eloquent, his orchestra was no less so, for this is truly a partnership of colleagues, each uniquely great. It is no idle gesture when Munch stands with his men to receive applause. Theirs is a creative association and an interpretative art that obviously rejects the facsimile, that demands and finds in each performance a new perception.

Only a profound devotion and respect between conductor and orchestra could surmount the obvious performance dangers implicit in such a relationship, and result in a performance art remarkable for its discipline even in the midst of creative experience. Theirs was live, exciting music, and the audience, entering into the spirit of things, could not quite restrain its own enthusiasm, beating Brahms and the performing artists to the finish by a full two measures.

Performed Here Previously

Honegger's Symphony No. 2 for string orchestra opened the second part of the program. The third movement of this work had previously been performed here by Munch and the French National Orchestra in 1948, and the work in its entirety, by Koussevitsky with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, also in 1948. Its rehearing last night proved most welcome. If French music of the 20th century seems at times somewhat alien to a more robust American taste, this composition must be classed as a forceful exception. Incisive rhythms of varying device pervade the whole. Woven into and surmounting the rhythmic textures are solo lines of deep, and on occasion, bold expressive power. Scope, color, and dynamic range, are achieved through an exhaustive use of the different combinations of voice and register possible to an orchestra of strings.

It should be observed that Samuel Mayes, in the role of solo cellist, was eminently effective. All of the strings played superbly, and Munch's uncanny feeling for strings was always subtly present. Under his hands melodic line was amazingly sustained, the bow was always long enough and powerful enough for its musical need. It must be acknowledged, though, that these men from Boston draw a mighty long and powerful bow. If there is one factor in the construction of this work of Honegger's that may be questioned, it is the introduction of trumpets to sound a chorale theme at the end of the last movement. It was this reviewer's impression that their use was both unprepared for and unnecessary, even perhaps an intrusion to an otherwise compelling and well-knit composition.

Relieves Tension

"Le Tombeau de Couperin" was nicely interposed to relieve tension built up by the Brahms and Honegger. Ravel, though dedicating each of the four movements of this suite to a friend killed in World War I, moves here in subdued fashion. His manner is reserved, his end achieved through deft and sensitive touch. His textures are transparent, even fragile. A beautifully light and sensitive performance was an additional measure of the stylistic scope of orchestra and conductor.

The Introduction, Dance of the Apprentices, and Assemblage of the Mastersingers from the third act of Wagner's gayest opera brought the program to a close. It is worthy of mention that this more familiar fare seemed to evince no greater interest and response from the audience than was lavished on the more demanding portions of the program. Insistent recalls, and an obvious reluctance to leave the hall, made even more apparent the audience's evaluation of the evening.

Cir. (S 89,838)

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 18 1953

Springfield Symphony Alumni With Boston Symphony

These musicians who will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday evening at the Auditorium in the Community Concerts series gained some of their experience playing with the Springfield Symphony Orchestra. They are, left to right: Leonard Moss, violinist; Everett Firth, percussionist; Theodore Brewster, bassoonist; William Waterhouse, violinist; and Gottfried Wilfringer, violinist. Other artists in the series will be the DePaur Infantry Chorus, Dec. 9; Paul Badura-Skoda, panist, Feb. 15; and Rise Stevens, mezzo-soprano, March 30.

Cir. (D 78,998) (S 102,999)

This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD

OCT 25 1953

Honegger: Symphony No. 5; Roussel: Bacchus et Ariane; Ravel: Pavane pour une Infante defunte (RCA Victor LM 1741). No happier choice could have possibly have been made by Victor than that of Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra for these works. For Mr Munch's affinity for the Honigger idiom is well known, and the performance on this occasion is of the usual high order.

The Roussel is a positive delight, being a concert presentation of a fanciful ballet score, beautifully orchestrated. Here, too, the Munch interpretation may be accepted as wholly definitive.

For good measure, the Pavane, in a richly conceived reading, fills out the second side. With Munch, the peerless Boston, and the brilliant New Orthophonic recording, this is an effort of which RCA Victor can well be proud.

TIGHT BINDING

powerful need. It
ugh, that draw a bow. If onstrucnegger's
t is the
to sound
d of the review-use was unneces-
trusion to and well-

erin" was lieve ten-rahms and h dedicat-vements of killed in re in subner is red through
His tex-n fragile.
sensitive additional scope of ce of the age of the third act

a brought
se. It is this more evince no ponse from avished on ortions of ecalls, and leave the parent the
the eve-

Cir. (D 345,423) (S 633,364)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

1953

Sara Mae Endich, Soprano, Heard

Morris Warman

Sara Mae Endich

ara Mae Endich, soprano of New England Opera Thea- who sang at the Forum's rd session, a native of ubenville, Ohio, and was duated from Ohio University. was awarded scholarships Tanglewood in 1952 and 1953 appeared as soloist with the ston Symphony Orchestra seasons.

he has been guest soloist with h choral groups as the Hen- ck Hudson Chorus, Hudson, Y.; the Schubert Club, Sche- tady, N. Y., and the Troy cal Society, Troy, N. Y. She also been heard many times r Station WNYC in the Song ssics program and has broad- t from there with Paul lfe's New Chamber Music iety.

n addition to her appearance h the Boston Symphony, Miss lich was soloist with the le Orchestra Society, con- ted by Thomas Scherman in York, and sang the role of arina" in the concertized ver- of Boris Godunov, presented the New York Philharmonic hestra and conducted by itri Mitropoulos.

iss Endich is scheduled to ear with the New England a Theater in Boston Dec. 6 he role of "Melisande," in Debussy's "Pelleas and Melisande," and in November she will be soloist with the Oratorio Society in Schenectady in a performance of Dvorak's "Te Deum," and "The Song of Amos," by Gardner.

Accompanied by Gibner King, Miss Endich's program at the Forum included "Ebben, ne andro lontana," from "La Wally"; Musetta's Waltz Song, from "La Boheme"; "Go 'way From My Window," a folk song arranged by Niles, and "Miranda," by Hageman.

Cir. (D 109,871) (S 165,154)

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT & CHRONICLE
OCT 25 1953

Boston Symphony Acclaimed At Eastman with Monteux

By HARVEY W. SOUTHGATE

ONCE a date is set for a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert events follow with the certainty of the calendar—the large audience, the air of expectancy, the triumph of beautiful music and the salvos of applause.

The cycle was repeated last night at the Eastman, but with an extra fillip at the end when Conductor Pierre Monteux, one of the great men of music, was called back time after time after a memorable reading of Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony. Mr. Monteux, to who the Boston Symphony must seem like a first love as he recalls his service as conductor more than thirty years ago, bowed his thanks for an unusual tribute from a Rochester audience.

The Boston Symphony, being made up of human beings, is presumably subject to the ups and downs of other human institutions, yet one would never guess it as it keeps to the same high standard year after year, in spite of changes of personnel and leadership. Pierre Monteux, from a long career in musical interpretation, knows precisely what he wants from the orchestra, and the orchestra is equipped to give it down to the last nuance and note. It is this complete understanding between conductor and players that probably makes what is meant by the "Boston Symphony tradition." It was all very evident last night.

* * *

THE PROGRAM itself was all on the familiar side, yet varied, with no innovations. It began with the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," music which has worn better than the opera of which it is a part. It is good program music, with its obvious suggestion of a storm at sea, followed by the song of the phantom boat (Flying Dutchman) and the shipwreck and subsequent calm. It is all done on the big Wagnerian scale and was given a rousing performance.

Next was the prelude to the "Afternoon of a Faun," Debussy's delicately tinted setting of Mallarme's poem about a faun that awakens in the forest at daybreak and tries to recall the events of the preceding afternoon. The controversy over what this poem really means has died down, and the music remains for what it is—a charming pastoral study, full of the outdoors and sunshine. And here it was that Miss Doriot Anthony, former Eastman School student, now the first flutist of the orchestra — and its only woman member—was called to the footlight to take a bow for her playing of the lovely air for flute that runs through the piece.

* * *

THEN CAME a thoroughly exciting performance of the "Der Rosenkavalier" suite of Richard Strauss, an orchestral setting of music from the opera and including some delightful waltz music that might have been written by that other Strauss, Johann. This is gorgeous music and won a thunder of applause.

Finally, after the intermission, the Tschaikowsky Fifth brought out in exquisite detail the unique virtues of each section of the orchestra, each giving its special place to the perfect balance of the whole. Much repetition has made this symphony familiar, but one may understand why its form and structure, its recurring theme, taken up by instrument after instrument and repeated in one form after another through the various movements, set traditions spinning when it was first presented. It has a great deal to say to the emotions as well as to the ear.

Mr. Monteux, now in his 79th year, conducted with a vigor and understanding that never flagged. The audience paid tribute to a great career no less than to a stirring performance.

Cir. (D 267,116) 23

This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
OCT 22 1953

Audience Acclaims Glowing Concert By Boston Symphony

By THEODOLINDA C. BORIS

IF THE Boston Symphony had played only the Brahms Second Symphony Wednesday evening, that would have been riches enough and overflowing. Rarely have we had the privilege of hearing as rich and glowing an interpretation, so soaring, free and noble.

Charles Munch, the Bostonians' director, told the students in the Berkshire Music Center this Summer that the most important thing was "to love music with all our heart and all our spirit." He urged them "to make music with all your intensity, with all your conviction, with fire and flame."

Mr. Munch is, himself, a most eloquent practitioner of his preachments. He, himself, makes music with fire and flame. Where some approach music with cool intellectual appraisal or hold that only the objective approach is correct, eschewing all emotion as detrimental to the music, Mr. Munch puts intellect, technical knowledge and his whole self at the service of the music, and is unashamed to be carried away by its beauty.

* * *

LITTLE WONDER that the Brahms symphony was an extraordinary reading, when you add to this kind of animating spirit the playing and sound of one of the world's finest orchestras.

One with their director, the players seemed to anticipate his wishes, so exact was their response. As for the sound of the orchestra, it has a shimmering, full beauty that can scarcely be described but, once heard, leaves the ear dissatisfied with anything less.

The concert included the first hearing here of Honegger's Symphony for Strings, dated Paris, 1941, and indeed reflecting, as a European critic has pointed out, "much of the mood of occupied Paris."

Powerful and intense, the work develops dramatically from its opening theme, a simple and straightforward one introduced by the violas, through the tragic, swelling lament of the slow movement into the vertiginous tension of the finale.

The tension is released with the sudden, surprising entrance of a stately trumpet chorale, original with the composer, which is like a militant and exultant affirmation that the spirit must and does triumph.

* * *

AFTER ACKNOWLEDGING the applause for the Honegger, Mr. Munch gave a little speech, turning now and again to Richard Burgin, concertmaster, for the right English word, in which he said that he played the Honegger here as a memorial for a Buffalo flier, who had been helped by French people after being shot down in France back of the German lines, but who was captured and shot by the Nazis.

Queried after the concert, Mr. Munch said that he did not know the flier's name, but only that he was from Buffalo.

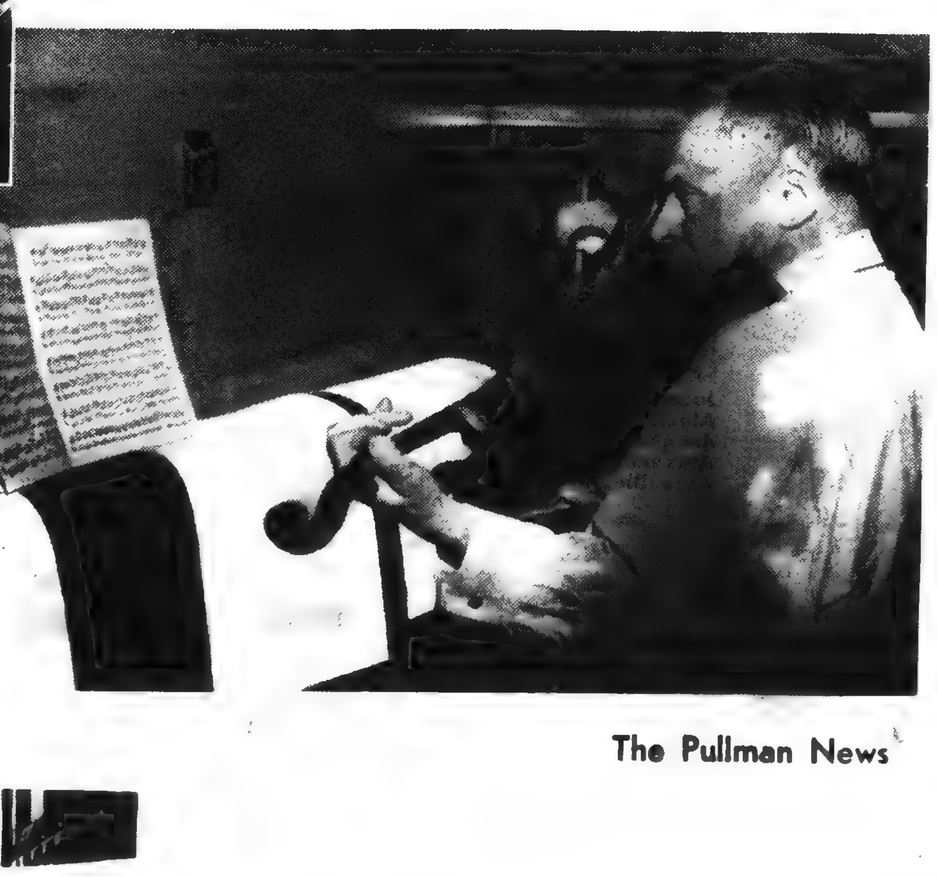
Following the Honegger came the suite "Le Tombeau de Couperin," in which Ravel made poetic obeisance to a French master and the mores of another day.

This was a delectable reading, particularly in the elegantly ingenuous Forlance, the exquisite Menuet and the bouncing Rigaudon. Ending the concert were excerpts from "Die Meistersinger," as warm and mellow in sound as the stage scenes they depict are in color and life.

That the listeners in Kleinhans Music Hall understood it had been a rare evening was apparent in their acclaim for Mr. Munch and his splendid orchestra.

OCTOBER · 1953

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA travels Rail and Pullman on its 33-day transcontinental tour, during which 26 cities were visited. Traveling by special train, the orchestra of 112 men and women went as far south as New Orleans, west to the Pacific, and north to Toronto and Montreal. In photo above, l. to r.: Associate Conductor Richard Burgin, Guest Conductor Pierre Monteux (who formerly headed orchestra), Conductor Charles Munch, Mrs. Monteaux, Pullman Conductor G. D. LaFontaine and New York Central Railroad Conductor Charles Williams.



At right, Richard Burgin, Associate Conductor and Concertmaster, goes over a score aboard his Pullman car, proving that Symphony musicians are good because they practice continually.

18

The Pullman News

TIGHT BINDING

Cir. (D 345,423) (S 636,364)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

OCT 25 1953

Sara Mae Endich, Soprano, Heard

Morris Warman

Sara Mae Endich

ara Mae Endich, soprano of New England Opera Thea- who sang at the Forum's rd session, is a native of ubenville, Ohio, and was duated from Ohio University. was awarded scholarships Tanglewood in 1952 and 1953 appeared as soloist with the ton Symphony Orchestra seasons.

he has been guest soloist with h choral groups as the Hen- k Hudson Chorus, Hudson, Y.; the Schubert Club, Sche- tady, N. Y., and the Troy al Society, Troy, N. Y. She also been heard many times r Station WNYC in the Song ssics program and has broad- from there with Paul ife's New Chamber Music iety.

n addition to her appearance h the Boston Symphony, Miss ich was soloist with the le Orchestra Society, con- ed by Thomas Scherman in York, and sang the role of rina" in the concertized ver- of Boris Godunov, presented he New York Philharmonic hestra and conducted by itri Mitropoulos.

iss Endich is scheduled to ar with the New England a Theater in Boston Dec. 6 he role of "Melisande," in Debussy's "Pelleas and Melisande," and in November she will be soloist with the Oratorio Society in Schenectady in a performance of Dvorak's "Te Deum," and "The Song of Amos," by Gardner.

Accompanied by Gibner King, Miss Endich's program at the Forum included "Ebben, ne andro lontana," from "La Wally"; Musetta's Waltz Song from "La Boheme"; "Go 'way From My Window," a folk song arranged by Niles, and "Miranda," by Hageman.

---

need. It
ugh, that draw a bow. If construc-onegger's
t is the
to sound
d of the review-use was unneces-
trusion to and well-

erin" was lieve ten-rahms and
h dedicat-vements of killed in re in subner' is red through
His tenn fragile.
sensitive additional scope of

ce of the ge of the third act
a brought
se. It is this more evince no
ponse from avished on ortions of ecalls, and leave the arent the
the eve-

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT & CHRONICLE

OCT 25 1953

Boston Symphony Acclaimed At Eastman with Monteux

By HARVEY W. SOUTHGATE

ONCE a date is set for a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert events follow with the certainty of the calendar—the large audience, the air of expectancy, the triumph of beautiful music and the salvos of applause.

The cycle was repeated last night at the Eastman, but with an extra fillip at the end when Conductor Pierre Monteux, one of the great men of music, was called back time after time after a memorable reading of Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony. Mr. Monteux, to who the Boston Symphony must seem like a first love as he recalls his service as conductor more than thirty years ago, bowed his thanks for an unusual tribute from a Rochester audience.

The Boston Symphony, being made up of human beings, is presumably subject to the ups and downs of other human institutions, yet one would never guess it as it keeps to the same high standard year after year, in spite of changes of personnel and leadership. Pierre Monteux, from a long career in musical interpretation, knows precisely what he wants from the orchestra, and the orchestra is equipped to give it down to the last nuance and note. It is this complete understanding between conductor and players that probably makes what is meant by the "Boston Symphony tradition." It was all very evident last night.

* * *

THE PROGRAM itself was all on the familiar side, yet varied, with no innovations. It began with the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," music which has worn better than the opera of which it is a part. It is good program music, with its obvious suggestion of a storm at sea, followed by the song of the phantom boat (Flying Dutchman) and the shipwreck and subsequent calm. It is all done on the big Wagnerian scale and was given a rousing performance.

Next was the prelude to the "Afternoon of a Faun," Debussy's delicately tinted setting of Mallarme's poem about a faun that awakens in the forest at daybreak and tries to recall the events of the preceding afternoon. The controversy over what this poem really means has died down and the music remains for what it is—a charming pastoral study, full of the outdoors and sunshine. And here it was that Miss Doriot Anthony, former Eastman School student, now the first flutist of the orchestra — and its only woman member—was called to the footlights to take a bow for her playing of the lovely air for flute that runs through the piece.

* * *

THEN CAME a thoroughly exciting performance of the "Der Rosenkavalier" suite of Richard Strauss, an orchestral setting of music from the opera and including some delightful waltz music that might have been written by that other Strauss, Johann. This is gorgeous music and won a thunder of applause.

Finally, after the intermission, the Tschaikowsky Fifth brought out in exquisite detail the unique virtues of each section of the orchestra, each giving its special place to the perfect balance of the whole. Much repetition has made this symphony familiar, but one may understand why its form and structure, its recurring theme, taken up by instrument after instrument and repeated in one form after another through the various movements, set traditions spinning when it was first presented. It has a great deal to say to the emotions as well as to the ear.

Mr. Monteux, now in his 79th year, conducted with a vigor and understanding that never flagged. The audience paid tribute to a great career no less than to a stirring performance.

This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 22 1953

Audience Acclaims Glowing Concert By Boston Symphony

By THEODOLINDA C. BORIS

IF THE Boston Symphony had played only the Brahms Second Symphony Wednesday evening, that would have been riches enough and overflowing. Rarely have we had the privilege of hearing as rich and glowing an interpretation, so soaring, free and noble.

Charles Munch, the Bostonians' director, told the students in the Berkshire Music Center this Summer that the most important thing was "to love music with all our heart and all our spirit." He urged them "to make music with all your intensity, with all your conviction, with fire and flame."

Mr. Munch is, himself, a most eloquent practitioner of his preachments. He, himself, makes music with fire and flame. Where some approach music with cool intellectual appraisal or hold that only the objective approach is correct, eschewing all emotion as detrimental to the music, Mr. Munch puts intellect, technical knowledge and his whole self at the service of the music, and is unashamed to be carried away by its beauty.

• • •

LITTLE WONDER that the Brahms symphony was an extraordinary reading, when you add to this kind of animating spirit the playing and sound of one of the world's finest orchestras.

One with their director, the players seemed to anticipate his wishes, so exact was their response. As for the sound of the orchestra, it has a shimmering, full beauty that can scarcely be described but, once heard, leaves the ear dissatisfied with anything less.

The concert included the first hearing here of Honegger's Symphony for Strings, dated Paris, 1941, and indeed reflecting, as a European critic has pointed out, "much of the mood of occupied Paris."

Powerful and intense, the work develops dramatically from its opening theme, a simple and straightforward one introduced by the violas, through the tragic, swelling lament of the slow movement into the vertiginous tension of the finale.

The tension is released with the sudden, surprising entrance of a stately trumpet chorale, original with the composer, which is like a militant and exultant affirmation that the spirit must and does triumph.

• • •

AFTER ACKNOWLEDGING the applause for the Honegger, Mr. Munch gave a little speech, turning now and again to Richard Burgin, concertmaster, for the right English word, in which he said that he played the Honegger here as a memorial for a Buffalo flier, who had been helped by French people after being shot down in France back of the German lines, but who was captured and shot by the Nazis.

Queried after the concert, Mr. Munch said that he did not know the flier's name, but only that he was from Buffalo.

Following the Honegger came the suite "Le Tombeau de Couperin," in which Ravel made poetic obeisance to a French master and the mores of another day.

This was a delectable reading, particularly in the elegantly ingenuous Forlance, the exquisite Menuet and the bouncing Rigaudon. Ending the concert were excerpts from "Die Meistersinger," as warm and mellow in sound as the stage scenes they depict are in color and life.

That the listeners in Kleinhans Music Hall understood it had been a rare evening was apparent in their acclaim for Mr. Munch and his splendid orchestra.

ON de on
of mar-tor ut-ch in n-rts
ga, n-rts
rn-

OCTOBER · 1953

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA travels Rail and Pullman on its 33-day transcontinental tour, during which 26 cities were visited. Traveling by special train, the orchestra of 112 men and women went as far south as New Orleans, west to the Pacific, and north to Toronto and Montreal. In photo above, l. to r.: Associate Conductor Richard Burgin, Guest Conductor Pierre Monteaux (who formerly headed orchestra), Conductor Charles Munch, Mrs. Monteaux, Pullman Conductor G. D. LaFontaine and New York Central Railroad Conductor Charles Williams.

At right, Richard Burgin, Associate Conductor and Concertmaster, goes over a score aboard his Pullman car, proving that Symphony musicians are good because they practice continually.

24

Cir. (D 12,338)

This Clipping From
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
OCT 20 1953

Boston Symphony Delights Audience In Smith Opener

Once again, the Boston Symphony Orchestra charmed and delighted a capacity audience at John M. Greene Hall last night in the first of this season's Smith College Concert Course. Charles Munch, music director of this outstanding orchestra, was in fine form and conducted with great feeling and fervor.

Everything about this orchestra is highly polished, from its eminent conductor to its unusually fine solo performers and beautifully blended string or woodwind or brass sections.

Brahm's Second Symphony, with which Mr. Munch opened last night's performance was a constant, tantalizing tapestry of new material, new themes worked out or not but all interesting and diverting. The last movement was very [illegible] and spirited and excitingly outlined by Mr. Munch and his musicians.

Honegger's 2nd Symphony which followed intermission was very dreary save the beautiful viola tone and solo by Joseph de-Pasquale, was otherwise not to be commented upon until the very nice chorales for trumpet in the last movement which was indeed rewarding after the incomprehensible rhythmic and harmonic composition which preceded it.

Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" Suite which followed was very pleasant listening. We heard this last summer and were then, as last evening, delighted with the presentation. The whole has, it seems to me, a Scottish flavor, and employs bagpipe effects in the prelude. The Forlane is a peculiar little dance and the Menuet is charmingly done. Rigaudon has some superb oboe work done by Ralph Gomberg and ends a suite which belies its somber title. The Boston Symphony and Mr. Munch outdid themselves in their final effort of the evening in their rendition of "Excerpts from Act III of Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

The selection was full of nice contrasts, lovely tone from the cellos and a wonderfully grand finale which more than rewarded the most demanding in the audience.

Mention must be made, too, of the beautiful solo work by the first flutist, Doriot Anthony; first trumpet, Roger Voisin, and first cellist, Samuel Mayes. The next in the Smith College Concert Series to be presented will be the 'Virtuosi Di Roma," a chamber orchestra on Nov. 17.—F.M.R.

Cir. (D 192,249) (S 211,152)

This Clipping From PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGON JOURNAL
OCT 25 1953

WAX MUSEU

Classical

By JAMES HART

Berlioz: "Romeo and Juliet," Dramatic Symphony (Complete), Margaret Roggero, Leslie Chabay, Yi-Kwei Sze, Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society, and Boston Symphony under Munch (Victor two 12-inch):

Fine as have been the three earlier disks featuring excerpts from this score, they give no real appreciation of the grandeur and architectonic skill of the whole design. The familiar Love Scene and Queen Mab Scherzo take on new values and special relevance when they're heard in their intended context. This is perhaps Berlioz's greatest score. Munch's interpretation is unquestionably his finest recorded work to date. These various positive factors add up to a major event on records.

Beethoven: Symphony No. 3, "Eroica," Beecham and Royal Philharmonic (Columbia 12-inch):

There's nothing wrong with this reading that couldn't be [illegible]

"Is It a Dream," ers (Red Rob
"Ooh Boo," Pa
(Okeh).

"Percy Faith Play sic" (Columbia LP (

Stuff like "If I
"I'll Take Roman ress"—things they'
the way they usec tunes may not be they are very lov

"Songs From Caro 475):

This is one of ries, capitalizing membership du standing Broad since 1928. R( real legit tale slickies like Di
these tunes th
tang they des any items fro have to be n can argue w larity-wise.
hear "You'
"June Is
and tw
ing all

Boston Sunday Globe
Published by GLOBE NEWSPAPER COMPANY
242 Washington St. Boston 7, Mass.
Established March 4, 1872. Evening edition first issued March 7, 1878. Sunday edition first issued Oct. 14, 1877.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1953

THE INNOVATOR

Originality is the act of discovering that which is in plain sight. The orchestra had been in plain sight for a hundred years when Hector Berlioz discovered that it is not a glorified grand pianoforte, but an instrument in its own right.

That was a hundred years ago, and this year, 11 December, is the 150th anniversary of Berlioz's birth, near Grenoble, France. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make a special observance of it by a performance of his oratorio, "L' Enfance du Christ," the week before Christmas, and of "The Damnation of Faust" in the Spring. Then why not also special programs of Berlioz at next Summer's Berkshire Festival?

* * *

Art-forms, like human beings, nations, institutions, philosophies, theologies, and cultures have their life-cycles, of birth, youth, maturity, age, decay, and death, varying from a few years to scores of centuries, and some of them have resurrections, rebirths, and reincarnations. Hector Berlioz is an event in the life-cycle of an art-form.

Music as we know it now was about two hundred years old when Berlioz explored the glowing October forest of instrumental color and mixed on his palette some of the infinite varieties of tone which may be had from combinations of the string choirs, wood winds, brass, and percussion. His "Treatise on Instrumentation" (1844) though not appreciated then, is a towering landmark in that forest today.

Wagner, too, discovered the orchestra, much as notable inventions are likely to be made almost simultaneously by more than one mind; but Berlioz, being ten years older and an impetuous experimenter, arrived first on the new scene. Later, the spectacular career of Wagner obscured the eminence of Berlioz, an injustice which is being rectified only in our own lifetimes, and some of the rectification is thanks to Mr. Charles Munch who has restored in their entirety some of Berlioz's most imposing works to the repertory of our orchestra. The astonishment when hearing them has been not alone at their splendor of instrumental color and their prodigality of imagination, but equally at their spontaneity of melodic invention.

Berlioz and Wagner between them dominate the Romantic Revolution in the music of the mid-19th century, towering like twin colossi over all but a mere handful of their contemporaries. Wagner dramatized sonata form; he set the orchestra half-way under the stage while conjuring out of it the stream of consciousness which is flowing through the heads and hearts of his figures upon that stage, and their voices are often treated like instruments of the orchestra, even as the singing actors impersonate the thematic development in sonata form on the stage itself; but, as Romain Rolland once remarked, "A time may come when it will be perceived how little melodic invention Wagner's works contain in proportion to the continual working-over of the same themes, and his works will suffer." Those of Berlioz will never suffer from that.

* * *

The orchestra which Berlioz discovered a century ago has only in this present century come into full maturity, for the Virtuoso Orchestra may be said to be a creation of the past fifty years. It, too, is an art-form in its own right (perhaps the greatest in our time) and with a life-cycle of its own. We of today live in an epoch of brilliant musical performances, performances of a grandeur which would have astounded the creators of the works themselves, since they were more concerned with composition. Epochs of plenteous creativity are apt to be taken for granted by those who live in them. As with a good conversation, if things are going all right leave them alone. What is not so well understood is that such epochs can come to an end without warning. Up to 1920, or 1925, we of the Western World took for granted the mighty river of indubitable masterworks in music. Had it not already been flowing for three centuries? Why not three more?

Can noble music be written in an age of organized mass-murder; does harmony flow so easily in a world of discord; are composers of today less often visited by beautiful melodies ("good tunes") or, if they are so visited, do they drop them quickly as if ashamed and give us instead harsh dissonance like a hard-boiled pose to ward off ridicule? Asked, but not answered.

* * *

Or are we listeners at fault? Society is seldom prepared to welcome innovators. They must proceed at their own peril. True, the first prospectors who venture beyond the Range are rewarded by finding the richest pay-steaks, although of course they may starve, freeze, or be scalped by the savages.

Berlioz had to live by journalism; Wagner borrowed money. The first was a loss to the world, since Berlioz did not compose as freely as he might have; the second was a loss to that noble army of martyrs, Wagner's creditors, though their loss is our gain. Again, the hardships of innovation are so excessive that who would choose such a career unless catapulted into it by some force not of his own? Nature creates these beings to make new moulds. Existing rules do not fit them. They ignore those rules and suffer the penalties. Are they more than half aware of the magnitude of their innovations? They might stand rather aghast could they foresee some of their remoter consequences. Still, they must go on, for that is the law of their beings. Innovations are here to be made, and the innovator is here to make them. He asks no one's permission. How can he? There is no one to grant it. The possibilities of untried experiment are, or seem, endless, an infinite riches; they reach in and pull out treasure almost at random, as Berlioz did in his succession of herculean scores, and, as if one art-form were not enough for one artist, there is Berlioz the man of letters, who wrote those delightful "Memoirs," (English translation revised by Mr. Ernest Newman 1932), memoirs witty, entertaining, profound, and leaving the composer established as still his own best biographer.

Later it may be found that such innovators were cooly skimming the cream and exhausting an art or an epoch, as Leonardo da Vinci and Michelangelo exhaust the Renaissance. A new vein must be, and is now being, sought in music. With the same pains and penalties for the innovators?

* * *

There are tides in human creativity which, taken at their flood, lead on to grandeur; and—who knows?—we may be in one now. With science, at least, there is no doubt of it. Then whence comes a Great Age? It comes from people exerting to the full their highest faculties regardless of the age they live in. For no great age is tranquil. Struggle is of its essence, and so is daring. Better not take our own, for whatsoever it may be, too casually. It may be over before we think, as the great ages of the Western World, four in number, have been all too few and all too brief. Suppose generations hence, people said,

"Those lucky creatures—to have lived in the mid-20th century, when all the metal of world history was molten white-hot, and human destinies on this planet hung in the weighing-scales!"

UNCLE DUDLEY.

25

Cir. (D 35,334)

This Clipping From
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR

CT 22 1953

Monteux to Be Conductor In RPI Concert

Boston Symphony To Play in Troy Next Monday

TROY, Oct. 22—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be conducted by Pierre Monteux when it appears at the RPI Field House here Monday night.

Monteux was picked by Charles Munch, musical director, to lead the orchestra in its road concerts this fall.

In the five years that Munch has headed the orchestra he has surrounded himself with many new faces as did his predecessor, Serge Koussevitsky, a quarter of a century ago. The average age of the musicians is now well below 40 years.

The result of this change, one critic said as the season opened in Boston recently, is "an orchestra of immense dynamics, of great virility and strength and power of utterance."

CORNELL DAILY SUN

MONDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1953

MUSIC REVIEW

By JOEL COGEN

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Pierre Monteux, conductor. Bailey Hall series, at Bailey Hall.
Overtrure to "The Flying Dutchman" Wagner
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" Debussy
Suite from "Der Rosehkavalier" R. Strauss
Symphony No. 5, in E minor, Op. 64 Tchaikovsky

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its brilliant tone and fine precision, can do wonders at the hands of a great conductor. Pierre Monteux, who led the Boston musicians in Bailey Hall yesterday, is a great conductor, and the results of the joint effort were superb. It's a pity their labor was so misplaced.

The entire program was late 19th century music, and not of the best products of that period, either. The carload of schmaltz served up yesterday was an insult to the very large number of serious concert-goers in Ithaca, many of whom stayed away from the concert. The rest went to hear a great orchestra play and turned a deaf ear, as it were, to the musical content of the afternoon.

Mr. Monteux was at his best in the Debussy prelude. He achieved a control and transparent balance which revealed the impressionist colors of this music. Miss Doriot Anthony was magnificient in the difficult flute solos.

There was strength and body in the performance of the Wagner overture. About the rest of the program, there is nothing more we want to say.

Cir. (D 196,775) (S 203,908)

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

OCT 28 1953

Ex-Concertmaster Dies

LOS ANGELES, Oct. 27 (UP).—Sylvain Noack, 72, former concertmaster of the Hollywood Bowl and Los Angeles Philharmonic orchestras, died today. For a number of years, he was concertmaster of the St. Louis and Boston Symphony Orchestras.

Cir. (D 58,466) (S 120,102)

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

OCT 27 1953

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA—Pierre Monteux, guest conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra which made its annual Troy appearance at the R. P. I. Field House last night, visits with Edgar S, Van Olinda, left, music editor of Times-Union, and, Ken Parker, announcer for WPTR on the program "Luncheon at the Ten Eyck."

Times-Union Staff Photo by Wilder

Cir. (D 124,110) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

OCT 25 1953

Recordings: Honegger, Roussel by Munch and Boston Symphony

By CYRUS DURGIN

There is nothing nicer than to receive recordings of music which, for some little time, you have thought should be recorded, especially by Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. One such is Honegger's Fifth Symphony, another the "Bacchus et Ariane" Suite No. 2 of Roussel. Each represents notably engrossing music of lasting qualities and a superlative reading by this conductor and orchestra. They now are to be had in recording of the RCA-Victor "new orthophonic" method, than which there is none better.

Another exceptionally fine recording, also in the RCA-Victor process and, like the Boston Symphony one, "from the connoisseur catalogue," is Leopold Stokowski's conducting of Schoenberg's "Transfigured Night" and the Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, by Vaughan Williams. The performances are good Stokowski, and the string sound absolutely gorgeous.

Pianist Rubinstein

Pianist Artur Rubinstein, who has always combined the highest technical virtuosity with good musicianship and a way of making every tune sing, is represented by a new-old RCA-Victor item that may well prove a best-seller. The pieces are Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini (previously recorded) and Syzmanowski's excellent but not well known Symphonie Concertante. The former, Mr. Rubinstein played with the Philharmonia Orchestra of London, Walter Suesskind conducting; the other with the Los Angeles Philharmonic, conducted by Alfred Wallenstein.

To its "Treasury of Immortal Performances" series, RCA-Victor has added the Kreisler-Rachmaninoff performances of Grieg's C minor Sonata, and the Schubert A major Sonata, Op. 162. The series further has been enlarged with the Cello Sonatas Nos. 3, 4 and 5 of Beethoven, as played by the late Artur Schnabel and cellist Pierre Fournier.

A remarkable undertaking that, I think, will keep this album in constant if not widespread use for years, is the Haydn Society's "Masterpieces of Music Before 1750." As Paul Lang explains in a brief commentary, the three-disc recording is issued in conjunction with the book of the same title (which discusses the same compositions), published by W. W. Norton. The three volumes are (1) Gregorian Chant to the 16th Century, (2) The 16th and 17th Centuries, and (3) The 17th and 18th Centuries. The recording was done in Denmark under the general supervision of Moegens Woldike, with Danish artists. It is, and hardly necessary to add, of remarkably high quality of execution and musicianship. This album is bound to be for students and specialists, but it should last a long while.

Cir. (D 505,451) (S 1,109,491)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 26 1953

MISS ELIZABETH B. ELY

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Oct. 25 — Miss Elizabeth Brewster Ely, a social worker for more than fifty years, died on Friday, her eighty-third birthday.

Miss Ely was a graduate of the Simmons College School of Social Work. She had served as a director of the Elizabeth Peabody House since 1903 and in that capacity helped many families and individuals in Boston's West End.

She had been active also in the work of the Girls Friendly Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church and was a member of the American Association of Social Workers.

Miss Ely was a supporter of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Museum of Fine Arts. She belonged to the Women's City Club and the Appalachian Mountain Club.

ITHACA, N.Y. MONDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 26, 1953

THE ITHACA JOURNAL

Music

Boston Symphony Bailey Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteux as guest conductor, opened the Bailey Hall Concert Series Sunday afternoon to a completely filled auditorium.

There was much pre-concert discussion about the program chosen—much comment about why no Beethoven, no Brahms (or "something!"). Nor were there any modern works from the orchestra, which, under Koussevitsky, did perhaps more than any of our major orchestras to give hearing to works of contemporary composers. But to this reviewer, who in interest leans heavily in the above direction, the program still seemed appropriate and satisfying, when so beautifully played.

It is, after all, not often that one can hear in person standard works played by an orchestra of such magnitude—directed by a conductor who is certainly one of the best that we have today. We can therefore wait with good grace for the works that we did not hear.

Wagner's lusty "Overture to the Flying Dutchman" was the opening work, followed by a magical interpretation of "The Afternoon of a Faun," by Debussy, for which an appreciative hand was given Doriot Anthony, Boston's new and very, very fine lady flautist (who formerly was San Francisco's, under Monteux).

Strauss's "Suite from Der Rosenkavalier" was the par excellence of the afternoon for me. Individual and collective brilliance of technic (a trumpet whose tone rivalled that of the flute for smoothness—horns and oboe that never missed), was added to a beauty of sound that was luxuriant, not over-powering or cloying.

Tsaichovsky's "Symphony No. 5 in E flat Minor, Opus 64," was the second half of the concert. Again the Gallic good sense of Mr. Monteux (who never, never gets in the way of the orchestra—nor known American poultry-an in the world and "father" of ne billion-dollar poultry industry, died in the Hialeah Nursing Home Sunday, Oct. 25, 1953. He was 88.

Earlier this month he had been critically ill with virus hepatitis but was apparently making a satisfactory recovery. He entered the nursing home a week ago. On his last trip to Europe in 1948 to attend the World Poultry Science Congress, his eyesight had begun failing, and he had been blind for the last 4 or 5 years.

He is survived by his wife, Mrs. Louise Dawley Rice; two sons, James E. Rice Jr. and John V. B. Rice of Trumansburg; three daughters, Mrs. William D. McMillan of the Inlet Valley Rd.,

---

Cir. (D 6,543)

This Clipping From
TROY, N. Y.
MORNING RECORD

OCT 27 1953

Symphony Scores At Field House

By KEITH MARVIN.

For the third time in as many years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played before a Troy Area audience at the RPI Field House last night. But something new was added. The orchestra was under the direction of its guest conductor, Pierre Monteux, once the regular conductor of that ensemble and more recently the conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra.

The program, which, though charming, would have been nothing to write home about, included Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" Overture; the "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" of Debussy; Richard Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier" Suite and, as a grand final, the well worn "Symphony No. 5" of Tschaikowsky.

From an interpretive standpoint, Monteux was at his best in the Debussy and the Tschaikowsky, but this is scarcely a surprise, as this man is known for his treatment of the French and Russian composers. Too, he knew Debussy as a personal friend, which gives him a distinct advantage over younger conductors who have not had that privilege.

Good Reading.

The concert opened with the Wagner and it received a good, sympathetic reading at Montuex's hands. This was followed by the Debussy. Those who heard the recent performance of the Guard Republican Band of Paris at the Field House as they performed this old favorite, appreciated the difference found in the band arrangement (ood) and Monteux' gorgeous reading of the composition (much better).

During the intermission, Dr. Monteux explained that he first conducted the work in a ballet in 1913. "Debussy," he said, "stood directly behind me pointing out exactly how the work should and must be played."

Suffice it is to say, then, that a conductor with such experience behind him would perform the thing exactly at Claude Debussy would have intended it be played. We feel Monteux did just that last night.

The Richard Strauss suite from "Der Rosenkavalier" followed. If this hodgepodge of jumbled chords lacks form here and there, surely no one among the approximately 4,000 persons in the Field House last night would deny that the work was played with spirit, particularly the "Silver Rose" waltz theme that brought the suite to its conclusion.

Pleasantly Surprised.

Tschaikowsky's "Fifth Symphony" is regarded by many as worthless and sentimental. That's too bad, for if those persons could have heard Monteux do this last night, particularly the final movement, they might have been pleasantly surprised. The brasses in the second and fourth movements were noteworthy as were the strings in the third.

Monteux won the hearts of his audience and we can say that with sincerity. The grand old man is 78 years of age. When one realizes that the conductor, his black curly hair and white walrus mustache making a striking contrast on the podium, was a youth of 17 years when Tschaikowsky died, one can well understand that a few great conductors of "the old guard" are still with us. It was Troy's privilege to have one of them as its guest last night!

TIGHT BINDING

26

THE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1953

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the third program of the 73d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Samuel Mayes, 'cellist. The program:
"Iberia" .... Debussy
Concerto for 'Cello and Orchestra, Kabalevsky
Symphony No. 3 in E flat, Op. 55, Beethoven

By RUDOLPH ELIE

What we have all suspected all along, namely that Samuel Mayes, the first cellist of the Boston Symphony, is one of the ranking cello virtuosi of the day, was made abundantly clear yesterday afternoon as this youthful instrumentalist gave the first Boston performance of Kabalevsky's Cello Concerto. It was a triumph, and not a bit less.

The work itself is considerably better than meets the ear. That is to say that because it is so immediately assimilable, so traditionally romantic in melodic materials while venturing so seldom very far into the 20th century harmonically it might seem old fashioned to the advanced listener, and it is. Whether that conservatism springs, as the program suggests, from Kabalevsky's political discretion (he is one of the few contemporary Russians who has never had his ears boxed by the Soviets), is beside the point. For the fact remains that the solo cello, like the solo human voice and the solo horn, is least suited to the jagged melodic lines and disturbances of contemporary musical practise. Jagged intervals can, of course, be executed up to a point, for if a cellist puts his finger on B natural it is B natural whereas the singer and the horn player (up to a point) have to think these notes.

Thus, while theoretically any work in any idiom technically possible is playable on the cello, it takes a very special musical quality — call it old-fashioned if you will — to make the cello speak as it can. And few composers since Bloch, in his "Schelomo" and Strauss in his "Don Quixote" have had any success with the cello at all; off hand, I can think of no cello concerto t has established itself in the ertoire since "Schelomo" of 6.

he Kabalevsky, because it is suited to the instrument, bese its melodic materials are so rm and spacious, so sustained retainable in the listening , would seem to have every nce to remain in the reperre. It is grateful to hear and teful to play; it is new and eresting and as well wrought the orchestra as for the solo trument. There is little likelid it will ever be deemed a at work, but there is a good nce it will be looked over by lists for many years to come.

nal Mastery

Mr. Mayes' performance of it an electrifying demonstration echnical assurance, tonal masy and musical conviction. His e is that of the late Feuernn, who was inimitable in making the cello seem heavenly easy to play, rather than Piatigorsky, who is inimitable in making the cello seem more difficult to play than it is. Without mannerism, without affectation, pretense or fidgets, Mr. Mayes extracted a tone of quite incredible beauty with a bowing technique unrivalled for its ease and perfection of touch. He may be exceeded by the travelling virtuosi on the fingerboard, though it is evident enough that if he took to the road as a virtuoso he would soon rival them all in this respect. But let us hope he doesn't, for as he is his fingers are marvels of speed and accuracy.

Mr. Mayes' appearance was not the only high point in this concert. Indeed, the entire concert was more than notable in the finest performance of Debussy's "Iberia" I have ever heard at any time, and in an intensely vivid reading of Beethoven's "Eroica."

Mr. Munch is largely unequaled as an interpretor of Debussy, but this work carried him to the peak of his particular feeling for the infinite gradations of color and shape and nuance. It is as if the whole poetry and violence, the vivid lights and shades of the musico-poetic conception of Spain were compressed into the fabric of these three extraordinary pieces, and that it was his mission to find and to express every one. He did, too, as the orchestra responded with infinite execution.

Notably Fine

His performance of the Beethoven "Eroica" was also a notably fine performance, at once muscular and dynamic, full-bodied and vigorous. It occasionally suggested breathlessness and impetuosity, which are qualities Mr. Munch often reflects in Beethoven. It is not that such qualities are inappropriate when fully controlled; it is only that when they verge on the overwrought they cause the restive feeling in the listener that some sort of a disaster might occur. A disaster never does, which of course proves that Mr. Munch knows precisely what he is doing and what his orchestra can do—and it did it yesterday with magnificent bravura.

Next week's program features the Helsinki University Chorus under Martti Turunen in a program of Finnish music.

Cir. (D 39,275)
This Clipping From
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE
OCT 28 1953

Rousing Applause Afforded Boston Sympho

By D. E. RITZ

Pierre Monteux conducted the Boston Symphony in a program at RPI Field House in Troy Monday evening which brought a rising ovation and much-deserved "Bravos" from the huge audience assembled from near and far.

The Tchaikovsky Symphony number 5 concluded the brilliant program which opened with the Wagner "Overture to the Flying Dutchman"; Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" and the magnificent orchestral suite from the Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier."

THE SUITE, according to the program notes, was made anonymously for its publisher, Boosey and Hawkes. We see no reason for it to remain anonymous as it is as excellent a piece of craftsmanship as could be prepared. Retaining the full flavor of the Strauss complexity and ingenuity it certainly was written by someone who knows how. The joy in performance of the orchestra and the obvious satisfaction of the conductor made one suspect as much as did the applause which the orchestra gave the conductor at its conclusion.

Doriot Anthony, the proficient and charming young first flutist, received a special accolade for her performance in the Debussy. The Wagner overture made one wish one heard it more often on programs.

Tchaikovsky symphonies have a way of retaining an ever new appeal. Under the baton of Monteux the opening Andante was more solemn, the waltz movement more gracious and the finals more brilliant than ever.

* * *

MONTEUX, a chubby little man of 78, toddles rather diffidently up on the stage, glances a bi toward the audience, march to the podium and takes ov pletely. Just what he does be hard to define but we hypnotism. The players slaves and love every while the conductor appar glances around to indica he wants. His stick tech so subdued that one aware of its masterfulnes also appreciates the orchest shares the honors of perfo with the players. No wond give and give.

MUSIC

Oct 31

Samuel Mayes Solois at Symphony Concer

Third "regular" program by Bos Symphony Orchestra. Charles Mu conductor. At Symphony Hall. The p gram: Debussy: "Iberia": Kabalevs Cello Concerto (first performance Boston. Samuel Mayes soloist); Beeth ven: "Eroica" Symphony.

By CYRUS DURGIN

Had it not been for a modicu of untidy string detail in the f neral march of Beethove "Eroica" Symphony, the conc by the Boston Symphony Orche tra yesterday would have stood an occasion of fabulously gre playing. As it was, this conc was memorable for rich beauty sound, and perhaps the most laxed performance Charles Mun has drawn from the Boston Sym phony since he became conducto He seemed to capture the ultimat essence of Debussy, Kabalevsk and Beethoven, and his reading were of a certain luminous quality exact in style and tempo, whicl require those abused words, "trul classical."

To be sure the essence of Ka balevsky was thin, indeed, com pared to that in "Iberia" and th "Eroica" Symphony. But what ever it amounted to was prop erly extracted. As for Mayes, tha superlatively gifted first cellist o the Boston Symphony, who i soloist of the week, his work wa large playing of small music. Care fully weighing these words, I d not recall any cello playing whicl exceeded his for precise articula tion of the notes, gloriously grace ful bowing, absolute command o rhythm and a satin tone whicl kept its sheen in every passage Furthermore he exemplified tha first requirement of every stringe instrument, which is to "sing, whether the passage be a lusl tune, agitated figuration or th technical fireworks of a cadenza.

The Kabalevsky Concerto indi rectly recalls Soviet official pres sure on its creative artists, be cause it is very simple (in sub stance, that is, not necessarily i technique) and full of tunes. Th orchestra is subdued, and but sel dom does it speak out and the with no weight or authority of genuine symphonic nature. Th solo instrument is always in th foreground. Kabalevsky must hav been pre-occupied pretty muc with triplet and sextuplet figure in the first movement, for you sel dom get a sense of a three or six metre out of your mind. Al through the slow movement, in good deal of the first and eve in some of the finale you find tha dark, songful mood best calle nocturne, which is perhaps th greatest talent of Kabalevsky, an of Khatchatourian and Shostakovitch.

The Kabalevsky work has n symphonic stature and it is not the most spectacular concerto for the instrument, but it is pleasant and when so well played, highly effective. Mayes got a tremendous reception.

If "Iberia" had been given perhaps the clearest, most poetic and unforced performance in my memary, so was the "Eroica." There was a good deal of detail from inner voices which Munch brought out but did not exaggerate. But the crowning joy lay in the glowing, clear sound; the absence of anything more than a naturally expressive tension, the proper pace for every bar of the score, and rythmic flexibility which was no less than wonderful. Munch outdid himself yesterday.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. [illegible] St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea [illegible]-8860
Cir. (D 417,336) ([illegible] 443,679)
This Clipping From
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
OC[illegible] 24 1953

Symphony Fans Have Busy Week

BY J. DORSEY CALLAGHAN
Free Press Music Critic

Detroit is singularly blessed in the matter of symphony concerts this week. On successive evenings the offerings of two distinguished orchestras under French conductors gave much on which to ponder.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert of Friday night followed immediately upon the opening concert of the season by the Detroit Symphony Orchestra under Paul Paray's direction.

* * *

THE BOSTON Orchestra's reputation is a towering one, gained through long years under great conductors. The advent of Munch to the orchestral command has created some difference in the performances, mainly in its over-all timbre.

The lush quality of the Russian Koussevitzky has given place to a more brilliant Gallic tone and temper.

There were reminders, though, of this Slavic breadth in the Brahms Second Symphony which opened the program.

Contrasting with the Brahms was the Symphony for Strings by the modern Arthur Honegger. It is nervous music, with brisk tempi and excited melody over insistent bass. It lies comfortably in the conservative ear, but does not indulge itself in any nostalgia.

A gorgeous feature of the work is the trumpet chorale in the last portion of the finale. It gave Detroit a chance to hear exploited what it without doubt the most magnificent brass section to be heard anywhere.

Maurice Ravel's gentle tribute to the memory of Couperin le Grand was given a performance of much loveliness.

"Couperin's Tomb" is a show case for woodwinds and strings in the shimmering manner of 18th Century music. The solo oboe was notably impressive.

Rounding out the concert was Wagner's "Meistersinger" Prelude.

Cir. (D 215,218)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
OCT 30 1953

SAMUEL MAYES, principal cellist of the Boston Symphony, is soloist this week in first Boston performance of the Kabalevsky concerto.

Oct. 31, 53

Music in Review

By TUCKER KEISER

Symphony Concert

Seldom does a work receive its definitive performance at its first playing, yet there is no other way to describe Samuel Mayes' introduction of Dmitri Kabalevsky's Concerto for Cello and Orchestra to a Boston audience at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The American premiere of the work was given by Mr. Mayes in Hartford only last Wednesday night.

Never have I heard the cello so magnificently played! I admit, quite frankly, that I was moved to tears at the end of the overpoweringly melancholy second movement. But I was not alone. Into this infinitely sad music, Kabalevsky distilled the essence of tragic nobility. The elegiac Largo will never be more eloquently communicative than in the superlative performance of Mr. Mayes.

Actually, the Concerto itself is not much of a piece. The opening movement, Allegro, written to please the unsophisticated musical taste of the Kremlin, is thin stuff. The final movement is very much like the first in its naive and obvious melodies, although occasionally brilliant in instrumentation. There is a pleasant but platitudinous cadenza toward the end.

However, it is the middle movement which will survive. It will be extracted from the concerto and in a few years the corner movements will have been forgotten, and people will speak of Kabalevsky's Largo in the same way they now speak of Handel's.

The rapt attention during and the thunderous ovation at the end of the concerto were not so much for the piece as for the masterly playing of Mr. Mayes. He was brought back to the stage repeatedly to receive the plaudits of the audience.

Mr. Munch opened the program with Debussy's "Iberia," the composer's tribute to Spain. The reading of the score was a straightforward one, if undistinguished. The conductor's preoccupation with tempi and dynamics blinded him to the fact that the tonal opulence of the score, the sensuous instrumentation, is its raison d'etre. It is as if one were asked to appreciate a monochromatic photograph of a Velasquez painting rather that the colorful original.

Beethoven's Eroica Symphony, the last item on the day's program, was given a more controlled performance than when Mr. Munch last played it. It may be added that Mr. Munch's performances of Beethoven are reaction to, rather than conducting of the music.

THE PITTS
BERK
OC

Music

BSO, M Given C At Troy C

By JAY C. R

A HUGE AUD Field House of Polytechnic Insti gave the Boston chestra and its Pierre Monteux, a tion at the close gram last night. final concert in westward fall tour the orchestra also plauded the venera for his convincing a fairly convention oughly enjoyable orchestra's musical Charles Munch, h all but the Roche night's concerts o circuit.

The orchestra cordial and alert the Tchaikovsky fi the overture to W Fliegende Hollande "Afternoon of a pot-pourri from Ric "Der Rosenkavalier and true favorites nd all right in th he veteran conduc irtuoso orchestra.

Every section of t emble was in its b een degree of pro trings, especially ith a fine-textured oid of any suggesti g at their most v ents and the wind t their peak. utist Doriot Ant ront of the stage a ful playing of the oseph Stagliano ave taken special ent of his French e slow moveme chaikowsky.

* * *

AS PROGRAM PE etty monotone, ts of a certain om near the middl just past the turn ry, no one piece allenge whatsoever estra, or to the at matter. It wa ich the performe roughly experie ght have selected diately played ted and made the oice at exactly so expert ually and re was a rit to the whole Monteux was a ris when Debussy re at the crest of years and from h the French ociations with rs acquired ght into their ed by any conc Rosenkavalie more music hall but it a sweep ety that no carried away he men of th red after the wood have now younger men that sense is dsman's ax ing his whole ing handles out which good work. hos to the st who contin he glory of the show and t go on. This one at North wing of the ng the winter estra will residence entrained he concert nds at. Boston

TIGHT BINDING

26

THE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1953

MUSIC

Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Münch conducting, gave the third program of the 73d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Samuel Mayes, 'cellist. The program:

"Iberia" .... Debussy
Concerto for 'Cello and Orchestra, Kabalevsky
Symphony No. 3 in E flat, Op. 55, Beethoven

By RUDOLPH ELIE

What we have all suspected all along, namely that Samuel Mayes, the first cellist of the Boston Symphony, is one of the ranking cello virtuosi of the day, was made abundantly clear yesterday afternoon as this youthful instrumentalist gave the first Boston performance of Kabalevsky's Cello Concerto. It was a triumph, and not a bit less.

The work itself is considerably better than meets the ear. That is to say that because it is so immediately assimilable, so traditionally romantic in melodic materials while venturing so seldom very far into the 20th century harmonically it might seem old fashioned to the advanced listener, and it is. Whether that conservatism springs, as the program suggests, from Kabalevsky's political discretion (he is one of the few contemporary Russians who has never had his ears boxed by the Soviets), is beside the point. For the fact remains that the solo cello, like the solo human voice and the solo horn, is least suited to the jagged melodic lines and disturbances of contemporary musical practise. Jagged intervals can, of course, be executed up to a point, for if a cellist puts his finger on B natural it is B natural whereas the singer and the horn player (up to a point) have to think these notes.

Thus, while theoretically any work in any idiom technically possible is playable on the cello, it takes a very special musical quality — call it old-fashioned if you will — to make the cello speak as it can. And few composers since Bloch, in his "Schelomo" and Strauss in his "Don Quixote" have had any success with the cello at all; off hand, I can think of no cello concerto that has established itself in the repertoire since "Schelomo" of 1916.

The Kabalevsky, because it is so suited to the instrument, because its melodic materials are so warm and spacious, so sustained and retainable in the listening ear, would seem to have every chance to remain in the repertoire. It is grateful to hear and grateful to play; it is new and interesting and as well wrought for the orchestra as for the solo instrument. There is little likelihood it will ever be deemed a great work, but there is a good chance it will be looked over by cellists for many years to come.

Tonal Mastery

Mr. Mayes' performance of it was an electrifying demonstration of technical assurance, tonal mastery and musical conviction. His style is that of the late Feuermann, who was inimitable in making the cello seem heavenly easy to play, rather than Piatigorsky, who is inimitable in making the cello seem more difficult to play than it is. Without mannerism, without affectation, pretense or fidgets, Mr. Mayes extracted a tone of quite incredible beauty with a bowing technique unrivalled for its ease and perfection of touch. He may be exceeded by the travelling virtuosi on the fingerboard, though it is evident enough that if he took to the road as a virtuoso he would soon rival them all in this respect. But let us hope he doesn't, for as he is his fingers are marvels of speed and accuracy.

Mr. Mayes' appearance was not the only high point in this concert. Indeed, the entire concert was more than notable in the finest performance of Debussy's "Iberia" I have ever heard at any time, and in an intensely vivid reading of Beethoven's "Eroica."

Mr. Munch is largely unequaled as an interpretor of Debussy, but this work carried him to the peak of his particular feeling for the infinite gradations of color and shape and nuance. It is as if the whole poetry and violence, the vivid lights and shades of the musico-poetic conception of Spain were compressed into the fabric of these three extraordinary pieces, and that it was his mission to find and to express every one. He did, too, as the orchestra responded with infinite execution.

Notably Fine

His performance of the Beethoven "Eroica" was also a notably fine performance, at once muscular and dynamic, full-bodied and vigorous. It occasionally suggested breathlessness and impetuosity, which are qualities Mr. Munch often reflects in Beethoven. It is not that such qualities are inappropriate when fully controlled; it is only that when they verge on the overwrought they cause the restive feeling in the listener that some sort of a disaster might occur. A disaster never does, which of course proves that Mr. Munch knows precisely what he is doing and what his orchestra can do—and it did it yesterday with magnificent bravura.

Next week's program features the Helsinki University Chorus under Martti Turunen in a program of Finnish music.

Cir. (D 39,276)

This Clipping From
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

OCT 28 1953

Rousing Applause Afforded Boston Sympho

By D. E. RITZ

Pierre Monteux conducted the Boston Symphony in a program at RPI Field House in Troy Monday evening which brought a rising ovation and much-deserved "Bravos" from the huge audience assembled from near and far.

The Tchaikovsky Symphony number 5 concluded the brilliant program which opened with the Wagner "Overture to the Flying Dutchman"; Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" and the magnificent orchestral suite from the Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier."

THE SUITE, according to the program notes, was made anonymously for its publisher, Boosey and Hawkes. We see no reason for it to remain anonymous as it is as excellent a piece of craftsmanship as could be prepared. Retaining the full flavor of the Strauss complexity and ingenuity it certainly was written by someone who knows how. The joy in performance of the orchestra and the obvious satisfaction of the conductor made one suspect as much as did the applause which the orchestra gave the conductor at its conclusion.

Doriot Anthony, the proficient and charming young first flutist, received a special accolade for her performance in the Debussy. The Wagner overture made one wish one heard it more often on programs.

Tchaikovsky symphonies have a way of retaining an ever new appeal. Under the baton of Monteux the opening Andante was more solemn, the waltz movement more gracious and the finals more brilliant than ever.

* * *

MONTEUX, a chubby little man of 78, toddles rather diffidently upon the stage, glances a bi toward the audience, march to the podium and takes ov pletely. Just what he does be hard to define but we hypnotism. The players w slaves and love every bit while the conductor appar glances around to indica he wants. His stick tech so subdued that one i aware of its masterfulne also appreciates the orches shares the honors of perfo with the players. No wond give and give.

MUSIC

Oct 31

Samuel Mayes Soloist at Symphony Concert

Third "regular" program by Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conductor. At Symphony Hall. The program: Debussy: "Iberia"; Kabalevsky: Cello Concerto (first performance in Boston, Samuel Mayes soloist); Beethoven: "Eroica" Symphony.

By CYRUS DURGIN

Had it not been for a modicum of untidy string detail in the funeral march of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday would have stood as an occasion of fabulously great playing. As it was, this concert was memorable for rich beauty of sound, and perhaps the most relaxed performance Charles Munch has drawn from the Boston Symphony since he became conductor. He seemed to capture the ultimate essence of Debussy, Kabalevsky and Beethoven, and his readings were of a certain luminous quality, exact in style and tempo, which require those abused words, "truly classical."

To be sure the essence of Kabalevsky was thin, indeed, compared to that in "Iberia" and the "Eroica" Symphony. But whatever it amounted to was properly extracted. As for Mayes, that superlatively gifted first cellist of the Boston Symphony, who is soloist of the week, his work was large playing of small music. Carefully weighing these words, I do not recall any cello playing which exceeded his for precise articulation of the notes, gloriously graceful bowing, absolute command of rhythm and a satin tone which kept its sheen in every passage. Furthermore he exemplified that first requirement of every stringed instrument, which is to "sing," whether the passage be a lush tune, agitated figuration or the technical fireworks of a cadenza.

The Kabalevsky Concerto indirectly recalls Soviet official pressure on its creative artists, because it is very simple (in substance, that is, not necessarily in technique) and full of tunes. The orchestra is subdued, and but seldom does it speak out and then with no weight or authority of a genuine symphonic nature. The solo instrument is always in the foreground. Kabalevsky must have been pre-occupied pretty much with triplet and sextuplet figures in the first movement, for you seldom get a sense of a three or a six metre out of your mind. All through the slow movement, in a good deal of the first and even in some of the finale you find that dark, songful mood best called nocturne, which is perhaps the greatest talent of Kabalevsky, and of Khatchatourian and Shostakovitch.

The Kabalevsky work has no symphonic stature and it is not the most spectacular concerto for the instrument, but it is pleasant and, when so well played, highly effective. Mayes got a tremendous reception.

If "Iberia" had been given perhaps the clearest, most poetic and unforced performance in my memory, so was the "Eroica." There was a good deal of detail from inner voices which Munch brought out but did not exaggerate. But the crowning joy lay in the glowing, clear sound; the absence of anything more than a naturally expressive tension, the proper pace for every bar of the score, and rythmic flexibility which was no less than wonderful. Munch outdid himself yesterday.

Cir. (D 215,218)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER

OCT 30 1953

SAMUEL MAYES, principal cellist of the Boston Symphony, is soloist this week in first Boston performance of the Kabalevsky concerto.

Oct. 31.53

Music in Review

By TUCKER KEISER

Symphony Concert

Seldom does a work receive its definitive performance at its first playing, yet there is no other way to describe Samuel Mayes' introduction of Dmitri Kabalevsky's Concerto for Cello and Orchestra to a Boston audience at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The American premiere of the work was given by Mr. Mayes in Hartford only last Wednesday night.

Never have I heard the cello so magnificently played! I admit, quite frankly, that I was moved to tears at the end of the overpoweringly melancholy second movement. But I was not alone. Into this infinitely sad music, Kabalevsky distilled the essence of tragic nobility. The elegiac Largo will never be more eloquently communicative than in the superlative performance of Mr. Mayes.

Actually, the Concerto itself is not much of a piece. The opening movement, Allegro, written to please the unsophisticated musical taste of the Kremlin, is thin stuff. The final movement is very much like the first in its naive and obvious melodies, although occasionally brilliant in instrumentation. There is a pleasant but platitudinous cadenza toward the end.

However, it is the middle movement which will survive. It will be extracted from the concerto and in a few years the corner movements will have been forgotten, and people will speak of Kabalevsky's Largo in the same way they now speak of Handel's.

The rapt attention during and the thunderous ovation at the end of the concerto were not so much for the piece as for the masterly playing of Mr. Mayes. He was brought back to the stage repeatedly to receive the plaudits of the audience.

Mr. Munch opened the program with Debussy's "Iberia," the composer's tribute to Spain. The reading of the score was a straightforward one, if undistinguished. The conductor's preoccupation with tempi and dynamics blinded him to the fact that the tonal opulence of the score, the sensuous instrumentation, is its raison d'etre. It is as if one were asked to appreciate a monochromatic photograph of a Velasquez painting rather that the colorful original.

Beethoven's Eroica Symphony, the last item on the day's program, was given a more controlled performance than when Mr. Munch last played it. It may be added that Mr. Munch's performances of Beethoven are reaction to, rather than conducting of the music.

REDUCTION

RATIO

19x

2.5 mm

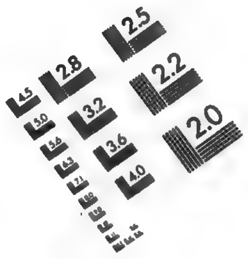
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

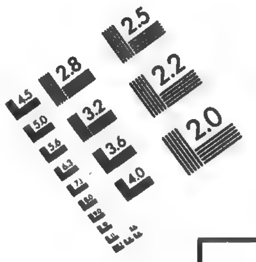
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

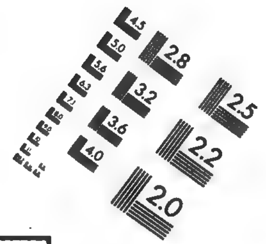
1.5 mm

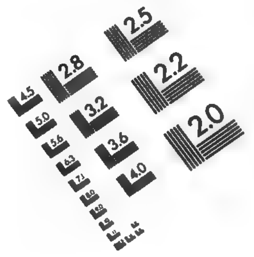
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

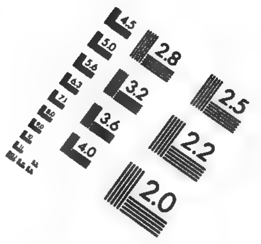


PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC





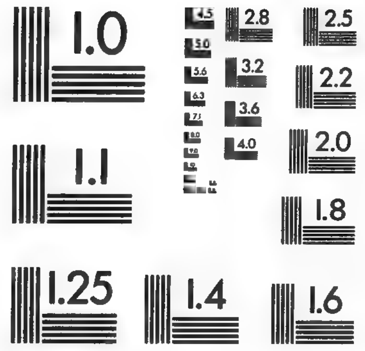




200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

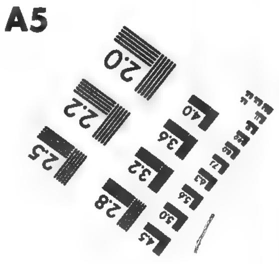
1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

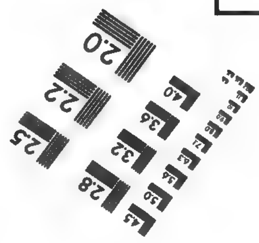
2.5 mm

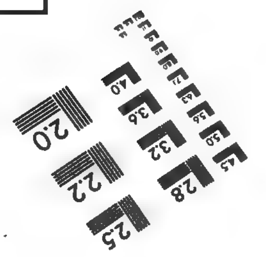
A5



A4

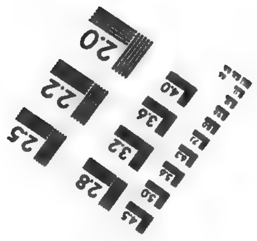
A3

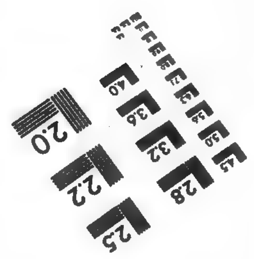




PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119





4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

27

Cir. (D 26,901)

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

OCT 27 1953

Music

BSO, Monteux Given Ovation At Troy Concert

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

A HUGE AUDIENCE in the Field House of the Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute in Troy gave the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its guest leader, Pierre Monteux, a standing ovation at the close of their program last night. Playing the final concert in their annual westward fall tour the men of the orchestra also stood and applauded the venerable conductor for his convincing leadership of a fairly conventional but thoroughly enjoyable program. The orchestra's musical director, Charles Munch, had conducted all but the Rochester and last night's concerts on the 10-day circuit.

The orchestra gave Monteux cordial and alert co-operation in the Tchaikovsky fifth symphony, the overture to Wagner's "Der Fliegende Hollander," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and a pot-pourri from Richard Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier," all tried and true favorites of audiences and all right in the groove for the veteran conductor and the virtuoso orchestra.

Every section of the whole ensemble was in its best and most keen degree of proficiency. The strings, especially, responded with a fine-textured sonority, devoid of any suggestion of shrieking at their most vehement moments and the wind soloists were at their peak. Monteux invited flutist Doriot Anthony to the front of the stage after her beautiful playing of the Debussy and Joseph Stagliano might well have taken special acknowledgment of his French horn solo in the slow movement of the Tchaikowsky.

* * *

AS PROGRAM PER SE, it was pretty monotone, all the products of a certain era starting from near the middle of the last to just past the turn of this century, no one piece giving any challenge whatsoever to the orchestra, or to the audience, for that matter. It was a program which the performers and their thoroughly experienced leader might have selected and then immediately played had they consulted and made the decision and choice at exactly concert time. Yet so expert are they individually and collectively that there was a warm and fresh spirit to the whole evening.

Monteux was a young man in Paris when Debussy and Strauss were at the crest of their productive years and from propinquity with the Frenchman and many associations with the German on tours acquired as authentic an insight into their music as is possessed by any conductor today. The Rosenkavalier arrangement was more music-hall than concert hall but it was done with such a sweep and infectious gaiety that no one could fail to be carried away on its wings.

The men of the orchestra who retired after the end of the Tanglewood have now been replaced by younger men. An orchestra in that sense is like the Maine woodsman's ax which he retains during his whole life, merely replacing handles and blades but without which he could not do such good work. There is a pathos to the departure of an artist who contributed so much to the glory of his organization but the show and the orchestra must go on. This concert and the one at Northampton on the outswing of the tour are as near during the winter season as the orchestra will come to its summer residence at Tanglewood. They entrained immediately after the concert for their home grounds at Boston.

Cir. (D 58,486) (S 120,102)

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

OCT 28 1953

Boston Symphony Plays For Audience of 5,000

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

An audience of 5,000 music lovers, including a very large number of Albanians, converged at the RPI Field House in Troy Monday evening to revel in a manificent program played by the superb Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux. The only disturbing note of the whole evening was the realization that the lack of a suitable auditorium in this, the capital of the richest state in the Union, made the journey to Troy necessary.

A former conductor of the Boston Symphony and the director who pulled, by his own bootstraps, the San Francisco Orchestra up to a preferred place in the symphonic sun, Mr. Monteux is recognized as a great musical personality, a musician equally at home in the field of opera or symphonic music. He is not a spectacular figure on the stage. In place of dramatics or excessive emotionalism, there is beautiful proportion, restraint, simplicity, profound musicianship and inspiration, all qualities which he transmits to the men of his ensemble and to the members of the audience alike. His lack of sensationalism is truly sensational.

Someone asked the maestro at the luncheon he attended in Albany Monday noon who was his favorite composer? With a Gallic twinkle in his eye, he replied: "The one I am conducting at the time." This catholicity of taste was in evidence throughout the whole evening.

GREAT LEADER

When playing the Overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" and the "Rosenkavalier Suite" he was a Teuton. When he reverted to type in "The Afternoon of a Faun" he was the true French impressionist. But when he directed the Fifth Symphony of Tchaikowsky, he was as Russian as a czar. For this reviewer, the Boston Symphony, being a king-size organization, can do no wrong. Mr. Monteux has that gift of interpretation which co-ordinates all his listeners.

There are a number of new faces this year in the personnel of the Bostonians. And the transfusion of new blood has given the orchestra new life and vitality. Youth, under proper restraint, is a marvelous power for good, especially in music. The enthusiasm of this segment of the orchestra was communicated to the older players in the organization, resulting in an evening of virile almost spontaneous, and, certainly, thrilling exploration of orchestral music.

GIVEN OVATION

Miss Doriot Anthony, the only regular woman member of the orchestra, was brought to the front of the platform by the conductor to share honors with him for her exquisite flute solo in the Debussy mezzotints of "The Afternoon of a Faun." It was the consensus of the intermission jury that this was one of the finest concerts played by the Boston Symphony orchestra this year, Tanglewood notwithstanding.

Cir. (D 96,447)

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 28 1953

UNITED STATES premiere of Kabalevsky's Cello Concerto is discussed by Samuel Mayes, left, first cellist of the Boston Symphony, and Fritz Mahler of Hartford Symphony, which has its first concert of season tonight at 8:15 in Bushnell.—[Times.

Cir. (D 355,617)

This Clipping From
KANSAS CITY, MO.
TIMES

OCT 28 1953

CONCERT MASTER IS DEAD.

Slyvain Noack Served in Several Cities, Including St. Louis.

Los Angeles, Oct. 27.(AP)—Sylvain Noack, former concert master of the Hollywood Bowl, Los Angeles Philharmonic, St. Louis and Boston symphony orchestras, died today in the Monte Sano hospital. He was 72.

A graduate with first prize honors from the Amsterdam conservatory, Noack was a famed teacher of the violin.

11/4/53

THE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—W

Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Dead

Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, internationaly known benefactor of musicians and musical undertakings, died at the Mt. Auburn Hospital, Cambridge, this morning. She had celebrated her 89th birthday last Friday.

Mrs. Coolidge is credited with contributing more to the advancement of chamber music and its performance in this country than any other individual.

Her interest in it and her financial support of it were prodigious. Many a composition by American and foreign composers probably not have been written had it not been for her vigorous encouragement and for the stimulus of the Coolidge prizes in a field of art which brings little financial return.

She undoubtedly will be remembered most now for the great amount of work done in the cause of chamber music by the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation which she established at the Library of Congress in Washington, D. C., in 1924. Yet several years before she made her first contributions to musical activity by means of the Berkshire Festivals in Pittsfield.

Honored at Pittsfield

This past Summer, she was guest of honor at the 35th anniversary of the Berkshire Festivals of Chamber Music, which she founded at South Mountain, Pittsfield, in 1918. They later gave impetus to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

Mrs. Coolidge personally attended the festival, where leaders of the music world gathered to pay tribute to her.

On her 80th birthday in 1944, she was similarly honored when the Foundation which bears her name held its 10th festival in the nation's capital and distinguished guests from far and near paid tribute to the single-minded purpose, generosity and idealism which made the foundation possible.

Since its establishment, the Coolidge Foundation has paid for what must be hundreds of chamber music concerts in many communities, including Boston and Cambridge.

The phrase "this concert has been made possible through the generosity of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation of the Library of Congress" has long been familiar in many places where her efforts were felt by the performance of chamber music.

Deep Devotion to Music

Her interest in music was not that of a wealthy dilettante but was the deep devotion of one who was herself a musician.

In fact, the work of Mrs. Coolidge can be compared only to that of the late Walter Willson Cobbett, an asbestos belting manufacturer and a devoted amateur musician in England. Both of these patrons of the chamber music art established medals of honor. It is significant that Mrs. Coolidge was awarded the Cobbett Medal in 1925 and that Mr. Cobbett received the first Coolidge Medal in 1932, five years before his death.

The daughter of Albert Arnold and Nancy Ann (Atwood) Sprague, Mrs. Coolidge was born in Chicago in 1864. Music was an integral part of her extensive education and she became an accomplished pianist.

In 1891 she married Dr. Frederic Shurtleff Coolidge, a distinguisned orthopedic surgeon who was forced to retire from active practice in 1904 because of ill health.

With their only child, a son, Albert Sprague Coolidge, who survives, they moved to Pittsfield and established permanent residence.

Lost Husband, Father, Mother

Following the loss of her husband, father and mother in the year 1915-16, Mrs. Coolidge immersed herself in plans for her musical philanthropies, the first step being the building of the South Mountain Temple of Chamber Music at Pittsfield in 1918, where the famous Berkshire Festivals were inaugurated.

It was her idea that these festivals were not to be identified with any school or fashion of music, but were to be international, inclusive of all periods and styles, impartial between the old and the new. They were designed to emphasize that music is a living art reflecting the spirit of the time in which it is created. Classical and romantic music were to stand on equal footing with new and contemporary works. Guests invited to the festivals were selected from musicians and music lovers of this country and abroad in such a way as to make the audiences as representative as possible.

Rewarded New Composers

[illegible] fered for unperformed works. Among those who received early recognition were Ernest Bloch, who was awarded the Berkshire Chamber Music Prize in September, 1919, for his Suite for Viola and Piano, and Roy Ellsworth Harris, well known for his later Folk Song Symphony, who composed the prize-winning Trio for the Ninth Berkshire Festival of Chamber Music in 1934.

It was to assure the continuance of chamber music activities under the [illegible] of the Federal Government that Mrs. Coolidge offered in 1924 to provide funds for the building of an auditorium in the Library of Congress and to establish an endowment for its [illegible]

In addition [illegible]

Decorated by France, Belgium

[illegible]

ELIZABETH SPRAGUE COOLIDGE

leaves four grandchildren, Frederic S. Coolidge of Sausalito, Calif., an architect; Dr. John Coolidge of Belmont, Mrs. Thomas Winship of Washington, D. C., and Mrs. Sullivan Marsden of State College, Pennsylvania. She also leaves 11 great-grandchildren.

PHONES

Continued from the First Pag

Cir. (D 161,189) (S 291,208)

This Clipping From
MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL

NOV 1 - 1953

Music and Musicians

Revised War Memorial Plans To Be Boon to Art Lovers

By
EDWARD P. HALLINE

THE NEWLY-announced plan to build the War Memorial on the lakefront in two units instead of the three originally contemplated is the best news Milwaukee concert - theater - and ballet - going public has heard in some time.

The long dreamed of Music Hall looms just a little more brightly on the horizon now that the program is to combine the Veterans' Building and the Art Center into one five-story structure, sitting astride the east end of Lincoln Memorial Bridge.

When the idea was to build three separate units, it looked as if music and the theater, as usual, were to be elbowed into last place. And yet, I venture to predict, the Music Hall, once built, will get the most patronage, serve the largest portion of the community and provide the most revenue.

[illegible] main floor and [illegible] making it eminently suitable for symphony, opera, ballet and musical theater of the dimensions of "South Pacific." This town is ballet crazy and Sadler's Wells or Ballet Theater could easily fill a hall of this size. So could the Metropolitan. What visiting orchestras we have had draw about 3,0[illegible] or so at the Auditorium although the Boston Symphony Orchestra went way over that when it was here a few years ago.

If Milwaukee had a first rate symphony orchestra of its own, the orchestra might reasonably expect to play in a hall of this size. Take other symphony orchestras: The Minneapolis has a hall with 4,824 capacity; St. Louis, 3,525; Cincinnati, 3,460; Los Angeles, [illegible]; San Francisco, [illegible]; Pittsburgh, 3,729; Dallas, 2,6[illegible]; New York, [illegible]; Philadelphia, 3,06[illegible]; Chicago, [illegible],582; Boston, 2,63[illegible]; Buffalo, [illegible],939; New Orleans, [illegible]

THE ONLY Milwaukee hall which comes close to this capacity is the Auditorium which has a flat floor and which was built for conventions, exhibitions and the like and has served those purposes admirably.

Unfortunately, a few hurdles still await our ideal Music Hall with its promise of the best acoustics and visibility for the patron wherever he sits. The first structure will use up the [illegible] million available, and obviously the rest of the original $5 million asked will have to be raised. And, furthermore, the Music Hall will have to be built on made land beginning [illegible]

[illegible] again I venture to predict, when the Music Hall is finally opened, it [illegible] dramatic and exciting spectacle in itself as the [illegible] was last spring. The [illegible] helped Milwaukee blossom almost overnight into a major league metropolis. The Music Hall on the lakefront can do the same in music and the theater.

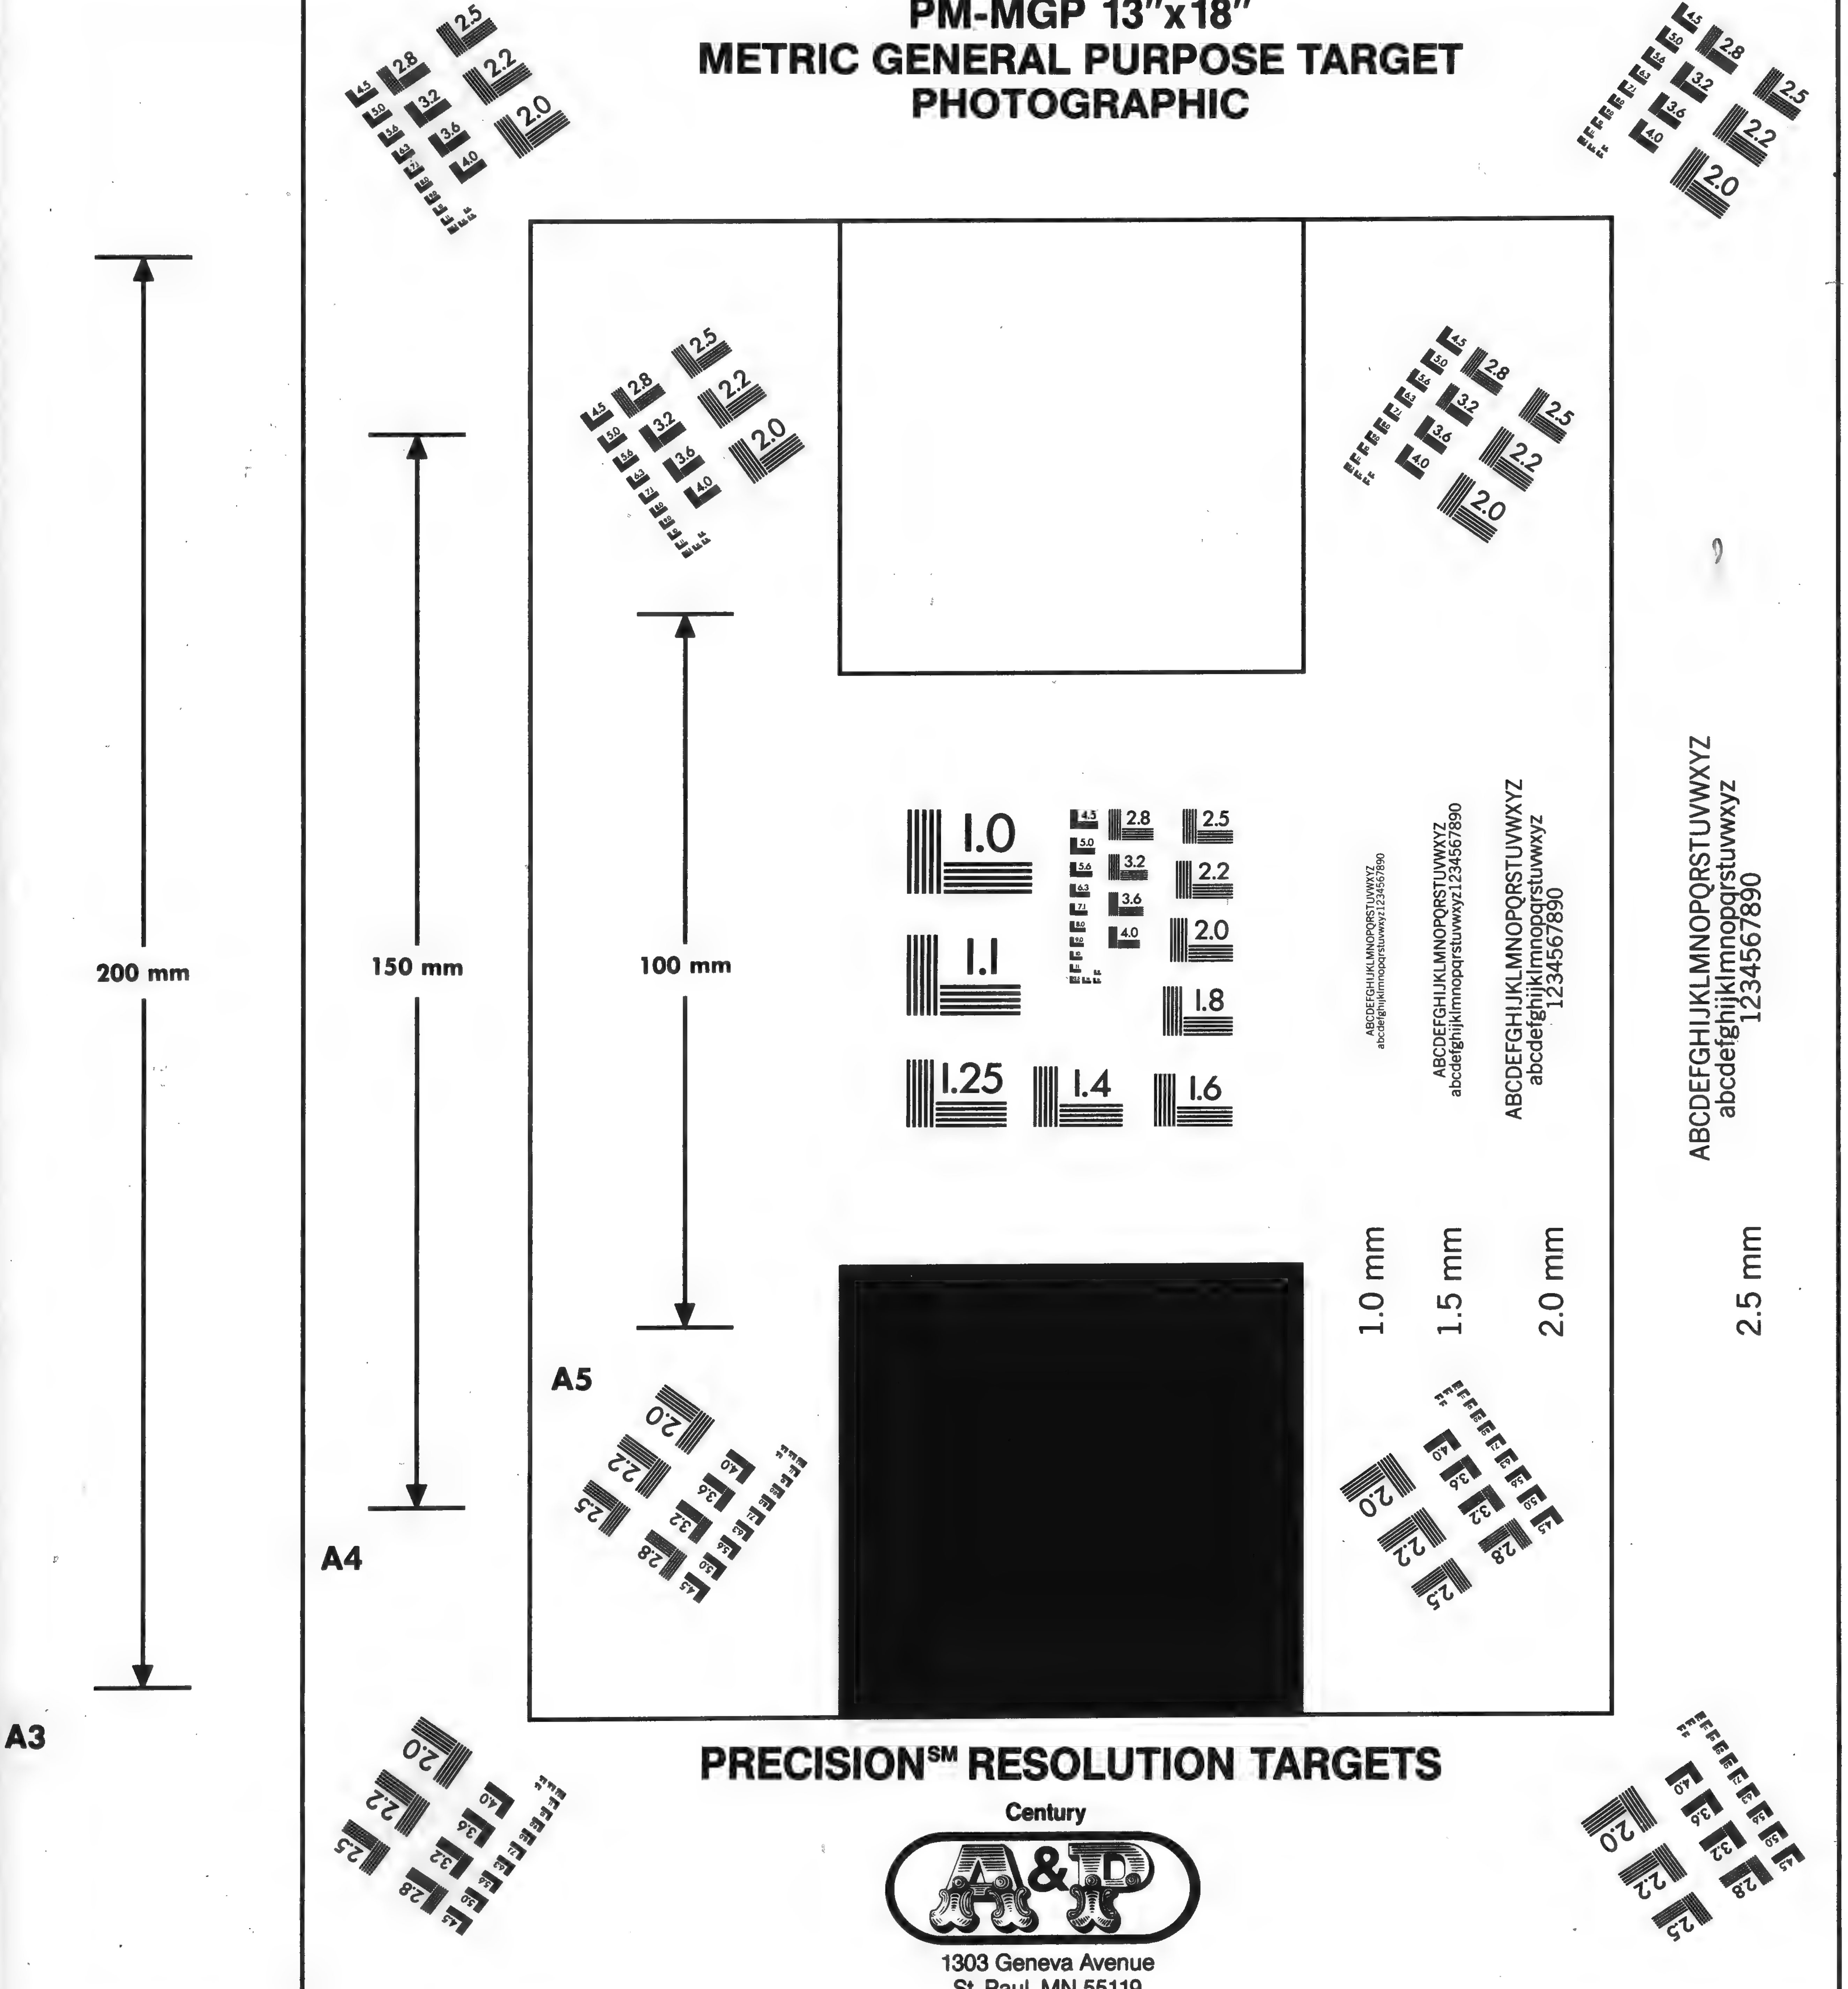
One more important point: The Music Hall will have elevators to haul the less athletic patrons to the first and second balconies. As the second balcony alone is to have a capacity of about 1,200, according to tentative plans, this innovation—almost revolutionary for theaters and music halls—will be a significant factor in building up attendance. Undoubtedly, we're lazier than we used to be, but a lot of people don't like to climb a lot of stairs.

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
5.6
6.3
3.6
7.1
4.0
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm
A5
A4
A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Cir. (D 26,981)

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

OCT 27 1953

Music

BSO, Monteux Given Ovation At Troy Concert

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

A HUGE AUDIENCE in the Field House of the Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute in Troy gave the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its guest leader, Pierre Monteux, a standing ovation at the close of their program last night. Playing the final concert in their annual westward fall tour the men of the orchestra also stood and applauded the venerable conductor for his convincing leadership of a fairly conventional but thoroughly enjoyable program. The orchestra's musical director, Charles Munch, had conducted all but the Rochester and last night's concerts on the 10-day circuit.

The orchestra gave Monteux cordial and alert co-operation in the Tchaikovsky fifth symphony, the overture to Wagner's "Der Fliegende Hollander," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and a pot-pourri from Richard Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier," all tried and true favorites of audiences and all right in the groove for the veteran conductor and the virtuoso orchestra.

Every section of the whole ensemble was in its best and most keen degree of proficiency. The strings, especially, responded with a fine-textured sonority, devoid of any suggestion of shrieking at their most vehement moments and the wind soloists were at their peak. Monteux invited flutist Doriot Anthony to the front of the stage after her beautiful playing of the Debussy and Joseph Stagliano might well have taken special acknowledgment of his French horn solo in the slow movement of the Tchaikowsky.

* * *

AS PROGRAM PER SE, it was pretty monotone, all the products of a certain era starting from near the middle of the last to just past the turn of this century, no one piece giving any challenge whatsoever to the orchestra, or to the audience, for that matter. It was a program which the performers and their thoroughly experienced leader might have selected and then immediately played had they consulted and made the decision and choice at exactly concert time. Yet so expert are they individually and collectively that there was a warm and fresh spirit to the whole evening.

Monteux was a young man in Paris when Debussy and Strauss were at the crest of their productive years and from propinquity with the Frenchman and many associations with the German on tours acquired as authentic an insight into their music as is possessed by any conductor today. The Rosenkavalier arrangement was more music-hall than concert hall but it was done with such a sweep and infectious gaiety that no one could fail to be carried away on its wings.

The men of the orchestra who retired after the end of the Tanglewood have now been replaced by younger men. An orchestra in that sense is like the Maine woodsman's ax which he retains during his whole life, merely replacing handles and blades but without which he could not do such good work. There is a pathos to the departure of an artist who contributed so much to the glory of his organization but the show and the orchestra must go on. This concert and the one at Northampton on the outswing of the tour are as near during the winter season as the orchestra will come to its summer residence at Tanglewood. They entrained immediately after the concert for their home grounds at Boston.

Cir. (D 58,486) (S 120,102)

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

OCT 28 1953

Boston Symphony Plays For Audience of 5,000

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

An audience of 5,000 music lovers, including a very large number of Albanians, converged at the RPI Field House in Troy Monday evening to revel in a manificent program played by the superb Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux. The only disturbing note of the whole evening was the realization that the lack of a suitable auditorium in this, the capital of the richest state in the Union, made the journey to Troy necessary.

A former conductor of the Boston Symphony and the director who pulled, by his own bootstraps, the San Francisco Orchestra up to a preferred place in the symphonic sun, Mr. Monteux is recognized as a great musical personality, a musician equally at home in the field of opera or symphonic music. He is not a spectacular figure on the stage. In place of dramatics or excessive emotionalism, there is beautiful proportion, restraint, simplicity, profound musicianship and inspiration, all qualities which he transmits to the men of his ensemble and to the members of the audience alike. His lack of sensationalism is truly sensational.

Someone asked the maestro at the luncheon he attended in Albany Monday noon who was his favorite composer? With a Gallic twinkle in his eye, he replied: "The one I am conducting at the time." This catholicity of taste was in evidence throughout the whole evening.

GREAT LEADER

When playing the Overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" and the "Rosenkavalier Suite," he was a Teuton. When he reverted to type in "The Afternoon of a Faun" he was the true French impressionist. But when he directed the Fifth Symphony of Tchaikowsky, he was as Russian as a czar. For this reviewer, the Boston Symphony, being a king-size organization, can do no wrong. Mr. Monteux has that gift of interpretation which co-ordinates all his listeners.

There are a number of new faces this year in the personnel of the Bostonians. And the transfusion of new blood has given the orchestra new life and vitality. Youth, under proper restraint, is a marvelous power for good, especially in music. The enthusiasm of this segment of the orchestra was communicated to the older players in the organization, resulting in an evening of virile, almost spontaneous, and, certainly, thrilling exploration of orchestral music.

GIVEN OVATION

Miss Doriot Anthony, the only regular woman member of the orchestra, was brought to the front of the platform by the conductor to share honors with him for her exquisite flute solo in the Debussy mezzotints of "The Afternoon of a Faun." It was the consensus of the intermission jury that this was one of the finest concerts played by the Boston Symphony orchestra this year, Tanglewood notwithstanding.

Cir. (D 96,447)

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 28 1953

UNITED STATES premiere of Kabalevsky's Cello Concerto is discussed by Samuel Mayes, left, first cellist of the Boston Symphony, and Fritz Mahler of Hartford Symphony, which has its first concert of season tonight at 8:15 in Bushnell.—[Times.

Cir. (D 355,617)

This Clipping From
KANSAS CITY, MO.
TIMES

OCT 28 1953

CONCERT MASTER IS DEAD.

Slyvain Noack Served in Several Cities, Including St. Louis.

Los Angeles, Oct. 27.(AP) — Sylvain Noack, former concert master of the Hollywood Bowl, Los Angeles Philharmonic, St. Louis and Boston symphony orchestras, died today, in the Monte Sano hospital. He was 72.

A graduate with first prize honors from the Amsterdam conservatory, Noack was a famed teacher of the violin.

Cir. (D 181,189) (S 291,206)

This Clipping From
MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL

NOV 1 1953

Music and Musicians

Revised War Memorial Plans To Be Boon to Art Lovers

By EDWARD P.
HALLINE

THE NEWLY-announced plan to build the War Memorial on the lakefront in two units instead of the three originally contemplated is the best news Milwaukee concert-theater and ballet-going public has heard in some time.

The long dreamed of Music Hall looms just a little more brightly on the horizon now that the program is to combine the Veterans' Building and the Art Center into one five-story structure sitting astride the east end of Lincoln Memorial Bridge.

When the idea was to build three separate units, it looked as if music and the theater, as usual, were to be elbowed into last place. And yet, I venture to predict, the Music Hall, once built, will get the most patronage, serve the largest portion of the community and provide the most revenue.

[illegible] AVE [illegible] main floor [illegible] making it eminently suitable for symphony, opera, ballet and musical theater of the dimensions of "South Pacific." This town is ballet crazy and Sadler's Wells or Ballet Theater could easily fill a hall of this size. So could the Metropolitan. What visiting orchestras we have had draw about 3,000 or so at the Auditorium although the Boston Symphony Orchestra went way over that when it was here a few years ago.

If Milwaukee had a first rate symphony orchestra of its own, the orchestra might reasonably expect to play in a hall of this size. Take other symphony orchestras. The Minneapolis has a hall with 4,824 capacity; St. Louis, 3,525; Cincinnati, 3,460; Los Angeles, 2,668; San Francisco, ,252; Pittsburgh, 3,729; Dallas, 2,64[illegible]; New York, [illegible]; Philadelphia, 3,005; Chicago, .582; Boston, 2,631; Buffalo, ,939; New Orleans, 2,700.

THE ONLY Milwaukee hall hich comes close to this capacity is the Auditorium, hich has a flat floor and hich was built for conventions, exhibitions and the like nd has served those purposes dmirably.

Unfortunately, a few hurdles still await our ideal Music Hall with its promise of the best acoustics and visibility for the patron wherever he sits. The first structure will use up the $2.2 million available, and obviously the rest of the original $5 million asked will have to be raised. And, furthermore, the Music Hall will have to be built on made land, beginning just blossom almost overnight into a major league metropolis. The Music Hall on the lakefront can do the same in music and the theater.

One more important point: The Music Hall will have elevators to haul the less athletic patrons to the first and second balconies. As the second balcony alone is to have a capacity of about 1,200, according to tentative plans, this innovation—almost revolutionary for theaters and music halls—will be a significant factor in building up attendance. Undoubtedly, we're lazier than we used to be, but a lot of people don't like to climb a lot of stairs.

PHONES

Continued from the First Pag

ce. But, again I venpredict, when the Mu-is finally opened, it s dramatic and excitctacle in itself as the was last spring. The helped Milwaukee

11/4/53

THE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—W

Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Dead

ELIZABETH SPRAGUE COOLIDGE

Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, internationaly known benefactor of musicians and musical undertakings, died at the Mt. Auburn Hospital, Cambridge, this morning. She had celebrated her 89th birthday last Friday.

Mrs. Coolidge is credited with contributing more to the advancement of chamber music and its performance in this country than any other individual.

Her interest in it and her financial support of it were prodigious. Many a composition by American and foreign composers probably not have been written had it not been for her vigorous encouragement and for the stimulus of the Coolidge prizes in a field of art which brings little financial return.

She undoubtedly will be remembered most now for the great amount of work done in the cause of chamber music by the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation which she established at the Library of Congress in Washington, D. C., in 1924. Yet several years before she made her first contributions to musical activity by means of the Berkshire Festivals in Pittsfield.

Honored at Pittsfield

This past Summer, she was guest of honor at the 35th anniversary of the Berkshire Festivals of Chamber Music, which she founded at South Mountain, Pittsfield, in 1918. They later gave impetus to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

Mrs. Coolidge personally attended the festival, where leaders of the music world gathered to pay tribute to her.

On her 80th birthday in 1944, she was similarly honored when the Foundation which bears her name held its 10th festival in the nation's capital and distinguished guests from far and near paid tribute to the single-minded purpose, generosity and idealism which made the foundation possible.

Since its establishment, the Coolidge Foundation has paid for what must be hundreds of chamber music concerts in many communities, including Boston and Cambridge.

The phrase "this concert has been made possible through the generosity of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation of the Library of Congress" has long been familiar in many places where her efforts were felt by the performance of chamber music.

Deep Devotion to Music

Her interest in music was not that of a wealthy dilettante but was the deep devotion of one who was herself a musician.

In fact, the work of Mrs. Coolidge can be compared only to that of the late Walter Willson Cobbett, an asbestos belting manufacturer and a devoted amateur musician in England. Both of these patrons of the chamber music art established medals of honor. It is significant that Mrs. Coolidge was awarded the Cobbett Medal in 1925 and that Mr. Cobbett received the first Coolidge Medal in 1932, five years before his death.

The daughter of Albert Arnold and Nancy Ann (Atwood) Sprague, Mrs. Coolidge was born in Chicago in 1864. Music was an integral part of her extensive education and she became an accom-

leaves four grandchildren, Frederic S. Coolidge of Sausalito, Calif., an architect; Dr. John Coolidge of Belmont, Mrs. Thomas Winship of Washington, D. C., and Mrs. Sullivan Marsden of State College, Pennsylvania. She also leaves 11 great-grandchildren.

Paris when [illegible] were at the crest of their productive years and from propinquity with the Frenchman and many associations with the German on tours acquired as authentic an insight into their music as is possessed by any conductor today. The Rosenkavalier arrangement was more music-hall than concert hall but it was done with such a sweep and infectious gaiety that no one could fail to be carried away on its wings.

The men of the orchestra who retired after the end of the Tanglewood have now been replaced by younger men. An orchestra in that sense is like the Maine woodsman's ax which he retains during his whole life, merely replacing handles and blades but without which he could not do such good work. There is a pathos to the departure of an artist who contributed so much to the glory of his organization but the show and the orchestra must go on. This concert and the one at Northampton on the outswing of the tour are as near during the winter season as the orchestra will come to its summer residence at Tanglewood. They entrained immediately after the concert for their home grounds at Boston.

Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Dead

Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, internationaly known benefactor of musicians and musical undertakings, died at the Mt. Auburn Hospital, Cambridge, this morning. She had celebrated her 89th birthday last Friday.

Mrs. Coolidge is credited with contributing more to the advancement of chamber music and its performance in this country than any other individual.

Her interest in it and her financial support of it were prodigious. Many a composition by American and foreign composers probably not have been written had it not been for her vigorous encouragement and for the stimulus of the Coolidge prizes in a field of art which brings little financial return.

She undoubtedly will be remembered most now for the great amount of work done in the cause of chamber music by the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation which she established at the Library of Congress in Washington, D. C., in 1924. Yet several years before she made her first contributions to musical activity by means of the Berkshire Festivals in Pittsfield.

Honored at Pittsfield

This past Summer, she was guest of honor at the 35th anniversary of the Berkshire Festivals of Chamber Music, which she founded at South Mountain, Pittsfield, in 1918. They later gave impetus to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

Mrs. Coolidge personally attended the festival, where leaders of the music world gathered to pay tribute to her.

On her 80th birthday in 1944, she was similarly honored when the Foundation which bears her name held its 10th festival in the nation's capital and distinguished guests from far and near paid tribute to the single-minded purpose, generosity and idealism which made the foundation possible.

Since its establishment, the Coolidge Foundation has paid for what must be hundreds of chamber music concerts in many communities, including Boston and Cambridge.

The phrase "this concert has been made possible through the generosity of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation of the Library of Congress" has long been familiar in many places where her efforts were felt by the performance of chamber music.

Deep Devotion to Music

Her interest in music was not that of a wealthy dilettante but was the deep devotion of one who was herself a musician.

In fact, the work of Mrs. Coolidge can be compared only to that of the late Walter Willson Cobbett, an asbestos belting manufacturer and a devoted amateur musician in England. Both of these patrons of the chamber music art established medals of honor. It is significant that Mrs. Coolidge was awarded the Cobbett Medal in 1925 and that Mr. Cobbett received the first Coolidge Medal in 1932, five years before his death.

The daughter of Albert Arnold and Nancy Ann (Atwood) Sprague, Mrs. Coolidge was born in Chicago in 1864. Music was an integral part of her extensive education and she became an accomplished pianist.

In 1891 she married Dr. Frederic Shurtleff Coolidge, a distinguished orthopedic surgeon who was forced to retire from active practice in 1904 because of ill health.

With their only child, a son, Albert Sprague Coolidge, who survives, they moved to Pittsfield and established permanent residence.

Lost Husband, Father, Mother

Following the loss of her husband, father and mother in the year 1915-16, Mrs. Coolidge immersed herself in plans for her musical philanthropies, the first step being the building of the South Mountain Temple of Chamber Music at Pittsfield in 1918, where the famous Berkshire Festivals were inaugurated.

It was her idea that these festivals were not to be identified with any school or fashion of music, but were to be international, inclusive of all periods and styles, impartial between the old and the new. They were designed to emphasize that music is a living art reflecting the spirit of the time in which it is created. Classical and romantic music were to stand on equal footing with new and contemporary works. Guests invited to the festivals were selected from musicians and music lovers of this country and abroad in such a way as to make the audiences as representative as possible.

Rewarded New Composers

To insure the participation of living composers, prizes were offered for unperformed works. Among those who received early recognition were Ernest Bloch, who was awarded the Berkshire Chamber Music Prize in September, 1919, for his Suite for Viola and Piano, and Roy Ellsworth Harris, well known for his later Folk Song Symphony, who composed the prize-winning Trio for the Ninth Berkshire Festival of Chamber Music in 1934.

It was to assure the continuance of chamber music activities under the aegis of the Federal Government that Mrs. Coolidge offered in 1924 to provide funds for the building of an auditorium in the Library of Congress and to establish an endowment for its maintenance and for concerts. The munificent gift was accepted and the Coolidge Auditorium, where many concerts have been given since, was constructed.

In addition to concerts given there, the Foundation has presented concerts in many parts of this country and abroad. Mrs. Coolidge often personally took American artists abroad and enlisted the services of resident organizations in London, Paris, Brussels, Rome, Venice, Milan and Budapest.

Decorated by France, Belgium

For her work the "Fairy Godmother of Chamber Music" was awarded France's Legion of Honor Medal, and Belgium's Order of the Crown.

At home, she was the recipient of many other honors, and degrees were bestowed on her by Yale, the University of California, Smith College, Mount Holyoke College, Mills College and Pomona College.

In addition to her son, Dr. Albert Sprague Coolidge of Harvard University, who makes his home in Cambridge, Mrs. Coolidge

ELIZABETH SPRAGUE COOLIDGE

leaves four grandchildren, Frederic S. Coolidge of Sausalito, Calif., an architect; Dr. John Coolidge of Belmont, Mrs. Thomas Winship of Washington, D. C., and Mrs. Sullivan Marsden of State College, Pennsylvania. She also leaves 11 great-grandchildren.

PHONES

Continued from the First Pag

[illegible] again I venture to predict, when the Mu[illegible] is finally opened, it[illegible] dramatic and exciting [illegible]ctacle in itself as the [illegible] was last spring. The [illegible] helped Milwaukee or so at the Auditorium although the Boston Symphony Orchestra went way over that when it was here a few years ago.

If Milwaukee had a first rate symphony orchestra of its own, the orchestra might reasonably expect to play in a hall of this size. Take other symphony orchestras. The Minneapolis has a hall with 4,824 capacity; St. Louis, 3,525; Cincinnati, 3,466; Los Angeles, 2,666; San Francisco, 3,252; Pittsburgh, 3,729; Dallas, 2,643; New York, 2,736; Philadelphia, 3,005; Chicago, 2,582; Boston, 2,631; Buffalo, 2,939; New Orleans, 2,700.

THE ONLY Milwaukee hall which comes close to this capacity is the Auditorium which has a flat floor and which was built for conventions, exhibitions and the like and has served those purposes admirably.

Unfortunately, a few hurdles still await our ideal Music Hall with its promise of the best acoustics and visibility for the patron wherever he sits. The first structure will use up the $2.2 million available, and obviously the rest of the original $5 million asked will have to be raised. And, furthermore, the Music Hall will have to be built on made land beginning just rial on the lakefront in two units instead of the three originally contemplated is the best news Milwaukee concert-theater- and ballet-going public has heard in some time.

By
EDWARD P. HALLINE

The long dreamed of Music Hall looms just a little more brightly on the horizon now that the program is to combine the Veterans' Building and the Art Center into one five-story structure sitting astride the east end of Lincoln Memorial Bridge.

When the idea was to build three separate units, it looked as if music and the theater, as usual, were to be elbowed into last place. And yet, I venture to predict, the Music Hall, once built, will get the most patronage, serve the largest portion of the community and provide the most revenue.

[illegible] main floor [illegible] AVE [illegible]conies, making it eminently suitable for symphony, opera, ballet and musical theater of the dimensions of "South Pacific." This town is ballet crazy and Sadler's Wells or Ballet Theater could easily fill a hall of this size. So could the Metropolitan. What visiting orchestras we have had draw about 3,[illegible]

The Music Hall on the lakefront can do the same in music and the theater.

One more important point: The Music Hall will have elevators to haul the less athletic patrons to the first and second balconies. As the second balcony alone is to have a capacity of about 1,200, according to tentative plans, this innovation—almost revolutionary for theaters and music halls—will be a significant factor in building up attendance. Undoubtedly, we're lazier than we used to be, but a lot of people don't like to climb a lot of stairs.

27

Cir. (D 26,991)

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

OCT 27 1953

Music

BSO. Monteux Given Ovation At Troy Concert

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

A HUGE AUDIENCE in the Field House of the Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute in Troy gave the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its guest leader, Pierre Monteux, a standing ovation at the close of their program last night. Playing the final concert in their annual westward fall tour the men of the orchestra also stood and applauded the venerable conductor for his convincing leadership of a fairly conventional but thoroughly enjoyable program. The orchestra's musical director, Charles Munch, had conducted all but the Rochester and last night's concerts on the 10-day circuit.

The orchestra gave Monteux cordial and alert co-operation in the Tchaikovsky fifth symphony, the overture to Wagner's "Der Fliegende Hollander," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and a pot-pourri from Richard Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier," all tried and true favorites of audiences and all right in the groove for the veteran conductor and the virtuoso orchestra.

Every section of the whole ensemble was in its best and most keen degree of proficiency. The strings, especially, responded with a fine-textured sonority, devoid of any suggestion of shrieking at their most vehement moments and the wind soloists were at their peak. Monteux invited flutist Doriot Anthony to the front of the stage after her beautiful playing of the Debussy and Joseph Stagliano might well have taken special acknowledgment of his French horn solo in the slow movement of the Tchaikowsky.

* * *

AS PROGRAM PER SE, it was pretty monotone, all the products of a certain era starting from near the middle of the last to just past the turn of this century, no one piece giving any challenge whatsoever to the orchestra, or to the audience, for that matter. It was a program which the performers and their thoroughly experienced leader might have selected and then immediately played had they consulted and made the decision and choice at exactly concert time. Yet so expert are they individually and collectively that there was a warm and f spirit to the whole eve

Monteux was Paris when Deb were at the crest tive years and fr with the Frenchm associations with th tours acquired as insight into their mus sessed by any conduc The Rosenkavalier ar was more music-hall t cert hall but it was do such a sweep and in gaiety that no one could be carried away on its wing

The men of the orchestra retired after the end of the T glewood have now been replac by younger men. An orchest in that sense is like the Main woodsman's ax which he retains during his whole life, merely replacing handles and blades but without which he could not do such good work. There is a pathos to the departure of an artist who contributed so much to the glory of his organization but the show and the orchestra must go on. This concert and the one at Northampton on the outswing of the tour are as near during the winter season as the orchestra will come to its summer residence at Tanglewood. They entrained immediately after the concert for their home grounds at Boston.

Cir. (D 58,486) (S 120,102)

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

OCT 28 1953

Boston Symphony Plays For Audience of 5,000

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

An audience of 5,000 music lovers, including a very large number of Albanians, converged at the RPI Field House in Troy Monday evening to revel in a manificent program played by the superb Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux. The only disturbing note of the whole evening was the realization that the lack of a suitable auditorium in this, the capital of the richest state in the Union, made the journey to Troy necessary.

A former conductor of the Boston Symphony and the director who pulled, by his own bootstraps, the San Francisco Orchestra up to a preferred place in the symphonic sun. Mr. Monteux is recognized as a great musical personality, a communicated to the older players in the organization, resulting in an evening of virile, almost spontaneous, and, certainly, thrilling exploration of orchestral music.

GIVEN OVATION

Miss Doriot Anthony, the only regular woman member of the orchestra, was brought to the front of the platform by the conductor to share honors with him for her exquisite flute solo in the Debussy mezzotints of "The Afternoon of a Faun." It was the consensus of the intermission jury that this was one of the finest concerts played by the Boston Symphony orchestra this year, Tanglewood notwithstanding.

Cir. (D 96,447)

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 28 1953

UNITED STATES premiere of Kabalevsky's Cello Concerto is discussed by Samuel Mayes, left, first cellist of the Boston Symphony, and Fritz Mahler of Hartford Symphony, which has its first concert of season tonight at 8:15 in Bushnell.—[Times.

Cir. (D 355,617)

This Clipping From
KANSAS CITY, MO.
TIMES

OCT 28 1953

CONCERT MASTER IS DEAD.

Slyvain Noack Served in Several Cities, Including St. Louis.

Los Angeles, Oct. 27.(AP) — Sylvain Noack, former concert master of the Hollywood Bowl, Los Angeles Philharmonic, St. Louis and Boston symphony orchestras, died today, in the Monte Sano hospital. He was 72.

A graduate with first prize honors from the Amsterdam conservatory, Noack was a famed teacher of the violin.

Cir. (D 181,189) (S 291,208)

This Clipping From
MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL

NOV 1 - 1953

Music and Musicians

Revised War Memorial Plans To Be Boon to Art Lovers

By
EDWARD P. HALLINE

THE NEWLY-announced plan to build the War Memorial on the lakefront in two units instead of the three originally contemplated is the best news Milwaukee concert - theater - and ballet - going public has heard in some time.

The long dreamed of Music Hall looms just a little more brightly on the horizon now that the program is to combine the Veterans' Building and the Art Center into one five-story structure sitting astride the east end of Lincoln Memorial Bridge.

When the idea was to build three separate units, it looked as if music and the theater, as usual, were to be elbowed into last place. And yet, I venture to predict, the Music Hall, once built, will get the most patronage, serve the largest portion of the community and provide the most revenue.

IT WILL HAVE a capacity of about 3,500 on the main floor and two balconies, making it eminently suitable for symphony, opera, ballet and musical theater of the dimensions of "South Pacific." This town is ballet crazy and Sadler's Wells or Ballet Theater could easily fill a hall of this size. So could the Metropolitan. What visiting orchestras we have had draw about 3,0 or so at the Auditorium although the Boston Symphony Orchestra went way over that when it was here a few years ago.

If Milwaukee had a first rate symphony orchestra of its own, the orchestra might reasonably expect to play in a hall of this size. Take other symphony orchestras. The Minneapolis has a hall with 4,824 capacity; St. Louis, 3,525; Cincinnati, 3,460; Los Angeles, 2,666; San Francisco, 3,252; Pittsburgh, 3,729; Dallas, 2,643; New York, 2,756; Philadelphia, 3,005; Chicago, 2,582; Boston, 2,631; Buffalo, 2,939; New Orleans, 2,700.

THE ONLY Milwaukee hall which comes close to this capacity is the Auditorium, which has a flat floor and which was built for conventions, exhibitions and the like and has served those purposes admirably.

Unfortunately, a few hurdles still await our ideal Music Hall with its promise of the best acoustics and visibility for the patron wherever he sits. The first structure will use up the $2.2 million available, and obviously the rest of the original $5 million asked will have to be raised. And, furthermore, the Music Hall will have to be built on made land beginning just about where the waves of Lake Michigan lap the present shoreline. Extension of the shoreline out into the lake is part of the long range program of the County Park Commission and the Milwaukee Harbor Commission.

SO OUR DREAM is still a distance away in both time and space. But, again I venture to predict, when the Music Hall is finally opened, it will be as dramatic and exciting a spectacle in itself as the Stadium was last spring. The Stadium helped Milwaukee blossom almost overnight into a major league metropolis. The Music Hall on the lakefront can do the same in music and the theater.

One more important point: The Music Hall will have elevators to haul the less athletic patrons to the first and second balconies. As the second balcony alone is to have a capacity of about 1,200, according to tentative plans, this innovation—almost revolutionary for theaters and music halls—will be a significant factor in building up attendance. Undoubtedly, we're lazier than we used to be, but a lot of people don't like to climb a lot of stairs.

Cir. (S 89,838)

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

NOV 8 - 1953

Mrs. Elizabeth Coolidge's Works Scarcely Realized

Late Founder of South Mountain Music Colony First Came to Pittsfield in 1904

(Special to The Republican)

Berkshire Hills, Nov. 7—Music lovers, not only in the Berkshires, but whereever the name of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge was known, were mourning this week her passing at the age of 89 in Mt. Auburn Hospital Cambridge, where she had been a patient for two weeks. The "fairy godmother of chamber music," as she was often referred to, was probably one of the best known patronesses of music in the country, and a great benefactor of other charitable organizations. Her name has been synonymous with music in the Berkshires for many years.

The founder of South Mountain Music Colony, Pittsfield, came to that city in 1904 with her husband, Dr. Frederick S. Coolidge, noted orthopedic surgeon. She was a concert pianist at one time, and one of her first projects in the Berkshires was formation of Berkshire Quartet, which included the late Willem Willeke, who served for many years as director of the South Mountain Temple of Chamber Music. The Temple was constructed in 1917, and for years it was the music center of the area during the summer months until it was overshadowed in size by the music festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra holds forth each season.

Mrs. Coolidge brought many famous personalities in the music world to South Mountain Temple. In 1940 Oscar Levant, noted pianist wrote a book, "A Smattering of Ignorance," which ranked as a top seller at that period and in which he praised Mrs. Coolidge for her contribution to music. He said of her; "As for the unlimited thousands who bruised each other for the privilege of hearing Lily Pons sing at the Stadium last summer, I doubt if there are 22,000 people in the whole country who are familiar with the name, merely, of a person infinitely more important to music in this country than Pons and Kostelanetz together. I am thinking of one of the greatest patronesse of all time—Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge. The list of men she has commissioned to write chamber music is virtually a cross-section of the creative forces at work today,—Stravinsky, Prokofieff, Schoenberk, Mindemith, Bartok, Piston, Pizetti, Leoffler, Martineau are merely a few of the names. Moreover, she has introduced numerous fine European chamber-music ensembles to America, the Roths, the Pro Arte Quartet, the Busch Quartet, the Koliesches. It is true that the average concert-goer has no consciousness of her existence, but that is a matter of slight significance, I am sure, to her or to those to whom her work is important—the composers."

In the way of helping and promoting music, she offered large cash awards for new musical works; she financed tours of ensembles from Europe in this country and American units to the Continent. In 1925 as the result of an initial gift of $250,000 the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation of the Library of Congress was authorized by Congress and an auditorium built which has been the scene of many outstanding musical presentations. She also was donor of the Sprague Memorial Hall at Yale University, and established a pension fund for the Chicago orchestra. She was given the famed Cobbett medal of London for her support of music in England, and was named an honorary citizen of Frankfort, Germany.

Mrs. Coolidge made her last visit to the Berkshires last September when she attended the 25th anniversary of South Mountain. She had made her winter home at Hotel Continental, Cambridge. Shortly in a declining state up to her death. She leaves a son, Albert Sprague Coolidge a well known musician, four grandchildren, and a great-grandchild.

The body is buried in the Pittsfield Cemetery beside her husband.

Music School Directors

The Pittsfield Community Music School named two new directors at a meeting held recently. They are William G. O'Connell of Dalton and Mrs. John Russ. Re-elected directors for one year were Mrs. Bruce Crane, president; Mrs. Jay C. Rosenfield, vice-president; Paul E. Fodder, treasurer; Mrs. John H. Rice, secretary, and Francis L. Cunningham clerk. Other directors are Mrs. Lincoln S. Cain, Alan J. Blau, Kingsley R. Fall, Dr. Modestine Criscitello, Eric Joslin, Donald B. Miller, Mrs. Willem Willeke, Clifford A. Read, Mrs. Maurice Woolverton, Mrs. George G. Mintz, Mrs. Carl W. Germeek, Donald M. Waston, Jr., and Mrs. Clayton W. Nesbit. Mr. and Mrs. Jan Stocklinski were re-appointed music directors.

Dr. Knight Honored

Dr. Robert P. Knight, medical director at Austen Riggs Center, Stockbridge, and clinical professor of psychiatry at Yale University School of Medicine, received one of the first alumni citations granted by Oberlin College, Oberlin, Ohio at a special banquet there this past week.

Dr. Knight is a past president of the American Psychopathological Association, and of the American Psychoanalytic Association. He is a member of the Yale Club of New York, the Graduates Club of New Haven, and president of the Stockbridge Golf Club.

An old South Berkshire landmark, Egremont Tavern in South Egremont, 191 years old, was sold this past week by Rudolph W. Schrader to Dr. George C. Adie of Sheffield and New Rochelle, N. Y. Included in the sale was the Old Mill, built in 1797 and used as a guest house for the Tavern. The latter of brick construction was built by Lodowick Karner, who settled in Egremont in 1730.

In South Sandisfield, an old Colonial house, believed to be around 200 years old, was sold to Richard Widmark, well known motion picture actor, and Mrs. Widmark. The property was known as the Floyd Rasmussen house. It includes the eight room structure, a barn and about 50 acres of land. History of the property extends back to the king's grant in the 18th century. The Widmarks plan to use the house as a summer and week end place when they are in the East.

In Monterey, a beautiful old Colonial dwelling owned by Mrs. Paul Girard of Philadelphia, Pa., was sold this week through Wheeler & Taylor Inc., realtors of Great Barrington to Mr. and Mrs. Walter Spencers of Hudson, Quebec, Can. The house was built in 1767, and contains about 10 rooms. It is on a plot of about eight acres and situated on high elevation giving it a commanding view of the Berkshires.

By this time, her hearing was quite impaired and a jeweled ear trumpet was a traditional part of her attire. She later replaced it with a hearing aid, which she turned off when she didn't like the music being performed.

An amateur pianist and composer, Mrs. Coolidge wrote several pieces of chamber music. One of them, an oboe quintet, was performed in the summer of 1953 at the Music Mountain Music Festival in Falls Village, Conn.

Albert Sprague Coolidge played the oboe solo. Although a chemist by profession and a Professor of Chemistry at Harvard, he proved his versatility as a musician by returning later in the program to play the second viola in a Mozart Quintet.

Mrs. Coolidge helped treat the people of New York to an evening of chamber music the same summer, when she gave $1,000 toward the outdoor concert that Alexander Schneider conducted in Washington Square Park in cooperation with Local 802 of the American Federation of Musicians.

She was a member of the Legion of Honor of France, the Order of Leopold and the Order of the Crown of Belgium, and recipient of the Cobbett Medal of London. Mrs. Coolidge received honorary degrees from Mount Holyoke, Smith, Yale, Mills and the University of California.

MRS. E. S. COOLIDGE, MUSIC PATRON, DIES

Pittsfield Festival Founder Aided Thousands of Artists by Library of Congress Gift

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Nov. 4—Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, one of the nation's wealthiest women and an internationally known patron of chamber music, died today at Wyman House, Mount Auburn Hospital. She was 89 years old last Friday.

She was the widow of Dr. Frederic Shurtleff Coolidge, a Chicago and Pittsfield orthopedic surgeon who died in 1915.

Mrs. Elizabeth S. Coolidge

Leading Patron of Music

Through the establishment of the South Mountain Temple of Chamber Music at Pittsfield, Mass., and the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation at Washington, Mrs. Coolidge became America's outstanding music patron. For many years she devoted her time and her fortune to varied musical projects, and her gift to the Library of Congress, brought about legislation making private gifts to the famous library possible.

The music festivals, held each summer at the temple in Pittsfield, attracted wide attention. Mrs. Coolidge, however, shunned personal publicity, with the result that the extent of her philanthropies was not exactly known. She gave thousands of dollars for the establishment of scholarships, pension funds and the erection of buildings in Washington, at Yale and elsewhere. In return, she received honorary degrees from many universities and decorations from foreign governments.

Perhaps her outstanding benefaction was the gift she made to the Library of Congress. Although not the largest gift ever received by that institution, its historic importance transcended its size. In 1925 Mrs. Coolidge offered to the library an endowment for the extension of its work as well as for an auditorium for the playing of chamber music.

Since the Library of Congress is not a corporation with trustees, and so without the necessary facilities for the care and management of an endowment fund, Dr. Herbert Putnam, the librarian, with the aid of Senator George Wharton Pepper of Pennsylvania drafted an act that made possible acceptance of Mrs. Coolidge's $600,000 gift. The act, which was passed by Congress in 1926, created a Trust Fund Board to hold and administer all endowments and funds offered to the library.

Under Mrs. Coolidge's endowment, the director of the music division—admittedly one of the country's finest collections—is the holder of a Chair of Music as well as administrator of the department.

Donated Sprague Hall to Yale

Mrs. Coolidge also donated Sprague Hall to Yale and through a generous gift of several thousand dollars established the pension fund for the musicians of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra.

Mrs. Coolidge was born in Chicago, the daughter of Albert Arnold Sprague and Nancy Ann Atwood Sprague. In 1891 she was married to Dr. Frederic Shurtleff Coolidge of Boston, a member of an old New England family—not the one of which Calvin Coolidge was a member. Dr. Coolidge died many years ago. Their one child is Albert Sprague Coolidge.

Mrs. Coolidge, who was widely traveled, divided her time among Boston, Washington and Lenox, Mass. In 1918 she transformed a side of South Mountain, in the Berkshires, into a setting for chamber-music presentation. Each year thereafter she assembled what one critic called "an international congress of music lovers and musicians" to play and listen to chamber music in the late summer and early fall setting for which the Berkshire Hills are famous.

Mostly the concerts were under the direction of Willem Willeke. South Mountain became a shrine for devotees of chamber music. Sir Henry Kitson executed a marble likeness of Mrs. Coolidge for the outdoor auditorium.

More than 100 premieres of chamber music works were given at South Mountain. Mrs. Coolidge had commissioned many of these compositions, most of which were dedicated to her.

Honored by President

In 1944, at the closing session of a three-day festival of chamber music at the Library of Congress in celebration of her eightieth birthday, Mrs. Coolidge received a "declaration of gratitude" signed by President Franklin D. Roosevelt and other high public officials in appreciation for her gifts to the library.

Cir. (D 149,902) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE

NOV 6 - 1953

TREASURE TROVE

It had been a barn in Lanesboro before it became a Temple of Music. The timbers were moved to South Mountain near Pittsfield and re-erected; audiences sat in old pews from a New England meeting-house; for the spirit of worship reincarnates in divers forms.

That was in September 1918, it was called the Berkshire Music Festival, the foundress was Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, her Temple seated five hundred persons, the works performed were chamber music, and the artists were distinguished, including Mrs. Coolidge herself, who was an accomplished pianist.

This was the modest beginning thirty-five years ago which

"In spiral routes by long detours,
As a much-tacking ship upon the sea,"

has become the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, with Mrs. Coolidge still providing many of its finest concerts of chamber music, and her audience of five hundred expanding season after season until those who know Tanglewood are numbered by hundreds of thousands and its repute is international.

From Hawthorne, Longfellow, Holmes, and Melville in the mid-19th century when our dominant art was literature, to South Mountain and Tanglewood in the 20th, when music is the dominant art (for the American people now spend more money each year on serious music than on baseball), Berkshire County continues to be a cultural capital.

On our soil chamber music had long been a tender plant. Big orchestras and resounding symphonic and choral works, yes, they were well on their way to domestication a century ago; but chamber music, that is, string quartets, sonatas for one or more instruments, pianoforte trios, quartets, and quintets,—the literature of these, though fabulously rich, was little known save to tiny groups of professionals and amateurs. It is music more rarefied, more austere, yet often far superior to works more grandiose. The Kneisel Quartet had disbanded, the Flonzaley, which had had to be in part subsidized, was nearing the end of its career; chamber music had arisen in Europe first among village musicians, then in Courts fostered by beneficent Princelings. How was this immense treasure to be transferred to the American continent, and does an art so refined fit into our society?

It fits. No sooner has one said that the age of patronage in the arts is gone than along comes a patron. This cultivated and public-spirited woman, herself a performing musician, widowed of her surgeon husband, and bereft of both her parents in one year, found solace in music and shared that solace, as the event has proved, with multitudes.

From South Mountain her festival moved to the Library of Congress in Washington to which she gave a choice chamber concert hall, for which she provided concerts, and for which concerts she provided notable works by contemporary composers commissioned and paid for by herself, works many of which but for her would never have been composed.

Far and wide went her musical, as well as other, ministrations. The concerts made possible by her munificence ranged from European capitals to obscure towns in the United States many of whose people had never before heard chamber music in living performance.

Her career is not bounded by her own y her own time, nor by the alone. Her mortal life ended ago after she had just passed rthday; her immortal life goes e in the music she shed abroad generosity, but in the way she has shown how to ingratiate a noble art with a myriad public. Thus gradually does a culture grow, and thus in the end a civilization flowers.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

Cir. (S 89,838)

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

NOV 8 - 1953

Mrs. Elizabeth Coolidge's Works Scarcely Realized

Late Founder of South Mountain Music Colony First Came to Pittsfield in 1904

(Special to The Republican)

Berkshire Hills, Nov. 7—Music lovers, not only in the Berkshires, but whereever the name of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge was known, were mourning this week her passing at the age of 89 in Mt. Auburn Hospital Cambridge, where she had been a patient for two weeks. The "fairy godmother of chamber music," as she was often referred to, was probably one of the best known patronesses of music in the country, and a great benefactor of other charitable organizations. Her name has been synonymous with music in the Berkshires for many years.

The founder of South Mountain Music Colony, Pittsfield, came to that city in 1904 with her husband, Dr. Frederick S. Coolidge, noted orthopedic surgeon. She was a concert pianist at one time, and one of her first projects in the Berkshires was formation of Berkshire Quartet, which included the late Willem Willeke, who served for many years as director of the South Mountain Temple of Chamber Music. The Temple was constructed in 1917, and for years it was the music center of the area during the summer months until it was overshadowed in size by the music festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra holds forth each season.

Mrs. Coolidge brought many famous personalities in the music world to South Mountain Temple. In 1940 Oscar Levant, noted pianist wrote a book, "A Smattering of Ignorance," which ranked as a top seller at that period and in which he praised Mrs. Coolidge for her contribution to music. He said of her; "As for the unlimited thousands who bruised each other for the privilege of hearing Lily Pons sing at the Stadium last summer, I doubt if there are 22,000 people in the whole country who are familiar with the name, merely, of a person infinitely more important to music in this country than Pons and Kostelanetz together. I am thinking of one of the greatest patronesse of all time—Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge. The list of men she has commissioned to write chamber music is virtually a cross-section of the creative forces at work today,—Stravinsky, Prokofieff, Schoenberk, Mindemith, Bartok, Piston, Pizetti, Leoffler, Martineau are merely a few of the names. Moreover, she has introduced numerous fine European chamber-music ensembles to America, the Roths, the Pro Arte Quartet, the Busch Quartet, the Koliesches. It is true that the average concert-goer has no consciousness of her existence, but that is a matter of slight significance, I am sure, to her or to those to whom her work is important—the composers."

In the way of helping and promoting music, she offered large cash awards for new musical works; she financed tours of ensembles from Europe in this country and American units to the Continent. In 1925 as the result of an initial gift of $250,000 the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation of the Library of Congress was authorized by Congress and an auditorium built which has been the scene of many outstanding musical presentations. She also was donor of the Sprague Memorial Hall at Yale University, and established a pension fund for the Chicago orchestra. She was given the famed Cobbett medal of London for her support of music in England, and was named an honorary citizen of Frankfort, Germany.

Mrs. Coolidge made her last visit to the Berkshires last September when she attended the 25th anniversary of South Mountain. She had made her winter home at Hotel Continental, Cambridge. Shortly in a declining state up to her death. She leaves a son, Albert Sprague Coolidge a well known musician, four grandchildren, and a great-grandchild.

The body is buried in the Pittsfield Cemetery beside her husband.

Music School Directors

The Pittsfield Community Music School named two new directors at a meeting held recently. They are William G. O'Connell of Dalton and Mrs. John Russ. Re-elected directors for one year were Mrs. Bruce Crane, president; Mrs. Jay C. Rosenfield, vice-president; Paul E. Fodder, treasurer; Mrs. John H. Rice, secretary, and Francis L. Cunningham clerk. Other directors are Mrs. Lincoln S. Cain, Alan J. Blau, Kingsley R. Fall, Dr. Modestine Criscitello, Eric Joslin, Donald B. Miller, Mrs. Willem Willeke, Clifford A. Read, Mrs. Maurice Woolverton, Mrs. George G. Mintz, Mrs. Carl W. Germeek, Donald M. Waston, Jr., and Mrs. Clayton W. Nesbit. Mr. and Mrs. Jan Stocklinski were re-appointed music directors.

Dr. Knight Honored

Dr. Robert P. Knight, medical director at Austen Riggs Center, Stockbridge, and clinical professor of psychiatry at Yale University School of Medicine, received one of the first alumni citations granted by Oberlin College, Oberlin, Ohio at a special banquet there this past week.

Dr. Knight is a past president of the American Psychopathological Association, and of the American Psychoanalytic Association. He is a member of the Yale Club of New York, the Graduates Club of New Haven, and president of the Stockbridge Golf Club.

An old South Berkshire landmark, Egremont Tavern in South Egremont, 191 years old, was sold this past week by Rudolph W. Schrader to Dr. George C. Adie of Sheffield and New Rochelle, N. Y. Included in the sale was the Old Mill, built in 1797 and used as a guest house for the Tavern. The latter of brick construction was built by Lodowick Karner, who settled in Egremont in 1730.

In South Sandisfield, an old Colonial house, believed to be around 200 years old, was sold to Richard Widmark, well known motion picture actor, and Mrs. Widmark. The property was known as the Floyd Rasmussen house. It includes the eight room structure, a barn and about 50 acres of land. History of the property extends back to the king's grant in the 18th century. The Widmarks plan to use the house as a summer and week end place when they are in the East.

In Monterey, a beautiful old Colonial dwelling owned by Mrs. Paul Girard of Philadelphia, Pa., was sold this week through Wheeler & Taylor Inc., realtors of Great Barrington to Mr. and Mrs. Walter Spencers of Hudson, Quebec, Can. The house was built in 1767, and contains about 10 rooms. It is on a plot of about eight acres and situated on high elevation giving it a commanding view of the Berkshires.

By this time, her hearing was quite impaired and a jeweled ear trumpet was a traditional part of her attire. She later replaced it with a hearing aid, which she turned off when she didn't like the music being performed.

An amateur pianist and composer, Mrs. Coolidge wrote several pieces of chamber music. One of them, an oboe quintet, was performed in the summer of 1953 at the Music Mountain Music Festival in Falls Village, Conn.

Albert Sprague Coolidge played the oboe solo. Although a chemist by profession and a Professor of Chemistry at Harvard, he proved his versatility as a musician by returning later in the program to play the second viola in a Mozart Quintet.

Mrs. Coolidge helped treat the people of New York to an evening of chamber music the same summer, when she gave $1,000 toward the outdoor concert that Alexander Schneider conducted in Washington Square Park in cooperation with Local 802 of the American Federation of Musicians.

She was a member of the Legion of Honor of France, the Order of Leopold and the Order of the Crown of Belgium, and recipient of the Cobbett Medal of London. Mrs. Coolidge received honorary degrees from Mount Holyoke, Smith, Yale, Mills and the University of California.

MRS. E. S. COOLIDGE, MUSIC PATRON, DIES

Pittsfield Festival Founder Aided Thousands of Artists by Library of Congress Gift

Special to The New York Times.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Nov. 4—Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, one of the nation's wealthiest women and an internationally known patron of chamber music, died today at Wyman House, Mount Auburn Hospital. She was 89 years old last Friday.

She was the widow of Dr. Frederic Shurtleff Coolidge, a Chicago and Pittsfield orthopedic surgeon who died in 1915.

Mrs. Elizabeth S. Coolidge

Leading Patron of Music

Through the establishment of the South Mountain Temple of Chamber Music at Pittsfield, Mass., and the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation at Washington, Mrs. Coolidge became America's outstanding music patron. For many years she devoted her time and her fortune to varied musical projects, and her gift to the Library of Congress brought about legislation making private gifts to the famous library possible.

The music festivals, held each summer at the temple in Pittsfield, attracted wide attention. Mrs. Coolidge, however, shunned personal publicity, with the result that the extent of her philanthropies was not exactly known. She gave thousands of dollars for the establishment of scholarships, pension funds and the erection of buildings in Washington, at Yale and elsewhere. In return, she received honorary degrees from many universities and decorations from foreign governments.

Perhaps her outstanding benefaction was the gift she made to the Library of Congress. Although not the largest gift ever received by that institution, its historic importance transcended its size. In 1925 Mrs. Coolidge offered to the library an endowment for the extension of its work as well as for an auditorium for the playing of chamber music.

Since the Library of Congress is not a corporation with trustees, and so without the necessary facilities for the care and management of an endowment fund, Dr. Herbert Putnam, the librarian, with the aid of Senator George Wharton Pepper of Pennsylvania drafted an act that made possible acceptance of Mrs. Coolidge's $600,000 gift. The act, which was passed by Congress in 1925, created a Trust Fund Board to hold and administer all endowments and funds offered to the library.

Under Mrs. Coolidge's endowment, the director of the music division—admittedly one of the country's finest collections—is the holder of a Chair of Music as well as administrator of the department.

Donated Sprague Hall to Yale

Mrs. Coolidge also donated Sprague Hall to Yale and through a generous gift of several thousand dollars established the pension fund for the musicians of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra.

Mrs. Coolidge was born in Chicago, the daughter of Albert Arnold Sprague and Nancy Ann Atwood Sprague. In 1891 she was married to Dr. Frederic Shurtleff Coolidge of Boston, a member of an old New England family—not the one of which Calvin Coolidge was a member. Dr. Coolidge died many years ago. Their one child is Albert Sprague Coolidge.

Mrs. Coolidge, who was widely traveled, divided her time among Boston, Washington and Lenox, Mass. In 1918 she transformed a side of South Mountain, in the Berkshires, into a setting for chamber-music presentation. Each year thereafter she assembled what one critic called "an international congress of music lovers and musicians" to play and listen to chamber music in the late summer and early fall setting for which the Berkshire Hills are famous.

Mostly the concerts were under the direction of Willem Willeke. South Mountain became a shrine for devotees of chamber music. Sir Henry Kitson executed a marble likeness of Mrs. Coolidge for the outdoor auditorium.

More than 100 premières of chamber music works were given at South Mountain. Mrs. Coolidge had commissioned many of these compositions, most of which were dedicated to her.

Honored by President

In 1944, at the closing session of a three-day festival of chamber music at the Library of Congress in celebration of her eightieth birthday, Mrs. Coolidge received a "declaration of gratitude" signed by President Franklin D. Roosevelt and other high public officials in appreciation for her gifts to the library.

Cir. (D 149,902) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE

NOV 6 - 1953

TREASURE TROVE

It had been a barn in Lanesboro before it became a Temple of Music. The timbers were moved to South Mountain near Pittsfield and re-erected; audiences sat in old pews from a New England meeting-house; for the spirit of worship reincarnates in divers forms.

That was in September 1918, it was called the Berkshire Music Festival, the foundress was Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, her Temple seated five hundred persons, the works performed were chamber music, and the artists were distinguished, including Mrs. Coolidge herself, who was an accomplished pianist.

This was the modest beginning thirty-five years ago which

"In spiral routes by long detours,
As a much-tacking ship upon the sea,"

has become the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, with Mrs. Coolidge still providing many of its finest concerts of chamber music, and her audience of five hundred expanding season after season until those who know Tanglewood are numbered by hundreds of thousands and its repute is international.

From Hawthorne, Longfellow, Holmes, and Melville in the mid-19th century when our dominant art was literature, to South Mountain and Tanglewood in the 20th, when music is the dominant art (for the American people now spend more money each year on serious music than on baseball), Berkshire County continues to be a cultural capital.

On our soil chamber music had long been a tender plant. Big orchestras and resounding symphonic and choral works, yes, they were well on their way to domestication a century ago; but chamber music, that is, string quartets, sonatas for one or more instruments, pianoforte trios, quartets, and quintets,—the literature of these, though fabulously rich, was little known save to tiny groups of professionals and amateurs. It is music more rarefied, more austere, yet often far superior to works more grandiose. The Kneisel Quartet had disbanded, the Flonzaley, which had had to be in part subsidized, was nearing the end of its career; chamber music had arisen in Europe first among village musicians, then in Courts fostered by beneficent Princelings. How was this immense treasure to be transferred to the American continent, and does an art so refined fit into our society?

It fits. No sooner has one said that the age of patronage in the arts is gone than along comes a patron. This cultivated and public-spirited woman, herself a performing musician, widowed of her surgeon husband, and bereft of both her parents in one year, found solace in music and shared that solace, as the event has proved, with multitudes.

From South Mountain her festival moved to the Library of Congress in Washington to which she gave a choice chamber concert hall, for which she provided concerts, and for which concerts she provided notable works by contemporary composers commissioned and paid for by herself, works many of which but for her would never have been composed.

Far and wide went her musical, as well as other, ministrations. The concerts made possible by her munificence ranged from European capitals to obscure towns in the United States many of whose people had never before heard chamber music in living performance.

Her career is not bounded by her own land, nor by her own time, nor by the art of music alone. Her mortal life ended three days ago after she had just passed her 89th birthday; her immortal life goes on, not alone in the music she shed abroad with lavish generosity, but in the way she has art with a does a

a

Cir. (D 142,658)

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I. BULLETIN

NOV 6 - 1953

Mrs. Coolidge Will Benefits Library of Congress, Yale

Cambridge, Mass.—(UP)—The Library of Congress and Yale University are among beneficiaries named in the will of the late Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, nationally known music patron.

Her will was filed in Middlesex County Probate Court yesterday but valuation of her estate was not disclosed.

Mrs. Coolidge left to the Library of Congress Trust Fund Board that portion of a trust fund established by her father of which she had control. The residue of her estate goes to her son, Albert, who was named executor.

Yale will be allowed to keep the portraits of her grandparents now displayed in the Albert Arnold Sprague Memorial Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra offered a musical tribute to Mrs. Coolidge's memory today. The afternoon concert audience stood while the orchestra played a Bach chorale.

Mrs. Coolidge was known by many as the fairy godmother of chamber music.

The roll call of those commissioned under the Coolidge Foundation include such names as Paul Hindemith, Igor Stravinsky, Bela Bartok, Arnold Schoenberg and Aaron Copland. More than 20 American composers have dedicated works to their benefactor.

Mrs. Coolidge was born in Chicago on Oct. 30, 1864, the daughter of Albert Arnold and Nancy Ann Atwood Sprague. She married Dr. Frederick Shurtleff Coolidge in 1891. Her son, Albert Sprague Coolidge, became famous in his own right as a noted chemist and research worker and lecturer at Harvard University.

It was at the Coolidges' big estate near Pittsfield, Mass., that the Berkshire symphonic festivals got started and Mrs. Coolidge first became known as a tireless worker to further musical appreciation.

She installed pews from an old church in a barn on the estate in 1918 and began to sponsor concerts of chamber music. They were so successful that later Henry Hadley established the Berkshire Symphonic Festivals which were taken over later by the Boston Symphony and Serge Koussevitsky and now draw thousands every summer.

In 1925 Mrs. Coolidge set up her foundation and endowed an auditorium in the Library of Congress. She wrote the librarian:

"I have a wish to make possible the composition and performance of music in ways which might otherwise be considered too unique and expensive—giving precedence to quality over quantity and opportunity over expediency."

Mrs. Coolidge grew deaf in later years and her jeweled earhorn became part of her attire. Later she replaced it with a hearing aid which she turned off when she didn't like the music.

Cir. (D 124,110) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS. MORNING GLOBE

NOV 8 - 1953

Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, One of Music's Great Ladies

By CYRUS DURGIN

Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge was one of music's great ladies, and her death last Wednesday was a palpable loss to everyone who has an interest in chamber music. I do not think it an exaggeration to say that no other person in her lifetime, except the late Walter Wilson Cobbett of England, did so much for chamber music. In the United States no other person ever gave so much in money, time, interest and genuine affection to this branch of musical art as did Mrs. Coolidge.

She was a remarkable woman in many ways, a person of wealth and exceptional character. Her interest in music was profound and genuine; it extended to personal participation, and she wrote at least one chamber composition, a String Quartet in E minor. The most remarkable quality of Mrs. Coolidge, in relation to the whole world of music, was her generosity. There have been many wealthy dilettantes in music, but she was not one of them. She enjoyed music herself, but, vastly more important, she wished to share music with others. That is a quality of heart for which we can never be grateful enough.

Moreover, Mrs. Coolidge was practical. She established the Berkshire Festivals given atop South Mountain in Pittsfield. She commissioned the writing of many pieces which might not otherwise have come to being, for chamber music has been one of the least remunerative branches in the commerce of music. Having vision as well as plain sense, Mrs. Coolidge realized that commissioning of music, though a great boon to composers, was not enough to further her aims.

So she provided funds for what must have been hundreds of free chamber music concerts in many places. The instrument for the execution of her plan was the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress, which she established in 1924. She endowed the Foundation with $600,000. Thus she ensured the continuance of her work. The Foundation is administered by the head of the music division of the Library of Congress on the annual $24,000 income from her endowment.

Mrs. Coolidge fortunately was greatly honored during her lifetime, for her work was recognized throughout the civilized world. That must have been a source of satisfaction to her. Yet, though I never had the pleasure of knowing Mrs. Coolidge, I judge from a remark she made at a concert in Boston University's Recital Hall last Spring, that these honors she regarded more as directed toward fine endeavor than as personal accolades.

On that occasion she was presented a citation by university president Harold C. Case. Mrs. Coolidge spoke her thanks modestly, and with a smile observed that, in view, of the pleasure she had experienced over the years from music, "I think the debt is on the other side of the ledger." She was truly one of the greatest souls in the history of music.

Cir. (D 52,373)

29

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N. Y. KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

NOV 6 - 1953

Elizabeth S. Coolidge

Within the last several months some of the most outstanding figures in the arts—creators, performers and patrons—have left the American scene through death. One of the most beloved of these was the "fairy godmother of music," Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, who died Wednesday in Cambridge, Mass., at the age of 89.

Mrs. Coolidge's benefactions to music were prodigious over a period of more than 40 years, when her life and fortune were dedicated to it. She founded the Berkshire Festivals of Chamber Music and built an auditorium on her South Mountain estate near Pittsfield, within reach of Albany music lovers. She founded the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation of the Library of Congress in Washington and endowed its $600,000 chamber music hall. She gave Yale University its Sprague Hall, established the $100,000 Chicago Symphony pension fund, supported countless chamber music groups and many of her proteges are today among the most famous composers and musicians.

There was a complete unselfishness about Mrs. Coolidge but she could not escape the honors that have come to her from all over the world, for while her impact upon music in America has been profound, the echoes returned from overseas with some of the most coveted decorations of foreign governments.

Because of her activities, many regarded her fortune as boundless as her heart, which was not true. She tried to meet every demand that gave quality precedence over quantity, opportunity over expediency, but there were times, as her close friends knew, when her generous gifts far exceeded what could reasonably be expected even from a "fairy godmother." Because of the nearness of one of her chief fields of endeavor, Albany music circles long have known, even if indirectly, the influence of her devotion to music.

In her death, music everywhere has lost one of the finest, most gracious and generous friends that anyone in this world could have.

Deaths and Funerals

Mrs. Coolidge, Music Patron, Succumbs at 89

Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, internationally known benefactor of musicians and musical enterprises, died yesterday at Mt. Auburn Hospital, Cambridge. She had celebrated her 89th birthday last Friday.

Mrs. Coolidge is credited with contributing more to the advancement of chamber music and its performance in this country than any other individual.

Her interest in it and her financial support of it were prodigious. Many a composition by American and foreign composers probably not have been written had it not been for her vigorous encouragement and for the stimulus of the Coolidge prizes in a field of art which brings little financial return.

She undoubtedly will be remembered most for the great amount of work done in the cause of chamber music by the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation, which she established at the Library of Congress in 1924. Yet several years before, she made her first contributions to musical activity by means of the Berkshire Festivals in Pittsfield.

Honored at Pittsfield

This past Summer, she was guest of honor at the 35th anniversary of the Berkshire Festivals of Chamber Music, which she founded at South Mountain, Pittsfield, in 1918. They later gave impetus to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

On her 80th birthday in 1944, she was similarly honored when the Foundation which bears her name held its 10th festival in the nation's capital and distinguished guests from far and near paid tribute to the single-minded purpose, generosity and idealism which made the foundation possible.

Since its establishment, the Coolidge Foundation has paid for hundreds of chamber music concerts in many communities, including Boston and Cambridge.

The daughter of Albert Arnold and Nancy Ann (Atwood) Sprague, Mrs. Coolidge was born in Chicago in 1864. Music was an integral part of her extensive education and she became an accomplished pianist.

In 1891 she married Dr. Frederic Shurtleff Coolidge, a distinguished orthopedic surgeon who was forced to retire from active practice in 1904 because of ill health.

With their only child, a son, Albert Sprague Coolidge, who survives, they moved to Pittsfield and established permanent residence.

Lost Husband, Father, Mother

Following the loss of her husband, father and mother in the year 1915-16, Mrs. Coolidge immersed herself in plans for her musical philanthropies, the first step being the building of the South Mountain Temple of Chamber Music at Pittsfield in 1918, where the famous Berkshire Festivals were inaugurated.

It was her idea that these festivals were not to be identified with any school or fashion of music, but were to be international, inclusive of all periods and styles, impartial between the old and the new. They were designed to emphasize that music is a living

ELIZABETH SPRAGUE COOLIDGE

art reflecting the spirit of the time in which it is created. Classical and romantic music were to stand on equal footing with new and contemporary works. Guests invited to the festivals were selected from musicians and music lovers of this country and abroad in such a way as to make the audiences as representative as possible.

Rewarded New Composers

To insure the participation of living composers, prizes were offered for unperformed works. Among those who received early recognition were Ernest Bloch, who was awarded the Berkshire Chamber Music Prize in September, 1919, for his Suite for Viola and Piano, and Roy Ellsworth Harris, well known for his later Folk Song Symphony, who composed the prize-winning Trio for the Ninth Berkshire Festival of Chamber Music in 1934.

It was to assure the continuance of chamber music activities under the aegis of the Federal Government that Mrs. Coolidge offered in 1924 to provide funds for the building of an auditorium in the Library of Congress and to establish an endowment for its maintenance and for concerts. The munificent gift was accepted and the Coolidge Auditorium, where many concerts have been given since, was constructed.

In addition to concerts given there, the Foundation has presented concerts in many parts of this country and abroad. Mrs. Coolidge often personally took American artists abroad and enlisted the services of resident organizations in London, Paris, Brussels, Rome, Venice, Milan and Budapest.

In addition to her son, Dr. Albert Sprague Coolidge of Harvard University, who makes his home in Cambridge, Mrs. Coolidge leaves four grandchildren, Frederic S. Coolidge of Sausalito, Calif., an architect; Dr. John Coolidge of Belmont, Mrs. Thomas Winship of Washington, D. C., and Mrs. Sullivan Marsden of State College, Pennsylvania. She also leaves 11 great-grandchildren.

Cir. (D 98,282)

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS. GAZETTE

NOV 6 - 1953

Library of Congress, Yale Are Beneficiaries

CAMBRIDGE, Nov. 6 (UP)—The Library of Congress and Yale University are among beneficiaries named in the will of the late Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, nationally-known music patron.

Her will was filed in Middlesex County Probate Court yesterday but the valuation of her estate was not disclosed.

Mrs. Coolidge left to the Library of Congress Trust Fund Board that portion of a trust fund established by her father of which she had control. The residue of her estate goes to her her son, Albert, who was named executor.

Yale will be allowed to keep the portraits of her grandparents which now are displayed in the Albert Arnold Sprague Memorial Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra offered a musical tribute to Mrs. Coolidge's memory today. The afternoon concert audience stood while the orchestra played a Bach chorale.

30

Cir. (D 345,423) (S 633,364)

This Clipping From

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

NOV 5 - 1953

Mrs. E. S. Coolidge Dies; Patron of Music Was 89

Herald Tribune—United Press

Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Nov. 4 (AP).—Mrs. Frederic Shurtleff Coolidge, eighty-nine, internationally honored patron of music, died today in a hospital.

Mrs. Coolidge was taken to the hospital two weeks ago and was in a coma up to the time of her death.

Founded Berkshire Festivals

Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge established the Berkshire Festivals of Chamber Music in 1918, and the Elizabeth Sprague Foundation at the Library of Congress, Washington, in 1924. Throughout the years she stimulated compositions and musical performances that made possible the careers of many young musicians, since become world famous, and did much to enrich the musical life of the nation.

In 1928, to mark the tenth anniversary of the founding of the Berkshire Festivals, her friends installed a bas-relief in the auditorium on her South Mountain estate, near Pittsfield, Mass., where the festivals originated. It said: "To Mrs. Frederick S. Coolidge, the Fairy Godmother of Music." Last Sept. 13, shortly before her eighty-ninth birthday, Mrs. Coolidge received a standing ovation from the audience as she arrived to attend the thirty-fifth anniversary of the festivals.

Mrs. Coolidge had been interested in music all her life and had received musical training in her youth which enabled her to perform on the piano frequently with her quartets and to compose occasional numbers of her own.

Set Up Orchestra Fund

She was born in Chicago in 1864, daughter of Albert Arnold Sprague, president of Sprague, Warner & Co., wholesale grocers. In 1891 she was married to Dr. Frederick Shurtleff Coolidge, of Boston. Her son, Albert Sprague Coolidge, is a chemical engineer and an accomplished oboeist who frequently plays with the Coolidge ensemble groups.

Mrs. Coolidge established in 1915 a $100,000 pension fund for the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, and made a contribution to construct the Sprague music building at Yale University. Her major benefaction began in 1918, when, after the death of her father, mother and husband, she engaged a house quartet to comfort her in her loneliness. That developed into the organization which she perpetuated as the Berkshire Festivals.

The festivals became a project of the Federal government in 1924 when Mrs. Coolidge established the foundation bearing her name, endowed it with $600,000, built a chamber music hall adjoining the Library of Congress, and gave over its administration to the music division of the Library. The capital provides $24,000 a year for musical expenditures.

Aided Young Composers

"I have wished," she said at the time "to make possible through the Library of Congress, the composition and performance of music in ways which might otherwise have been considered too unique or too expensive to be ordinarily undertaken . . . as an occasional possibility of giving precedence to consideration of quality over those of quantity . . . to opportunity rather than expediency."

By-products of the foundation have been the commissioning of new works by young artists, the awarding of prizes, and the acquisition of new manuscripts by the Library of Congress.

For the twenty-fifth anniversary festival of the Coolidge Foundation, new works were commissioned from William Schuman, Robert Palmer, Aaron Copland and Malipiero. Also on the program were works commissioned in previous years from such artists as Stravinsky, Ravel and Ernest Bloch.

For her services to music Mrs. Coolidge had been decorated by France with the Legion of Honor; by Belgium with the Order of Leopold and the Order of the Crown; by Frankfurt with honorary citizenship, and by the Worshipful Company of Musicians of London with the Cobbett Medal.

Sponsored Square Concert

In 1948 Mrs. Coolidge sponsored a season by a second "Berkshire Quartet," named to honor the first quartet she had endowed. This new quartet was in Falls Village, Conn.

Last Sept. 15, Mrs. Coolidge and Local 802 of the American Federation of Musicians sponsored a free open air concert in Washington Square, New York. She maintained a home at 2400 16th St., Washington, and her summer home at South Mountain, Mass.

Surviving in addition to her son, a professor at Harvard University, are four grandchildren, Frederic S. Coolidge, of Sausalito, Calif.; Dr. John Coolidge, of Belmont, Mass.; Mrs. Thomas Winship, of Washington, D. C., and Mrs. Samuel S. Marsden, of Philadelphia, and eleven great-grandchildren.

Cir. (D 322,441) (S 255,656)

This Clipping From

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

NOV 7 - 1953

Music in Review

By TUCKER KEISER

Symphony Concert

Charles Munch walked briskly to the podium yesterday in Symphony Hall, turned to the audience and said, "We are saddened this week by the loss of a great friend of music and musicians, Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge. What she has done for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tanglewood, for chamber music, for composers, was absolutely unique. I ask you to rise and stand with us while we play a chorale by Johann Sebastian Bach in memory of Mrs. Coolidge."

The audience stood and the conductor led the orchestra in the "Passion" chorale. Their beautiful reading of this simple piece was a warm tribute to a great lady who has done much for music in America.

The program yesterday accented the unusual. Mr. Munch shared conducting honors with Martti Turunen, the Finnish conductor whose Helsinki University Chorus sang three works in the second part of the concert. The Scandanavian composers, Carl Nielsen and Jean Sibelius, were featured.

Charles Munch can take great credit for introducing to us a work by Nielsen, belatedly emerging as one of the most significant composers of the 20th century. His 5th Symphony given its Boston premiere yesterday, is a profound composition. Its complexities require that one hear it a number of times, or that one follow the developments, as I did, in the bar-by-bar analysis provided by Robert Simpson in his definite study of Nielsen, published last year.

Sibelius, the Finn, enjoyed a world reputation much earlier than his contemporary Nielsen, the Dane, largely because he expressed the moods of his age in the musical language of his age while Nielsen was prophetic of the future, both in ideas and expression.

Symphony No. 5 is, in many ways, paradoxical. It is a kind of abstract tone poem the meaning of which the composer did not explicitly state, so that it is at the same time programmatic and lacks a program. It has only two movements and yet it takes 40 minutes to play, so that it is at once unusually simple and exceptionably elaborate. It requires a very large orchestra in fortissimo passages and yet the major part of the work has a Mozartian transparency. It uses a contemporary linear idiom yet achieves its inner tension through a struggle between key relationships.

Improvised Drum Solo

An improvised drum solo which changes with each performance, is introduced as a cadenza ad lib. Nielsen directed the tympanist to "beat his own rhythm as if he wanted to disturb the music at any price." Like Lucifer, the independent drummer is driven by the desire to declare his freedom from orderliness and decorum and co-operative goodness, and like Lucifer he is defeated by force majeure.

In deference to the Helsinki University Chorus, Mr. Munch performed the "Finlandia" of Sibelius which was not unhackneyed at the time of its composition, but which has become unbearably hackneyed by infinitely numerous performances, and yesterday was not rendered any less hackneyed by the impatient manner in which Mr. Munch dashed through it.

The bleak and foreboding tone which colors Finnish mythology is mirrored in the three selections sung by the Helsinki University Chorus, Martti Turunen conducting. Of the three, Klami's "In the Belly of Vipunen," Madetoja "The Theft of the Sampo," and Sibelius' "The Orifin of Fire," the second was most skillfully adapted to vocal requirements. The text provides opportunities to paint a wide variety of emotions and images, the orchestration does not cover the voices, and the chorus is given an opportunity to sing rather than simply declaim.

The members of the chorus were startlingly mature for a university group, but they produced a very full-bodied and beautiful tone for a rather small organization. The technique was unexceptionable. Mr. Turunen, unaccustomed to the superlative acoustics of Symphony Hall, sometimes drew from the orchestra more volume than was wise. Sulo Saarits, the baritone soloist, sang the lyrical passages scarce as they were, brightly, and declaimed the dramatic passages overabundant as they were, ardently.

Next week Ferenc Fricsay will make his American debut at these concerts; Mr. Fricsay has made an international reputation as conductor of the Radio in the American Sector Orchestra.

This Clipping From

NEW YORK TIMES

NOV 7 - 1953

MRS. WILLIAM H. BRENNAN

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

IPSWICH, Mass., Nov. 6—Mrs. Christine Brennan, widow of William H. Brennan, for many years manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died today at the age of 69. Surviving are a son William H. Jr. of Beverly Hills, Calif., and two daughters, Miss Martha Brennan of Ipswich and Miss Jean A. Brennan of Rome.

Cir. (D 322,441) (S 255,656)

This Clipping From

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

NOV 7 - 1953

Mrs. Brennan Dies

IPSWICH, Nov. 6—Mrs. Christine Brennan, 69, wife of the late William H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for many years, died today at her home on East st. She leaves a son, William H., of Beverly Hills, Calif.; two daughters, Martha of Ipswich and Jean A. of Rome, Italy, and two grandchildren.

Funeral arrangements were incomplete tonight.

HURSDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1953

Noted Patron Of Music Dies

Mrs. E. S. Coolidge Of Cambridge, 89

Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, 89, world-famed music patron who commissioned many modern works and whose summer concerts in a barn led to the Berkshire Music Festival, died yesterday in Mt. Auburn Hospital, Cambridge.

The tall, distinguished woman — herself a composer and pianist — was held to be the foremost friend of chamber music in the nation and her benefactions began formally in 1925 when she established the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation at the Library of Congress in Washington, D. C.

SERVICES PRIVATE

That foundation built a $94,000 concert hall in the Library of Congress and endowed it with $25,000 a year.

Her foundation commissioned works by such noted moderns as Paul Hindemith, Igor Stravinsky, Bela Bartok, Arnold Schoenberg and Aaron Copland and countless compositions were dedicated to her.

MRS. E. S. COOLIDGE

Services will be private at an unannounced date and the family announcement said that "a memorial concert to be announced later will take the place of a funeral service."

She leaves her son, Dr. Albert Sprague Coolidge, Harvard University lecturer on chemistry and widely-known chemist and research scientist.

She leaves also four grandchildren, Frederic S. Coolidge of Sausalito, Calif., an architect; Dr. John Coolidge of Belmont; Mrs. Thomas Winship of Washington, D. C., and Mrs. Sullivan Marsden of State College, Pa., and 11 great-grandchildren.

USED EAR TRUMPET

Mrs. Coolidge, a lifetime concert-goer—she used a jewelled ear-trumpet when her hearing began to fail—said that her hope was to create American concerts which would give "precedence to quality over quantity and opportunity over expediency."

Her years of work for this aim earned her many decorations from foreign governments, the Cobbett Medal of London, the Legion of Honor of France, the Order of Leopold of Belgium, the Order of the Crown of Belgium, the award of Honorary Citizen (with medal) of Frankfort, Germany.

Mrs. Coolidge was born in Chicago Oct. 30, 1864, daughter of Albert Arnold and Nancy Atwood Sprague. Her father was the wealthy head of a grocery firm which he joined after leaving Vermont for Chicago in 1862.

In 1891 she married Dr. Frederick Shurtleff Coolidge, noted orthopedic surgeon. Her husband and her parents died within 15 months of one another in 1915-1916.

She later maintained homes in Pittsfield and Washington, D. C., and since 1947 had made her home in Cambridge.

To Bostonians and music lovers across the nation a very familiar program note reads: "This concert has been made possible through the generosity of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation of the Library of Congress."

Her portrait by John Singer Sargent hangs in the library concert room and there in 1950 she was honored by a series of five concerts and lauded as one who has "permanently enriched America in culture."

Cir. (D 149,902) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE

NOV 6 - 1953

EPILOGUE TO SIBELIUS STORY OF 1937

How 'Fire' Was Kept Burning

By CYRUS DURGIN

When director Martti Turunen and the Helsinki University Chorus take over the second half of the Boston Symphony concerts this afternoon, some of us in the audience will be recalling the alarums and excursions of their previous visit. That was just after Christmas of 1937, and the trouble was caused by a package of music lost in the mail.

Serge Koussevitsky had invited the Helsinki Chorus to give, with the Boston Symphony, the American premiere of Jean Sibelius' "The Origin of 'Fire," which the Finnish composer had written in 1902 as his Opus 32. Sibelius sent his manuscript to his publishers, Breitkopf and Haertel in Leipzig, Ger., but he was not widely popular then, and the firm published the work only in a piano-choral edition. The original full score remained in the vaults.

On Nov. 18, 1937, Breitkopt and Haertel put in the mail, New York-bound aboard the Europa (now the French liner Liberte), two packages. One, containing choral and some orchestral parts, was received at Symphony Hall. But the other, in which were the remaining parts and the manuscript full score, has never turned up to this day.

* * *

What to do? It was Dec. 27, and the premiere was scheduled for Dec. 31. Someone thought of the new radio-photo process. A frantic cable to Leipzig brought the missing parts through the thousands of miles of air to New York. It was too expensive to transmit the full score, but if the missing parts could be obtained, the performance could be given. The radio-photos were received in New York and rushed to Boston by train.

Now in those days the radio-photo process was crude, and the pages of parts had to be reduced so they could be sent four to one page of radio-photo. Result, some portions were badly blurred. Until 2 Thursday morning, Dec. 30, Symphony librarian Leslie A. Rogers and copyist Joseph R. Mann worked with magnifying glasses, copying off the parts. They were on the musicians' stands for rehearsal at 10 that morning.

* * *

I attended that rehearsal, and I remember how Koussevitzky, who had been able to study the composition only from a choral-piano "reduction," as it is called, was working hard to find out how the orchestral sections went. A lot of orchestral detail inevitably has to be left out of a "reduction."

Three times Koussevitzky played through "The Origin of Fire," which takes only 10 mintues, and then declared he knew it well enough. But those three run-throughs were hard going. I remember that at one point the conductor stopped, pointed with a finger, and said:

"Here I have a F, but personne (French for nobody) plays. Who has dat F?"

As I recall, no one found the missing F, so they went on without it. The erformance next day went off without any further hitch, and was regarded as a complete success.

* * *

The epilogue to this story was told in 1945, the year which saw the end of World War II. The Breitkopf and Haertel plant was very badly damaged during the bombings of Germany, and every shred of "The Origin of Fire" was destroyed. Had it not been for the package lost in transit nearly eight years before, this music might have been lost forever.

In 1945, Oliver Daniel, then producer of the Boston Symphony broadcasts, wanted to give Jean Sibelius a gift on his 80th birthday. How about a reconstructed score of "The Origin of Fire"? So he set about to find what he could. Some of the parts he discovered in possession of an American publisher (how they got there has not been told), and the remainder came from Symphony Hall's copies of 1937. Sibelius got his birthday gift.

By the way, the Helsinki University Chorus are singing "The Origin of Fire" again today and tomorrow.

~~Cir. (D 5,155)~~
~~Cir. (D 15,573)~~
~~Cir. (D 33,690)~~
~~Cir. (D 17,986)~~
Cir. (D 4,456)

This Clipping From
TARRYTOWN, N. Y.
NEWS

NOV 6 - 1953

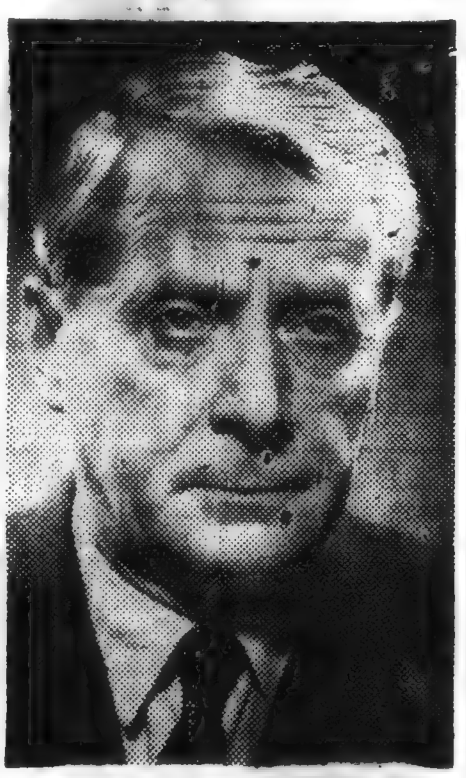
at the
NEW YORK THEATERS

by Charles K. Freeman

MUSIC ON STAGE

The fact that most of the national music events, as well as many such international happenings are funneled into the New York area; that practically no audience is more alert to the wide range of music and musicianship than New York and its environs, has urged this corner to take more than casual note in print. The Summer festivals, chief of which is the Tanglewood Music Festival, are a Summer topic of discussion among the apartment cliff dwellers as well as those of us who make up Westchester's house and garden set. The Sadlers Wells ballets, the opera and symphonic world ensembles are part and parcel of the living world of entertainment. Consequently our spotlight may wander at times from the world of theatre to embrace significant occurrences in the related field of music and its brethren arts.

* * *



BOSTON'S SYMPHONY
CHARLES MUNCH

We hereby pass on the information that the world renowned 104-man aggregation known as the Boston Symphony Orchestra will leave its headquarters in Boston to tour the Eastern seaboard, and again under its master musician Charles Munch. Mr. Munch, now in his fifth year as conductor will baton the 73rd year of the Boston Symphony concerts through a series of five Wednesday evening concerts and five Saturday afternoon concerts. The evening dates are December 2, January 13, February 10, March 10 and April 7. The Saturday concerts will occur on the afternoons of Dec. 5th, January 16, February 13, and April 10.

* * *

There are still available a number of balcony locations for each of the series at $7.50 the five. The popularity of these concerts are such that there are no orchestra seats left. The subscription Department of the organization addressed to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts will attend to your request.

* * *

Add musical annotations: Richard Dyer-Bennet brings his guitar and fine tenor voice onto the stage of Town Hall tomorrow, Saturday, for a group of songs which will include some French and German in their native language. The American section will feature among others "My Good Old Man," "The Lonesome Valley," "Mary Had a Baby" and the Childrens' play-party song "I Went Out One Morning in May." . . . Elaine Malbin, soprano of the New York City Opera Company, flew in from London after guesting on some B.B.C. telecasts of opera . . . before his departure on a round-the-world tour, violinist Isaac Stern was issued a $250,000 insurance policy protecting him against injury to his hands and against concert cancellations. This is the first such contract issued in this country and marks a fine rapport between art and big business.

Cir. (D 131,670) (S 258,529)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

NOV 7 - 1953

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the fourth concert of the 73d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The Helsinki University Choir, Marti Turunen, conductor, with Sulo Saarits, baritone, took part in the second half of the program, which was as follows:

"Finlandia"	Sibelius
Symphony No. 5, Op. 50	Nielsen
Vipusessa Kaynty	Klami
Sammon Ryosto	Madetoja
Tulen Synty	Sibelius

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It was Scandinavian Day at the Symphony yesterday, Scandinavian Day with a vengeance, too, in a program listing four works by Finnish composers and one by a Dane, and I think it proved to be just a little too much for most of us.

Just the same it provided a showcase for the exceptional talents of the Helsinki University Choir, which was all to the good, and for the first Boston performance of a most unusual symphony, which was nearly all to the good as well. There was one non-Finnish work on the program, incidentally, and we all deeply regretted it having to be there. For it was a Bach chorale performed in memory of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, whose life in music was one long great symphony of dedication.

The Helsinki University Choir, composed of about 45 stalwart looking men in slate blue suits, and appearing to be somewhat older than our own university men, is notable for the full-bodied manliness of its tonal production. It is the quality of tone we usually think of as being Russian (though the Finns won't thank us for that). That is to say the voices are heavier, deeper colored and more freely and openly produced than we usually manage, and this gives the ensemble a sense of heartiness and vigor.

The music the chorus elected to sing was perhaps not the wisest possible choice. The idea was to display Finnish music, but the selection of three works all of the same period, the same character, the same literary theme, the same forces and, in fact, the same sound, cannot be said to do justice to Finnish music. It seemed to me that if the group does not wish to do non-Finnish music on occasions such as these it could safely drop one of the numbers (the Klami one, for instance), and give us a little a-cappela selection of folk songs in between.

As it stands, since a great deal of the choral writing is in unison, the choir cannot really convey the extent of its musical capacity, which is obviously of the highest quality. Sulo Saarits, as baritone soloist with the group, sang extremely well and the choir and orchestra were soundly conducted by Martti Turunen. Let us hope it doesn't take another 17 years to be visited by this splendid organization.

The music of Carl Nielsen, as represented by his Fifth Symphony, ranks with the most curious produced during the first half of this century. I'm inclined to think on the basis of only one hearing that this late Danish composer, who died in 1931 at the age of 66, was one of the most truly original composers of his day or any day. It is possible to listen to this extended work from end to end and never once find the slightest trace of derivativeness save, in a sense, in mood, which occasionally suggests Sibelius though never literally.

The very opening of this work achieves this singular mood, which seems to be an evocation of a distant landscape, while rustic and martial and turbulent and even grotesque scenes follow (as in the fugue that presently becomes as fantastic as Berlioz' "Dream of a Witches' Sabbath"), there always returns that sense of concentrated contemplation of a distant view. And all the while it gives the singular impression of not being music at all. This is an absurd observation, of course, but it somehow applies to the sensation of hearing this music unfold.

In any event, it is a work of great creative force and great originality. This is not to say it doesn't have stretches that are tiresome as it does, but it is not because the composer wants for something to say; it is only that you don't quite follow him. Mr Munch conducted the work with great conviction; so much so that at the end he tapped the score as if, to give it a bow, too. And it could well be that living with this music does lead to the conviction that it and its composer have been too long neglected. The Fifth Symphony is a new world in any case, and it was a privilege to be introduced to it in such a brilliant performance.

As for "Finlandia," next week's program introduces the Czech conductor Ferenc Fricsay to Boston for the first time in a program offering Haydn's "Clock" Symphony, Bartok's Dance Suite for Orchestra and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony.

Cir. (D 149,902) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE

31

NOV 7 - 1953

MUSIC

Helsinki Chorus Appears With Boston Symphony

Fourth "regular" program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conductor, at Symphony Hall. Mr. Munch conducted the Bach Chorale, "When Comes My Hour of Parting," from the St. Matthew Passion, in memory of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge; "Finlandia," by Sibelius, and the Fifth Symphony of Carl Nielsen for the first time in Boston. Martti Turumen conducted the second part of the program, in which the Helsinki University Chorus, of which he is director, presented, with the orchestra, Klami's "In the Belly of Vipunen" (first time in Boston); Madetoja's "The Theft of the Sampo" (first performance in Boston), and Sibelius' "The Origin of Fire." The baritone soloist was Sulo Saarits.

By CYRUS DURGIN

When Charles Munch first appeared on the stage at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, he addressed the audience over the public address system.

"Ladies and gentlemen. Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, a great friend of music and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has died. What she has done for Boston, Tanglewood, for chamber music, musicians and composers all over the world is unique. I ask you to stand and listen to a chorale by Johann Sebastian Bach, which we play in her memory."

The audience rose, the orchestra played standing a tribute both solemn and appropriate. Fortunately no one was so thoughtless as to applaud something which has marred other tributes.

Carl Nielsen's Fifth Symphony must have been new to nearly everyone in Symphony Hall. It is "big music," in form and manner. A great deal in orchestral counterpoint goes on, too much to grasp all the work at a single hearing. The style is a mixture of modernity and old-fashioned romanticism, and was such a mixture when the Symphony was written in 1922.

Neilsen, much admired in his native Denmark and virtually unknown across the Atlantic, must have been both an academic musician and an artist with a demonic side, witness the long, loud and ferocious improvisation for a snare drum which cuts across the singing tissue of a striking part of the first movement. (Harold Farberman played this improvisation brilliantly. Indeed, being kept busy much of the afternoon, he was perhaps the most spectacular player involved in this program.)

A man with the technic, the melodic gift, the sense of structure and the passion which Nielsen shows in this work cannot be judged this or that on the basis of brief acquaintance. I found the Fifth Symphony absorbing, indeed fascinating, and I would prefer opportunity to write of it again after much more acquaintance.

The Helsinki University Chorus of 1953 is quite as rugged, well-disciplined and resonant as its predecessor of 1937, when the group's local debut coincided with the famous crisis of the missing portions of "The Origin of Fire." It was a pleasure to hear them again, under the calm but most authoritative directing of Mr. Turunen. There is no musical or vocal deadwood, it seems, in this male singing group of perhaps 60 men. Mr. Saarits sang the incidental solos creditably.

The music of Klami and Madetoja, the former now a man of 53, the latter 60 when he died in 1947, is new over here. These pieces, like "The Origin of Fire" composed on excerpts from the Finnish literary epic, "The Kalevala," are romantic, almost quasi-descriptive, in each case very well written for voices and instruments and broadly melodic. Klami sounds the more modern, quite naturally.

The learning Madetoja absorbed from Vincent D'Indy lent a curiously French quality to Finnish music. "The Origin of Fire" is the most personal of all three and the shortest. Klami and Madetoja show evident talent, but the genius of the trio is Finland's musical patriarch.

65

Cir. (D 149,902) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE

NOV 6 - 1953

EPILOGUE TO SIBELIUS STORY OF 1937

How 'Fire' Was Kept Burning

By CYRUS DURGIN

When director Martti Turunen and the Helsinki University Chorus take over the second half of the Boston Symphony concerts this afternoon, some of us in the audience will be recalling the alarums and excursions of their previous visit. That was just after Christmas of 1937, and the trouble was caused by a package of music lost in the mail.

Serge Koussevitsky had invited the Helsinki Chorus to give, with the Boston Symphony, the American premiere of Jean Sibelius' "The Origin of Fire," which the Finnish composer had written in 1902 as his Opus 32. Sibelius sent his manuscript to his publishers, Breitkopf and Haertel in Leipzig, Ger., but he was not widely popular then, and the firm published the work only in a piano-choral edition. The original full score remained in the vaults.

On Nov. 18, 1937, Breitkopt and Haertel put in the mail, New York-bound aboard the Europa (now the French liner Liberte), two packages. One, containing choral and some orchestral parts, was received at Symphony Hall. But the other, in which were the remaining parts and the manuscript full score, has never turned up to this day.

* * *

What to do? It was Dec. 27, and the premiere was scheduled for Dec. 31. Someone thought of the new radio-photo process. A frantic cable to Leipzig brought the missing parts through the thousands of miles of air, to New York. It was too expensive to transmit the full score, but if the missing parts could be obtained, the performance could be given. The radio-photos were received in New York and rushed to Boston by train.

Now in those days the radio-photo process was crude, and the pages of parts had to be reduced so they could be sent four to one page of radio-photo. Result, some portions were badly blurred. Until 2 Thursday morning, Dec. 30, Symphony librarian Leslie A. Rogers and copyist Joseph R. Mann worked with magnifying glasses, copying off the parts. They were on the musicians' stands for rehearsal at 10 that morning.

* * *

I attended that rehearsal, and I remember how Koussevitzky, who had been able to study the composition only from a choral-piano "reduction," as it is called, was working hard to find out how the orchestral sections went. A lot of orchestral detail inevitably has to be left out of a "reduction."

Three times Koussevitzky played through "The Origin of Fire," which takes only 10 mintues, and then declared he knew it well enough. But those three run-throughs were hard going. I remember that at one point the conductor stopped, pointed with a finger, and said:

"Here I have a F, but personne (French for nobody) plays. Who has dat F?"

As I recall, no one found the missing F, so they went on without it. The performance next day went off without any further hitch, and was regarded as a complete success.

* * *

The epilogue to this story was told in 1945, the year which saw the end of World War II. The Breitkopf and Haertel plant was very badly damaged during the bombings of Germany, and every shred of "The Origin of Fire" was destroyed. Had it not been for the package lost in transit nearly eight years before, this music might have been lost forever.

In 1945, Oliver Daniel, then producer of the Boston Symphony broadcasts, wanted to give Jean Sibelius a gift on his 80th birthday. How about a reconstructed score of "The Origin of Fire"? So he set about to find what he could. Some of the parts he discovered in possession of an American publisher (how they got there has not been told), and the remainder came from Symphony Hall's copies of 1937. Sibelius got his birthday gift.

By the way, the Helsinki University Chorus are singing "The Origin of Fire" again today and tomorrow.

Cir. (D 12,407)

This Clipping From
PORT CHESTER, N. Y.
ITEM

NOV 6 - 1953

THEATERS

Freeman

New York area; that practically no audience is more alert to the wide range of music and musicianship than New York and its environs, has urged this corner to take more than casual note in print. The Summer festivals, chief of which is the Tanglewood Music Festival, are a Summer topic of discussion among the apartment cliff dwellers as well as those of us who make up Westchester's house and garden set. The Sadlers Wells ballets, the opera and symphonic world ensembles are part and parcel of the living world of entertainment. Consequently our spotlight may wander at times from the world of theatre to embrace significant occurrences in the related field of music and its brethren arts.

* * *

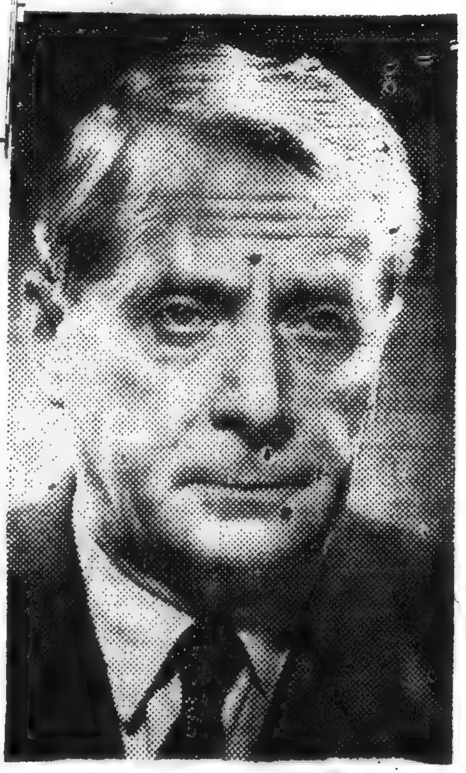
We hereby pass on the information that the world renowned 104-man aggregation known as the Boston Symphony Orchestra will leave its headquarters in Boston to tour the Eastern seaboard, and again under its master musician Charles Munch. Mr. Munch, now in his fifth year as conductor will baton the 73rd year of the Boston Symphony concerts through a series of five Wednesday evening concerts and five Saturday afternoon concerts. The evening dates are December 2, January 13, February 10, March 10 and April 7. The Saturday concerts will occur on the afternoons of Dec. 5th, January 16, February 13, and April 10.

* * *

There are still available a number of balcony locations for each of the series at $7.50 the five. The popularity of these concerts are such that there are no orchestra seats left. The subscription Department of the organization addressed to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts will attend to your request.

* * *

Add musical annotations: Richard Dyer-Bennet brings his guitar and fine tenor voice onto the stage of Town Hall tomorrow, Saturday, for a group of songs which will include some French and German in their native language. The American section will feature among others "My Good Old Man," "The Lonesome Valley," "Mary Had a Baby" and the Childrens' play-party song "I Went Out One Morning in May." . . . Elaine Malbin, soprano of the New York City Opera Company, flew in from London after guesting on some B.B.C. telecasts of opera . . . before his departure on a round-the-world tour, violinist Isaac Stern was issued a $250,000 insurance policy protecting him against injury to his hands and against concert cancellations. This is the first such contract issued in this country and marks a fine rapport between art and big business.



BOSTON'S SYMPHONY
CHARLES MUNCH

Cir. (D 131,670) (S 258,529)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

NOV 7 - 1953

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the fourth concert of the 73d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The Helsinki University Choir, Marti Turunen, conductor, with Sulo Saarits, baritone, took part in the second half of the program, which was as follows:

"Finlandia"	Sibelius
Symphony No. 5, Op. 50	Nielsen
Vipusessa Kaynty	Klami
Sammon Ryosto	Madetoja
Tulen Synty	Sibelius

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It was Scandinavian Day at the Symphony yesterday, Scandinavian Day with a vengeance, too, in a program listing four works by Finnish composers and one by a Dane, and I think it proved to be just a little too much for most of us.

Just the same it provided a showcase for the exceptional talents of the Helsinki University Choir, which was all to the good, and for the first Boston performance of a most unusual symphony, which was nearly all to the good as well. There was one non-Finnish work on the program, incidentally, and we all deeply regretted it having to be there. For it was a Bach chorale performed in memory of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, whose life in music was one long great symphony of dedication.

The Helsinki University Choir, composed of about 45 stalwart looking men in slate blue suits, and appearing to be somewhat older than our own university men, is notable for the full-bodied manliness of its tonal production. It is the quality of tone we usually think of as being Russian (though the Finns won't thank us for that). That is to say the voices are heavier, deeper colored and more freely and openly produced than we usually manage, and this gives the ensemble a sense of heartiness and vigor.

The music the chorus elected to sing was perhaps not the wisest possible choice. The idea was to display Finnish music, but the selection of three works all of the same period, the same character, the same literary theme, the same forces and, in fact, the same sound, cannot be said to do justice to Finnish music. It seemed to me that if the group does not wish to do non-Finnish music on occasions such as these it could safely drop one of the numbers (the Klami one, for instance), and give us a little a-cappela selection of folk songs in between.

As it stands, since a great deal of the choral writing is in unison, the choir cannot really convey the extent of its musical capacity, which is obviously of the highest quality. Sulo Saarits, as baritone soloist with the group, sang extremely well and the choir and orchestra were soundly conducted by Martti Turunen. Let us hope it doesn't take another 17 years to be visited by this splendid organization.

The music of Carl Nielsen, as represented by his Fifth Symphony, ranks with the most curious produced during the first half of this century. I'm inclined to think on the basis of only one hearing that this late Danish composer, who died in 1931 at the age of 66, was one of the most truly original composers of his day or any day. It is possible to listen to this extended work from end to end and never once find the slightest trace of derivativeness save, in a sense, in mood, which occasionally suggests Sibelius though never literally.

The very opening of this work achieves this singular mood, which seems to be an evocation of a distant landscape, while rustic and martial and turbulent and even grotesque scenes follow (as in the fugue that presently becomes as fantastic as Berlioz' "Dream of a Witches' Sabbath"), there always returns that sense of concentrated contemplation of a distant view. And all the while it gives the singular impression of not being music at all. This is an absurd observation, of course, but it somehow applies to the sensation of hearing this music unfold.

In any event, it is a work of great creative force and great originality. This is not to say it doesn't have stretches that are tiresome as it does, but it is not because the composer wants for something to say; it is only that you don't quite follow him. Mr. Munch conducted the work with great conviction; so much so that at the end he tapped the score as if to give it a bow, too. And it could well be that living with this music does lead to the conviction that it and its composer have been too long neglected. The Fifth Symphony is a new world in any case, and it was a privilege to be introduced to it in such a brilliant performance.

As for "Finlandia," next week's program introduces the Czech conductor Ferenc Fricsay to Boston for the first time in a program offering Haydn's "Clock" Symphony, Bartok's Dance Suite for Orchestra and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony.

Cir. (D 149,902) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE

31

NOV 7 - 1953

MUSIC

Helsinki Chorus Appears With Boston Symphony

Fourth "regular" program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conductor, at Symphony Hall. Mr. Munch conducted the Bach Chorale, "When Comes My Hour of Parting," from the St. Matthew Passion, in memory of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge; "Finlandia," by Sibelius, and the Fifth Symphony of Carl Nielsen for the first time in Boston. Martti Turumen conducted the second part of the program, in which the Helsinki University Chorus, of which he is director, presented, with the orchestra, Klami's "In the Belly of Vipunen" (first time in Boston); Madetoja's "The Theft of the Sampo" (first performance in Boston), and Sibelius' "The Origin of Fire." The baritone soloist was Sulo Saarits.

By CYRUS DURGIN

When Charles Munch first appeared on the stage at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, he addressed the audience over the public address system.

"Ladies and gentlemen. Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, a great friend of music and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has died. What she has done for Boston, Tanglewood, for chamber music, musicians and composers all over the world is unique. I ask you to stand and listen to a chorale by Johann Sebastian Bach, which we play in her memory."

The audience rose, the orchestra played standing a tribute both solemn and appropriate. Fortunately no one was so thoughtless as to applaud something which has marred other tributes.

Carl Nielsen's Fifth Symphony must have been new to nearly everyone in Symphony Hall. It is "big music," in form and manner. A great deal in orchestral counterpoint goes on, too much to grasp all the work at a single hearing. The style is a mixture of modernity and old-fashioned romanticism, and was such a mixture when the Symphony was written in 1922.

Neilsen, much admired in his native Denmark and virtually unknown across the Atlantic, must have been both an academic musician and an artist with a demonic side, witness the long, loud and ferocious improvisation for a snare drum which cuts across the singing tissue of a striking part of the first movement. (Harold Farberman played this improvisation brilliantly. Indeed, being kept busy much of the afternoon, he was perhaps the most spectacular player involved in this program.)

A man with the technic, the melodic gift, the sense of structure and the passion which Nielsen shows in this work cannot be judged this or that on the basis of brief acquaintance. I found the Fifth Symphony absorbing, indeed fascinating, and I would prefer opportunity to write of it again after much more acquaintance.

The Helsinki University Chorus of 1953 is quite as rugged, well-disciplined and resonant as its predecessor of 1937, when the group's local debut coincided with the famous crisis of the missing portions of "The Origin of Fire." It was a pleasure to hear them again, under the calm but most authoritative directing of Mr. Turunen. There is no musical or vocal deadwood, it seems, in this male singing group of perhaps 60 men. Mr. Saarits sang the incidental solos creditably.

The music of Klami and Madetoja, the former now a man of 53, the latter 60 when he died in 1947, is new over here. These pieces, like "The Origin of Fire" composed on excerpts from the Finnish literary epic, "The Kalevala," are romantic, almost quasi-descriptive, in each case very well written for voices and instruments and broadly melodic. Klami sounds the more modern, quite naturally.

The learning Madetoja absorbed from Vincent D'Indy lent a curiously French quality to Finnish music. "The Origin of Fire" is the most personal of all three and the shortest. Klami and Madetoja show evident talent, but the genius of the trio is Finland's musical patriarch.

Cir. (D 149,902) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE

NOV 6 - 1953

EPILOGUE TO SIBELIUS STORY OF 1937

How 'Fire' Was Kept Burning

By CYRUS DURGIN

When director Martti Turunen and the Helsinki University Chorus take over the second half of the Boston Symphony concerts this afternoon, some of us in the audience will be recalling the alarums and excursions of their previous visit. That was just after Christmas of 1937, and the trouble was caused by a package of music lost in the mail.

Serge Koussevitsky had invited the Helsinki Chorus to give, with the Boston Symphony, the American premiere of Jean Sibelius' "The Origin of Fire," which the Finnish composer had written in 1902 as his Opus 32. Sibelius sent his manuscript to his publishers, Breitkopf and Haertel in Leipzig, Ger., but he was not widely popular then, and the firm published the work only in a piano-choral edition. The original full score remained in the vaults.

On Nov. 18, 1937, Breitkopt and Haertel put in the mail, New York-bound aboard the Europa (now the French liner Liberte), two packages. One, containing choral and some orchestral parts, was received at Symphony Hall. But the other, in which were the remaining parts and the manuscript full score, has never turned up to this day.

* * *

What to do? It was Dec. 27, and the premiere was scheduled for Dec. 31. Someone thought of the new radio-photo process. A frantic cable to Leipzig brought the missing parts through the thousands of miles of air, to New York. It was too expensive to transmit the full score, but if the missing parts could be obtained, the performance could be given. The radio-photos were received in New York and rushed to Boston by train.

Now in those days the radio-photo process was crude, and the pages of parts had to be reduced so they could be sent four to one page of radio-photo. Result, some portions were badly blurred. Until 2 Thursday morning, Dec. 30, Symphony librarian Leslie A. Rogers and copyist Joseph R. Mann worked with magnifying glasses, copying off the parts. They were on the musicians' stands for rehearsal at 10 that morning.

* * *

I attended that rehearsal, and I remember how Koussevitzky, who had been able to study the composition only from a choral-piano "reduction," as it is called, was working hard to find out how the orchestral sections went. A lot of orchestral detail inevitably has to be left out of a "reduction."

Three times Koussevitzky played through "The Origin of Fire," which takes only 10 mintues, and then declared he knew it well enough. But those three run-throughs were hard going. I remember that at one point the conductor stopped, pointed with a finger, and said:

"Here I have a F, but personne (French for nobody) plays. Who has dat F?"

As I recall, no one found the missing F, so they went on without it. The performance next day went off without any further hitch, and was regarded as a complete success.

* * *

The epilogue to this story was told in 1945, the year which saw the end of World War II. The Breitkopf and Haertel plant was very badly damaged during the bombings of Germany, and every shred of "The Origin of Fire" was destroyed. Had it not been for the package lost in transit nearly eight years before, this music might have been lost forever.

In 1945, Oliver Daniel, then producer of the Boston Symphony broadcasts, wanted to give Jean Sibelius a gift on his 80th birthday. How about a reconstructed score of "The Origin of Fire"? So he set about to find what he could. Some of the parts he discovered in possession of an American publisher (how they got there has not been told), and the remainder came from Symphony Hall's copies of 1937. Sibelius got his birthday gift.

By the way, the Helsinki University Chorus are singing "The Origin of Fire" again today and tomorrow.

This Clipping From
WHITE PLAINS, N. Y.
REPORTER-DISPATCH

NOV 6 - 1953

THEATERS

Freeman

BOSTON'S SYMPHONY
CHARLES MUNCH

penings are funneled into the New York area; that practically no audience is more alert to the wide range of music and musicianship than New York and its environs, has urged this corner to take more than casual note in print. The Summer festivals, chief of which is the Tanglewood Music Festival, are a Summer topic of discussion among the apartment cliff dwellers as well as those of us who make up Westchester's house and garden set. The Sadlers Wells ballets, the opera and symphonic world ensembles are part and parcel of the living world of entertainment. Consequently our spotlight may wander at times from the world of theatre to embrace significant occurrences in the related field of music and its brethren arts.

* * *

We hereby pass on the information that the world renowned 104-man aggregation known as the Boston Symphony Orchestra will leave its headquarters in Boston to tour the Eastern seaboard, and again under its master musician Charles Munch. Mr. Munch, now in his fifth year as conductor will baton the 73rd year of the Boston Symphony concerts through a series of five Wednesday evening concerts and five Saturday afternoon concerts. The evening dates are December 2, January 13, February 10, March 10 and April 7. The Saturday concerts will occur on the afternoons of Dec. 5th, January 16, February 13, and April 10.

* * *

There are still available a number of balcony locations for each of the series at $7.50 the five. The popularity of these concerts are such that there are no orchestra seats left. The subscription Department of the organization addressed to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts will attend to your request.

* * *

Add musical annotations: Richard Dyer-Bennet brings his guitar and fine tenor voice onto the stage of Town Hall tomorrow, Saturday, for a group of songs which will include some French and German in their native language. The American section will feature among others "My Good Old Man," "The Lonesome Valley," "Mary Had a Baby" and the Childrens' play-party song "I Went Out One Morning in May." . . . Elaine Malbin, soprano of the New York City Opera Company, flew in from London after guesting on some B.B.C. telecasts of opera . . . before his departure on a round-the-world tour, violinist Isaac Stern was issued a $250,000 insurance policy protecting him against injury to his hands and against concert cancellations. This is the first such contract issued in this country and marks a fine rapport between art and big business.

Cir. (D 131,670) (S 258,529)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

NOV 7 - 1953

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the fourth concert of the 73d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The Helsinki University Choir, Marti Turunen, conductor, with Sulo Saarits, baritone, took part in the second half of the program, which was as follows:

"Finlandia"	Sibelius
Symphony No. 5, Op. 50	Nielsen
Vipusessa Kaynty	Klami
Sammon Ryosto	Madetoja
Tulen Synty	Sibelius

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It was Scandinavian Day at the Symphony yesterday, Scandinavian Day with a vengeance, too, in a program listing four works by Finnish composers and one by a Dane, and I think it proved to be just a little too much for most of us.

Just the same it provided a showcase for the exceptional talents of the Helsinki University Choir, which was all to the good, and for the first Boston performance of a most unusual symphony, which was nearly all to the good as well. There was one non-Finnish work on the program, incidentally, and we all deeply regretted it having to be there. For it was a Bach chorale performed in memory of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Goolidge, whose life in music was one long great symphony of dedication.

The Helsinki University Choir, composed of about 45 stalwart looking men in slate blue suits, and appearing to be somewhat older than our own university men, is notable for the full-bodied manliness of its tonal production. It is the quality of tone we usually think of as being Russian (though the Finns won't thank us for that). That is to say the voices are heavier, deeper colored and more freely and openly produced than we usually manage, and this gives the ensemble a sense of heartiness and vigor.

The music the chorus elected to sing was perhaps not the wisest possible choice. The idea was to display Finnish music, but the selection of three works all of the same period, the same character, the same literary theme, the same forces and, in fact, the same sound, cannot be said to do justice to Finnish music. It seemed to me that if the group does not wish to do non-Finnish music on occasions such as these it could safely drop one of the numbers (the Klami one, for instance), and give us a little a-cappela selection of folk songs in between.

As it stands, since a great deal of the choral writing is in unison, the choir cannot really convey the extent of its musical capacity, which is obviously of the highest quality. Sulo Saarits, as baritone soloist with the group, sang extremely well and the choir and orchestra were soundly conducted by Martti Turunen. Let us hope it doesn't take another 17 years to be visited by this splendid organization.

The music of Carl Nielsen, as represented by his Fifth Symphony, ranks with the most curious produced during the first half of this century. I'm inclined to think on the basis of only one hearing that this late Danish composer, who died in 1931 at the age of 66, was one of the most truly original composers of his day or any day. It is possible to listen to this extended work from end to end and never once find the slightest trace of derivativeness save, in a sense, in mood, which occasionally suggests Sibelius though never literally.

The very opening of this work achieves this singular mood, which seems to be an evocation of a distant landscape, while rustic and martial and turbulent and even grotesque scenes follow (as in the fugue that presently becomes as fantastic as Berlioz' "Dream of a Witches' Sabbath"), there always returns that sense of concentrated contemplation of a distant view. And all the while it gives the singular impression of not being music at all. This is an absurd observation, of course, but it somehow applies to the sensation of hearing this music unfold.

In any event, it is a work of great creative force and great originality. This is not to say it doesn't have stretches that are tiresome as it does, but it is not because the composer wants for something to say; it is only that you don't quite follow him. Mr Munch conducted the work with great conviction; so much so that at the end he tapped the score as if to give it a bow, too. And it could well be that living with this music does lead to the conviction that it and its composer have been too long neglected. The Fifth Symphony is a new world in any case, and it was a privilege to be introduced to it in such a brilliant performance.

As for "Finlandia," next week's program introduces the Czech conductor Ferenc Fricsay to Boston for the first time in a program offering Haydn's "Clock" Symphony, Bartok's Dance Suite for Orchestra and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony.

Cir. (D 149,902) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From 31
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE

NOV 7 - 1953

65

MUSIC

Helsinki Chorus Appears With Boston Symphony

Fourth "regular" program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conductor, at Symphony Hall. Mr. Munch conducted the Bach Chorale, "When Comes My Hour of Parting," from the St. Matthew Passion, in memory of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge; "Finlandia," by Sibelius, and the Fifth Symphony of Carl Nielsen for the first time in Boston. Martti Turumen conducted the second part of the program, in which the Helsinki University Chorus, of which he is director, presented, with the orchestra, Klami's "In the Belly of Vipunen" (first time in Boston); Madetoja's "The Theft of the Sampo" (first performance in Boston), and Sibelius' "The Origin of Fire." The baritone soloist was Sulo Saarits.

By CYRUS DURGIN

When Charles Munch first appeared on the stage at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, he addressed the audience over the public address system.

"Ladies and gentlemen. Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, a great friend of music and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has died. What she has done for Boston, Tanglewood, for chamber music, musicians and composers all over the world is unique. I ask you to stand and listen to a chorale by Johann Sebastian Bach, which we play in her memory."

The audience rose, the orchestra played standing a tribute both solemn and appropriate. Fortunately no one was so thoughtless as to applaud something which has marred other tributes.

Carl Nielsen's Fifth Symphony must have been new to nearly everyone in Symphony Hall. It is "big music," in form and manner. A great deal in orchestral counterpoint goes on, too much to grasp all the work at a single hearing. The style is a mixture of modernity and old-fashioned romanticism, and was such a mixture when the Symphony was written in 1922.

Neilsen, much admired in his native Denmark and virtually unknown across the Atlantic, must have been both an academic musician and an artist with a demonic side, witness the long, loud and ferocious improvisation for a snare drum which cuts across the singing tissue of a striking part of the first movement. (Harold Farberman played this improvisation brilliantly. Indeed, being kept busy much of the afternoon, he was perhaps the most spectacular player involved in this program.)

A man with the technic, the melodic gift, the sense of structure and the passion which Nielsen shows in this work cannot be judged this or that on the basis of brief acquaintance. I found the Fifth Symphony absorbing, indeed fascinating, and I would prefer opportunity to write of it again after much more acquaintance.

The Helsinki University Chorus of 1953 is quite as rugged, well-disciplined and resonant as its predecessor of 1937, when the group's local debut coincided with the famous crisis of the missing portions of "The Origin of Fire." It was a pleasure to hear them again, under the calm but most authoritative directing of Mr. Turunen. There is no musical or vocal deadwood, it seems, in this male singing group of perhaps 60 men. Mr. Saarits sang the incidental solos creditably.

The music of Klami and Madetoja, the former now a man of 53, the latter 60 when he died in 1947, is new over here. These pieces, like "The Origin of Fire" composed on excerpts from the Finnish literary epic, "The Kalevala," are romantic, almost quasi-descriptive, in each case very well written for voices and instruments and broadly melodic. Klami sounds the more modern, quite naturally.

The learning Madetoja absorbed from Vincent D'Indy lent a curiously French quality to Finnish music. "The Origin of Fire" is the most personal of all three and the shortest. Klami and Madetoja show evident talent, but the genius of the trio is Finland's musical patriarch.

Cir. (D 149,902) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
NOV 6 - 1953

EPILOGUE TO SIBELIUS STORY OF 1937

How 'Fire' Was Kept Burning

By CYRUS DURGIN

When director Martti Turunen and the Helsinki University Chorus take over the second half of the Boston Symphony concerts this afternoon, some of us in the audience will be recalling the alarums and excursions of their previous visit. That was just after Christmas of 1937, and the trouble was caused by a package of music lost in the mail.

Serge Koussevitsky had invited the Helsinki Chorus to give, with the Boston Symphony, the American premiere of Jean Sibelius' "The Origin of Fire," which the Finnish composer had written in 1902 as his Opus 32. Sibelius sent his manuscript to his publishers, Breitkopf and Haertel in Leipzig, Ger., but he was not widely popular then, and the firm published the work only in a piano-choral edition. The original full score remained in the vaults.

On Nov. 18, 1937, Breitkopt and Haertel put in the mail. New York-bound aboard the Europa (now the French liner Liberte), two packages. One, containing choral and some orchestral parts, was received at Symphony Hall. But the other, in which were the remaining parts and the manuscript full score, has never turned up to this day.

* * *

What to do? It was Dec. 27, and the premiere was scheduled for Dec. 31. Someone thought of the new radio-photo process. A frantic cable to Leipzig brought the missing parts through the thousands of miles of air, to New York. It was too expensive to transmit the full score, but if the missing parts could be obtained, the performance could be given. The radio-photos were received in New York and rushed to Boston by train.

Now in those days the radio-photo process was crude, and the pages of parts had to be reduced so they could be sent four to one page of radio-photo. Result, some portions were badly blurred. Until 2 Thursday morning, Dec. 30, Symphony librarian Leslie A. Rogers and copyist Joseph R. Mann worked with magnifying glasses, copying off the parts. They were on the musicians' stands for rehearsal at 10 that morning.

* * *

I attended that rehearsal, and I remember how Koussevitzky, who had been able to study the composition only from a choral-piano "reduction," as it is called, was working hard to find out how the orchestral sections went. A lot of orchestral detail inevitably has to be left out of a "reduction."

Three times Koussevitzky played through "The Origin of Fire," which takes only 10 mintues, and then declared he knew it well enough. But those three run-throughs were hard going. I remember that at one point the conductor stopped, pointed with a finger, and said:

"Here I have a F, but personne (French for nobody) plays. Who has dat F?"

As I recall, no one found the missing F, so they went on without it. The performance next day went off without any further hitch, and was regarded as a complete success.

* * *

The epilogue to this story was told in 1945, the year which saw the end of World War II. The Breitkopf and Haertel plant was very badly damaged during the bombings of Germany, and every shred of "The Origin of Fire" was destroyed. Had it not been for the package lost in transit nearly eight years before, this music might have been lost forever.

In 1945, Oliver Daniel, then producer of the Boston Symphony broadcasts, wanted to give Jean Sibelius a gift on his 80th birthday. How about a reconstructed score of "The Origin of Fire"? So he set about to find what he could. Some of the parts he discovered in possession of an American publisher (how they got there has not been told), and the remainder came from Symphony Hall's copies of 1937. Sibelius got his birthday gift.

By the way, the Helsinki University Chorus are singing "The Origin of Fire" again today and tomorrow.

Cir. (D 33,690)

This Clipping From
YONKERS, N. Y.
HERALD STATESMAN
NOV 6 - 1953

THEATERS

. Freeman

BOSTON'S SYMPHONY
CHARLES MUNCH

many [illegible] penings are funneled into the New York area; that practically no audience is more alert to the wide range of music and musicianship than New York and its environs, has urged this corner to take more than casual note in print. The Summer festivals, chief of which is the Tanglewood Music Festival, are a Summer topic of discussion among the apartment cliff dwellers as well as those of us who make up Westchester's house and garden set. The Sadlers Wells ballets, the opera and symphonic world ensembles are part and parcel of the living world of entertainment. Consequently our spotlight may wander at times from the world of theatre to embrace significant occurrences in the related field of music and its brethren arts.

* * *

We hereby pass on the information that the world renowned 104-man aggregation known as the Boston Symphony Orchestra will leave its headquarters in Boston to tour the Eastern seaboard, and again under its master musician Charles Munch. Mr. Munch, now in his fifth year as conductor will baton the 73rd year of the Boston Symphony concerts through a series of five Wednesday evening concerts and five Saturday afternoon concerts. The evening dates are December 2, January 13, February 10, March 10 and April 7. The Saturday concerts will occur on the afternoons of Dec. 5th, January 16, February 13, and April 10.

* * *

There are still available a number of balcony locations for each of the series at $7.50 the five. The popularity of these concerts are such that there are no orchestra seats left. The subscription Department of the organization addressed to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts will attend to your request.

* * *

Add musical annotations: Richard Dyer-Bennet brings his guitar and fine tenor voice onto the stage of Town Hall tomorrow, Saturday, for a group of songs which will include some French and German in their native language. The American section will feature among others "My Good Old Man," "The Lonesome Valley," "Mary Had a Baby" and the Childrens' play-party song "I Went Out One Morning in May." . . . Elaine Malbin, soprano of the New York City Opera Company, flew in from London after guesting on some B.B.C. telecasts of opera . . . before his departure on a round-the-world tour, violinist Isaac Stern was issued a $250,000 insurance policy protecting him against injury to his hands and against concert cancellations. This is the first such contract issued in this country and marks a fine rapport between art and big business.

Cir. (D 131,670) (S 258,529)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
NOV 7 - 1953

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the fourth concert of the 73d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The Helsinki University Choir, Marti Turunen, conductor, with Sulo Saarits, baritone, took part in the second half of the program, which was as follows:

"Finlandia"	Sibelius
Symphony No. 5, Op. 50	Nielsen
Vipusessa Kaynty	Klami
Sammon Ryosto	Madetoja
Tulen Synty	Sibelius

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It was Scandinavian Day at the Symphony yesterday, Scandinavian Day with a vengeance, too, in a program listing four works by Finnish composers and one by a Dane, and I think it proved to be just a little too much for most of us.

Just the same it provided a showcase for the exceptional talents of the Helsinki University Choir, which was all to the good, and for the first Boston performance of a most unusual symphony, which was nearly all to the good as well. There was one non-Finnish work on the program, incidentally, and we all deeply regretted it having to be there. For it was a Bach chorale performed in memory of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, whose life in music was one long great symphony of dedication.

The Helsinki University Choir, composed of about 45 stalwart looking men in slate blue suits, and appearing to be somewhat older than our own university men, is notable for the full-bodied manliness of its tonal production. It is the quality of tone we usually think of as being Russian (though the Finns won't thank us for that). That is to say the voices are heavier, deeper colored and more freely and openly produced than we usually manage, and this gives the ensemble a sense of heartiness and vigor.

The music the chorus elected to sing was perhaps not the wisest possible choice. The idea was to display Finnish music, but the selection of three works all of the same period, the same character, the same literary theme, the same forces and, in fact, the same sound, cannot be said to do justice to Finnish music. It seemed to me that if the group does not wish to do non-Finnish music on occasions such as these it could safely drop one of the numbers (the Klami one, for instance), and give us a little a-cappela selection of folk songs in between.

As it stands, since a great deal of the choral writing is in unison, the choir cannot really convey the extent of its musical capacity, which is obviously of the highest quality. Sulo Saarits, as baritone soloist with the group, sang extremely well and the choir and orchestra were soundly conducted by Martti Turunen. Let us hope it doesn't take another 17 years to be visited by this splendid organization.

The music of Carl Nielsen, as represented by his Fifth Symphony, ranks with the most curious produced during the first half of this century. I'm inclined to think on the basis of only one hearing that this late Danish composer, who died in 1931 at the age of 66, was one of the most truly original composers of his day or any day. It is possible to listen to this extended work from end to end and never once find the slightest trace of derivativeness save, in a sense, in mood, which occasionally suggests Sibelius though never literally.

The very opening of this work achieves this singular mood, which seems to be an evocation of a distant landscape, while rustic and martial and turbulent and even grotesque scenes follow (as in the fugue that presently becomes as fantastic as Berlioz' "Dream of a Witches' Sabbath"), there always returns that sense of concentrated contemplation of a distant view. And all the while it gives the singular impression of not being music at all. This is an absurd observation, of course, but it somehow applies to the sensation of hearing this music unfold.

In any event, it is a work of great creative force and great originality. This is not to say it doesn't have stretches that are tiresome as it does, but it is not because the composer wants for something to say; it is only that you don't quite follow him. Mr Munch conducted the work with great conviction; so much so that at the end he tapped the score as if, to give it a bow, too. And it could well be that living with this music does lead to the conviction that it and its composer have been too long neglected. The Fifth Symphony is a new world in any case, and it was a privilege to be introduced to it in such a brilliant performance.

As for "Finlandia," next week's program introduces the Czech conductor Ferenc Fricsay to Boston for the first time in a program offering Haydn's "Clock" Symphony, Bartok's Dance Suite for Orchestra and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony.

Cir. (D 149,902) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From 31
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
NOV 7 - 1953

MUSIC

Helsinki Chorus Appears With Boston Symphony

Fourth "regular" program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conductor, at Symphony Hall. Mr. Munch conducted the Bach Chorale, "When Comes My Hour of Parting," from the St. Matthew Passion, in memory of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge; "Finlandia," by Sibelius, and the Fifth Symphony of Carl Nielsen for the first time in Boston. Martti Turumen conducted the second part of the program, in which the Helsinki University Chorus, of which he is director, presented, with the orchestra, Klami's "In the Belly of Vipunen" (first time in Boston); Madetoja's "The Theft of the Sampo" (first performance in Boston), and Sibelius' "The Origin of Fire." The baritone soloist was Sulo Saarits.

By CYRUS DURGIN

When Charles Munch first appeared on the stage at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, he addressed the audience over the public address system.

"Ladies and gentlemen. Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, a great friend of music and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has died. What she has done for Boston, Tanglewood, for chamber music, musicians and composers all over the world is unique. I ask you to stand and listen to a chorale by Johann Sebastian Bach, which we play in her memory."

The audience rose, the orchestra played standing a tribute both solemn and appropriate. Fortunately no one was so thoughtless as to applaud something which has marred other tributes.

Carl Nielsen's Fifth Symphony must have been new to nearly everyone in Symphony Hall. It is "big music," in form and manner. A great deal in orchestral counterpoint goes on, too much to grasp all the work at a single hearing. The style is a mixture of modernity and old-fashioned romanticism, and was such a mixture when the Symphony was written in 1922.

Neilsen, much admired in his native Denmark and virtually unknown across the Atlantic, must have been both an academic musician and an artist with a demonic side, witness the long, loud and ferocious improvisation for a snare drum which cuts across the singing tissue of a striking part of the first movement. (Harold Farberman played this improvisation brilliantly. Indeed, being kept busy much of the afternoon, he was perhaps the most spectacular player involved in this program.)

A man with the technic, the melodic gift, the sense of structure and the passion which Nielsen shows in this work cannot be judged this or that on the basis of brief acquaintance. I found the Fifth Symphony absorbing, indeed fascinating, and I would prefer opportunity to write of it again after much more acquaintance.

The Helsinki University Chorus of 1953 is quite as rugged, well-disciplined and resonant as its predecessor of 1937, when the group's local debut coincided with the famous crisis of the missing portions of "The Origin of Fire." It was a pleasure to hear them again, under the calm but most authoritative directing of Mr. Turunen. There is no musical or vocal deadwood, it seems, in this male singing group of perhaps 60 men. Mr. Saarits sang the incidental solos creditably.

The music of Klami and Madetoja, the former now a man of 53, the latter 60 when he died in 1947, is new over here. These pieces, like "The Origin of Fire" composed on excerpts from the Finnish literary epic, "The Kalevala," are romantic, almost quasi-descriptive, in each case very well written for voices and instruments and broadly melodic. Klami sounds the more modern, quite naturally.

The learning Madetoja absorbed from Vincent D'Indy lent a curiously French quality to Finnish music. "The Origin of Fire" is the most personal of all three and the shortest. Klami and Madetoja show evident talent, but the genius of the trio is Finland's musical patriarch.

65

Cir. (D 149,902) (S 382,056)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
NOV 6 - 1953

EPILOGUE TO SIBELIUS STORY OF 1937

How 'Fire' Was Kept Burning

By CYRUS DURGIN

When director Martti Turunen and the Helsinki University Chorus take over the second half of the Boston Symphony concerts this afternoon, some of us in the audience will be recalling the alarums and excursions of their previous visit. That was just after Christmas of 1937, and the trouble was caused by a package of music lost in the mail.

Serge Koussevitsky had invited the Helsinki Chorus to give, with the Boston Symphony, the American premiere of Jean Sibelius' "The Origin of Fire," which the Finnish composer had written in 1902 as his Opus 32. Sibelius sent his manuscript to his publishers, Breitkopf and Haertel in Leipzig, Ger., but he was not widely popular then, and the firm published the work only in a piano-choral edition. The original full score remained in the vaults.

On Nov. 18, 1937, Breitkopt and Haertel put in the mail, New York-bound aboard the Europa (now the French liner Liberte), two packages. One, containing choral and some orchestral parts, was received at Symphony Hall. But the other, in which were the remaining parts and the manuscript full score, has never turned up to this day.

* * *

What to do? It was Dec. 27, and the premiere was scheduled for Dec. 31. Someone thought of the new radio-photo process. A frantic cable to Leipzig brought the missing parts through the thousands of miles of air to New York. It was too expensive to transmit the full score, but if the missing parts could be obtained, the performance could be given. The radio-photos were received in New York and rushed to Boston by train.

Now in those days the radio-photo process was crude, and the pages of parts had to be reduced so they could be sent four to one page of radio-photo. Result, some portions were badly blurred. Until 2 Thursday morning, Dec. 30, Symphony librarian Leslie A. Rogers and copyist Joseph R. Mann worked with magnifying glasses, copying off the parts. They were on the musicians' stands for rehearsal at 10 that morning.

* * *

I attended that rehearsal, and I remember how Koussevitzky, who had been able to study the composition only from a choral-piano "reduction," as it is called, was working hard to find out how the orchestral sections went. A lot of orchestral detail inevitably has to be left out of a "reduction."

Three times Koussevitzky played through "The Origin of Fire," which takes only 10 mintues, and then declared he knew it well enough. But those three run-throughs were hard going. I remember that at one point the conductor stopped, pointed with a finger, and said:

"Here I have a F, but personne (French for nobody) plays. Who has dat F?"

As I recall, no one found the missing F, so they went on without it. The performance next day went off without any further hitch, and was regarded as a complete success.

* * *

The epilogue to this story was told in 1945, the year which saw the end of World War II. The Breitkopf and Haertel plant was very badly damaged during the bombings of Germany, and every shred of "The Origin of Fire" was destroyed. Had it not been for the package lost in transit nearly eight years before, this music might have been lost forever.

In 1945, Oliver Daniel, then producer of the Boston Symphony broadcasts, wanted to give Jean Sibelius a gift on his 80th birthday. How about a reconstructed score of "The Origin of Fire"? So he set about to find what he could. Some of the parts he discovered in possession of an American publisher (how they got there has not been told), and the remainder came from Symphony Hall's copies of 1937. Sibelius got his birthday gift.

By the way, the Helsinki University Chorus are singing "The Origin of Fire" again today and tomorrow.

This Clipping From
NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y.
STANDARD-STAR
NOV 6 - 1953

THEATERS

Freeman

New York area; that no audience is more alert to the wide range of music and musicianship than New York and its environs, has urged this corner to take more than casual note in print. The Summer festivals, chief of which is the Tanglewood Music Festival, are a Summer topic of discussion among the apartment cliff dwellers as well as those of us who make up Westchester's house and garden set. The Sadlers Wells ballets, the opera and symphonic world ensembles are part and parcel of the living world of entertainment. Consequently our spotlight may wander at times from the world of theatre to embrace significant occurrences in the related field of music and its brethren arts.

* * *

We hereby pass on the information that the world renowned 104-man aggregation known as the Boston Symphony Orchestra will leave its headquarters in Boston to tour the Eastern seaboard, and again under its master musician Charles Munch. Mr. Munch, now in his fifth year as conductor will baton the 73rd year of the Boston Symphony concerts through a series of five Wednesday evening concerts and five Saturday afternoon concerts. The evening dates are December 2, January 13, February 10, March 10 and April 7. The Saturday concerts will occur on the afternoons of Dec. 5th, January 16, February 13, and April 10.

* * *

There are still available a number of balcony locations for each of the series at $7.50 the five. The popularity of these concerts are such that there are no orchestra seats left. The subscription Department of the organization addressed to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts will attend to your request.

* * *

Add musical annotations: Richard Dyer-Bennet brings his guitar and fine tenor voice onto the stage of Town Hall tomorrow, Saturday, for a group of songs which will include some French and German in their native language. The American section will feature among others "My Good Old Man," "The Lonesome Valley," "Mary Had a Baby" and the Childrens' play-party song "I Went Out One Morning in May." . . . Elaine Malbin, soprano of the New York City Opera Company, flew in from London after guesting on some B.B.C. telecasts of opera . . . before his departure on a round-the-world tour, violinist Isaac Stern was issued a $250,000 insurance policy protecting him against injury to his hands and against concert cancellations. This is the first such contract issued in this country and marks a fine rapport between art and big business.

BOSTON'S SYMPHONY
CHARLES MUNCH

Cir. (D 131,670) (S 258,529)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
NOV 7 - 1953

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the fourth concert of the 73d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The Helsinki University Choir, Marti Turunen, conductor, with Sulo Saarits, baritone, took part in the second half of the program, which was as follows:

"Finlandia"	Sibelius
Symphony No. 5, Op. 50	Nielsen
Vipusessa Kaynty	Klami
Sammon Ryosto	Madetoja
Tulen Synty	Sibelius

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It was Scandinavian Day at the Symphony yesterday, Scandinavian Day with a vengeance, too, in a program listing four works by Finnish composers and one by a Dane, and I think it proved to be just a little too much for most of us.

Just the same it provided a showcase for the exceptional talents of the Helsinki University Choir, which was all to the good, and for the first Boston performance of a most unusual symphony, which was nearly all to the good as well. There was one non-Finnish work on the program, incidentally, and we all deeply regretted it having to be there. For it was a Bach chorale performed in memory of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, whose life in music was one long great symphony of dedication.

The Helsinki University Choir, composed of about 45 stalwart looking men in slate blue suits, and appearing to be somewhat older than our own university men, is notable for the full-bodied manliness of its tonal production. It is the quality of tone we usually think of as being Russian (though the Finns won't thank us for that). That is to say the voices are heavier, deeper colored and more freely and openly produced than we usually manage, and this gives the ensemble a sense of heartiness and vigor.

The music the chorus elected to sing was perhaps not the wisest possible choice. The idea was to display Finnish music, but the selection of three works all of the same period, the same character, the same literary theme, the same forces and, in fact, the same sound, cannot be said to do justice to Finnish music. It seemed to me that if the group does not wish to do non-Finnish music on occasions such as these it could safely drop one of the numbers (the Klami one, for instance), and give us a little a-cappela selection of folk songs in between.

As it stands, since a great deal of the choral writing is in unison, the choir cannot really convey the extent of its musical capacity, which is obviously of the highest quality. Sulo Saarits, as baritone soloist with the group, sang extremely well and the choir and orchestra were soundly conducted by Martti Turunen. Let us hope it doesn't take another 17 years to be visited by this splendid organization.

The music of Carl Nielsen, as represented by his Fifth Symphony, ranks with the most curious produced during the first half of this century. I'm inclined to think on the basis of only one hearing that this late Danish composer, who died in 1931 at the age of 66, was one of the most truly original composers of his day or any day. It is possible to listen to this extended work from end to end and never once find the slightest trace of derivativeness save, in a sense, in mood, which occasionally suggests Sibelius though never literally.

The very opening of this work achieves this singular mood, which seems to be an evocation of a distant landscape, while rustic and martial and turbulent and even grotesque scenes follow (as in the fugue that presently becomes as fantastic as Berlioz' "Dream of a Witches' Sabbath"), there always returns that sense of concentrated contemplation of a distant view. And all the while it gives the singular impression of not being music at all. This is an absurd observation, of course, but it somehow applies to the sensation of hearing this music unfold.

In any event, it is a work of great creative force and great originality. This is not to say it doesn't have stretches that are tiresome as it does, but it is not because the composer wants for something to say; it is only that you don't quite follow him. Mr Munch conducted the work with great conviction; so much so that at the end he tapped the score as if to give it a bow, too. And it could well be that living with this music does lead to the conviction that it and its composer have been too long neglected. The Fifth Symphony is a new world in any case, and it was a privilege to be introduced to it in such a brilliant performance.

As for "Finlandia," next week's program introduces the Czech conductor Ferenc Fricsay to Boston for the first time in a program offering Haydn's "Clock" Symphony, Bartok's Dance Suite for Orchestra and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony.

Cir. (D 149,902) (S 382,056)
This Clipping From 31
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
NOV 7 - 1953

MUSIC

Helsinki Chorus Appears With Boston Symphony

Fourth "regular" program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conductor, at Symphony Hall. Mr. Munch conducted the Bach Chorale, "When Comes My Hour of Parting," from the St. Matthew Passion, in memory of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge; "Finlandia," by Sibelius, and the Fifth Symphony of Carl Nielsen for the first time in Boston. Martti Turumen conducted the second part of the program, in which the Helsinki University Chorus, of which he is director, presented, with the orchestra, Klami's "In the Belly of Vipunen" (first time in Boston); Madetoja's "The Theft of the Sampo" (first performance in Boston), and Sibelius' "The Origin of Fire." The baritone soloist was Sulo Saarits.

By CYRUS DURGIN

When Charles Munch first appeared on the stage at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, he addressed the audience over the pub-ice address system.

"Ladies and gentlemen. Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, a great friend of music and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has ied. What she has done for Bos-on, Tanglewood, for chamber mu-ic, musicians and composers all ver the world is unique. I ask you to stand and listen to a horale by Johann Sebastian Bach, which we play in her memory."

The audience rose, the orchestra played standing a tribute both solemn and appropriate. Fortunately no one was so thoughtless as to applaud something which has marred other tributes.

Carl Nielsen's Fifth Symphony must have been new to nearly everyone in Symphony Hall. It is "big music," in form and manner. A great deal in orchestral counterpoint goes on, too much to grasp all the work at a single hearing. The style is a mixture of modernity and old-fashioned romanticism, and was such a mixture when the Symphony was written in 1922.

Neilsen, much admired in his native Denmark and virtually unknown across the Atlantic, must have been both an academic musician and an artist with a demonic side, witness the long, loud and ferocious improvisation for a snare drum which cuts across the singing tissue of a striking part of the first movement. (Harold Farberman played this improvisation brilliantly. Indeed, being kept busy much of the afternoon, he was perhaps the most spectacular player involved in this program.)

A man with the technic, the melodic gift, the sense of structure and the passion which Nielsen shows in this work cannot be judged this or that on the basis of brief acquaintance. I found the Fifth Symphony absorbing, indeed fascinating, and I would prefer opportunity to write of it again after much more acquaintance.

The Helsinki University Chorus of 1953 is quite as rugged, well-disciplined and resonant as its predecessor of 1937, when the group's local debut coincided with the famous crisis of the missing portions of "The Origin of Fire." It was a pleasure to hear them again, under the calm but most authoritative directing of Mr. Turunen. There is no musical or vocal deadwood, it seems, in this male singing group of perhaps 60 men. Mr. Saarits sang the incidental solos creditably.

The music of Klami and Madetoja, the former now a man of 53, the latter 60 when he died in 1947, is new over here. These pieces, like "The Origin of Fire" composed on excerpts from the Finnish literary epic, "The Kalevala," are romantic, almost quasi-descriptive, in each case very well written for voices and instruments and broadly melodic. Klami sounds the more modern, quite naturally.

The learning Madetoja absorbed from Vincent D'Indy lent a curiously French quality to Finnish music. "The Origin of Fire" is the most personal of all three and the shortest. Klami and Madetoja show evident talent, but the genius of the trio is Finland's musical patriarch.

65

Cir. (D 149,902) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE

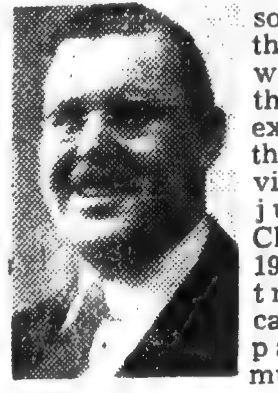
NOV 6 - 1953

EPILOGUE TO SIBELIUS STORY OF 1937

How 'Fire' Was Kept Burning

By CYRUS DURGIN

When director Martti Turunen and the Helsinki University Chorus take over the second half of the Boston Symphony concerts this afternoon, some of us in the audience will be recalling the alarums and excursions of their previous visit. That was just after Christmas of 1937, and the trouble was caused by a package of music lost in the mail.



Serge Koussevitsky had invited the Helsinki Chorus to give, with the Boston Symphony, the American premiere of Jean Sibelius' "The Origin of Fire," which the Finnish composer had written in 1902 as his Opus 32. Sibelius sent his manuscript to his publishers, Breitkopf and Haertel in Leipzig, Ger., but he was not widely popular then, and the firm published the work only in a piano-choral edition. The original full score remained in the vaults.

On Nov. 18, 1937, Breitkopt and Haertel put in the mail, New York-bound aboard the Europa (now the French liner Liberte), two packages. One, containing choral and some orchestral parts, was received at Symphony Hall. But the other, in which were the remaining parts and the manuscript full score, has never turned up to this day.

* * *

What to do? It was Dec. 27, and the premiere was scheduled for Dec. 31. Someone thought of the new radio-photo process. A frantic cable to Leipzig brought the missing parts through the thousands of miles of air to New York. It was too expensive to transmit the full score, but if the missing parts could be obtained, the performance could be given. The radio-photos were received in New York and rushed to Boston by train.

Now in those days the radio-photo process was crude, and the pages of parts had to be reduced so they could be sent four to one page of radio-photo. Result, some portions were badly blurred. Until 2 Thursday morning, Dec. 30, Symphony librarian Leslie A. Rogers and copyist Joseph R. Mann worked with magnifying glasses, copying off the parts. They were on the musicians' stands for rehearsal at 10 that morning.

* * *

I attended that rehearsal, and I remember how Koussevitzky, who had been able to study the composition only from a choral-piano "reduction," as it is called, was working hard to find out how the orchestral sections went. A lot of orchestral detail inevitably has to be left out of a "reduction."

Three times Koussevitzky played through "The Origin of Fire," which takes only 10 mintues, and then declared he knew it well enough. But those three run-throughs were hard going. I remember that at one point the conductor stopped, pointed with a finger, and said:

"Here I have a F, but personne (French for nobody) plays. Who has dat F?"

As I recall, no one found the missing F, so they went on without it. The performance next day went off without any further hitch, and was regarded as a complete success.

* * *

The epilogue to this story was told in 1945, the year which saw the end of World War II. The Breitkopf and Haertel plant was very badly damaged during the bombings of Germany, and every shred of "The Origin of Fire" was destroyed. Had it not been for the package lost in transit nearly eight years before, this music might have been lost forever.

In 1945, Oliver Daniel, then producer of the Boston Symphony broadcasts, wanted to give Jean Sibelius a gift on his 80th birthday. How about a reconstructed score of "The Origin of Fire"? So he set about to find what he could. Some of the parts he discovered in possession of an American publisher (how they got there has not been told), and the remainder came from Symphony Hall's copies of 1937. Sibelius got his birthday gift.

By the way, the Helsinki University Chorus are singing "The Origin of Fire" again today and tomorrow.

Cir. (D 149,902) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From 31
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE

NOV 7 - 1953

MUSIC

Helsinki Chorus Appears With Boston Symphony

Fourth "regular" program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conductor, at Symphony Hall. Mr. Munch conducted the Bach Chorale, "When Comes My Hour of Parting," from the St. Matthew Passion, in memory of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge; "Finlandia," by Sibelius, and the Fifth Symphony of Carl Nielsen for the first time in Boston. Martti Turumen conducted the second part of the program, in which the Helsinki University Chorus, of which he is director, presented, with the orchestra, Klami's "In the Belly of Vipunen" (first time in Boston); Madetoja's "The Theft of the Sampo" (first performance in Boston), and Sibelius' "The Origin of Fire." The baritone soloist was Sulo Saarits.

By CYRUS DURGIN

When Charles Munch first appeared on the stage at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, he addressed the audience over the pubice address system.

"Ladies and gentlemen. Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, a great friend of music and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has died. What she has done for Boston, Tanglewood, for chamber music, musicians and composers all over the world is unique. I ask you to stand and listen to a chorale by Johann Sebastian Bach, which we play in her memory."

The audience rose, the orchestra played standing a tribute both solemn and appropriate. Fortunately no one was so thoughtless as to applaud something which has marred other tributes.

Carl Nielsen's Fifth Symphony must have been new to nearly everyone in Symphony Hall. It is "big music," in form and manner. A great deal in orchestral counterpoint goes on, too much to grasp all the work at a single hearing. The style is a mixture of modernity and old-fashioned romanticism, and was such a mixture when the Symphony was written in 1922.

Neilsen, much admired in his native Denmark and virtually unknown across the Atlantic, must have been both an academic musician and an artist with a demonic side, witness the long, loud and ferocious improvisation for a snare drum which cuts across the singing tissue of a striking part of the first movement. (Harold Farberman played this improvisation brilliantly. Indeed, being kept busy much of the afternoon, he was perhaps the most spectacular player involved in this program.)

A man with the technic, the melodic gift, the sense of structure and the passion which Nielsen shows in this work cannot be judged this or that on the basis of brief acquaintance. I found the Fifth Symphony absorbing, indeed fascinating, and I would prefer opportunity to write of it again after much more acquaintance.

The Helsinki University Chorus of 1953 is quite as rugged, well-disciplined and resonant as its predecessor of 1937, when the group's local debut coincided with the famous crisis of the missing portions of "The Origin of Fire." It was a pleasure to hear them again, under the calm but most authoritative directing of Mr. Turunen. There is no musical or vocal deadwood, it seems, in this male singing group of perhaps 60 men. Mr. Saarits sang the incidental solos creditably.

The music of Klami and Madetoja, the former now a man of 53, the latter 60 when he died in 1947, is new over here. These pieces, like "The Origin of Fire" composed on excerpts from the Finnish literary epic, "The Kalevala," are romantic, almost quasi-descriptive, in each case very well written for voices and instruments and broadly melodic. Klami sounds the more modern, quite naturally.

The learning Madetoja absorbed from Vincent D'Indy lent a curiously French quality to Finnish music. "The Origin of Fire" is the most personal of all three and the shortest. Klami and Madetoja show evident talent, but the genius of the trio is Finland's musical patriarch.

Cir. (D 131,670) (S 258,529)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

NOV 7 - 1953

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the fourth concert of the 73d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The Helsinki University Choir, Marti Turunen, conductor, with Sulo Saarits, baritone, took part in the second half of the program, which was as follows:

"Finlandia"	Sibelius
Symphony No. 5, Op. 50	Nielsen
Vipusessa Kaynty	Klami
Sammon Ryosto	Madetoja
Tulen Synty	Sibelius

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It was Scandinavian Day at the Symphony yesterday, Scandinavian Day with a vengeance, too, in a program listing four works by Finnish composers and one by a Dane, and I think it proved to be just a little too much for most of us.

Just the same it provided a showcase for the exceptional talents of the Helsinki University Choir, which was all to the good, and for the first Boston performance of a most unusual symphony, which was nearly all to the good as well. There was one non-Finnish work on the program, incidentally, and we all deeply regretted it having to be there. For it was a Bach chorale performed in memory of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, whose life in music was one long great symphony of dedication.

The Helsinki University Choir, composed of about 45 stalwart looking men in slate blue suits, and appearing to be somewhat older than our own university men, is notable for the full-bodied manliness of its tonal production. It is the quality of tone we usually think of as being Russian (though the Finns won't thank us for that). That is to say the voices are heavier, deeper colored and more freely and openly produced than we usually manage, and this gives the ensemble a sense of heartiness and vigor.

The music the chorus elected to sing was perhaps not the wisest possible choice. The idea was to display Finnish music, but the selection of three works all of the same period, the same character, the same literary theme, the same forces and, in fact, the same sound, cannot be said to do justice to Finnish music. It seemed to me that if the group does not wish to do non-Finnish music on occasions such as these it could safely drop one of the numbers (the Klami one, for instance), and give us a little a-cappela selection of folk songs in between.

As it stands, since a great deal of the choral writing is in unison, the choir cannot really convey the extent of its musical capacity, which is obviously of the highest quality. Sulo Saarits, as baritone soloist with the group, sang extremely well and the choir and orchestra were soundly conducted by Martti Turunen. Let us hope it doesn't take another 17 years to be visited by this splendid organization.

The music of Carl Nielsen, as represented by his Fifth Symphony, ranks with the most curious produced during the first half of this century. I'm inclined to think on the basis of only one hearing that this late Danish composer, who died in 1931 at the age of 66, was one of the most truly original composers of his day or any day. It is possible to listen to this extended work from end to end and never once find the slightest trace of derivativeness save, in a sense, in mood, which occasionally suggests Sibelius though never literally.

The very opening of this work achieves this singular mood, which seems to be an evocation of a distant landscape, while rustic and martial and turbulent and even grotesque scenes follow (as in the fugue that presently becomes as fantastic as Berlioz' "Dream of a Witches' Sabbath"), there always returns that sense of concentrated contemplation of a distant view. And all the while it gives the singular impression of not being music at all. This is an absurd observation, of course, but it somehow applies to the sensation of hearing this music unfold.

In any event, it is a work of great creative force and great originality. This is not to say it doesn't have stretches that are tiresome as it does, but it is not because the composer wants for something to say; it is only that you don't quite follow him. Mr Munch conducted the work with great conviction; so much so that at the end he tapped the score as if ,to give it a bow, too. And it could well be that living with this music does lead to the conviction that it and its composer have been too long neglected. The Fifth Symphony is a new world in any case, and it was a privilege to be introduced to it in such a brilliant performance.

As for "Finlandia," next week's program introduces the Czech conductor Ferenc Fricsay to Boston for the first time in a program offering Haydn's "Clock" Symphony, Bartok's Dance Suite for Orchestra and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony.

Cir. (D 5,155)

This Clipping From
MAMARONECK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 6 - 1953

THEATERS

. Freeman

wide range of ... cianship than New York and its environs, has urged this corner to take more than casual note in print. The Summer festivals, chief of which is the Tanglewood Music Festival, are a Summer topic of discussion among the apartment cliff dwellers as well as those of us who make up Westchester's house and garden set. The Sadlers Wells ballets, the opera and symphonic world ensembles are part and parcel of the living world of entertainment. Consequently our spotlight may wander at times from the world of theatre to embrace significant occurrences in the related field of music and its brethren arts.

* * *

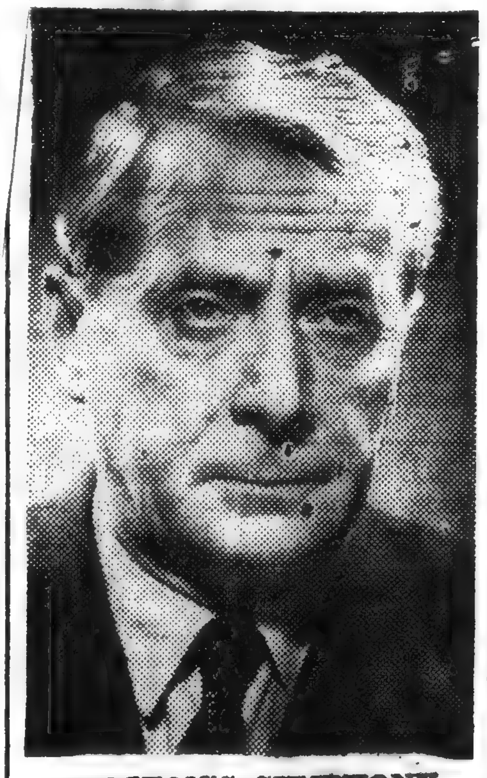
We hereby pass on the information that the world renowned 104-man aggregation known as the Boston Symphony Orchestra will leave its headquarters in Boston to tour the Eastern seaboard, and again under its master musician Charles Munch. Mr. Munch, now in his fifth year as conductor will baton the 73rd year of the Boston Symphony concerts through a series of five Wednesday evening concerts and five Saturday afternoon concerts. The evening dates are December 2, January 13, February 10, March 10 and April 7. The Saturday concerts will occur on the afternoons of Dec. 5th, January 16, February 13, and April 10.

* * *

There are still available a number of balcony locations for each of the series at $7.50 the five. The popularity of these concerts are such that there are no orchestra seats left. The subscription Department of the organization addressed to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts will attend to your request.

* * *

Add musical annotations: Richard Dyer-Bennet brings his guitar and fine tenor voice onto the stage of Town Hall tomorrow, Saturday, for a group of songs which will include some French and German in their native language. The American section will feature among others "My Good Old Man," "The Lonesome Valley," "Mary Had a Baby" and the Childrens' play-party song "I Went Out One Morning in May." . . . Elaine Malbin, soprano of the New York City Opera Company, flew in from London after guesting on some B.B.C. telecasts of opera . . . before his departure on a round-the-world tour, violinist Isaac Stern was issued a $250,000 insurance policy protecting him against injury to his hands and against concert cancellations. This is the first such contract issued in this country and marks a fine rapport between art and big business.



BOSTON'S SYMPHONY
CHARLES MUNCH

32

Cir. (D 346,423) (S 633,364)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

NOV 8 - 1953

THE RECORD W

By HERBERT KUPFERBE

Symphonic Adventu

Other Moderns

Two new records of post-1900 music come from R. C. A.-Victor, which is taking an increasing, if still cautious, interest in such goings-on. In performances by Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony, Arthur Honegger's Fifth Symphony, a strikingly somber and vivid work, is coupled with Albert Roussel's "Bacchus and Ariane" Suite No. 2 ($5.72).

recorded syr es, certainly adventurous phony, for ir time, but its

Cir. (D 52,771) (S 102,494)

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

NOV 8 - 1953

REHEARSE FOR EVENT

Miss Antoinette Giannini (left), pianist, and Mrs. Frances Giabatti Cammuso, soprano, rehearse the program of music which they will present tomorrow night at the parents' night of Bloomingdale School. Both are former pupils at the school.

Ex-Pupils Will Give Program

Two former schoolmates at Bloomingdale School, now well-known in Worcester music circles, will return to their alma mater to present a program at parents' night tomorrow at 7.30 p. m.

Miss Antoinette Giannini of Auburn will give piano selections and accompany Mrs. Frances Giabatti Cammuso, soprano.

B. U. Graduate

Miss Giannini received her bachelor's and master's degrees in music at the Boston University School of Music, has done graduate work at the Julliard School and is continuing her studies at Columbia School of Music, New York City. Winner of the New York Colony Club Concert prize, she will play a concert for the club in New York Dec. 1. She teaches music in the Worcester schools.

Mrs. Cammuso was graduated from the Boston University School of Music. She sang at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox in 1948, and later sang with the New England Opera Theater Association under Boris Goldovsky.

She has also had parts in presentations of the Worcester County Light Opera Association and has appeared in dramatic productions at the Red Barn Theater in Westboro.

Exhibit

Preceding the program, teachers will receive parents in their classrooms. An exhibit of articles made by the children for shipment to hospitals under the Junior Red Cross program will be on display in the school basement.

A social hour will conclude the program. Hostesses will be Mrs. Arthur P. Orsi, Mrs. Alfred Mattress, Mrs. Robert Cravedi, Mrs. Armando Rossi, Mrs. Marco Consiglio, Mrs. Anthony M. Vincequere, Mrs. Joseph B. Healy, Mrs. Elon N. Carlson, Mrs. Wilfred J. Duhamel and Mrs. George DeFeo.

The Boston Daily Globe

Published by GLOBE NEWSPAPER COMPANY
242 Washington St. Boston 7, Mass.
(Established March 4, 1872. Evening edition first issued March 7, 1878. Sunday edition first issued Oct. 14, 1877.)

MONDAY, NOV. 9, 1953

SUBSCRIPTION RATES

	Daily Per Mo.	Daily Per Yr.	Sunday Per Mo.	Sunday Per Yr.
Boston Postal Zone	1.25	15.00	1.00	12.00
New England States	1.00	12.00	.95	11.40
Elsewhere in United States	1.25	15.00	1.15	13.80
Canada, Central and So. America	1.35	16.20	1.20	14.40
Other Foreign Countries	2.50	30.00	1.90	22.00

(Please do not send cash. Use money orders or checks.)

Back numbers (per copy): 1 week, or older, 5c daily; 20c Sundays; over 3 months old, out of print.

Entered as second class mail matter at Boston, Mass., under the act of March 3, 1879—242 Washington St.

The Associated Press is entitled exclusively to the use for republication of all the local news printed in this newspaper.

Globe Man's Daily Story

The translators at the United Nations occasionally trip, often on some purely American idiom, one of which was recently voiced by a Briton, surprisingly enough England's Minister of State, the Rt. Hon. Selwyn Lloyd.

Becoming bored with Russia's Vishinsky, who was haranguing with customary venom, Lloyd suddenly blurted: "Dig that broken record."

Most of the glib-tongued coterie were caught off guard by this one and paused to ponder.

Not so the man who puts English into Chinese. Briskly he issued this clarifier: "Recover the phonograph record which you have discarded."

ORIGIN OF FIRE

It is an advantage of living in one of the capitals of civilized thought that other envoys of civilization pay us visits. Metropolitan Boston is such a capital; to it and through it stream scholars, artists, statesmen, authors, and musicians to be seen and heard and to listen in turn. Mural paintings of the late Middle Ages depict such envoys as trotting from Abbey to Abbey and from university to university on little palfreys accoutred with tinkling bells; today they come propelled by marine turbine or aerial motor, but still they come.

Over the week-end we have entertained and been entertained by the Helsinki University Chorus at Symphony Hall, audible, too, on Station WGHB by a multitudinous public at both concerts in stirring performances of an early work by Jean Sibelius (1902), "The Origin of Fire."

* * *

Finland enjoys a distinction unique among modern nations. The Finn by whom she is best known to the world is not a millionaire, not a General, not a statesman, not a film favorite, but an artist, and a creator in that art which is pre-eminent in our epoch, music. Aware of his value, his fellow-countrymen pay Sibelius a yearly stipend equal to that of their Premier. Imagine Congress voting to our own foremost artist (whomsoever he may be) the same salary as say Secretary of State John Foster Dulles. (Pause—to regain consciousness.)

At the start of this century, Sibelius was thought to be a nationalist composer. As its decades went on, he burst any such bounds and shed abroad the fertilization of his genius over an area which is highly significant to our world situation. Latin Europe has been slow to understand his music, although Italy is hospitable; Germany yielded gradually; but Scandanavia, the United States, and England never hesitated. We Northern peoples at once knew him for our own. Sibelius is a man of the North; the North speaks eloquently in his music, the North of gray seas, gray skies, and sombre moore, the North of the Finnish epic, "Kalevala" (into which Longfellow dipped for the verse rhythms of his "Hiawatha"), the North of the Scandanavian sagas and the poetic Edda of Saemund.

Thus the art of symphonic music, starting on the shores of the Mediterranean, has moved in the course of centuries north of the "wine line" into the latitude of the Nordic peoples, and at a time when these peoples, even in despite of three ghastly wars, and possibly in part as a consequence of two of them, can be seen to be moving toward their own characteristic expression in the arts, and, through such aesthetic expression, groping for their peculiar religious entity. When the smoke of battle has cleared from the 20th century, this, in retrospect, it may quite possibly be seen, was the meaning which underlay all the military, political, economic, and technological turmoil; for it is the creative spirit in the arts which is finally descried to be > "Calm rising through change and through storm."

* * *

At the core of this process is man-on-his own. The hardest thing on earth to be is oneself—that which Nature meant you to be. Few ever achieve it. This is the "Origin of Fire." Sibelius achieved it in 1908 in his Fourth Symphony, from which time he is Sibelius and no one else. The paradox is that by being oneself and nobody else, he finds himself speaking for multitudes who, through him, have first found tongue. On December 8, 1953, Sibelius, now living at Jarvenpaa, Finland, will be eighty-eight years old. In him the North becomes fully articulate for the first time in symphonic music. We are on our way.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

Cir. (D 103,308)

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 11 1953

Munch Conducts Nielsen Premiere

By FEROL AUSTEN
Special to The Hartford Times

Boston—Of particular interest this week in Boston is the first local performance of Carl Nielsen's Fifth Symphony. The Danish composer died in 1931, this work was completed in 1922, and why it has been so long before we have heard it here is a puzzlement.

However, Nielsen isn't completely unknown here — recordings of his works have occasionally shown up on the better disc jockey shows — but we ought to hear more of his music because it is good music, listenable, expressive, and packed full of imagination.

One especially intriguing incident in the Fifth Symphony is the several page "ad lib" which is tossed to the snare drum in the first movement. The snare — probably surprised and flattered by the composer's compliment—responded to its solo cadenza with an energetic fervor that was spinetingling. If we may lift for a moment the shade of propriety, one might say that tympanist Harold Farberman can sure beat those skins.

* * *

WITH THE EXCEPTION of one piece, the program was completely Scandinavian, and Mr. Munch goaded Sibelius' "Finlandia" on to a new speed record. However, it was fresh, and one shouldn't quarrel with a new approach in the rarefied atmosphere of the concert hall. The only non-Scandinavian piece was the final chorale from Bach's St. Matthew Passion which Mr. Munch played to the standing audience in a moving and solemn tribute to Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, benefactress of the B. S. O., Tanglewood, and numerous other local projects, as well as a helpful friend to music elsewhere in the country.

Sharing the program was the excellent chorus of 55 men from Helsinki University. Their rich voices are robust, they respond immediately to direction, and the tone of their voices filled Symphony Hall with an organ-like splendor of sound. They sang works by Klami, Madetoja, and "The Origin of Fire" by Sibelius.

* * *

THE FLOWERS that bloom in the spring—tra la—give promise of merry sunshine. Yes, and they give promise, too, of a merry evening in New England Mutual Hall, where the American Savoyards —a flourish of trumpets would do nicely here—are giving forth with some really good Gilbert & Sullivan. This week Ko-Ko, Yum-Yum, Pooh-bah, and all the rest are treading the boards in the fine tradition of the D'Oyly Carte. The company is only four and a half years old, but they're all doing a wonderful job.

It was the "Mikado" the other night, with Rue Knapp taking over the role so long associated with Martyn Green and doing very nicely too—if he tends to imitate the great D'Oyly Carte star, it is no disgrace. Who wouldn't? At the same time, this doesn't mean to say that Mr. Knapp isn't original, for he offers many inventive little businesses which ingratiate him with an audience. Ronald Bush, as the Mikado was hilarious with a fascinating repertoire of sneers, jeers, chortles, and gleeful snorts.

16 Art—Music—Theater THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR.

Backstage With Ferenc Fricsay—

Guest Conductor in Boston For U.S. Debut at Symphony

By Klaus George Roy

"What do I think of this orchestra? It is phenomenal! I cannot tell you how moved I was to hear this sound, this technical perfection, this ability to do anything at all!"

In this way Ferenc Fricsay characterized his first impression, after one rehearsal, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will make his American debut with them this week end and will give four concerts before traveling on to Houston and San Francisco for further engagements.

"It was an unforgettable experience for us when your orchestra came to play in Berlin last year. That is where Mr. Munch heard me conduct, by the way. It is such a great honor for me, as an unknown visitor, to be invited to lead this group!" Assured that his reputation had preceded him, and that his many recordings have made his name well known in this country, Mr. Fricsay still remained immensely pleased to be introduced to America in Boston.

Since 1949 Mr. Fricsay has been permanent conductor of the RIAS Symphony Orchestra in West Berlin, an ensemble of 112 players founded by him. (RIAS stands for Radio in the American Sector.) A native of Budapest (1914), the Hungarian musician began piano-study at six and conducting at 13. His teachers in composition have been Zoltán Kodály and Béla Bartók.

* * *

At 21 he became conductor in Hungary's second largest city, Szeget, and ten years later, in 1945, he headed the Budapest Opera. Engagements in Vienna and Salzburg followed,—with later appearances at Edinburgh and in South America, and at the helm of the noted Concertgebouw Orchestra in Holland.

His "home base," actually, is not Berlin but Switzerland; from there he leaves for his many guest engagements. Only two-and-a-half months of the season (two-thirds of the programs) he spends with RIAS—during September, January, and May.

Under his guidance the RIAS Symphony has become a highly regarded body, noted especially for its espousal of contemporary music. Bartók's music, understandably, is a real cause with the tall Hungarian conductor.

For Deutsche Gramophon, released in this country by Decca, Mr. Fricsay and RIAS are recording a whole Bartók series. These include the Violin Concerto (with Tibor Varga), already issued, and all three Piano Concertos with Geza Anda, whom Mr. Fricsay calls "an unbelievable virtuoso." Also included will be Bartók's Dance Suite, a work that will be heard here this week end for the first time since Koussevitzky presented it in November, 1926.

* * *

Although his English is much better than he will admit, Mr. Fricsay enjoyed discussing the program in his fluent German. "This Dance Suite is mature Bartók," he stressed.

"Don't forget, it dates from 1923 when he was 42! It is amazing what the composer achieved here, with a virtually classical orchestra. This is one of his pieces in which there is absolutely no thematic reliance on folk-lore—even if it may sound like that! All the material—the melodies and the rhythms—is freely invented. Bartók simply drew upon the invaluable treasure of folk-material he had studied so closely, as a jumping-off place for an entirely original piece. Listen for those pentatonic melodies, the astonishing irregular rhythms!"

The 20-minute work contains five different dance types and a finale, played without pause. The last section sums up what has gone before as well as contributing new material. Varied percussion, as well as piano and harp, augment the orchestra.

Mr. Fricsay will also conduct the Tchaikovsky "Pathétique" Symphony, No. 6, and Haydn's "Clock" Symphony, No. 101.

"I have had quite a classical upbringing, you see," the genial conductor said. "It is always a joy to do some hard work on a Haydn symphony!"

Boston Traveler, Nov. 11/53

33

65

First 'Cello for Mayes From Uncle Will Rogers

It's a long time back to 1881, to the beginning of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the monopoly held on its membership by European musicians.

Now amont the steadily increasing number of American-born and trained players, the Symphony boasts the grandson of a full-blooded Cherokee Indian.

This most American of the young symphony men is Samuel Mayes, 36-year-old principal 'cello, a native of St. Louis.

It was another man of Cherokee descent, who started Mayes on his career—the late home-spun humorist, Will Rogers, a first cousin of the boy's father.

Cousin Will came to call one day when Sam was four. Talking over the youngster's future with his surgeon father, Rogers found that the elder Mayes hoped to have his son follow in his footsteps. The son, even then, thought differently.

To encourage the musical interest he saw in the child, Rogers gave him a tiny 'cello. Four years later, when he was eight, Sam played a solo with the St. Louis Symphony.

From his first teacher, Max Steindel of the St. Louis orchestra, Sam moved at 12 to the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia to study with the noted Felix Salmond. In 1936, at 19, he joined the Philadelphia Orchestra and three years later headed his section and was soloist.

Serge Koussevitzky appointed Mayes as principal 'cello of the Boston Symphony in 1948 and that same year, when he was 31, Mayes made his debut as soloist, winning praise for his tone, technique and youthful buoyancy.

This year Charles Munch is so delighted with Mayes as soloist for the Kabalevsky Cello Concerto, which had its American premiere in November, that he is including it on the short Eastern tour to New York, Washington, Brooklyn, Newark and Providence early next month.

Mayes' seriousness as an artist is in marked contrast to his boyish appearance and off-stage good humor. An ardent baseball fan and loyal St. Louis Cardinals rooter, he once played semi-pro and during vacations was shortstop for the Tulsa Oilers.

The young 'cellist, his wife, Sophie, and two sons, Joe, 9, and Bill, 10, live in Wellesley, their household also including a boxer, a golden retriever and a Pomeranian, which Mrs. Mayes uses as handy models for her sculptures in clay.

BOSTON, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1953

8* Art—Music—Theater THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Doriot Anthony Recital—

Flute Sonata By Hindemith On Program

By Jules Wolffers

The characteristic qualities of the flute which make it such a valued adjunct in the orchestra and in concerted ensemble music also make it something of a problem as a solo instrument throughout an entire program.

To be sure, the flute has its devoted adherents in or out of the orchestra. While this devotion has not been shared to any marked degree by the chief composers of this or any other age, a demand for music for flute has existed for centuries and this demand has been met, albeit somewhat unwillingly at times.

* * *

A fine body of music for flute is thus available, as was shown last night by Doriot Anthony, flutist, and Gregory Tucker, pianist, in a program presented by the John Winthrop Club in the Hale Chapel of the First Church in Boston.

The first flutist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra largely overcame both the limitations and the unfailing sweetness of her instrument by skillful choice of works. The conventional and polite patterns of the Handel Sonata No. 1, for instance, was immediately followed by the challenging nature of the Hindemith Sonata for Flute and Piano (1936). Owing to the fact that the present-day composer made an equal partner of both performers, his essay had much more vitality and interest than did the older model.

* * *

Mr. Tucker wisely chose Brahms for his solo contributions—the Fantasien, Op. 116. The solid texture of these works offered just the contrast needed midway through the program. The pianist's dash and forcefulness made the most of the spirit of the fine set, and it was this spirit that made a few skittered passages of no particular moment.

Miss Anthony returned with some lighter works that exploited the flute's decided penchant to be charming. Folk melodies from Bali and Haiti drew admiring and audible comment from the audience. A fine little Pavane by Saint-Saëns, two delicate works by Roussel, and an exuberant Burlesca by Casella closed this exceptionally well performed and musicianly program.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1953 Art—Music—Theater 15

—Fricsay's U.S. Debut at Symphony

Haydn, Bartók, Tchaikovsky on Program

By Harold Rogers

Ferenc Fricsay, the Hungarian conductor who is now director of the RIAS Symphony Orchestra in Berlin, came to Boston well recommended by the many fine recordings that have preceded him. When he made his American debut yesterday afternoon as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony, his performance was equal to his recordings—an observation that offers much by way of praise but also raises a serious question.

The question is simple. Should not any truly inspired performance in a concert hall carry an emotional message that is over and above anything that a recording can provide?

Recordings, even at today's high technological development, can do no more than transcribe, more or less faithfully, the sound of a concert. Music speaks to us in different ways. It can speak to the ear, to the intellect, or to the heart. The perfect performance speaks to all three at the same time.

* * *

A microphone is a mechanical ear. It can do no more than respond to the sound. However, by observing the form of this recorded sound we can determine the quality of intelligence that has produced it. So a recording may speak to our ears and to our intellects. But can a recording speak to our hearts?

No machine has yet been devised that can record the emotional content of a concert, which, if it exists, is entirely apart from the actual sound of the music. A listener who feels emotion while listening to a recording does so through an ability to generate it within himself; it is not inherent in the sound that issues from his loudspeaker.

It is this three-dimensional power of music—to speak to the ear, the intellect, and the heart—that makes music heard in a concert hall a vivid and dynamic experience. Listeners who accept recorded music as the be-all and end-all of music are depriving themselves of its essence—the poetic substance that leaves the listener inspired and exalted.

* * *

Mr. Fricsay's Boston performance, to return to our original observation, was equal to his recordings. It appealed to the ear; it appealed to the intellect. He is a musical bookkeeper of almost impeccable order. He holds a tight intellectual rein on everything he undertakes. In Haydn's "Clock" Symphony in D major, No. 101, his conception as well as his gestures, was refined, precise, sensitive, and genteel.

This same extraordinary balance was maintained in his lucid reading of Bartók's brilliant Dance Suite, filled as it is with whirling folk rhythms and lyrical tunes. He can vary the intensity from a whisper to a thunderclap.

But with all this gorgeous sound the emotional content was wanting. I had hoped to find it in his reading of the Tchaikovsky Sixth, for if any symphony provides an opportunity for it, there is none better than the "Pathétique." But it was not to be found.

Gordon N. Converse, Staff Photographer

Ferenc Fricsay, conductor of the RIAS Orchestra of Berlin, makes his North American debut this week end as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

34 Nov 14

THE

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Ferenc Fricsay conducting, gave the fourth program of the 73rd season in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon. The program:
Symphony No. 101 in D. "Clock." Haydn
Dance Suite for orchestra......Bartok
Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Op. 74. Tchaikovsky

By RUDOLPH ELIE

There is no disputing the extraordinary and the extraordinary future gift of Ferenc Fricsay.

The 39-year-old Hungarian born conductor from Berlin made his American debut with the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon and it was the occasion of great stimulation for his listeners and great success for him as he demonstrated a mastery of the orchestra technically and personally, that brought him an ovation—Friday afternoon style.

Tall, cherub-faced, bald save for a hat-line of thick brown hair, of graceful, wholly manly carriage, Mr. Fricsay is first of all a tower of strength. Such a tower, indeed, that despite one of the most gymnastic baton styles I have ever seen, a style requiring prodigious expenditure of energy, he traversed the whole program to emerge without trace of weariness, let alone exhaustion.

This magnificent muscularity is by no means an end in itself, nor does it ever lead to wild excesses of motion for the mere sake of motion. It is a basic physical equipment given to few men in a field that by its very nature requires an enormous physical endowment, yet this robust young man who has, since 1948, conducted the RIAS Symphony in Berlin, is so abundantly bestowed with energy and physical force that he conveys the impression, even in his most vigorous moments, of somehow coasting.

This illusion never for one minute conceals either the superb musical coordination of his signals or the extent of his musical esthetic which, if occasionally unusual, is of a most compelling character. It must be remembered that as a touring virtuoso, Mr. Fricsay comes to us with music he knows through and through. Thus, the lightning-like quality of his cues to each section or solor member of the orchestra is perhaps more accentuated in this program than it would be were he to remain with us week after week. More accentuated, too, perhaps, were his infinitely subtle directions for nuance, for molding a phrase, for achieving a swell or a diminution of a musical line.

Still, the impression remained that these inexpressibly vivid signals are an integral part of his equipment. Certainly, the wide variations of gesture and bodily movement are. For now, with baton aimed at the floor, he swings his arm back and forth like a wonderfully musical and expressive pendulum, again he transfers his baton to his left hand and cues with hypnotic force, a solo entrance. Now he crouches to command a situation, again he raises left fist to heaven to call down an avalanche of brass.

Command, indeed, is one of the key words in describing Mr. Fricsay's most imposing quality after his athletic power. Never for a second is he out of command; it radiates through everything he does with a confidence, a security and even an intensity that sweeps over the audience as well as the orchestra. Does his personality sweep across quite as overwhelmingly too? Not quite as powerfully on first contact I would say. He is a man at work, brilliantly at work, but the question now and again arises as to whether the composer is at work too.

The Haydn Symphony went beautifully, there is no doubt about that, but I sometimes felt that the conductor was just a little too busy accenting the voices, contrasting the choirs and nudging the materials to give this work the classical simplicity that so becomes it.

The same approach to Tchaikovsky's well-worn but always effective Sixth worked just the other way, for here the accent of a melancholy phrase, the framing of a solo voice, the dynamic explosion of, well a dynamic explosion, is what gives this work an impact so great that after the march the audience cannot restrain from exploding as well. It did, too, and Mr. Fricsay, breaking a Boston tradition, signalled the astonished orchestra to rise. It deserved it as a matter of fact; it played with magnificent bravura, marred only by one trivial false entrance in the last movement (which I mention just to be always the critic).

All in all, I was most impressed with Mr. Fricsay in Bartok's wonderfully interesting and wonderfully difficult Dance Suite. Here, using a score, the conductor's complete security with every motion was even more impressive because of the great rhythmic complexity. Again, of course, he knows it through and through, but just the same it was a remarkable feat and one that found the orchestra utterly responsive to every detail.

Mr. Fricsay conducts again tonight as well as tomorrow afternoon and Tuesday night, then moves on to appear with the San Francisco orchestra. It's only an idle speculation but could it be he might stay there? Mr. Munch returns next week to do Brahms' Variations, Honegger's First Symphony, and Wagnerian excerpts with Margaret Harshaw as soloist.

Cir. (D 322,441) (S 255,666)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
NOV 14 1953

Music in Review

By TUCKER KEISER

Symphony Concert

Ferenc Fricsay, the young Hungarian who has made a world reputation as conductor of the RIAS (Radio in the American Sector of Berlin) orchestra, yesterday made his American debut leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra in ~~Haydn's~~ "Clock" Symphony, Bartok's Dance Suite, and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony.

Like plate glass, some conductors transmit music from score to audience as if they were transparent media. Like stained glass, some conductors color the music so much that one is impressed by the personality of the conductor rather than that of the composer. Like prisms, some conductors display with unforgettable vividness the qualities inherent in their material. Mr. Fricsay is prismatic.

Mr. Fricsay's conducting is neither pallidly neutral nor violently personal; it is modestly but very effectively expressive. About his podium manner and his reading there is, to be sure, a Teutonic angularity, but there is also a hard, clean, accurate reproduction of the composer's intent.

The clarity of the "Clock" Symphony was delightful; Mr. Fricsay molded every phrase with meticulous accuracy, yet the andante was particularly warm. The conductor is to be congratulated on programming a symphony which has been heard only twice in the history of the orchestra, yet obviously very well known to everyone in the audience through radio performance and recordings.

The Dance Suite of Bela Bartok, tonally a very interesting work because of its employment of Magyar and Arabic motifs, was given a striking reading by Mr. Fricsay, who was a pupil of the composer. Rhythmically the suite is very complex, requiring close attention on the part of members of the orchestra and a high degree of control by the conductor, although, strangely enough for Bartok, the score is not diabolically dissonant.

Probably no one will ever again make the "Pathetique" Symphony sound as well as it did under Koussevitzky's direction, but then, not even Tchaikovsky had very much to do with that famous personal triumph. Mr. Fricsay's reading was respectably straightforward, tonally opulent, and emotionally restrained. For once the Pathetique was treated as if it were music and not melodrama.

There were a few uncomfortable moments when the orchestra, accustomed to plunging into frenzied climactic passages with more than the necessary elan, realized that this conductor was determined to lead and not follow his orchestra. In spite of its embarrassment, the orchestra has seldom played with a better tone.

Nov 14

Music in Review

By TUCKER KEISER

Symphony Concert

Ferenc Fricsay, the young Hungarian who has made a world reputation as conductor of the RIAS (Radio in the American Sector of Berlin) orchestra, yesterday made his American debut leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Haydn's "Clock" Symphony, Bartok's Dance Suite, and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony.

Like plate glass, some conductors transmit music from score to audience as if they were transparent media. Like stained glass, some conductors color the music so much that one is impressed by the personality of the conductor rather than that of the composer. Like prisms, some conductors display with unforgettable vividness the qualities inherent in their material. Mr. Fricsay is prismatic.

Mr. Fricsay's conducting is neither pallidly neutral nor violently personal; it is modestly but very effectively expressive. About his podium manner and his reading there is, to be sure, a Teutonic angularity, but there is also a hard, clean, accurate reproduction of the composer's intent.

The clarity of the "Clock" Symphony was delightful; Mr. Fricsay molded every phrase with meticulous accuracy, yet the andante was particularly warm. The conductor is to be congratulated on programming a symphony which has been heard only twice in the history of the orchestra, yet obviously very well known to everyone in the audience through radio performance and recordings.

The Dance Suite of Bela Bartok, tonally a very interesting work because of its employment of Magyar and Arabic motifs, was given a striking reading by Mr. Fricsay, who was a pupil of the composer. Rhythmically the suite is very complex, requiring close attention on the part of members of the orchestra and a high degree of control by the conductor, although, strangely enough for Bartok, the score is not diabolically dissonant.

Probably no one will ever again make the "Pathetique" Symphony sound as well as it did under Koussevitzky's direction, but then, not even Tchaikovsky had very much to do with that famous personal triumph. Mr. Fricsay's reading was respectably straightforward, tonally opulent, and emotionally restrained. For once the Pathetique was treated as if it were music and not melodrama.

There were a few uncomfortable moments when the orchestra, accustomed to plunging into frenzied climactic passages with more than the necessary elan, realized that this conductor was determined to lead and not follow his orchestra. In spite of its embarrassment, the orchestra has seldom played with a better tone.

Cir. (D 124,110) (S 382,056)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
NOV 14 1953

MUSIC

Fricsay Leads Symphony Making Debut in U. S.

Fifth "regular" program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Symphony Hall. Conducted, as guest, by Ferenc Fricsay, who made his United States debut. The program: Haydn: Symphony No. 101, in D major, "The Clock"; Bartok: Dance Suite; Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetic."

By CYRUS DURGIN

Ferenc Fricsay made his United States debut, yesterday, as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This 39-year-old Hungarian was already known to some extent in this country by the recordings he has made with the Radio in the American Sector (RIAS) Orchestra of Berlin, which he founded in 1948 and has since conducted. His reputation as an able musician also had been spread by international newspaper correspondence. A good deal, consequently, had been expected of him.

Mr. Fricsay's orderly, correct and forceful readings justified the advance report. He does not look like an egotist of the baton, neither do his performances sound that way. In appearance he is slim, balding, precise, his gestures practical and not exhibitionistic. (In fact, with his long-tailed coat and the railing about the conductor's stand, the scene looked severely formal and European.)

The Fricsay conducting technic and his ear are good. He follows scrupulously the directions of a score; but he is no pedant, and he did not fuss over the unnecessarily elaborate crescendo—decrescendo markings which underlie the bassoon solo at the outset of the Tchaikovsky Symphony. The tone is rich, full-bodied; the phrases sing, the orchestral sections remain in balance; the inner voices receive their just prominence, no more and no less; the rhythms follow a long sustained line. Mr. Fricsay can whip up a tremendous roar of sonority, when that is called for, witness the march movement of the "Pathetic," but he does not force or exaggerate. In view of all these attributes, it is too bad he has seen fit to prepare but one program for his four appearances in Boston.

If Mr. Fricsay conducted Haydn's fine Symphony in a way to suggest the clock was running a little slow, that impression vanished when it came to Bartok's excellent Dance Suite. Incidentally, although Koussevitzky introduced the work here in 1926, it has remained for this distinguished guest to revive the Dance Suite after 27 years. High time it was, too, for this is most ingenious, imaginative, piquant music, a marvelous study in dance rhythm and apart from some of the lowest snorts of the brass, a tour de force of orchestration.

Mr. Fricsay was warmly received by the Friday audience, and some cheers were mingled with the applause at concert's end. He deserved every bit of it, even the outburst that came after Tchaikovsky's march in the Symphony. This obviously threw him off a bit, for though he signalled for quiet, it took a couple of minutes to obtain it. Mr. Fricsay's response was appropriate: he signalled the orchestra to rise and take a bow, and if it was an ironic gesture, the hasty palm-smackers were wise to make the best of it.

It suppose it is too much to expect a rouser like this march to go without immediate applause, considering human nature, but any interruption of a symphony is disturbing. As a final observation, let it not go unrecorded that Mr. Fricsay was obviously much impressed with the Boston Symphony; he not only bade them rise repeatedly, but himself gave them several deep bows.

Cir. (D 536,994) (S 1,107,545)
This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-AMERICAN
NOV 1 1953

RECORDS

Reviewed by Roger Dettmer

HONEGGER: SYMPHONY NO. 5 (1949)—ROUSSEL: "BACCHUS ET ARIANE" SUITE NO. 2—RAVEL: PAVAN FOR A DEAD PRINCESS. Charles Munch conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra. (1 12" Victor Lp.)

Commercially speaking, an ascetic item, yet notable for "Bacchus"—a striking score, reminiscent of Debussy, aware of Stravinsky, yet a copy of neither. It adds further fuel to one's growing admiration of the Roussel, a finer composer than his era seemed to think.

On the overside we have Honegger's 1949 symphony for the Koussevitzky Foundation, unfortunately. For it is an hysterical, repetitious piece—mechanically drab and inventively dessicated. The performance seems tense.

Throughout, the sound is bright and immediate, but not the equal of last month's "Romeo" by Berlioz. In part, recommended.

★ ★ ★

real polish—there are fuzzy attacks and releases, poor tonal balances and coarse ensemble soun
Both, in addition, are close-miked recordin overexpose details and leave desired.

★

BARTOK: "
MELOD

Mo sical po

35

Cir. (D 541,485) (Sat. 274,941)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM & SUN

[illegible] 17 1953

School and Educational News

Careers in Music Always Available

Anyone With Talent Can Be Sure Of Getting the Proper Training

By JANE SPRAGUE.

To quote John Ortiz, not everyone who picks up a violin can be a Heifetz, nor can everyone who sits at a piano be an Iturbi. But, he adds, that doesn't mean there aren't excellent chances for careers in music these days.

Our career tipster for today isn't out to tout anyone into the struggle for a career in music. Mr. Ortiz would merely like to point out that the outlook for musically talented young people is most promising right now and gives signs of staying so.

Mr. Ortiz knows the music world as manager of the artist department of Baldwin Piano Co. Part of his job is to seek out new talent. He scouts music students at schools and with private teachers as eagerly as a baseball scout looks for players of major league timber. When he finds a promising talent he tries to interest concert and symphony orchestra managers in his find.

Hand in Hand.

While Mr. Ortiz leans to piano talent, naturally, he looks for any standout musical ability. He and Baldwin are interesetd in promoting music and new artists, as well as their own pianos. The two go hand in hand, they feel.

The last 10 years have seen a great increase of interest in music, Mr. Ortiz says. Television has come along to further develop the appreciation of music which radio fostered, while giving work to musicians. Records are having a vogue again. Summer music festivals are drawing throngs.

Mr. Ortiz finds music schools faced with a demand for good instrumentalists, notably violinists, today. Where there were 111 symphony orchestras in the country in 1941, there are 200 now. Averaging about 80 men, they offer a sizeable job market for class musicians now. Even if the symphonic field shouldn't expand, many musicians will be needed in the coming years as replacements.

Piano Sales Up.

As good a barometer to the present healthy state of music as any, probably, is the sale of pianos. Last year some 160,000 pianos were sold in the country. That's the most in any year since player-piano boom days. This year, sales may reach 200,000.

The really great music talent isn't so much the concern here. Usually the great artist will dedicate himself to his art and work and suffer to make his mark, regardless of how tough the concert world is or what the current outlook.

A Few Tips on Careers.

Talent alone is not enough even in people who want a career in music, but aim short of the concert stage. A lot of schooling and work are apt to be needed, too.

Mr. Ortiz has some tips for young people considering such a career. Get an audition to see whether your talent warrants taking music as anything more than a cultural pursuit. Any good music school will gladly hear your work, Mr. Ortiz says. If you show real promise you might even wind up with a scholarship at the school. Mr. Ortiz himself will audition hopeful young pianists.

If possible, get into the music workshop of one of the summer music festivals, as the famed ones at Tanglewood, Mass., and Aspen, Colo. Some scholarships are available for instruction by some of the world's greatest artists.

Potential musicians are lucky to be in this city, center of music culture and home of so many top schools and teachers. There are schools to suit students of varied ages and at any stage of musical advancement. There are conservatories offering thorough music training, colleges with music courses in their four-year degree programs, and specialized schools where courses are available in everything from harpsichord to the Gregorian chant.

Can Be Expensive.

Music education can run into a lot of money. But, Mr. Ortiz says, no young person with talent who lacks the means for music lessons need go without help today. Arrangements for instruction can be made through music schools of local settlement houses. Some fine teachers give their services to this worthy work, Mr. Ortiz says.

Let Mr. Ortiz make one more point about music careers. For those who don't make the concert hall or symphony orchestra, and who may not have the ability or want to gamble on writing or arranging music, what's wrong with a music teaching career, he asks. About 7,000,000 persons take music instruction in this country, Mr. Ortiz says. They need a lot of teaching.

We might remind those with further questions about music careers that counselling service and information on schools is available, free, at Vocational Advisory Service, 432 Fourth Ave. That's a division of the New York State Labor Department.

Cir. (D 299,461) (S 516,478)

This Clipping From
CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAIN DEALER

NOV 15 1953

Depend

Right Off the Records

By Stewart Matter

Victor brings us a release of the greatest interest, a first complete recording of the sublimely beautiful incidental music Berlioz wrote for "Romeo and Juliet" in a powerful evocative performance by Charles Munch, the Boston Symphony, Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and soloists.

This is one of Berlioz' most inspired works; had he written no other he would still find his place among the most inspired of all time. It contains pages of supernal delight, passages of overwhelming exaltation and some of the most effective scoring of this master tone painter.

How grateful we are that Munch was entrusted with the direction of this work, for he has brought to it a sense of understanding which is translated through the performing artists into a living, pulsing sense of reality which makes for the listener an experience he will treasure for hours after the sounds have ceased. A strikingly realistic reproductive standard is further reason to place this among the most important releases we have ever had. Two records with full French-English libretto, boxed. Victor LM-6011.

Cir. (D 323,939) (S 700,668)

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CAL.
EXAMINER

NOV 8 1953

Classical

French Works on Wax

By Patterson Greene
Examiner Drama-Music Editor

Record of the Week—

Honegger, Fifth Symphony; Roussel, "Bacchus and Ariadne" Ballet Suite; and Ravel, "Pavane for a Dead Princess," played by the Boston Symphony under Charles Munch.

● THREE modern French works find an understanding interpreter in Charles Munch, with the unsurpassed Boston Symphony to carry out the intentions of composers and conductor.

The Fifth Symphony of Arthur Honegger (a Swiss by birth, but musically French) represents the composer at his mature best: vigorous, original, dignified, with free but logical use of dissonance.

The "Bacchus and Ariadne" Suite of Albert Roussel may stimulate the imagination to follow the mythological story of the ballet, or it may be taken as pure music. In either instance it stands on its merits, being inventive and brightly colored. The gentle "Pavane for a Dead Princess" of Ravel, one of the composer's loveliest miniatures, is played delightfully.

Heard through a high fidelity speaker, the recording leaves little to be desired. Through a less sensitive speaker it comes with a certain shrillness that can be modified, on most instruments, by a little tempering of the high frequencies. (One double faced 12 inch RCA Victor disc, LP.)

Opera Highlights—

[illegible] from "The Bar[illegible] "Lucia," "The [illegible] "Aida," [illegible]

Cir. (D 172,699)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
Christian Science Monitor

NOV 17 1953

Ferenc Fricsay Conducts Cast of German Singers

By Klaus George Roy

The Hungarian conductor Ferenc Fricsay, at present making guest appearances in this country, leads a magnificent performance of Wagner's "The Flying Dutchman" on three disks for Decca.

This much-maligned early work is really a masterpiece, and those who have a tendency to become exasperated with the later music-dramas might well get to know it. It is full of marvelous "set pieces," grand melodies, no wearying leitmotifs, and containing some of the best choral ensembles before "Die Meistersinger."

The cast is outstanding, featuring Joseph Greindl, Wolfgang Windgassen, Annelies Kupper, Sieglinde Wagner, Ernst Häflinger, together with Joseph Metternich as the Dutchman. Only Miss Kupper as Senta disappoints vocally, uncomfortably recalling Anna Russell, the satirist.

The RIAS Symphony Orchestra and Chorus of Berlin perform stirringly for their regular conductor, and the sound is topnotch. Decca has enclosed one of the handsomest booklets available with opera on disks. It includes an extra-clear libretto, illustrations, and Ernest Newman's essay on the work with 43 music examples.

* * *

From London comes the first LP version of Ambroise Thomas's "Mignon," also on three disks. The charming and once very popular opera gets a generally good performance from the Chorus of the Theâtre de la Monnaie in Brussels and L'Orchestra National de Belgique under Georges Sebastien. Geneviève Moizan, Janine Micheau, Libero De Luca, and Renè Bianco are the principals, and if none of them are stars of the first magnitude (which some feel this opera needs) they shine audibly enough. The recorded sound is splendid.

A highly welcome disk is issued by RCA Victor: Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing Arthur Honegger's Fifth Symphony with Albert Roussel's Second "Bacchus et Ariane" Suite and Ravel's "Pavane" on the reverse. The Roussel Suite is a beautiful work, certainly some of the finest ballet music of this century. Pleasant as is the Ravel piece, we would have preferred to have the Roussel complete on the side, instead of being cut so heavily.

* * *

As to the Honegger Symphony—this reviewer is forced to reserve judgment on its lasting qualities. That it is superbly scored, concise and potent in expression, there is no doubt. But there is something about it which rings false and a little empty. Honegger is supremely an illustrative composer, as his big choral pageants prove, and in much of his instrumental music one is constantly tempted to look for a story.

If Honegger's Fifth does perhaps not match his memorable Second, it surely seems better than the Third, the so-called "Symphonie Liturgique" of 1946, now issued on a Urania disk by

---

Cir. (D 30,663)

This Clipping From
QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER

NOV 11 1953

Quincy PM's Hear Critic

Mrs. David Walker, program chairman of the P.M. department of the Quincy Women's Club, presented Rudolph Elie, music critic and columnist of the Boston Herald, as guest speaker for their annual guest night last evening.

With his subtle humor, delicate wit and rare insight, Mr. Elie took his audience on a tour of Europe with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He explained that for some 25 years the late Serge Koussevitsky's dream had been such a tour, and ironically enough, it was due to his interest in playing new music by American and European contemporaries that finally made the tour possible after his death.

Mr. Elie spoke of the chauvinistic approach of French (and English critics) to most American orchestras, but said, "In Paris for the first time in 43 years the Boston Symphony Orchestra played an encore. (This was later repeated in Lyons.)" He explained, "It isn't that the ladies on Friday afternoon don't like the way the orchestra plays, but it's an effort to applaud." He told of the historic night in Paris when the orchestra played Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring" on its 39th anniversary, giving the 70-year-old composer a great reception, quite in reverse to the premiere, when he had to leave pursued by a jeering mob."

He described playing for the American Army of Occupation in Frankfurt, the attitude of the Germans there and in Berlin, Mr. Monteux's home in Strassbourg, and in London. Mr. Elie said, "Americans are among the most disliked people in the world when they travel. Europeans are not impressed by our gadgets, our money which never seeps down to their level, or by our military power. Western Europeans simply don't want to fight again—they have had it for generations. It is a pity that too many American tourists make such vulgar impressions, and that we send too few cultural projects to Europe which believes that there is simply no culture in the United States."

Mrs. Gray Pearson presided at the meeting. Following reports, Miss Sally Moscardelli reported on the recent P.M. state meeting. Mrs. William Maiers reported on the sale of cookbooks, project of the Senior club. Mrs. Hobart K. Robinson, chairman, called attention to the annual charity dance Nov. 18 at the Neighborhood Club.

Members voted on a waiting list, recommended by the executive board, and a donation to be used for veterans' service at Christmas.

Mrs. Leslie Cawelti also reported on the sale of place mats, and on a MSFWC project to provide reforestation for the devastated Worcester area.

Hostesses were Miss Bertha Koegler and Miss Gertrude Callahan. Assisting were Miss Inga Carlson, Miss Melba Conrad, Miss Gladys DeLuca, Miss M. Louise Dinegan, Miss Cassie Grant, Mrs. Philip J. Gacicia, Mrs. James Mahon, Miss Robina Purdon, Mrs. Patrick J. Tangney and Miss Margaret Whalen.

* * *

36

Cir. (35,106)

This Clipping From NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NOV 14 1953

Records

B. H. Haggin

BERLIOZ provided another overwhelming experience recently, this time with music I hadn't heard before. The beautiful songs "L'Absence" and "Le Spectre de la rose" that I had known from Maggie Teyte's record are part of a set called "Nuits d'été," which was recorded a few years ago for London by Suzanne Danco with the Cincinnati Symphony under Thor Johnson. The record wasn't sent to me for review; and I also missed Eleanor Steber's performance with the New York Philharmonic under Mitropoulos last spring; but recently a friend played a tape recording of the broadcast of that performance, which enabled me to hear for the first time two songs—"Sur les lagunes" and "Au cimetière"—that are among the most wonderful manifestations of Berlioz's powers.

In "Sur les lagunes" Berlioz uses a favorite procedure—the repetition at intervals of an unchanged figure that sounds different each time in the new context of the developing musical thought. One of the great examples is the Offertorium of the Requiem, in which the chorus sings its plaintive three-note figure at intervals during the increasingly elaborate and ever newly inventive fugal developments and expansive melodic episodes of the long orchestral movement; another is Juliet's Funeral Procession in "Romeo and Juliet," in which the chorus's plaintive Jetez des fleurs! on the repeated note E is heard similarly during the fugal development and melodic episode played by the orchestra, and then the fugal development and melodic episode are sung by the chorus with the plaintive E's heard at intervals from the violins. In "Sur les lagunes" it is the orchestra's somber three-note figure in the first measure that continues to punctuate the succession of wonderful vocal phrases which pivot on wonderful shifts of harmony; but it is from the voice that we hear the figure the last time at the end.

"Au cimetière" offers not only the exquisite vocal melody that deploys itself with intricate rhythmic irregularity over the bar-lines, but the exciting activity of the orchestra in which we hear the Berlioz mind constantly in operation. In the opening section that activity is the occasional plucked bass notes which add to the rhythmic irregularity; in the new section beginning with On dirait que l'âme éveillée the voice's repeated A's are punctuated by the woodwind's poignant two-note chromatic figure, which is made suddenly exciting by its increased animation and the plucked bass notes; at the climax of this section a moment later there are brilliant flourishes by the woodwinds, then their poignant two-note figure is heard again, with the violins adding gleaming harmonics, as the voice continues toward the pause for the return of the opening section; and this now is made overwhelming by a poignant descending figure of the muted violins and violas.

Unfortunately this figure, like some other orchestral details, is not clearly audible in the London performance, partly as a result of Danco's being placed too close to the microphone; and another consequence is that her lovely voice sounds unlovely in loud passages. In addition Johnson's conducting produces nothing more than a statement of the notes. One hopes therefore that Columbia recorded the superb Steber-Mitropoulos performance; but meanwhile the London record is something to acquire for the music and the singing.

RCA Victor's recording of the entire "Romeo and Juliet" of Berlioz makes the vocal portions of the work available on records for the first time. Unfortunately tradition appears to require the chorus in a Boston Symphony performance to be made up of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, with the result that in the choral Prologue we hear rough-toned and crudely four-square singing of music which Berlioz directs shall have the character of recitative, and in Juliet's Funeral Procession we hear not the plaintive Jetez—des fleurs! that is marked pp in the score but an aggressively accented JE—TEZ—DES FLEURS! In addition Margaret Roggero's tremulous contralto voice is damaging to the Stanzas that follow the Prologue. But the exquisite Scherzetto is sung well by Leslie Chabay.

Munch isn't responsible for the poor voices of the chorus, but he is responsible for the way it sings; and he also is responsible for the numerous details that reveal a lack of the sense for the right tempo, the sense for the right measure and proportion in change of tempo, change of sonority, and inflection of phrase that makes for continuity and coherence in the progression. The Love Scene suffers most from this ineptitude; and one of the worst examples is provided by the più animato passage on p. 170 of the Eulenburg score, in which a brief statement is repeated in a crescendo to a climax, and Munch each time accelerates the beginning of the statement only to slow down almost immediately in crude expansive emphasis of its end, thus producing a series of awkward starts and stops instead of the continuous progression. Moreover, except for the "Queen Mab" of Part 4 one wouldn't recognize the sound which comes off the records as that of the Boston Symphony; and the "Queen Mab" indicates that elsewhere the recording only makes worse what wasn't good in Symphony Hall. It is the recording which gives us Romeo in the Vault of the Capulets without its concluding pizzicato A; but it is Munch who gives us the "Queen Mab" with an extra stroke the antique cymbal after the wonderful ostinato passage.

This recording too is therefore something to acquire only for the music that isn't available on other records, until Toscanini records his performance.

Haydn's Symphony No. 92 ("Oxford"), one of his greatest, and Mozart's G minor get characteristically placid performances by Krips with the London Symphony (London) in which the dynamically lively Haydn lacks animation and the impassioned G minor is unimpassioned. The orchestra is excellent.

One of Dvorak's most beautiful pieces, the "Carnival" Overture, played by the Linz Bruckner Symphony under Georg Jochum, is on a Urania record with the melodious but long and rambling Symphonic Suite from Dvorak's opera "The Jacobin," played by the Radio Berlin Symphony under Kurt Kretschmar, and the uninteresting Overture to Smetana's "Libussa," played by the same orchestra under Rother. Good performances.

Cir. (D 149,648)

This Clipping From
CINCINNATI, OHIO
POST
NOV 21 1953

Records

Honegger, Roussel, Cowell Discs Tops

By Eleanor Bell

Those of us who sometimes charge the record companies with doing the same things over and over will have to hold our tongues this month. What's more, we'll gladly acknowledge a debt to Victor for its recording of Honegger's Symphony No. 5 and Roussel's "Bacchus and Ariane", and to Mercury for its new recording of Henry Cowell's Symphony No. 4.

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are heard in the two vigorous French works. The recording itself is decked out in Victor's New Orthophonic Sound. It could hardly be improved upon from the standpoint of performance or engineering. Both these pieces are overdue in the catalogs, too.

Mr. Renardy can cept for this excessi
Caprices sound wel promises the next order. I like my C olin alone, but i paniment makes atable to non-fi
ing to go alon

FRANCK:
Minor (Detr
chestra, Pa
Mercury 1
ingly life
a volum make and c to ha at dis fi
M

Cir. (D 37,475)

This Clipping From
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
NOV 21 1953

Cellist To Play New Concerto

To Perform With Boston Symphony Orchestra

Samuel Mayes, principal cellist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1948, will play a new cello concerto by Dmitri Kabalevsky Tuesday night with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, conductor, in the Veterans' Memorial Auditorium, Providence.

Another new work, the "Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra No. 2 with Solo String Quartet" by Ernest Bloch, will be introduced by Dr. Munch in this first concert of the 1953-54 Providence series by the orchestra. The concert begins at 8:15.

Mr. Mayes is the "most American" musician in the entire group. His grandfather was a full-blooded Cherokee Indian. The late Will Rogers, who was his father's cousin, started Mr. Mayes on his musical career by presenting him with a baby-size cello. He became so proficient that he appeared as soloist with the St. Louis Orchestra at the age of 8. At 14, he was accepted as a student at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia. He joined the Philadelphia Orchestra at the age of 19, and at 22 was principal cellist and soloist. He made his New York debut recital in 1944. He was appointed principal cellist with the Boston Symphony by the late Serge Koussevitsky in 1948.

Outside of music, he is a baseball fan and at one time he played semi-professionally with the Tulsa Oilers as shortstop. He is married, has two sons, and lives in Wellesley, Mass.

The program is as follows:

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra No. 2	Bloch
The "Le Tombeau de Couperin" Suite	Ravel
Intermission
Concerto For Cello and Orchestra	Kabalevsky
Symphony No. 4 in E-Minor	Brahms

Cir. (D 181,189) (S 291,208)

This Clipping From
MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL
NOV 22 1953

Reviewing

Munch Leads In French

ANOTHER French program is provided by Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on a Victor LP. One side is for Arthur Honegger's Fifth Symphony, composed in 1949 for the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. The other is for Albert Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane" Suite, leaving enough microgrooves for Ravel's gravely beautiful "Pavane for a Dead Princess." The Honegger symphony will not scare away any conservatives, but they will not find it immediately agreeable.

A couple of hearings will reveal the inner strength and dignity of this music. Honegger's style generally has a percussive impact, from the massive chords hurled from the brasses to the staccato utterances of the clarinet in the second movement. The long melodic line of a Brahms, a Tschaikowsky, a Sibelius is not in this crisp incisive symphony. In direct contrast is the bright hued, sometimes blazing ballet music about the mythical Ariadne, abandoned by Theseus, saved by Bacchus. It is ingratiating, insinuating stuff if nowhere near as dazzlingly sensuous as Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe."

65

Cir. (D 124,110) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

1953

IRMGARD SEEFRIED, Viennese soprano, who will make her Boston debut in the season's first Boston Morning Musicale at the Hotel Statler Wednesday morning.

HARRY ELLIS DICKSON, member of the Boston Symphony, will conduct a group of his confreres in a children's concert at Brookline High School this afternoon at 2.

MUSIC

Miss Harshaw Soloist in Wagner at Symphony

Sixth program in the Friday afternoon—Saturday evening series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch music director. At Symphony Hall. The program: Brahms: Variations on a Theme of Haydn; Honegger: First Symphony; Wagner: Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde." Immolation Scene from "Goetterdaemmerung"; soloist, Margaret Harshaw, soprano.

By CYRUS DURGIN

One of the rare musical peaks of a lifetime came toward the end of the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. This was a performance of the Immolation Scene from "Goetterdaemmerung" that wsa orchestrally stupendous, and only a little less so in Margaret Harshaw's voicing of Bruennhilde's farewell to the visible world.

The Immolation Scene will always be one of the marvels of the tragic spirit in the poetry of music; its dimensions are cosmic, its expression of grief, tragic comprehension and transfigured yielding to destiny is of a supreme eloquence.

It is one of those achievements in art so great that, considering the human necessity both to be moved and to laugh, Anna Russell can amuse us with her reductio ad absurdum of it on the same stage where, a day later, so consummate a performance can give us a vision of something colossal.

The Immolation Scene demands so much of an orchestra, conductor and singer that to realize all its vast profundities and beauties is almost impossible. In the opera house it cannot be done. But with the Boston Symphony, I do think the impossible was closely approached yesterday. This was the best Wagner conducting Mr. Munch has achieved here, a reading of utmost passion, gorgeous sound, and of true epic power.

Miss Harshaw, who was appearing in Boston for the first time as soloist with this orchestra, and for the first time as a soprano, sang with extraordinary beauty of tone and style, making the words clear, and coming very close to Olympian exaltation of tragedy if not quite managing it.

It has long seemed to me that the highest point of eloquence in the whole "Ring" are those words of Bruennhilde: "Alles! Alles! Alles weiss ich: alles ward mir nun frei," and the scale of a singer's mastery of the part must be reckoned from a certain stark and tragic nobility with which she must utter them. That Miss Harshaw did not quite accomplish.

In her progress from contralto to soprano Miss Harshaw has lost none of the large, velvety beauty of voice for which we have known her. If there was almost too much vibrato in her tone, at the start of the Liebestod—which she delivered in perhaps the most poignant, womanly manner I ever have heard—it did not remain. Miss Harshaw reaped a terrific reward of applause and cheers, all of which she richly deserved.

Brahms and Honegger were left in shadow by the Wagnerian magnificence, which was unfortunate but not fatal. Mr. Munch read the Brahms neatly and finely, if taking the fifth and eighth variations a trifle too fast.

It was time the Honegger First Symphony, composed for the Boston Symphony's 50th anniversary season, was revived. Under all the nonsense of dissonance and waggish effects of rhythmic irregularity, this is a most cleverly organized piece. It has melody, too, if you can persist in finding it.

The technic of structure and writing for orchestra are masterly. Were we to hear the Symphony with some frequency I think all but a minority of intransigent conservatives would recognize its worth.

Cir. (D 294,897) (S 282,207)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

NOV 21 1953

Music in Review

BY TUCKER KEISER

Symphony Concert

Margaret Harshaw, a Metropolitan Opera soprano who was once a contralto, scored a great personal triumph yesterday afternoon when she appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as guest soloist in the Liebestod from Wagner's Tristan and in the Immolation Scene from Gotterdammerung. These two selections plus the Tristan Prelude comprised the second half of the concert. Mr. Munch opened the program with Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn and Honegger's Symphony No. 1.

Miss Harshaw, who has a Brunnhilde physique, has for the most part been successful in the transition from the low voice parts to the dramatic high voice roles. A slight vibrato, which threatens to become a tremolo when the singer approaches a climax, is a telltale sign that the technique is not completely secure.

This was particularly noticeable yesterday in the Immolation scene where the music requires a huge vocal sound to compete with the waves of orchestral sound. It is also true that on the extremely high notes, which are necessarily sung fortissimo, the singer loses quality.

However, in the Liebestod, a scene demanding much lyric singing, Miss Harshaw was always opulent in timbre; here the music gave the soloist time to prepare a tone of the very best quality. Miss Harshaw created her own characters on stage without benefit of scenery, supporting actors (except the orchestra), or costumes.

Mr. Munch gave the singer splendid support, and this attention to detail and to nuance, too often absent in our symphony concerts, allowed the orchestra a chance for resplendent tone. Let us hope that when the conductor performs other Wagnerian excerpts, he has an experienced soloist to give him the tempo.

Excessive Silences

The opening Brahms was characterized by excessively long silences between variations and excessive speed in the faster sections. The reading, with these two reservations, was straightforward and unexceptional.

Honnegger's Symphony No. 1, written for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony in 1930, must have been received with misgivings at its initial appearance. Twenty-three years ago its dissonance would have been more shocking than it was yesterday.

The work is uneven. The first movement, using an ostinato as its generative powers, has one fat tune, shared by cellos and trumpets, when not overshadowed by tone-cluster chords used as exclamation points and a certain monotony in the technical details. At the end, the ostinato loses its momentum and the movement fades away.

The second movement, adagio, is built on a slowly rising bass line, a melody in the fiddles and ornamental passages in the woodwinds. The climax is reached in the middle and the music subsides at the end. The final rondo fidgeted at the starting gate and never got away.

Cir. (D 131,670) (S 258,529)

This Clipping From 3
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

NOV 21 1953

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the sixth concert of the 73d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Margaret Harshaw, soprano, was the soloist. The program:

Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56A .... Brahms
Symphony No. 1 .... Honegger
Prelude and "Liebested" from "Tristan"
"Immolation Scene" from Goetterdaemerung" .... Wagner

By RUDOLPH ELIE

It will be difficult indeed for any solo artist in the concerts to come to exceed the sensation achieved yesterday afternoon by Margaret Harshaw. She was magnificent, magnificent, and so, for that matter, was Charles Munch.

Not since the great days of Kirsten Flagstad and Kirsten Thorborg at the top of their form has Wagnerian singing on the concert stage equalled this for the range of its emotional quality or the power and brilliance of its vocal capacity. Miss Harshaw who, if she is still not back at the peak of her vocal abilities, revealed it not at all (she had to cancel an engagement with the New York Philharmonic only this week owing to laryngitis), is a dramatic soprano in the fullest sense of the term.

Her voice—and this is a most telling point — is exceptionally even in quality throughout its range. At the top it has devastating force but firmness as well; it never spreads out or becomes shrill or strident. At the bottom it retains its force, too, and its color, which is full and rich but of silvery sheen. She is, in short, vocally an indisputably great singer, with a mastery of every detail of breath control and musical nuance, and that special strength-in-reserve to rise to ever increasing climaxes after exhausting demands.

Yet great voices often occur in empty heads, and Miss Harshaw's is anything but wanting in intellectual and esthetic gifts. Her grasp of the Wagnerian style as well as of its very school and tradition is complete, and she sings it (in a wonderfuly uncluttered German, too) with immense conviction, immense devotion. Indeed, she sings it with such an overwhelming nobility touched ever with passion, she all but revives the whole Wagnerian cycle—though who could play the Tristan to her Isolde?

The curious thing is that Munch himself, in his own shattering concept of this music, all but revives it as well. We have noted his touch with Wagner before in, for instance, the Meistersinger prelude but this is our first experience with him in these two works, and it is a gripping experience indeed. Somehow, in the Liebestod, he revealed a personal identification that carried everything before him, singer as well as orchestra, while he gave the Immolation scene a truly heroic sweep from beginning to end. The orchestra, equipped with four Bayreuth tubas for the occasion, gave him all it had to produce, in the final peroration, one of the hugest utterances in all music. This, in fine, was a memorable occasion, and one that held the audience for an ovation.

Arthur Honnegger's First Symphony, repeated here for the first time since its performance on the occasion of the 50th anniversary of the orchestra in 1930 (for which occasion is was composed), remains a difficult work to appreciate and, for that matter, appraise. Its first movement is extremely motoric in quality, filled with dissonant tensions and crowded with rhythmic complexities, and it never falters in its underlying force and urgency. Yet its communication remains obscure; it never yields; it never communicates sav ein its great energy, its austere power. You are always impressed and often carried along, but not easily; you have to listen very hard to find its meaning and its purpose. The slow movement, of a protracted, dirge-like quality of great solemnity and bleakness, is clearer in meaning, while the finale, a brisk scherzo-like march, concludes with one of the most beautiful and touching passages to occur in contermporary music. Yet even after 23 years this remains a difficult nut to crack, though the obvious power of its utterance was sufficient yesterday to bring it more applause than greets much contemporary music.

The concert began with a warm and radiantly beautiful performance of Brahms' "Haydn" Variations, a piece that never loses its freshness and

---

AY, NOVEMBER 21, 1953 Art—Music—Theater 11

haw Soloist at the Symphony

Soprano Sings Two Excerpts From Wagner

By Harold Rogers

Something happened yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall that has not happened in a long, long time. It was the glorious reinstatement of the Golden Age of operatic singing, said to have been sadly languishing since the turn of the century.

The golden-throated singer is Margaret Harshaw, dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Association. If we had more singers of Miss Harshaw's caliber, there would be no need for longing memories. We'd live exalted musical lives in the present.

This rare sunburst of outpouring song and noble emotion was achieved through the combined talents of Miss Harshaw, Charles Munch, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The musical fabric, provided by Wagner, consisted of the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde" and the "Immolation Scene" from "Götterdämmerung."

* * *

The first triumph was achieved by Mr. Munch in the "Tristan" Prelude where he created a tremendous undercurrent of tension and built the climax to thunderous intensity.

Miss Harshaw then stepped forward to sing the "Liebestod," presenting it subjectively with a mien that summoned up the scene of Isolde's great love, heartbreak, and demise. Her soprano, though not yet having the bountiful opulence of Flagstad's, is stunning in its clarity, brilliance, accuracy, and power. How eloquently she built the crescendos! How skillfully she prepared the climaxes!

But the crowning triumph of the concert was the "Immolation Scene" where Miss Harshaw portrayed Brünnhilde's agony and ecstacy at the funeral pyre of Siegfried. Mr. Munch's handling of the orchestra was no less exciting. Here was the perfect collaboration that produced a vivid performance. Miss Harshaw's manner while receiving the ovation from the standing listeners was one of humility, sincerity, and graciousness.

* * *

By comparison the rest of the concert pales in significance. Mr. Munch's opening selection, the Brahms Variations on a Theme of Haydn, was played as thoughtfully and beautifully as one might wish. The Honegger First Symphony, however, was in stark contrast with the rest of the music, though it had much of interest to commend it.

Completed in 1930 and dedicated to the Boston Symphony, whose fiftieth anniversary it commemorated, the work belongs to that period in Honegger's career when he was more of a "rough writer." But it holds clear glimpses of the refined symphonic style that appeared in his Second, composed some 10 years later, and which brought forth a masterpiece in the Fifth.

There is his unmistakable vitality, a nervous quality that seldom allows for relaxation. There is his dramatic use of the brass, especially melodically against a pattern of strings. But in his First—particularly in the middle Adagio movement and in the final Presto—he makes use of a descending glissando effect, usually in the brass, that is distracting and often humorous. It is one of those effects that unfortunately draws attention to its oddness, thus destroying whatever aesthetic value it may have.

But even though one can see many fine things in this symphony, it leaves a total impression that is unsatisfactory. One feels that Honegger has made an almost willful use of dissonance, employing it for startling reasons, rather than artistic ones. We shouldn't rebel at dissonance—an integral part of our musical system for centuries, though usually to a lesser degree than nowadays. But we have a right to question it when it doesn't appear to support the basic meaning of the work.

---

point. Next week Mr. Munch will present the first Boston performance of Prokofieff's Seventh Symphony, as well as excerpts from that composer's "The Love for Three Oranges"; Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto (Zadel Skolosky, pianist) and Borodin's Polovtzian Dances.

Cir. (D 139,855)
This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
NOV 25 1953

Music

Boston Symphony Plays First Concert In Providence Series

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the first concert of its Providence series last evening at Veterans Memorial Auditorium. A capacity audience heard Charles Munch conduct one of the most interesting programs this orchestra has played here recently. Samuel Mayes, first 'cellist with the orchestra, was the soloist in a brilliant performance of Dmitri Kabalevsky's Concerto for violoncello and orchestra, Op. 49.

The program:

Bloch ....Concerto Grosso No. 2, for String Orchestra.
  I. Maestoso; Allegro (Fuga); Maestoso
  II. Andante
  III. Allegro
  IV. Tema con variazioni (Tranquillo—Animato—Tranquillo—Allegro)
Ravel ....“Le Tombeau de Couperin,” Suite
  I. Prelude
  II. Forlane
  III. Menuet
  IV. Rigaudon
Kabalevsky ....Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, Op. 49.
  I. Allegro
  II. Largo: Molto espressivo
  III. Allegretto
Brahms ....Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98
  I. Allegro non troppo
  II. Andante moderato
  III. Allegro giocoso
  IV. Allegro energico e passionato
Soloist—Samuel Mayes

From the start of the concert, the musicians were in rare form and we heard tone quality of great beauty from every section of the orchestra. Exceptional demands were made on the strings and they measured up to the highest standard of accomplishment throughout the concert.

The Concerto Grosso No. 2 for String orchestra by Ernest Bloch was the opening work and it proved to be a wonderfully constructed piece. The richness of the thematic material could not be fully appreciated at one hearing. The form of the work displayed the eloquent string quartet against the full complement of strings and the skill with which Dr. Munch set forth the alternating themes made listening an exhilarating experience. The intricate counterpoint of the first sections, the persistent descending figure in the third section and the colorful chromatic passages held the interest throughout the work. This music, written in 1952, is the type of modern writing which begs to be heard again.

The Ravel Suite gave the reed players a chance to play their most delicately shaded tones. There was a transparency about the tonal fabric of these pieces which was exactly suited to their fragile style. The Menuet was simply perfection for rhythm and color. The Rigaudon was taken at a smart pace and it seemed a lively dance indeed. One of the most amazing feats of this Ravel interpretation was the diminuendo of the trill at the end of the Menuet.

Samuel Mayes played a brilliant performance of the melodious Kabalevsky concerto. His tone was so vibrant and true that the real difficulty of the work was not apparent. He has unlimited technical facility and this, coupled with his deep feeling for the expressiveness of the music, gave us one of the most rewarding performances of many seasons. There was a special quality about the slow movement. It came from the entire ensemble as if to do exceptional honor to the artistry of one of their own group. Performances such as this are not too often heard. The soloist was recalled four times.

For solid symphonic fare, the program was rounded out by a superb interpretation of the Brahms fourth symphony. Here one just sat back and marveled at the conductor, who, without score, placed every phrase in true relation to its meaning in the composition. The Andante was most expressive. The Allegro giocoso was brilliant in its exposition and the symphony ended with a splendid climax which brought prolonged applause.

It is pertinent to the occasion to remind concert goers here that these Boston Symphony concerts must of necessity start at eight-fifteen, a quarter hour earlier than the usual concert time. Travel from Boston, with connections there, make this mandatory. It would make things easier and pleasanter for all if the few late-comers could plan for this earlier hour.

Cir. (D 26,991)
This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
NOV 21 1953

TAC

Koussevitzky Memorial Fund Committee Increases Goal

$15,000 Is Aim For Scholarships To Tanglewood Center

A committee of 21 Berkshire County residents who have organized to create a Koussevitzky memorial fund yesterday increased the goal from $5,000 to $15,000.

Meeting at a Dutch-treat luncheon at the Country Club of Pittsfield, the committee decided on the increase upon the advice of Leonard Bernstein's lawyer. Income from the $15,000 fund will provide an annual full scholarship for conductors at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood.

A total of $3,195 already has been realized from 85 donors, and letters will be sent out asking for contributions. All interested persons are invited to send checks to Paul K. Fodder of the Agricultural National Bank.

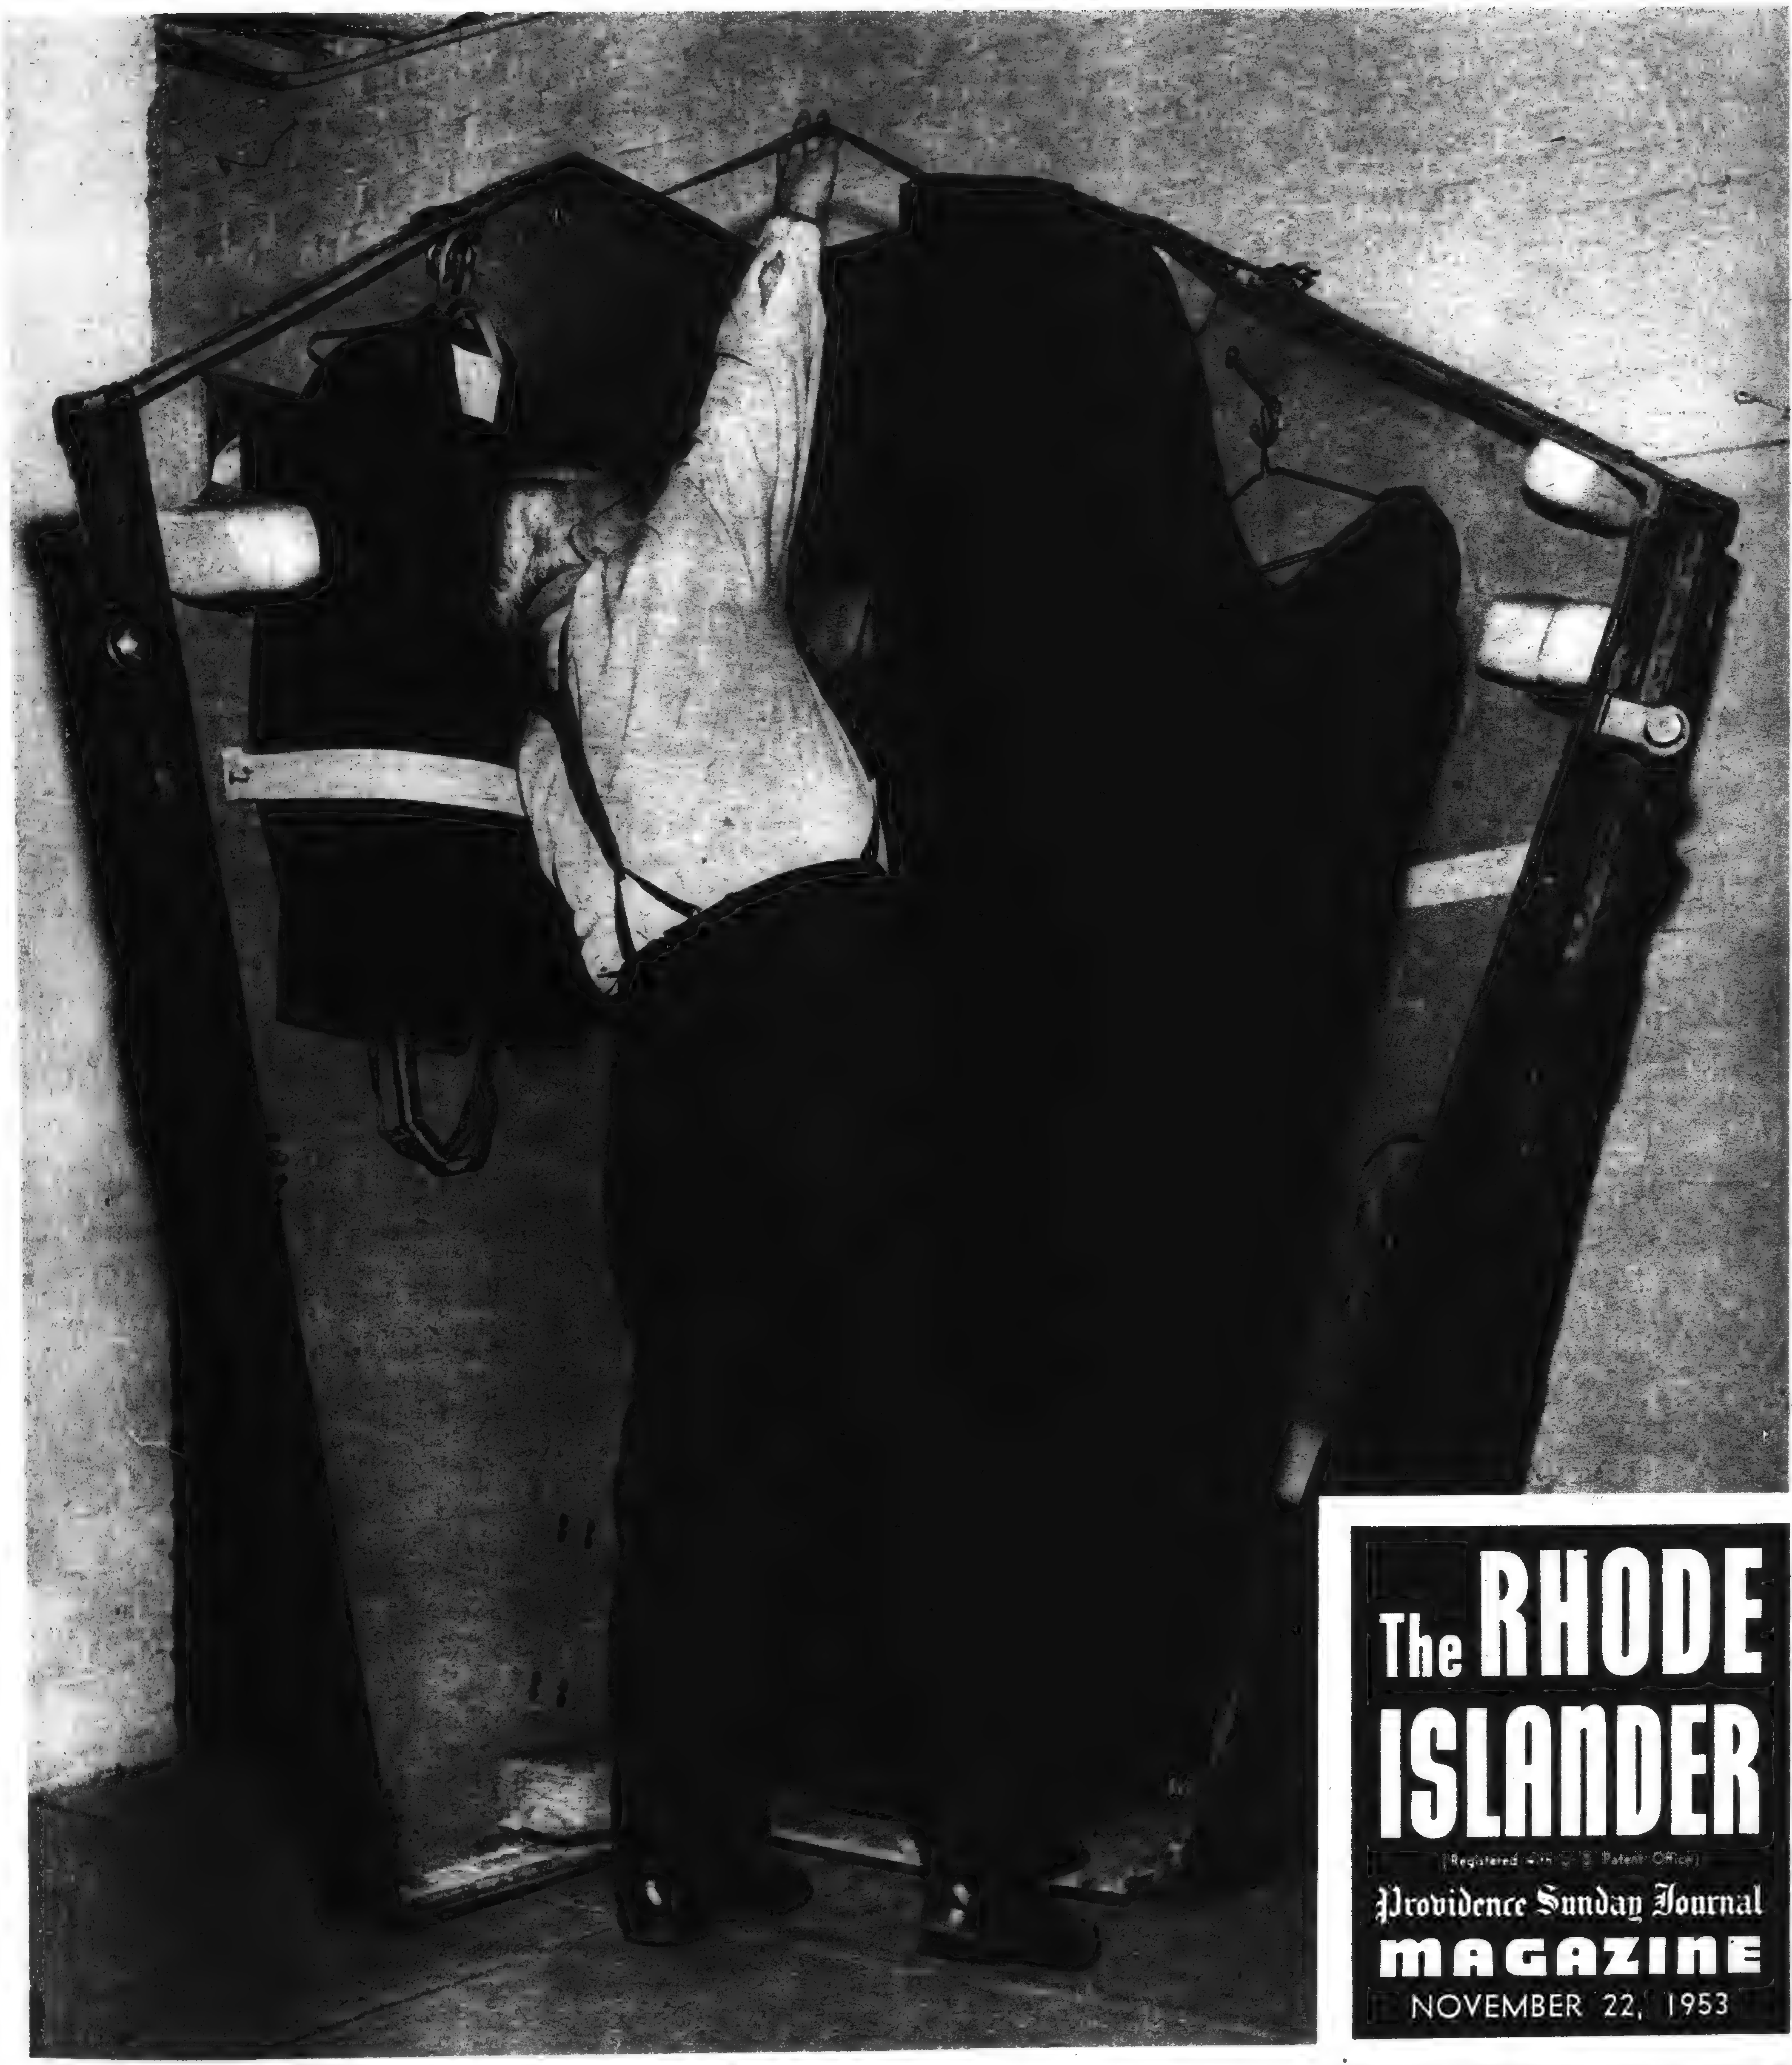
Instigated by Mrs. Crane

Sparked by Mrs. William M. Crane of Richmond, the committee was formed at a meeting at the home of Mrs. Shaun Kelly, also of Richmond, and is unique in that it has no chairman.

Mrs. Crane's interest in the Boston Symphony Orchestra dates back to 1897, when she had her first season ticket to the Boston concerts. Since then, she has been a subscriber in Boston, Cambridge and Lenox. She saw Koussevitzky for the first time in November, 1924, at the Paris Opera House. Soon after that, he was suggested as BSO conductor in which capacity he served for a quarter of a century. The conductor's scholarship is to honor the memory of Koussevitzky and to further the work he loved.

Looking over donors' lists for the Koussevitzky memorial fund at a meeting yesterday at the Country Club of Pittsfield are Mrs. Shaun Kelly of Richmond, Mrs. John H. Rice and Mrs. William M. Crane of Richmond. Mrs. Kelly has collected $1,000 of the $3,195 already realized toward the $15,000 goal. Mrs. Rice's interest in the BSO dates back to her great-grandfather, William Fobes Gavel of Salem, a stockbroker and mathematician who played the flute with BSO members at musical evenings at his home. Idea for the fund was sparked by Mrs. Crane. Mrs. Rice is a violinist, and Mrs. Kelly a pianist.

39



The RHODE ISLANDER

(Registered with U.S. Patent Office)

Providence Sunday Journal

MAGAZINE

NOVEMBER 22, 1953

Boston Symphony Moves to Providence

Gladding's
Since 1766

Open Mondays
Until Christmas

Your Slip Should Fit Three Ways
Under The New Silhouette

- Through the Bust
- Through the Bra
- In Length

Here Is Your Slip!

Proportioned to Fit You
As Though It Were Fitted On You!

Nylon Tricot with
Nylon Rose Fresco
Lace and Medallions by Artemis®

Here is the slip that matches your proportions and flatters your proportions . . . makes you look taller and thinner. Beautiful nylon tricot with exquisite nylon lace. Choose white, black or pink. Proportioned sizes 32 to 44.

Also at Gladding's Wayland Square

KNIT LINGERIE, FIRST FLOOR

GLADDING'S, PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Please charge my account .... find check enclosed ....for the following ARTEMIS SLIPS at 5.98 each:

Quantity	Color	SIZE Bra Size 32 to 40	Hip Size, medium or short	Height, short, (under 5'4)	average,	tall (over 5'7)

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
CITY ....

BASSOONIST Richard Plaster consults Symphony Hall bulletin board for times and places of trips the orchestra is going to take.

M

MANY orch
For instan of forms a artistic en purpose th

Even th
dence ent
non-music
Symphony
on the st would ava got to Do Symphony

ys

ette

Slip!

You!

rtemis

rtions and flatters your thinner. Beautiful nylon ite, black or pink. Pro-

Square OR

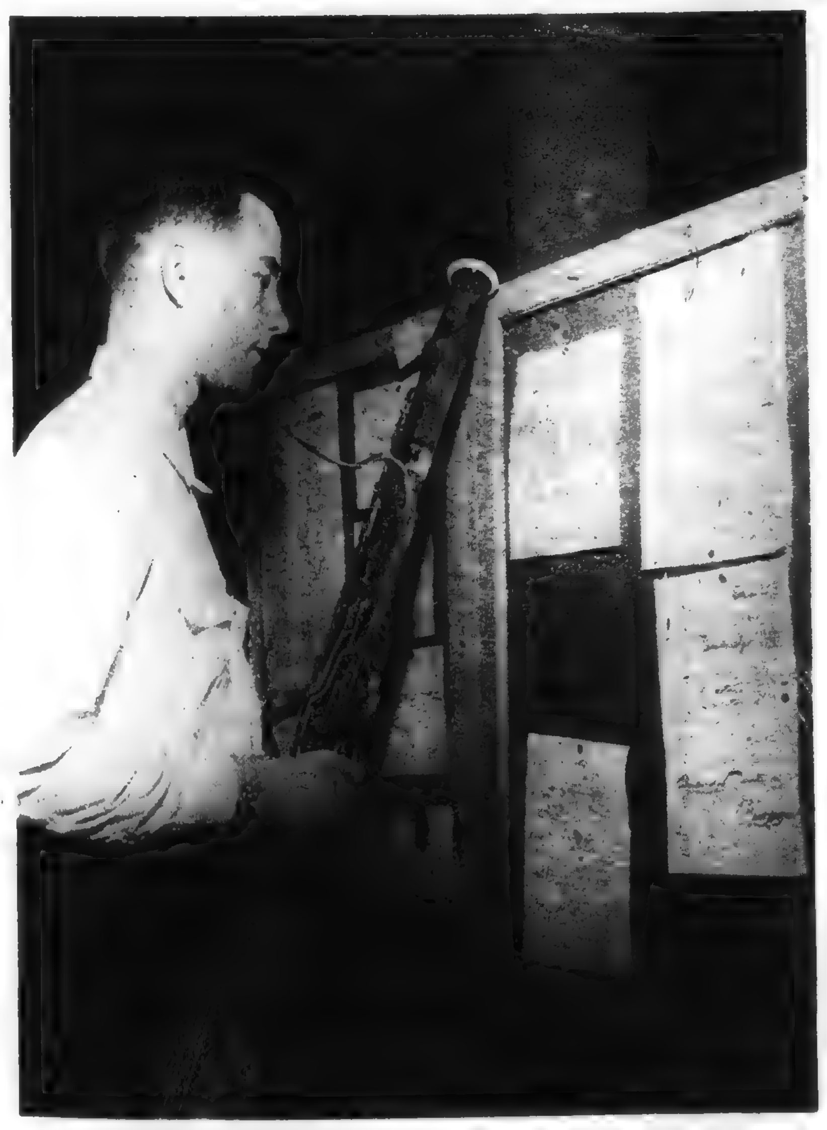
CE, R. I.
sed . . . .for the following
ch:

ight, hort, der 5'4)	average,	tall (over 5'7)

. . . NOVEMBER 22, 1953

CONDUCTOR CHARLES MUNCH, left, at his home, hands a few batons to his valet, Roger Toureau, to pack for a trip to Providence, with his conductor's uniform. Mme. Toureau helps. M. Toureau asked particular attention to the spelling of his name, so it wouldn't come out 'cow's husband' (i.e., 'taureau', the French for 'bull') and we have done our best to take care of this little detail.



BASSOONIST Richard Plaster consults Symphony Hall bulletin board for times and places of trips the orchestra is going to take.

Musical Moving Day

It's quite a trick to pack the orchestra for its Tuesday journey to Providence

STORY BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE — PICTURES BY EDWARD C. HANSON

MANY of the problems that bedevil a symphony orchestra have little to dc with aesthetics. For instance, moving. It does involve an interplay of forms and spaces, but for utilitarian rather than artistic ends, and a strong back is more to the purpose than a supple wrist.

Even the short journey from its home to Providence entails a workaday and rather strenuous non-musical performance in behalf of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A hundred men and a woman on the stage of Veterans Memorial Auditorium would avail little if the bass fiddles had somehow got to Dorchester or the kettledrums were still in Symphony Hall. When it is a question of a transcontinental or European tour, the hazards and details are multiplied.

For short trips, such as the orchestra will be making from Boston to Providence on Tuesday night, the players who use instruments easily portable—strings smaller than cellos; and trumpets, flutes and such—will carry their own. The bulkier instruments will come by truck.

Harvey Genereux, the orchestra's baggagemaster and baton maker, has refined the process of moving over so many years (he evades a direct statement of the number) that there is seldom a contretemps. It is reasonable to expect that what happens Tuesday will be what happened on the five

5
4
3
2
SYMPHONY HALL
BOSTON MASS
SYMPHONY HALL
BOSTON MASS

IN BASEMENT of Symphony Hall, trunks for double basses, or bull fiddles, stand at attention awaiting journey.

LIBRARIAN Leslie J. Rogers gets out scores for Providence concert.

Symphony moves continued

Not always smooth

Boston Symphony Tuesdays last season and will happen again next season. Mr. Genereux and his assistant, Bert Martin, will see to it that the basses and harps are in their trunks, the drums in their boxes, and every other necessary large instrument is ready. A truck will back up to the stage entrance of Symphony Hall and Clarence H. Davidson will fit everything into approximately 850 cubic feet of space, as he has done for 28 years already. He will drive to Providence and, with his helpers, unload in plenty of time for the concert.

About 6 o'clock, two busses will stop in back of the hall. Musicians who want to smoke will get into one bus, the "smoker," and musicians who don't want to smoke or be bothered by smoking colleagues will get into the other bus, the "hospital" car. The busses will make a stop or two en route to pick up assorted fiddlers and other instrumentalists on street corners. The rest of the orchestra will come to Providence in private cars.

It doesn't always work smoothly. About 10 years ago, when the orchestra's equipment came to Providence in a freight car, the indispensable car got lost somewhere in the Providence yards and the

continued on page 8

SYMPHONY HALL

TRUCKERS John C. Bailey and Martin S. DiStefano load a dou bass onto the moving van at the back door of Symphony H

FOR ALMOST 30 YEARS, Clarence Davidson has moved orches

39

Hall, trunks for double tention awaiting journey.

smooth

n and will happen again next t, Bert Martin, will see to it trunks, the drums in their instrument is ready. A truck Symphony Hall and Clarence proximately 850 cubic feet of
ady. He will drive to Provi-plenty of time for the con-in back of the hall. Musione bus, the "smoker," and be bothered by smoking col-"hospital" car. The busses pick up assorted fiddlers and

s. The rest of the orchestra s.

bout 10 years ago, when the nce in a freight car, the in-he Providence yards and the

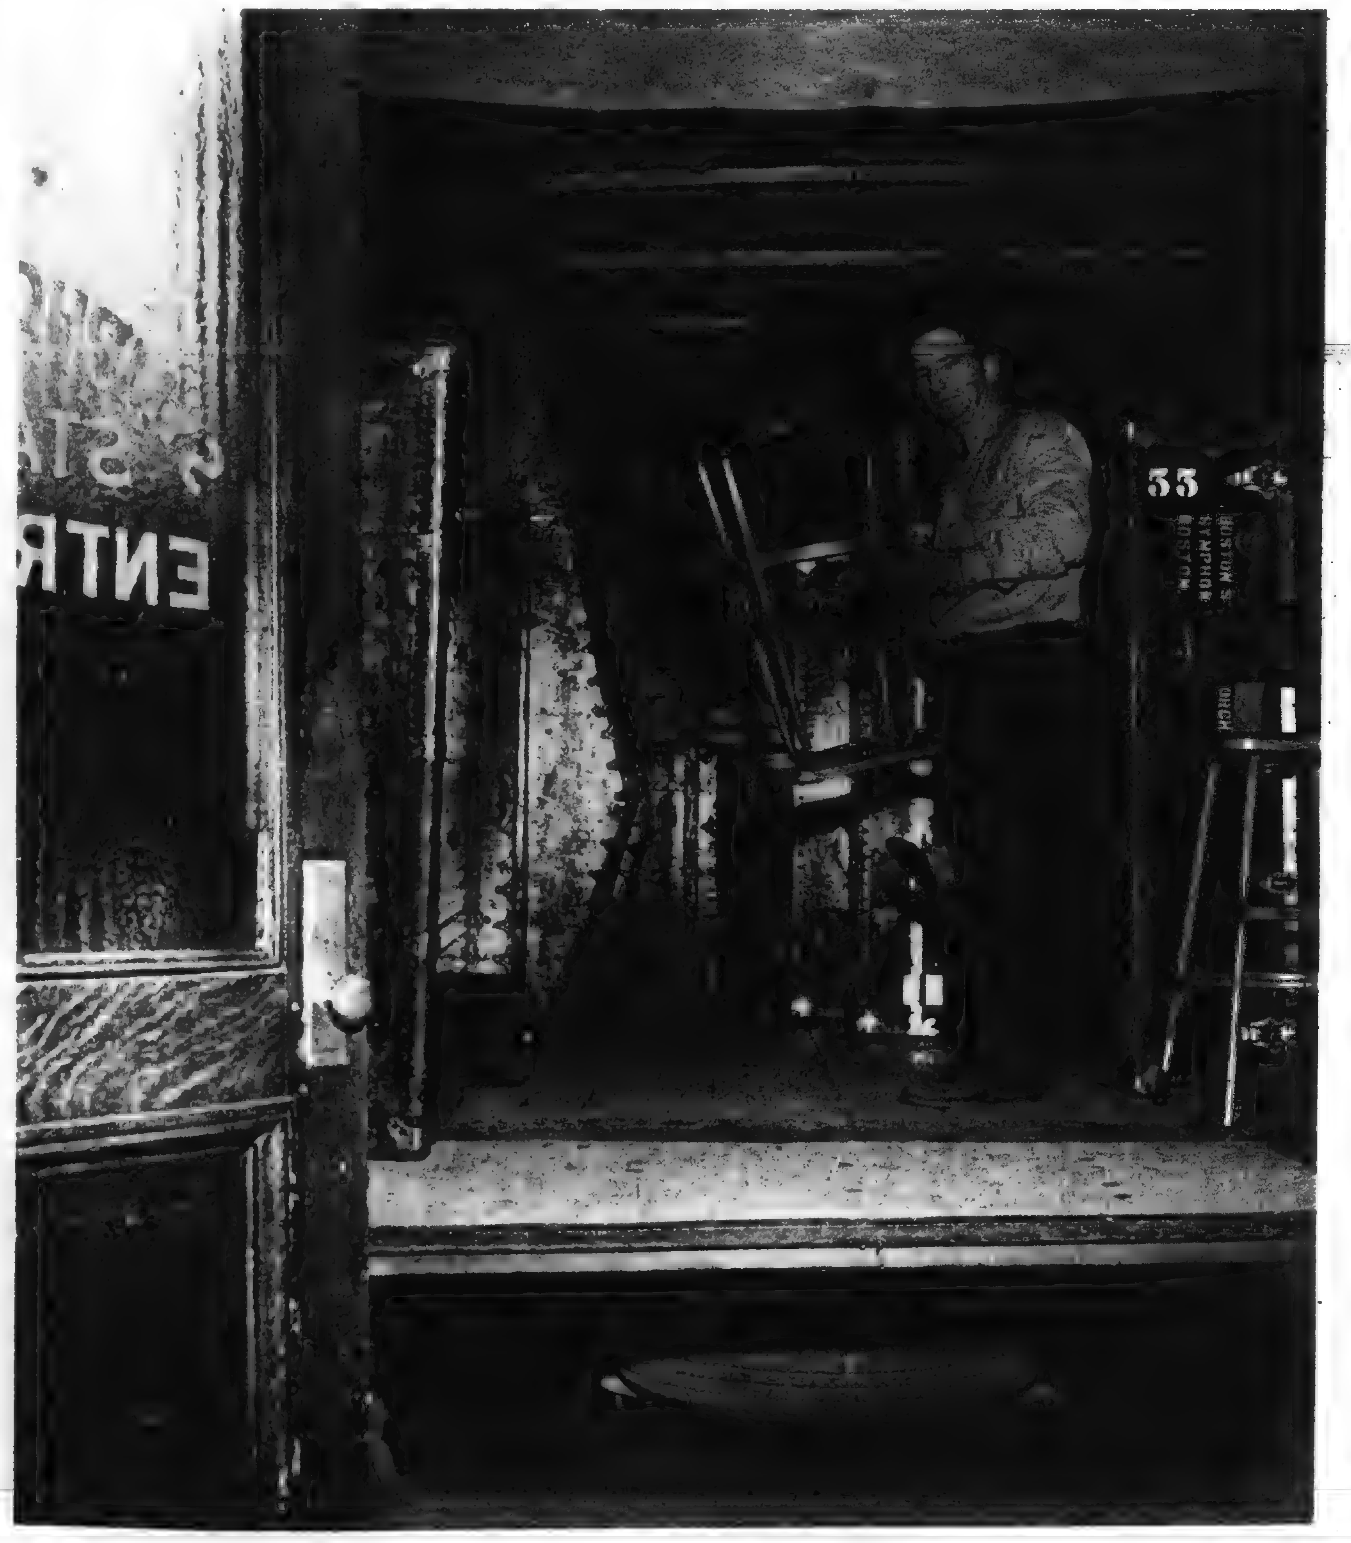
continued on page 8

TRUCKERS John C. Bailey and Martin S. DiStefano load a double bass onto the moving van at the back door of Symphony Hall.

WITH A HAND TRUCK, Harvey Genereux, orchestra's baggagemaster, trundles a kettledrum to the elevator, to lower it to street floor.



FOR ALMOST 30 YEARS, Clarence Davidson has moved orchestra.

HARPS GO ABOARD in large and sturdy trunks such as these.

Love homemade soups? HERE'S NEWS!

A NEW Lipton Soup Mix-

BEEF VEGETABLE!

Tasty vegetables–tender egg noodles –in rich hearty broth!

Lipton
BEEF FLAVOR VEGETABLE SOUP WITH NOODLES

A NEW Lipton Soup Mix-

GREEN PEA!

Velvet-smooth purée of peas with spicy "smoky" flavor!

Lipton
GREEN PEA SOUP

LIPTON BEEF VEGETABLE Soup gives you the satisfying flavor of good rich beef—nourishing garden vegetables—lots of egg noodles! Here's a soup with plenty of "man-appeal"—appetizing as only homemade soup can be!

LIPTON GREEN PEA Soup brings you rich velvety-smooth puréed peas, spiced with tantalizing "smoky" flavor that makes pea soup lovers rave! A hearty "stick-to-the-ribs" soup, a favorite of both youngsters and grownups!

ENJOY REAL HOMEMADE SOUPS THE MODERN WAY—WITH THESE MAGIC LIPTON MAKINGS!

LIPTON CHICKEN NOODLE SOUP

Golden chicken broth made even more nourishing with oodles of tender, enriched egg noodles. Delicious as the old-fashioned slow-to-make kind, yet takes only 7 minutes the modern Lipton way!

LIPTON TOMATO VEGETABLE SOUP

Appetizing broth of red ripe tomatoes with 6 garden-tasty vegetables, plenty of rich egg noodles. What a joy to make this homey soup the modern Lipton way—in just 10 minutes!

LIPTON ONION SOUP

Tender onions toasted golden-brown, in savory beef-flavored stock. A tangy, robust soup as served in smartest restaurants, yet costs only 4¢ to 5¢ a serving! Cooks in 10 minutes.

An Old Favorite in New England

Rich Havana aroma in a mild, modern cigar. That's the unique character of Haddon Hall, a cigar to light up and enjoy! Try one today

Other Sizes 2 for 27¢ to 26¢ each

Haddon Hall CIGARS

MORSE TOBACCO CO., DISTRIBUTORS
83 Atwells Ave., Providence

CHRISTMAS PORTRAITS NOW

Taken In Your Home
Large Selection of Proofs

Gabermann Studio

SPECIALISTS IN CHILDREN'S PORTRAITS
169 Weybosset St., Prov.
DExter 1-[illegible]

UNPACKING, dressing

OFTEN there's time to t concert. Irving Frankel, a

NEWS!

n Soup Mix–
N PEA!
purée of peas
noky" flavor!

Lipton GREEN PEA SOUP

you rich velvety-smooth puréed ky" flavor that makes pea soup e-ribs" soup, a favorite of both

C LIPTON MAKINGS!

PTON ONION SOUP
s toasted golden-brown, in savory tock. A tangy, robust soup as served staurants, yet costs only 4¢ to 5¢ a in 10 minutes.

37

An Old Favorite in New England

Rich Havana aroma in a mild, modern cigar. That's the unique character of Haddon Hall, a cigar to light up and enjoy! Try one today

Other Sizes 2 for 27¢ to 26¢ each

Haddon Hall CIGARS

MORSE TOBACCO CO., DISTRIBUTORS
83 Atwells Ave., Providence

CHRISTMAS PORTRAITS NOW

Taken In Your Home
Large Selection of Proofs

Gabermann Studio
SPECIALISTS IN CHILDREN'S PORTRAITS
169 Weybosset St., Prov.
DExter 1-5346

MANY of the symphony players travel to Providence by bus.

UNPACKING, dressing in Veterans Memorial.

OFTEN there's time to take a nap before the concert. Irving Frankel, a bass player, relaxes.

Symphony moves continued from page 4

Behind the bicycles

search for it took so long that the concert had to begin late. That was when the orchestra changed from rail to truck.

"And not too long ago," said Mr. Genereux, "we gave a concert in Springfield, Mass., and had another the next evening in New York. Instead of shipping our baggage car, the railroad sent an empty scenery car. When I got to Grand Central Terminal that morning, I found an empty car. They had to take a switcher to bring the right car to New York in time.

"Last year, when we were on our European tour, one of our trucks on the way from Bordeaux to Paris got behind a bicycle race and couldn't pass it. It had all the musicians' concert clothes in it."

The orchestra was going to London and reached that city without its tails. A serious international incident seemed likely if the boys performed in street clothes. Everything was nip and tuck. But the clothes finally did arrive in time, so we are still on good terms with Great Britain.

The Cover Picture shows Harvey Genereux, the baggagemaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, putting a wrapper on a harp before installing the harp in its trunk for a journey to Providence. And plenty of room left for performer's evening clothes. Mr. Genereux also makes the batons for the conductor. Photograph by Edward C. Hanson of Journal-Bulletin.

40

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.Y
11/28/53

SPOTLIGHT ON THE MODERNS

Major Honegger

HONEGGER'S Fifth Symphony, composed in 1949 for the Koussevitzky Foundation, is one of the most impressive works of this postwar era; yet—despite Charles Munch's many attempts to make it known as such in this country—it has aroused only the mildest attention, and the accolades have gone to less worthy products (RCA Victor LM 1741, $5.45). This may be due to a general feeling that Honegger has had his day and that even the effort of arguing over him, as we continue to argue over Stravinsky, is more than he is now worth. I cannot say with conviction that the attitude is entirely unmotivated. Recently I put myself on record as having been left pretty much unmoved by his inflated "Jeanne d'Arc au Bûcher," and a work with similar faults, the "Symphonie Liturgique" (Urania LP 7090, $5.95), is on the current list to do further injustice to Honegger of the Fifth Symphony. But if the celebrated Swiss composer's many lesser achievements may cause us so to lose our interest in him that we are unwilling to pay attention when a successful one does finally come along, it may also happen, contrariwise, that an unprejudiced approach to each new work will make the best works seem all the better since they are set in relief against so many lesser achievements.

—French Embassy Information Div.

Honegger—"clarity and compression."

The Fifth Symphony is, to be sure, more compelling than it is [illegible]. Honegger is by no means sparing in his use of the dissonant and percussive devices of the earliest days of what is still known as "modern" music. Contrary motion of separate homophonic planes, each made of parallel triads, plays a prominent role in the work, yielding often a pungent, dense texture, characteristic of the Twenties or earlier; and, as a matter of fact, the opening of the finale is even reminiscent, though only for a moment, of the "Dance of the Adolescents" from "Le Sacre." All these devices are, however, by now part of the universal vocabulary, and Honegger applies them with a sense of clarity and compression that is distinctly of today. Some may find the fury of a Walpurgis Night carried just beyond endurance in the finale, and there is a pat method for building a climax in the first movement, consisting of a slowly rising, ornamented chromatic scale in the trumpets—almost two octaves from B to A. This is an obvious attention-getter, but the passage following is so angelic and lovely that we may scarcely blame the composer for rousing the inattentive listener from his day-dream for it.

The tragic mood predominates, but a considerable infusion of delightful banter relieves it in the middle movement, so that we arrive at the finale fresh for the menacing figures of soaring horns and the skips of the violins up to their screeching limits. The "Symphonie Liturgique," by contrast, reveals Honegger in his familiar condition of being so intent on holding a heroic posture that he dare not relax in it for a moment. It is Honegger struggling to live up to the reputation of a most serious composer who will have no traffic with any but the loftiest subjects drawn from the Bible or antiquity. "Liturgique," the rubric for his third symphony of 1946, seems itself in this instance to be but an excuse for indulgent self-expression of anger in a "Dies Irae" that buffets the stormy seas where Rimsky-Korsakov's Sinbad came to grief, and of meditation in two lengthy Parsifalian movements. But as always with Honegger there are moments of sweep and affecting beauty, and mastery is ever apparent. That mastery is encountered, simple and unadorned, in a sonata for violin alone, elegantly played by Christian Ferras, who is also heard in Chausson and Ravel (London LL 762, $5.95). It is odd that this effective little work is not in the regular repertory.

The Fifth Symphony is wonderfully coupled with Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane" on the reverse side, and both are rendered with utmost brilliance, feeling, and skill by Munch and the Boston Symphony. That we have a definitive recording of the Honegger only four years after its completion [illegible] to Munch's passionate [illegible] to this composer. [illegible] distinct advantage [illegible] contemporary devices of this [illegible] well integrated by now within [illegible] technique of orchestra[illegible].

Other twentieth-century music is 177

Spotlight on Moderns

Continued from page 72

phonic Metamorphosis on Themes of Carl Maria von Weber," a work characterized by a heavy humor for which I have no keen appetite (MG 50024, $5.95).

IN ANTICIPATION of Christmas demands, newly recorded contemporary music is more than ever abundant, and summary treatment will have to suffice for most of it. Stern's recording of Prokofiev's two violin sonatas with Zakin at the piano stands high on the list (Columbia ML 4734, $5.45). This powerful young violinist is in his best form, and his fervency, lyricism, and coloristic range are especially favorable to the earlier and more subtle of the two sonatas. Three of the same composer's piano sonatas (Nos. 3, 4, and 8) have been recorded by Robert Cornman (London LL 748, $5.95) with energy and firm articulation that are very notable indeed, though he shies a bit from poetry.

Cornman is one of a handful of young American pianists whom we are surprised (and also gratified) to observe on London's roster, since they are not very widely known or so handsomely sponsored in their own country. Julius Katchen is another of them, and he is heard in thoroughly distinguished readings of Ned Rorem's Sonata No. 2 and an attractive sheaf of pieces from Bartók's "Mikrokosmos," Vol. 6 (London LL 759, $5.95). Rorem re-echoes the tune that Poulenc has been singing for years, and with the old, though pianistically still impressive, figurations. Poulenc is an odd model for anyone, since he is so dependent on his own models and just manages to get, by with a small, though potent and appealing personal inflection.

Stravinsky's "Pulcinella" Suite, long deplorably absent from the LP catalogue, is out all at once in two different European versions, neither of them wholly satisfactory. The Vienna Chamber Orchestra directed by Hellreiser (Vox LP 8270, $5.95) gives a performance that is rather stolid but is considerably more polished than the one by the Berlin Radio Orchestra under Rother (Urania LP 7093, $5.95), and it has the advantage of Stravinsky's "Apollon" on the other side. Stravinsky is also copiously represented on a record of four-hand piano music containing the Sonata and the Concerto for Two Pianos and the two sets of "Pièces Faciles" for one piano (M-G-M E3038, $4.85). Bartlett and Robertson are the performers, and while they have the notes quite well under hand, their playing is noticeably short on style. There are a few startling miscalculations on the part of the performers—the opening movement of the sonata, for example, which is too fast and methodical. The old Concert Hall LP by Gold and Fizdale remains the finest recording of the sonata. I hope their reading of the concerto is brought out before long, for it is one of Stravinsky's weightiest works, and of all the two-piano teams I have heard play it only Gold and Fizdale have succeeded in surmounting its knotty problems of balance and structure.

177

THOUGH Janáček's music has never excited me particularly, my attention was considerably arrested by Rudolf Firkusny's playing of the Moravian composer's piano music, particularly the latest of the [illegible] in his recorded selection, "In the [illegible]shing House" of 1912 (Columbia ML 4740, $5.45). Works of a lower order executed in a lofty and inspired manner will, of course, sound better than masterpieces performed by a mediocre musician. Still, it cannot be denied that there is something in this music, an intensely idiomatic use of the keyboard, a refined ear for sonority, that lends itself to such sympathetic execution on Firkusny's part. The unfortunate thing about Janáček was his inability to express his ideas in any but a rhapsodic form. There is, moreover, never really any fast music, so that when we hear a series of rapid notes it assumes the character of an ornamental flourish within an andante or adagio. Consequently, it does not hold the interest for long.

Poulenc's "Bal Masqué," one of the gems of contemporary music on LP, out for some time on a ten-inch disc, has now been reissued with a new Françaix work on the reverse side, "Serénade BEA" (Esoteric LP 518, $5.95). Nothing has been gained in the process. Against the pedestrian string sextet of Françaix, the Poulenc sounds more than ever like champagne. "BEA" is short for Beatrice (Goll), and from these letters Françaix derives a motive in the most obvious way. The playing by the Pasquier Sextet under the composer's direction [illegible] good. But what ill-spent effort!

—ARTHUR BERGER

Cir. (D 178,621) (S 246,284)

This Clipping From
NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER

NOV 27 1953

IERE TUESDAY — Charles Munch will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Mosque Tuesday evening in the opening concert of the Griffith Music Foundation's symphony series.

Cir. (D 13,153)

This Clipping From
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

NOV 23 1953

Koussevitzky Fund Goal Increased From $5,000 to $15,000

The goal for the Koussevitzky Memorial fund, which has been organized by a group of 21 Berkshire county residents, has been increased from $5,000 to $15,000, it was announced today.

The committee in charge decided on the increase on the advice of Conductor Leonard Bernstein's lawyer, who noted that the income from the $15,000 fund will provide an annual full scholarship for conductors at the Berkshire Music center at Tanglewood.

Some 85 donors already have contributed [illegible] to the fund and letters seeking additional money will be sent out soon. It was announced that interested persons may send checks to Paul K. Fodder of the Agricultural National bank in Pittsfield.

41

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR,

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1953 Art—Music—Theater 15

Prokofiev Seventh in Boston Première

Skolovsky in Rachmaninov Piano Concerto

By Harold Rogers

Charles Munch's Russian program in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon was packed with much interest and no small excitement. He led the Boston Symphony Orchestra through brilliant and rhapsodic works by Prokofiev, Rachmaninov, and Borodin. His program contained two pièces de résistance — the first Boston performance of Prokofiev's Seventh Symphony and the Rachmaninov Second Piano Concerto, for which Zadel Skolovsky was the soloist.

Though Eugene Ormandy's recording of the Prokofiev Seventh with the Philadelphia Orchestra has been out for some weeks, the work takes on colors when heard in the hall that display it to far better advantage.

* * *

This was Prokofiev's final symphony, first heard in Moscow in October, 1952, less than a year before his passing. Since the Russian authorities found it acceptable, it was naturally held suspect in Western musical circles. It almost went without saying that Prokofiev must have made some sacrifice in his ideals to bring his highly individualistic style into more conservative patterns.

Such a sacrifice was evidently made, but if it isn't a great symphony—according to Prokofiev's standards or any others—it is a good symphony, a very good symphony. He had the experience that would enable him to compose a good one through his superb craftsmanship alone. It is not without inspiration, though the inspiration appears to be of a less intensive quality than is found in his masterpieces.

* * *

It's a light-hearted symphony. In the first movement it sings and soars in a sort of aspiring lyricism. The second movement is a lilting waltz, cheerful and gay. The Andante espressivo has the nature of a legend in which the symphonist appears as a raconteur. And the final Vivace is a galop. This could bear the subtitle of "A Day at the Races" and is certainly an item that Arthur Fiedler should consider for the Pops season. Toward the close of this movement there is a recapitulation of the aspiration theme of the first section. Here is music that Hollywood could appropriate en toto, were it not for the copyright laws.

It is interesting to find Prokofiev in this frivolous vein, particularly since we know that he was physically unwell and extremely unhappy toward the end of his career. Perhaps he sought release in this spirited way. Regardless of the ingratiating harmonies (the dissonance content is slight), it is inevitable that his strong musical personality would leave its stamp.

The first movement of the Rachmaninov Second was grandly gorgeous in a way that is seldom heard, due no doubt to a joint conception of it that Mr. Munch and Mr. Skolovsky had worked out together. The orchestra was allowed to sing forth in all its glory on the sweeping melodies, thus relegating the piano to the secondary position of an obbligato. But even though the pianist was working hard with little effect, the total impact was magnificent.

* * *

Mr. Skolovsky had his day, however, in the serene Adagio sostenuto. Here he brought out the tender quality through his fluid, eloquent, and poignant playing. The final Allegro gave him many opportunities to display his crisp, sparkling style. He took his bows to much applause mingled with cheers.

Mr. Munch opened the concert with an incisive and electric reading of the Scherzo and March from Prokofiev's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges." He closed with a splashily colorful performance of the swirling Polovtzian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor."

In the latter the orchestra was augmented by the New England Conservatory Chorus, of which Lorna Cooke deVaron is the director. They sang with verve—dynamically and accurately—thus adding much to a concert that was already filled with superlatives.

Cir. (D 145,494) (S 272,057)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

NOV 28 1953

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 7th program of the 73d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Zadel Skolovsky, pianist, was the soloist. The Chorus of the New England Conservatory, Lorna Cook DeVaron conductor, appeared on the program, also.

The program:

Scherzo and March from "The Love for Three Oranges"
Symphony No. 7 .... Prokofieff
Concerto No. 2 in C minor, Op. 18 .... Rachmaninoff
Polovtzian Dances from "Prince Igor" .... Borodin

By RUDOLPH ELIE

A pleasant, untaxing and wholly enjoyable affair this, entirely suited to the post-holiday spirit of relaxation and ease.

I speak, of course, for the listener, not the performer. For as always the conductor, the soloist, the men of the orchestra and the choral group that appeared in the final number were allowed anything but their ease; they worked hard and tellingly to endow the program with a powerful sweep throughout.

To refer to a new Prokofieff Symphony as 'untaxing' is hardly flattering to the work, but there is little doubt that the Seventh ranks with that composer's least typical productions. The word for it, as for the recent works of Shostakovitch, is watered down. It no more reflects the fierce, proud, indomitably witty and ingenious Prokofieff of the March and Scherzo from "The Love For Three Oranges" than Shostakovitch's Brahmsian "Song of the Forest" reflects the bursting vigor of the Fifth.

Here and there throughout there occur flashes of the pre-Pravda Prokofieff, notably in the concluding movement, which begins with that swift, angular melodic line couched in a razor-sharp busyness and a harmonic bite that always set him so far above most of his contemporaries. But the overall atmosphere is a tired and routine mingling of all kinds of styles; there are echoes of everyone from Sibelius (at the beginning) to Berlioz (late in the slow movement). These are only fleeting suggestions, to be sure, and entirely coincidental, but could the Prokofieff of the Classical Symphony, the Third Piano Concerto, "Romeo and Juliet" and the Scythian Suite ever be said to remind anyone of anything but Prokofieff?

All this is not to say the symphony is not beautiful to hear. It is exceptionally so, whether it be in one of the most expressively beautiful slow movements of recent years or in the waltz movement, which might well be called the Soviet 'La Valse.' But it is not a work that compares in any degree to the works that have gone before. It is merely a collection of never very distinguished thematic materials put together by the hand of one of the 20th century's absolute masters of orchestration.

This concert brought Zadel Skolovsky back to Boston to do Rachmaninoff's wonderfully perennial Second Concerto, a work that for all its familiarity to everyone never fails to make a success. For some reason or other the piano part never really sounded as bright and resonant as it might have though this is not to say that Mr. Skolovsky neglected to inform his performance of it with power and virtuosity. He has both in abundance, and with them a tendency to be a little over-mannered at the keyboard, as if playing this piece required him to undergo a sort of heroic ordeal. He settled down in this regard as the concerto progressed and finished it with great bravura and style to win—as people who play Rachmaninoff's Second always do—an ovation.

The final offering on this all-Russian program was the set of Polovtzian dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." Assisting in the presentation of these four brilliant and evocative pieces was the New England Conservatory Chorus, trained by Lorna Cook DeVaron. It never sounded better or produced smarter attacks and climaxes. Mr. Munch, who again revealed his incomparable leadership as an accompanying conductor in the Rachmaninoff, sought out every exotic color in these quasi-barbaric dances to give them a rousing and exciting quality their familiarity could well deny them.

The orchestra is on tour next week, returning on Dec. 11 when Richard Burgin offers Stravinsky's Danses Concertantes, Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole (Ruth Posselt, soloist), the Adagio from Mahler's Tenth Symphony and Tchaikovsky's Italian Caprice.

Cir. (D 294,859) (S 262,207)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

NOV 28 1953

Music in Review

By TUCKER KEISER

Symphony Concert

Charles Munch took French leave of the Fifty-Piece-Standard-Repertoire yesterday afternoon for the seventh program of the symphony series, and for his sabbatical presented a Friday Afternoon at the Pops.

Russian names filled the program, composed of Prokofieff's Scherzo and March from the opera "The Love for Three Oranges," Prokofieff's Symphony No. 7, Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 2 (played by Zadel Skolovsky), and Borodin's Polovtzian Dance from "Prince Ignor" (sung by the New England Conservatory Chorus).

The Scherzo and March, Prokokofieff at his witty best, was given a sparkling performance under the direction of Mr. Munch, who appreciates every bit of the humor and exploits every bit of the color in those satirical excerpts.

The Seventh Symphony, Prokofieff at his apologetic worst, received its first Boston performance yesterday; even at his worst Prokofieff is not a dull composer, but one expects of him a more daring musical vocabulary. The Seventh was his wan swan song, dictated by the necessity for pleasing the atavistic tastes of Kremlin cretins unable to move beyond Tchaikovsky.

Lush Hollywood tunes fill the symphony, none of them formally developed since "bourgeois formalism" is rewarded in the Soviet Union these days by a cold shoulder of Siberian frigidity. The symphony is in the customary four movements; the allegretto, which is ordinarily third, and the andante, which is ordinarily second, are interchanged. If it were not for the superlative orchestration and the Peter-and-the-Wolf-like use of woodwinds, one would hardly identify this hit-tune potpourri as Prokofieffian.

Stylistically contemporary, although composed half a century apart, are the Prokofieff symphony and the Rachmaninoff concerto. The Second Concerto has been given the juke-box treatment, a process which breeds the inevitable concomitant of familiarity. From a histrionic standpoint, Mr. Skolovsky undoubtedly merited the ovation given him for his performance of this concerto, for he played in the grand manner, weaving emotionally over the keyboard, breathing hard as he thundered octaves, and tossing his dark hair as he sentimentalized the rich melodies.

Mr. Munch's metier is the production of brilliant effects, and the choice of Borodin's Polovtzian Dances as the final selection on the program was well-advised. He is also exceptionally skilful in the handling of choral material, and the inclusion of the New England Conservatory Chorus in the performance gave him an opportunity to demonstrate his facility once again. It is a common and laudable practice on the part of the conductor to restore vocal parts to scores from which they have been deleted too often.

Splendidly trained by Lorna Cooke de Varon, the chorus was somewhat too small and rather too refined in tone to cope with the elemental savagery of this particular score. Although the choral tone was lacking in weight and tang, it was interesting to hear the score as Borodin intended it.

Cir. (D 124,110) (S [illegible]2,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

NOV 28 1953

MUSIC

First Boston Hearing for Prokofieff Seventh

Seventh program in the Friday afternoon—Saturday evening series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch music director. At Symphony Hall. Prokofieff: Scherzo and March from the opera, "The Love for Three Oranges"; Seventh Symphony (first performances in Boston); Rachmaninoff: Second Piano Concerto (soloist, Zadel Skolovsky); Borodin: "Polovtzian Dances", form "Prince Igor" (assisting chorus, that of the New England Conservatory, Lorna Cooke de Varon conductor).

By CYRUS DURGIN

If Prokofieff's Seventh Symphony is an example of what the Bolshevik overlords want Soviet music to be, we may conclude that music is the least dangerous aspect of the U. S. S. R.

It is what you might call a "folksong symphony," a delightful and harmless collection of tunes. It is so childlike, for Prokofieff, and so corny in style and idiom, that I must conclude it was written under official duress. The facts of its first performance in Moscow, Oct. 11, 1952, and subsequent approval in Pravda, lend weight to that belief. We do not, and perhaps never shall, know what effect Prokofieff's final illness, upon him as he wrote, had upon the score, or whether, in some of his seemingly innocent drolleries, he might have been flinging his own, last joke at the governmental goons in charge of making Soviet musical art toe the party line.

Nor is it important, except as a sidelight upon the sunset months of what had been a great career in music. The point is that the man who created the "Scythian" and "Chout" Suites, the Piano and Violin Concertos, and the Fifth Symphony, here penned a work totally uncharacteristic of his genius. The idiom of the Seventh Symphony veers between the sort of late romantic harmonic and orchestral style that Mahler used more than 40 years ago, and a handful of echoes, in terms of orchestral detail, from his own "Love for Three Oranges." If there are suggestions of Kabalevsky or Khatchatourian, as some yesterday suggested, we may assume Prokofieff taught them first, or that, making a wild play of imagination, they might have touched up the Seventh Symphony.

There is almost no structure in this work. It is, rather, a succession of enjoyable tunes and bright if overly simple rhythmic schemes. If Prokofieff had composed without constraint he would, I am sure, have given us a score with more "bite." The technic, however, is assured, just like the technic of any number of Hollywood musical film hacks, of whom the Symphony is all too remindful at many times. You seldom, in this work, get far away from a hint of dance or folksong. Neither did Mahler, but think of the cleverness of treatment and texture in comparison with this pale and saccharine product!

Mr. Munch was smart to begin these concerts with the excerpts from "The Love for Three Oranges" which shows what a vast difference exists between that free and imaginative opera and the Symphony.

Zadel Skolovsky gave a wholly satisfactory performance of the solo part in Rachmanioff's familiar, romantic and Slavically sensuous Concerto. In quality of tone, in rhythmic vitality and over-all interpretive distinction, Mr. Skolovsky proved admirable, even though there were a few untidy details of finger articulation. The orchestral portion went superbly. Mr. Munch concluded this all-Russian program with a rousing performance of the "Polotvsian Dances," wherein the New England Conservatory Chorus took a notably creditable part.

Harshaw Concert Planned

Arrangements are being concluded for a Boston recital by Margaret Harshaw, whose phenomenal success as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week disclosed one of the great singers of our time. A definite date, according to Aaron Richmond, will be announced very shortly.

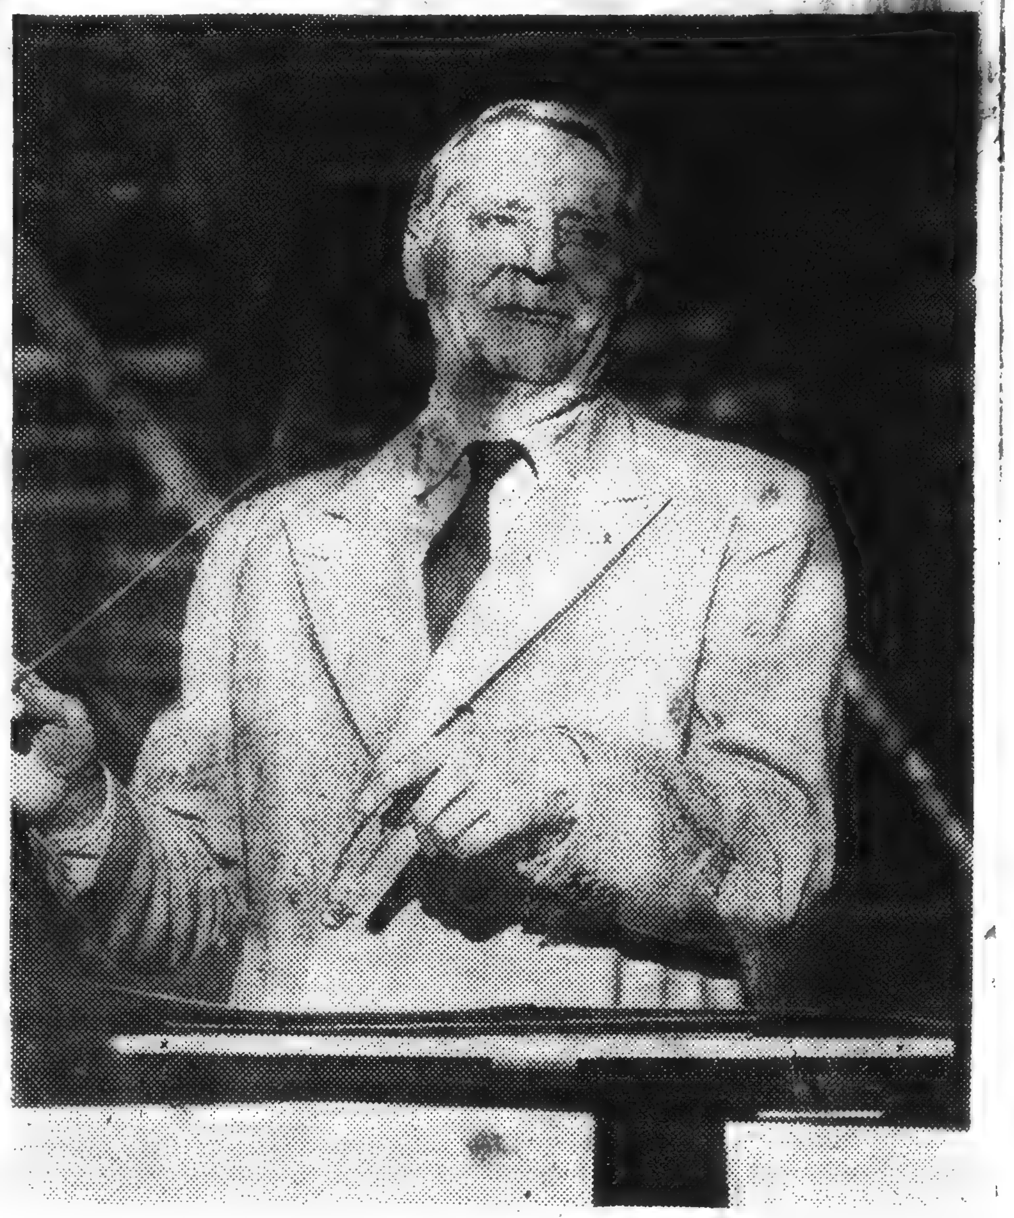
This will be under the sponsorship of Boston University.

42

This Clipping From
NEW YORK TIMES
NOV 29 1953

BOSTON CONDUCTOR

34



Clement Kalischer

Charles Munch leads his ensemble in season's first visit Wednesday.

Cir. (D 131,670) (S 258,529)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
NOV 29 1953

Munch Conducts in French Band Concert

"A phenomenal band, with every player a virtuoso." That is the estimate Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, places upon the Guard Republican Band of Paris, which makes its first Boston appearance since 1872 at Symphony Hall on Friday evening, Dec. 11, for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Pension Fund. Having already conducted the band on two occasions. Mr. Munch knows whereof he speaks. When the noted leader of the band, Francois-Julien Brun, invited Mr. Munch to conduct a number at the Boston concert, he was delighted to accept. His number will be Ravel's "Bolero," in which he has won spectacular success with the Symphony. Two other high spots of the concert will be the flute solo of Henri Lebon in Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and the clarinet solo of Henry Druart.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE— —NOVEMBER 29, 1953

'A Phenomenal Band,' Says Charles Munch of Guard Republican Band of Paris

"A phenomenal band, with every player a virtuoso." That is the estimate that Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, places upon the Guard Republican Band of Paris, which makes its first Boston appearance since 1872 at Symphony Hall on Friday evening, Dec. 11, for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Pension Fund.

Having already conducted the band on two occasions, Mr. Munch knows whereof he speaks. When the noted leader of the band, Francois-Julien Brun, invited Mr. Munch to conduct a number at the Boston concert, he was delighted to accept. His number will be Ravel's "Bolero," in which he has won spectacular success with the Symphony.

Two other high spots of the concert will be the flute solo of Henri Lebon in Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and the clarinet solo of Henri Druart in Weber's "Recitative and Polonaise." The program also will include: Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini,"—Berlioz; Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2—Liszt; "Till Eulenspiegel"—Strouss; and a set of marches dating from the French Revolution to the present.

Italian String Players Began Careers Early

Three men and a girl make up the Quartetto Italiano which comes to Jordan Hall for its first Boston appearance Monday evening, Dec. 7.

Like her colleagues, Elisa Pegreffi began the study of the violin at an early age: eight years. She is second violinist of the group. First violinist, Paoli Borciani, began at five; the violist, Piero Farulli, and the cellist, Franco Rossi, when nine years old. The two violinists had musically gifted fathers to give first lessons. They then progressed to other teachers, eventually landing with Serato, the noted Italian pedagogue, who also taught Farulli. Cellist, Rossi, began with Bonucci and later studied with Luigi Silva, well known to American audiences.

Cir. (D 203,001)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
NOV 30 1953

SYMPHONY AWAY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch director, took off today for concerts in Newark, New York, Washington and Brooklyn. There will be no Friday and Saturday concerts here this week.

Cir. (D 226,101) (S 261,386)
This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
NOV 29 1953

Boston Symphony Opens Thursday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 1953-4 Washington season in Constitution Hall Thursday evening, with many District socialites in the audience.

Cir. (D 259,227) (S 304,545)
This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES-HERALD
NOV 29 1953

Munch Leads First Concert On Thursday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Charles Munch, will make the first of its four appearances in Washington this season in Constiution Hall on Thursday at 8:30 p.m.

Samuel Mayes, first cellist of the Boston Symphony, will be the soloist in the first Washington performance of a new concerto by Dmitri Kabalevsky. The orchestra will play the Beethoven Symphony No. 3 in E-Flat (Eroica), and the Debussy "Iber-

43

Brookline Tots to 7th Graders Storm a Symphony Con

By VIRGINIA BRIGHT

Brookline has proved th youngsters will storm a sym phony concert.

Over 1230 nursery school chi dren from tots to 7th grader some in tow of adults, packe the High School auditorium r cently to hear 20 members
the Boston Symphony Orche tra create a musical land fairies, fun, and magic.

Via puppets and painting songs and narration, the mus of the masters came to life.

Brookline's public, privat and parochial schools were rep resented. Occidentals and Orie tals were present. Some of th pupils were natives of Ind
nesia; others were from Ha and could speak little Englis
Yet all took common delight the universal language—Music

[illegible] simple narration—just [illegible] hold the short span [illegible] of children—by Mr. [illegible] Zanzig, music di- [illegible] Brookline Public [illegible] the musical [illegible] word pic-

[illegible] of the in- [illegible], their lo- [illegible] chestra, and their [illegible] given by Mr. Dickson, conductor. [illegible] year to take over [illegible] the late Mr. Harry [illegible] conductor, and the [illegible] years ago, of the [illegible] Concerts.

* * *

[illegible] the children to listen [illegible] Dickson had the or- [illegible] first the theme of [illegible] symphony, and then varia- [illegible] of it to make it easier for [illegible] to detect that theme when [illegible] full composition was played.

* * *

[illegible] ed as the young- [illegible] how instru- [illegible] a story. They ap- [illegible] Tschaikovsky's gentle [illegible] when he brings in the [illegible] and the flute to describe [illegible] Chinese Doll Dance, and the [illegible] horns and clarinet to indi- [illegible] the waltz of the flowers in The Nut-Cracker Suite."

A burst of loud laughter broke out at Haydn's "surprise" chord in his famous symphony where he humorously twitted a sleepy audience.

Little people wriggled and whispered, but their eyes danced in high glee at such merry, subtle wit on the part of the long-hair composers.

During the Dennison marionette show, they sat in rapt attention, full of wonder, as the medieval "Sorcerer's Apprentice" danced in a frenzy when his magic got out of control.

* * *

As the orchestra played the finale from Haydn's "Farewell Symphony" only the lights at the music stands were left on. The music became softer. One by one the players picked up their music, pretended to "blow out" their candles, and mischievously tip-toed off the platform.

* * *

"Are you watching," Mr. Zanzig asked, eager to have the youngsters note how a bit of stage acting was humorously incorporated into a symphony.

Out over the hushed audience, a voice of an attentive little shaver piped up, "Yes!"

The popularity of these Youth Concerts is due to on enthusiastic, hard-working committee of the town's adult music lovers.

Originally started by Mr. Dubbs, whose wife continues to spark the program, the Youth Concerts quickly won financial support from many of Brookline's leading citizens, including Mr. Edward Dane, president of the Brookline Trust Company.

* * *

"What is good for our town, is good for our children," became the slogan of many, according to Mrs. Joseph Winn, chairman of the Brookline Youth Concert committee.

* * *

Assured of some financial aid, Mr. and Mrs. Dubbs then approached Mr. Ernest R. Caverly, superintendent of Brookline schools, for permission to conduct such a concert.

SYMPHONIC MUSIC inspires art classes in Brookline elementary public schools. Using finger painting as a medium to express the spirit of the music, Ruunkle School pupils, under the direction of Miss Priscilla Peckham, art director, and Miss Mary Ward, teacher, are becoming acquainted with classical music before attending the annual Fall concert, sponsored by the town's adult music lovers and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for Brookline's young people.

Their foresight, and their desire to bring symphony music to youngsters early in life, at a very nominal fee, appealed almost instantly to Mr. Caverly, who is sensitive to the values of cultural influences in lives of young people.

A community project was then launched.

Today, a large voluntary committee, including non-parents as well as doting fathers and mothers, school superintendent and principals, and other public-spirited citizens, handles all the mechanics of staging annually a Fall and Spring children's concert.

P. T. A.'s, schools, the local press, stores, and library cooperate in spreading publicity, according to Mrs. Herman Jacobson, the chairman.

Tickets are printed under the direction of Mr. Guy O. Edmonds, in charge of industrial arts in the Brookline schools. Every interested Brookline youngster, regardless of financial status, is welcome to attend the concerts.

* * *

In advance of the concerts, music and art teachers in the public elementary schools devote class periods to familiarising the students with the music they are to hear. The story of each symphony is told, the biographies of the composers are studied, and songs pertaining to the program are learned.

* * *

With brush and paint, pupils learn to express the mood and meaning of the composers as recordings of movements or themes of the symphonies are played.

The drawings were exhibited along the High School corridors at the recent Saturday afternoon concert. Rotund sugar-plum fairies, dainty flowers, and wild-eyed sorcerers vied for attention beside modernistic designs, rhythmical patterns of flowing lines and staccato-like dots and dashes.

These third and fourth grade artists proved that their youthful imaginations had caught the feeling of "The Water Symphony," "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" and Tschaikovsky's delightful Christmas fantasy of the little "Nut Cracker."

Several fathers, with their offspring, were seen at the recent afternoon musical. One, who also acted as an usher, had come straight from a dentist's chair, his jaw still numb from Novocain. He had brought his youngster, Jimmy Kurland, together with the boy's classmates, Eleanor Krupp and Toby Goldstein, from the Temple Emeth Nursery school.

* * *

[illegible] was no adult chaperonage for Richard Lubot and David [illegible], 3d graders from the Lawrence school. [illegible] Zanzig's gentle [illegible] of the opening strains of the "Water Music," the two boys sat throughout the concert just as "still as the King and Royal Court did at the aquatic festival when Handel first played the [illegible]."

* * *

Paul and Peter Dennison, aged 13 and 10, both from the Edward Devotion school, were busy back stage assisting their mother and dad for the first time with the puppet show. Because he never misses a musical cue, Peter was in charge of the lighting effects. His father, Joseph Dennison, served as engineer and carpenter.

Although diminutive, Mrs. Dennison majored in sculpture at the Massachusetts School of Art, she has been for the past 10 years designing and creating puppets professionally.

Back in the audience were several students from St. Dominic Institute in Brookline. All were natives of Haiti, two of them, Anne and Marie Magloire, being the daughters of the President of the Haiti Republic.

They later said they enjoyed the concert and, where language was a barrier, they still understood the meaning of the music because of the skillful conducting of Mr. Dickson.

* * *

Also taking advantage of the opportunity to attend the Youth Concert was a young mother with her 6- and 7-year-old children, Ranni and Nurjahman Sumawinata, from the Lawrence School. Their home was in Indonesia, but their father, who had formerly worked at the embassy in Washington, D. C., was currently studying at Harvard.

* * *

Her youngsters love music, she said, and they already had attended one full symphony program when they lived in Alexandria, Va.

"I only come because of the puppets," one forthright young miss stated.

One mother, with a boy and girl by each hand, thought the Brookline Youth Concerts were a wonderful adjunct to the Boston Symphony's Summer Esplanade Concerts.

Bolstered by the presence of their father and their two favorite toys, two kindergarteners came trotting into the Roberts Auditorium with the calm assurance of Boston's Brahmans. Hugging her rag doll, Judy McIntosh, and her brother, Jim, clutching his teddy bear, felt no qualms about attending a symphony performance.

Among those with some musical aptitudes of their own in the young audience were Lawrence and Lois Koplan, from the Baker School's sixth and second grades.

Lawrence announced he is studying the clarinet; his sister takes dancing lessons. Their chum, Peter Blumenthal, from the fifth grade, said he has never missed one of the Brookline children's music hours.

Another budding musician from the Baker School was Neil Richmond. He wanted to hear the trombone with the orchestra because that is the instrument he is studying.

From St. Mary's School was a young pianist, Robert Tynan. He had heard recordings during his music class of the "Nut-Cracker Suite" and was anticipating the pleasure of hearing it again.

Feeling well prepared to sing some of the program songs during intermission was young David Weinstein, from the Lawrence School. He was accompanied by his father and younger sister, Wendy, not yet of school age. David said his music class had [illegible] the words to the songs.

* * *

"Brookline pupils are so receptive to culture, and their homes and schools do so much to foster it, that it is a joy to teach the children," Mrs. Bonnie Merritt, music teacher at the Pierce and Devotion Schools and mother of two children, remarked.

* * *

Mr. Zanzig and the Concert Committee are convinced that with a visual approach through drawing, story-telling and acting the meaning of the music will unfold to the children.

A talented few may be influenced to follow music professionally, but for the majority, the committee hopes that the Youth Concerts will enable the youngsters to respond with greater pleasure and appreciation to symphonic music.

65

44

Cir. (D 189,181)

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CAL.
DAILY NEWS

DEC 2 1953

French music waxed by Boston

By MILDRED NORTON

The latest Boston Symphony releases with Charles Munch conducting Honegger's Symphony No. 5 and Roussel's Bacchus et Ariane ballet suite No. 2 are in the nature of premier performances on LP. They are also performances under the guidance of a master stylist and one who is among the foremost living ones for French music.

Munch's unique talent in this respect is brilliantly displayed in these readings which reveal Honegger not only as a superb craftsman in the tradition of Saint-Saens, but a highly original creator. This is the composer's most intimate and probing work to date and one that could very well endure in the standard repertory. The Roussel ballet suite is exquisitely played and for a bonus Munch has added a delicate reading of Ravel's Pavane for a Dead Princess (RCA Victor LP). Reproduction is occasionally rough in the violins but is otherwise good.

Sympho
Solomor
fers tw writing
itable

Cir. (208,241)

This Clipping From
RADIO & TELEVISION NEWS
CHICAGO, ILL.

DEC - 1953

Certified
R

By BERT WHYTE

BERLIOZ
ROMEO AND JULIET
Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Charles Munch with chorus and soloists. Victor LM-6011 (two 12" LP) Orthophonic curve. Price $11.44.

The advent of a complete version of this work is likely to cause some consternation among those who invested in the excerpted LP recently issued by Columbia. Well, that is LP for you! It's either feast or famine. This latest recording is one of Victor's best efforts with their new Orthophonic recording. A fine orchestral balance is matched by good acoustic treatment. The surprisingly good choral work is clean and articulate. Soloists are in proper perspective to the greater tonal masses. Victor advertises this disc as, "For Hi-Fi fans," on a little sticker applied to the front of the album. This is a good recording and I certainly recommend it to those interested in this work. But I don't think it need be called "Hi-Fi." The dynamic and frequency response still fall a little short of the efforts put forth by several other companies. Charles Munch, certainly one of the most controversial conductors of the Boston Symphony, is at his best here. Throughout the recording, the score bears witness to his painstaking efforts, in this highly polished performance. The orchestra is rich and sonorous and sympathetic to every demand [illegible] conductor. The recording [illegible] Orthophonic curve [illegible] in the bass [illegible] fillip. Quiet sur[illegible] clusion of a libretto [illegible] bonus picture.

ings a techni offer
wrot

THE WASH TON POST
Friday, Dece r 4, 1953

Postlude

Kabalevsky Cello Work Enjoyable

By Paul Hume

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened their Washington season last night, and kept things within the orchestral family with their first cellist as soloist.

Samuel Mayes, who traveled north from Philadelphia to Boston about five years ago to occupy the first cello chair of our northernmost leading symphony, played the recent Kabalevsky Cello Concerto. It is an absolutely straight forward affair—tuneful, unsubtle, thoroughly engaging and always enjoyable.

Mayes and the orchestra played it with resplendent tone, and the soloist's easy technical mastery made its octaves and leaps seem mere flicks of the wrist. Mayes' wrist, however, is very much the thing that makes his playing as fine as it proved, and when he flicks it, things happen.

Munch anchored down the Kabalevsky's lightweight with Beethoven's Third Symphony and Debussy's Iberia. The Beethoven had a far greater degree of repose than in Munch's last traversal of it here, and an adherence to what are usually regarded as its best tempos. He asks his brass for an edgy tone which bit pretty hard in the final calls of the slow movement, but that is the orchestral timbre Munch cultivates. It illustrates better than any other factor the rather complete changeover to a French-sounding orchestra which he has accomplished with the Boston Symphony during his tenure.

Debussy's Iberia is a great score and a great work under Munch. Its lights and shadows, its wirling rhythms emerge in dazzling array under his flickering baton, and he plays it with every bit of elasticity. Here the sound of the orchestra is right beyond argument. The members of the orchestra must be solidly commended for their work in this elusive music. Especially worth praise are the men of the percussion section, where the tambourines were touched with unusual skill.

There was an interesting near-contretemps toward the close of the final section, during Burgin's lovely violin solo when Munch suddenly burst into unnecessary song, but it passed and the conductor and concertmaster congratulated each other nicely at the end of the work.

Cir. (D 103,308)

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

DEC 2 - 1953

Prokofieff's Seventh Has First Performance in Boston

By FEROL AUSTEN
Special to The Hartford Times

Boston — In one of the best concerts of the still young season, Charles Munch presented an all-Russian program last weekend at Symphony Hall. The "big" work, of course was the first Boston performance of Prokofieff's Seventh Symphony.

There were also the Scherzo and March from the last composer's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concert — performed by Zadel Skolovsky, and Borodin's Polovtzian Dances from "Prince Igor."

* * *

THAT PROKOFIEFF, like Shostakovitch and others, has had to toe Moscow's party line is, I suppose, evident. Perhaps, even in our subjective evaluation, it wouldn't be so evident if we were not already apprised of a few facts regarding the state of music behind the Iron Curtain. But—however much Prokofieff has restrained himself from producing "reactionary" music, the truth still persists — you can't keep a great composer from writing good music. Unfortunately, you can keep him from writing great music.

And so it is with this Seventh Symphony—his last, incidentally. Strangely enough, it's a happy symphony—almost whimsical in feeling. As a major work it is so conventional for a mature Prokofieff that one could even think that the unhappy composer was having somewhat of a final joke on his self-appointed censors. More likely, however, it served as an outlet for his own illness and frustration. As a symphony, the music is good, interesting at all times, lyrical, pleasantly harmonic (in contrast to contemporary dissonances in general), and the final movement is quite exciting—reminiscent in some respects to the Classical Symphony. It is not, however, Prokofieff at his best, or even at his second best. The Russians have unwittingly deprived us — and themselves, if they only knew it — of what would have been Prokofieff's final great work.

* * *

ZADEL SKOLOVSKY, in collaboration with Charles Munch, performed the Rachmaninoff Piano Concert in a slightly unusual manner—it isn't often one hears the piano subjugated to the orchestra to such an extent. It isn't that Mr. Skolovsky isn't an authoritative keyboard artist —because he is, and his technical skill is admirable on all points, in spite of a few rebellious passages in the Concerto.

Under the auspices of the Eire Society of Boston, there was a delightful recital at Sanders Theater last week—that of soprano Joan Walker who, with a very right touch of informality, transformed what could have been a dull concert into a tremendous effective one. The usual practice for sopranos is to stand "naturally" in the crook of the piano with one hand resting "naturally" on the piano, and the other hand falling "naturally" at the side—giving an over-all impression, one might say, of a Spahi officer standing at parade rest.

* * *

NOT MISS WALKER. She had a glass of water on the piano which she needed, she said, because her tongue rattles around in her mouth when it gets too dry; she chatters between numbers, too, and after a song has received especially loud applause, she says she knew we'd like that one. Actually, she has a very pleasing voice and she uses it with intelligence and showmanship — blarney, I suppose we should call it in connection with this charming colleen.

There were some in the audience who might have felt that Miss Walker had desecrated the ritual of the hewn-in-granite, traditional soprano recital. But the ceiling stayed up, and the walls didn't fall in, and by far the majority of proper Bostonians in the audience enthusiastically approved of Miss Walker's informal and congenial style.

2, 1

THE BOSTON HERALD, WED

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE

iful, unbelievnstrument this estra is!
last night for any years un-er Eugene Ore may be some wing over the
to play, there
l over its sta-three or four as in the ressive thing is a different the Boston

ply cannot be other. It has and uniquely ity springing om its match-
spond, to ful-signal of its alive in great tonal vitility a displine
f articulation desks.
spirited, even

a mettlesome character that is extraordinarily exciting to hear but that depends, in the final analysis, on the esthetic values emphasized by its conductor. This, of course, applies to all orchestras, but especially to the Philadelphia, which would seem to have the capacity to be and to do what its conductor demands more willingly and capably than any other orchestra of the day.

In such soloists as William Kincaid, flute; Marcel Tabuteau, oboe; Mason Jones, horn; Jacob Kratchmalik, violin, and Samuel Lifschey, viola, it has some of the leading first desk players in the country, though it was interesting to note last night in the Brahms that Mr. Ormandy never gave them the lead or the emphasis these roles usually receive. Indeed, if there were any comments to make on Mr. Ormandy's conducting, save to find it masterly and persuasive, one might find a little fault with his lack of attention to the inner parts except in connection with the string band, which he gave great and effective attention. It was interesting to note, too, that Mr. Ormandy did not use the hall's risers, but presented his orchestra, cellos to the fore opposite the first violins, on the flat stage.

Although Boston has never taken very much to the Bach transcription, it must be said Mr. Ormandy's setting of the D minor Toccata and Fugue was a splendid evocation of the baroque organ. He took the fugue in a whirlwind of a tempo without sacrificing the lines of the bass entries too much, and made it a striking orchestral tour de force which, if verging on the theatrical, was entirely acceptable as a showcase for the orchestra's unlimited capacities.

William Schuman's Sixth Symphony, heard here for the first time,* also gave the orchestra every chance to display its limitless virtuosity but the music was something terrible to hear. Alas, poor Mr. Schuman would so like to be a 20th century American prophet it is too bad to have to belabor him at the risk of appearing in some 21st century edition of Mr. Slonimsky's Lexicon of Musical Invective. But anyone exposed as we all constantly are, to the complexities of Honegger, Martinu, Piston, Hindemith, Stravinsky, Bartok, Schoenberg, or even Bloch, Barber, and Copland, cannot find any legitimate excuse for an essay of this sort that, when it is not being tiresomely sustained is crashing and banging about at a great rate. I haven't heard anything less attractive or less important since the Boston Symphony suffered all through Europe with William Schuman's Third, and what Mr. Ormandy memory escapes me utterly. Oh, memory escapes me utterly. Oh well, we'll find out in 2053 whe I am quoted in the new Lexicon

However, the Schuman aside where it belongs, it was a beautiful and a brilliant evening o orchestral mastery, and I hope the Philadelphia will find some way of coming this way much much more often.

The Philadelphia Orchestra

The Philadelphia orchestra, Euger Ormandy conducting, gave a conce Symphony Hall last night as presente by the Philadelphia Forum in asso tion with Boston University's Celeb Series. The program:
Toccata and Fugue in D minor ..Ba
Symphony No. 6, Op. 33 .Wm. Schuma
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 6

44

Cir. (D 189,181)

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CAL.
DAILY NEWS

DEC 2 1953

French music waxed by Boston

By MILDRED NORTON

The latest Boston Symphony releases with Charles Munch conducting Honegger's Symphony No. 5 and Roussel's Bacchus et Ariane ballet suite No. 2 are in the nature of premier performances on LP. They are also performances under the guidance of a master stylist and one who is among the foremost living ones for French music.

Munch's unique talent in this respect is brilliantly displayed in these readings which reveal Honegger rot only as a superb craftsman in the tradition of Saint-Saens, but a highly original creator. This is the composer's most intimate and probing work to date and one that could very well endure in the standard repertory. The Roussel ballet suite is exquisitely played and for a bonus Munch has added a delicate reading of Ravel's Pavane for a Dead Princess (RCA Victor LP). Reproduction is occasionally rough in the violins but is otherwise good.

Sympho
Solomor
fers tw writing
itable

Cir. (D 103,308)

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

DEC 2 - 1953

Prokofieff's Seventh Has First Performance in Boston

By FEROL AUSTEN
Special to The Hartford Times

Boston — In one of the best concerts of the still young season, Charles Munch presented an all-Russian program last weekend at Symphony Hall. The "big" work, of course was the first Boston performance of Prokofieff's Seventh Symphony.

There were also the Scherzo and March from the last composer's opera, "The Love for Three Oranges," Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concert — performed by Zadel Skolovsky, and Borodin's Polovtzian Dances from "Prince Igor."

* * *

THAT PROKOFIEFF, like Shostakovitch and others, has had to toe Moscow's party line is, I suppose, evident. Perhaps, even in our subjective evaluation, it wouldn't be so evident if we were not already apprised of a few facts regarding the state of music behind the Iron Curtain. But—however much Prokofieff has restrained himself from producing "reactionary" music, the truth still persists — you can't keep a great composer from writing good music. Unfortunately, you can keep him from writing great music.

And so it is with this Seventh Symphony—his last, incidentally. Strangely enough, it's a happy symphony—almost whimsical in feeling. As a major work it is so conventional for a mature Prokofieff that one could even think that the unhappy composer was having somewhat of a final joke on his self-appointed censors. More likely, however, it served as an outlet for his own illness and frustration. As a symphony, the music is good, interesting at all times, lyrical, pleasantly harmonic (in contrast to contemporary dissonances in general), and the final movement is quite exciting—reminiscent in some respects to the Classical Symphony. It is not, however, Prokofieff at his best, or even at his second best. The Russians have unwittingly deprived us — and themselves, if they only knew it — of what would have been Prokofieff's final great work.

* * *

ZADEL SKOLOVSKY, in collaboration with Charles Munch, performed the Rachmaninoff Piano Concert in a slightly unusual manner—it isn't often one hears the piano subjugated to the orchestra to such an extent. It isn't that Mr. Skolovsky isn't an authoritative keyboard artist —because he is, and his technical skill is admirable on all points, in spite of a few rebellious passages in the Concerto.

Under the auspices of the Eire Society of Boston, there was a delightful recital at Sanders Theater last week—that of soprano Joan Walker who, with a very right touch of informality, transformed what could have been a dull concert into a tremendous effective one. The usual practice for sopranos is to stand "naturally" in the crook of the piano with one hand resting "naturally" on the piano, and the other hand falling "naturally" at the side—giving an over-all impression, one might say, of a Spahi officer standing at parade rest.

* * *

NOT MISS WALKER. She had a glass of water on the piano which she needed, she said, because her tongue rattles around in her mouth when it gets too dry; she chatters between numbers, too, and after a song has received especially loud applause, she says she knew we'd like that one. Actually, she has a very pleasing voice and she uses it with intelligence and showmanship — blarney, I suppose we should call it in connection with this charming colleen.

There were some in the audience who might have felt that Miss Walker had desecrated the ritual of the hewn-in-granite, traditional soprano recital. But the ceiling stayed up, and the walls didn't fall in, and by far the majority of proper Bostonians in the audience enthusiastically approved of Miss Walker's informal and congenial style.

THE WASH TON POST
Friday, Dece r 4, 1953

Postlude

Cir. (208,241)

This Clipping From
RADIO & TELEVISION NEWS
CHICAGO, ILL.

DEC - 1953

By BERT WHYTE

BERLIOZ
ROMEO AND JULIET
Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Charles Munch with chorus and soloists. Victor LM-6011 (two 12" LP) Orthophonic curve. Price $11.44.

The advent of a complete version of this work is likely to cause some consternation among those who invested in the excerpted LP recently issued by Columbia. Well, that is LP for you! It's either feast or famine. This latest recording is one of Victor's best efforts with their new Orthophonic recording. A fine orchestral balance is matched by good acoustic treatment. The surprisingly good choral work is clean and articulate. Soloists are in proper perspective to the greater tonal masses. Victor advertises this disc as, "For Hi-Fi fans," on a little sticker applied to the front of the album. This is a good recording and I certainly recommend it to those interested in this work. But I don't think it can be called "Hi-Fi." The dynamic and frequency response still fall a little short of the efforts put forth by several other companies. Charles Munch, certainly one of the most controversial conductors of the Boston Symphony, is at his best here. Throughout the recording, the score bears witness to his painstaking efforts, in this highly polished performance. The orchestra is rich and sonorous and sympathetic to every demand made on it by the conductor. The recording followed the Orthophonic curve [illegible] in the bass end, adding [illegible] extra fillip. Quiet surfaces and the inclusion of a libretto [illegible] bonus picture.

ings a
techni
offer
wrot

DECEMBER 2, 1

THE BOSTON HERALD, WED

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE

What a beautiful, unbelievably responsive instrument this Philadelphia orchestra is!

It came to town last night for its first visit in many years under its great leader Eugene Ormandy, and if there may be some hemming and hawing over the program it elected to play, there may be none at all over its station as one of the three or four greatest orchestras in the world.

The most impressive thing about it is that it is a different orchestra. Like the Boston Symphony, it simply cannot be compared with any other. It has a quality entirely and uniquely its own, a quality springing largely, I think, from its matchless capacity to respond, to fulfill the slightest signal of its conductor, to come alive in great surging waves of tonal vitility while maintaining a displine and a clarity of articulation down to the last desks.

This gives it a spirited, even a mettlesome character that is extraordinarily exciting to hear but that depends, in the final analysis, on the esthetic values emphasized by its conductor. This, of course, applies to all orchestras, but especially to the Philadelphia, which would seem to have the capacity to be and to do what its conductor demands more willingly and capably than any other orchestra of the day.

In such soloists as William Kincaid, flute; Marcel Tabuteau, oboe; Mason Jones, horn; Jacob Kratchmalik, violin, and Samuel Lifschey, viola, it has some of the leading first desk players in the country, though it was interesting to note last night in the Brahms that Mr. Ormandy never gave them the lead or the emphasis these roles usually receive. Indeed, if there were any comments to make on Mr. Ormandy's conducting, save to find it masterly and persuasive, one might find a little fault with his lack of attention to the inner parts except in connection with the string band, which he gave great and effective attention. It was interesting to note, too, that Mr. Ormandy did not use the hall's risers, but presented his orchestra, cellos to the fore opposite the first violins, on the flat stage.

Although Boston has never taken very much to the Bach transcription, it must be said Mr. Ormandy's setting of the D minor Toccata and Fugue was a splendid evocation of the baroque organ. He took the fugue in a whirlwind of a tempo without sacrificing the lines of the bass entries too much, and made it a striking orchestral tour de force which, if verging on the theatrical, was entirely acceptable as a showcase for the orchestra's unlimited capacities.

William Schuman's Sixth Symphony, heard here for the first time,* also gave the orchestra every chance to display its limitless virtuosity but the music was something terrible to hear. Alas, poor Mr. Schuman would so like to be a 20th century American prophet it is too bad to have to belabor him at the risk of appearing in some 21st century edition of Mr. Slonimsky's Lexicon of Musical Invective. But anyone exposed as we all constantly are, to the complexities of Honegger, Martinu, Piston, Hindemith, Stravinsky, Bartok, Schoenberg, or even Bloch, Barber, and Copland, cannot find any legitimate excuse for an essay of this sort that, when it is not being tiresomely sustained is crashing and banging about at a great rate. I haven't heard anything less attractive or less important since the Boston Symphony suffered all through Europe with William Schuman's Third, and what Mr. Ormandy memory escapes me utterly. Oh, memory escapes me utterly. Oh well, we'll find out in 2053 when I am quoted in the new Lexicon.

However, the Schuman aside where it belongs, it was a beautiful and a brilliant evening of orchestral mastery, and I hope the Philadelphia will find some way of coming this way much, much more often.

The Philadelphia Orchestra

The Philadelphia orchestra, Eugene Ormandy conducting, gave a concert Symphony Hall last night as presented by the Philadelphia Forum in association with Boston University's Celebrity Series. The program:

Toccata and Fugue in D minor	Ba
Symphony No. 6, Op. 33	Wm. Schuma
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 6

Music in Review

By TUCKER KEISER

When an orchestra has a permanent conductor with a keen ear, musical erudition, insight into and respect for a composer's intention, and effortless control of his musicians, the organization is bound to grow through the years into a great instrument. Last night in Symphony Hall Eugene Ormandy led such an organization, the Philadelphia Orchestra, in its first Boston performance in 14 years.

Orchestras have personalities as distinctive as those of individual musicians, and this Quaker member of the American big three (the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the New York Philharmonic, and the Philadelphia Orchestra) is very much of a personality. Its woodwinds blend more beautifully than any other such choir; its strings, penetratingly brilliant when necessary, retain a Stokowskian lushness; its brasses are sonorous, secure, and steady, without being obstreperous. In short, the orchestra reflects Ormandy's discriminating taste.

Boston knows too well what results from erratic brilliance on the podium; Philadelphia appreciates the assured equanimity of a musical director who gives the utmost consideration to the composer, and whose conducting technique is honest rather than histrionic.

His orchestration of the Toccata and Fugue in D minor by Bach, which opened the program, fulfills the historical function of a toccata; originally this form was designed to exploit the sonorities of a keyboard instrument and Mr. Ormandy has employed the form to exploit in similar fashion the sonorities of the various choirs of the orchestra.

William Schuman's Symphony No. 6 in one movement received its first Boston performance as the second item on last night's program. Though the symphony is played continuously from beginning to end, its six sections are clearly defined, the first and last parts, Largo and Larghissimo, serving as prologue and epilogue. The four middle sections, in alternate tempi, were much like a classical symphony both in time consumed and forms employed.

MUSIC

Philadelphia Orchestra Plays at Symphony Hall

The Philadelphia Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy, music director and conductor, last night gave a concert at Symphony Hall in the Boston University Celebrity Series. The program: Bach: Toccata and Fugue in D minor (transcribed for orchestra by Eugene Ormandy); William Schuman: Sixth Symphony (first performance in Boston); Brahms: First Symphony.

By CYRUS DURGIN

Mr. Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra were indeed welcome visitors at Symphony Hall last night. This was their first Boston concert since Jan. 13, 1940, or since the succession of Charles Munch as conductor of the Boston Symphony. The point is made for this reason: That in the Koussewitzky era the Boston and Philadelphia Orchestras had more in common, tonally, than today, and after four seasons of a different technical approach and a different ideal of tone, it is most interesting to hear again our friends from the city on the Skuylkill.

The Philadelphians continue to be one of the three greatest orchestras of these United States, an instrument of magnificent sound and ensemble. The individual choirs are homogeneous and solid, and when all are playing together the sonority is both clear and rich. (It was interesting, further, to hear part of the concert away from this writer's usual place in Symphony Hall, for it is true that the same place in an auditorium does condition your ears to certain effects less noticeable elsewhere.)

Compared to the Boston Symphony today, the Philadelphia Orchestra plays with considerably more weight. In the Brahms Symphony it seemed odd (though five or six years ago it would not) to note the strings "biting in" so hard, and to remark the relative heaviness of brass and woodwind tone. These comparisons need be invidious to no one; it is a fact that no two conductors hear or work just alike (which is fortunate, obviously!) and it is well that there be a difference in orchestras and that we have opportunity to savor it.

Brahms' C minor Symphony was the one wholly "classical" item of the program, since the Bach work was a modern, resplendent and skilled, transcription. Hence Brahms was the more exacting test of Mr. Ormandy as interpreter. The first three movements he played conventionally, but in the finale, little exaggerations of inner voices, aberrations of tempo and some peculiar shadings, dynamically, crept in. They did not greatly alter the context of the music, but neither did they seem in the least degree necessary. The large audience was favorably impressed, and the conductor won a decided ovation.

I would prefer to write of the Schuman Sixth Symphony after more acquaintance with it than is presently the case. But marginal comments may be made, and chief among them is the conviction that this is music of powerful and uncompromising ideas. There were those who didn't like the sheer sound of it, but I suspect they might change their views with repeated hearings. Schuman, though much of his life a music-educator, has not been a mild or repressed academic in his own creative work. Dissonance as derived from separate moving voices is wholly logical and natural to him, and so is a certain emotional intensity that hints, whatever the surface of his music, that Schuman at bottom is not without romantic feeling. The structure of the Sixth—its single movement encompassing a half-dozen sections—is what takes time to grasp. I hope Bostonians will have that opportunity.

D-18 THE EVENING STAR
Washington, D. C.
FRIDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1953

Boston Orchestra Displays Polish and Elan

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, conductor. Soloist: Samuel Mayes, cello. Program: Symphony No. 3 in E flat, Op. 55, Beethoven; Concerto for cello and orchestra, Op. 49, Kabalevsky; Iberia, Debussy.

It seems a shame that Mr. Munch and his colleagues would come all the way from Boston, paying Pullman and taxi fares and temporarily interrupting their home life, to devote a third of their program to the Kabalevsky cello concerto. It was beautifully played by Samuel Mayes, first cellist of the orchestra, but what else can be said of this high-class dinner music, this rich man's Muzak? It is a three-movement concerto, of great bril- nce in the solo part, other- se undistinguished. Even its edication, "To Soviet Youth," s, I daresay, reasonably undistinguished.

Debussy's Iberia, that masterpiece of Spanish music written by a man who never spent a night in Spain, was presented with all the polish and elan that has made the Boston Orchestra one of the greatest in the world. The last movement seemed to lack the drive and excitement that is in the music. Mr. Munch has never been a prime favorite of mine; his admirers who were not at last night's concert may be assured that his work was much the same as usual.

The Eroica was the greatest disappointment of the evening to me. Mannered and lacking grandeur in the first movement, unsteady rhythmically in the scherzo and marred by curious "effects" in the finale, it was routine—although, of course, the routine of a very great orchestra.

My feeling about the Debussy and Beethoven gives rise to the observation of an evident but perhaps overlooked fact. At the present time (it has not always been so) the difference in performances of an orchestral work, one conducted by the most perverse virtuoso, the other by the most pedestrian stick-waver, are very slight. They fall within narrow limits. I emphatically state that these differences are all-important, they make music out of notes, they provide a lifetime of study, decision, and aesthetic enjoyment—still the fact remains they are relatively slight.

The Eroica symphony provides a good example. It is a piece of music of the same stature as Hamlet. The two works may be very different in every other particular, yet no one would avoid a discussion based on the assumption that each is the great example of its kind. Now A says to B: "I heard a performance of the Eroica last night." B knows without further comment how many movements

---

Washington
Dec. 4, 1953 Times-Herald

Munch Links Harmony Of Past, Present

BY GLENN DILLARD GUNN

The Boston Symphony, under Charles Munch, played the first concert of its current season Thursday [illegible] Constitution hall.

A program [illegible] balanced as to con[illegible] contrasted the classic and [illegible] schools in equal [illegible] the "Eroica" symphony [illegible] Beethoven represented the last century. Debussy's "Iberia" and a new cello Concerto by the Soviet composer, Kabalevski, represented the present.

To revive the traditions of the past and to make the spirit of Beethoven's great tribute to Napoleon live again demands of the interpreter profound insight and warm sympathy.

Dedication Destroyed

Beethoven planned this symphony as an acknowledgement of the liberating hand and purpose of Napoleon. When he learned that his hero was just another dictator he tore from the score the page on which he has inscribed the dedication and with characteristic impulsiveness he trampled it under foot.

He could not, of course, take from the music its soaring freedom, its excited conflict, its plangent sorrow in the stately funeral march, the fleet joy of the scherzo and the mounting triumph of the finale.

Beethoven was the first to bring such drama to the symphony orchestra; and tho many have followed his example none has surpassed the force and, considering the limitations of his generation, the imagination for orchestral color that he developed in defining his program.

Charles Munch is a classicist and a traditionalist who contrives to define the ideals of the past and to imbue them with the force and the fantasy of the present. This was Beethoven playing of the very highest order and the public payed cordial tribute.

At the other end of the symphonic spectrum stood the warmth and color and disciplined excitement of Debussy's "Iberia." Often it has been said that the French write the finest Spanish music and in the entirely idiomatic Debussy expression the voice of Spain, its rhythms, its urgent movement, its langor and its exaltation sound with vigor but also with all the restraints of taste.

Again the performance exhibited all the resources of a great virtuoso orchestra and all the re-creative capacity of a highly-gifted and imaginative conductor.

Makes a Master of Cello

These qualities carried over into the new cello Concerto, which brought forward the orchestra's first cellist in the highly-characteristic pages of the Soviet master, Kabalevsky. This composer was first made known to America in his piano Sonota, which Horowitz added to his repetoire.

The cello Concerto is quite different. Where the piano work is bizarre and at the same time a bit calculated the Concerto moves with a certain measure of serenity and with frequent lyric beauty.

One judges that it is a work of great difficulty, and it is a pleasant duty to join in the plaudits of the public as addressed to Samuel Mayes. He is quite certainly one of the foremost masters of his instrument, an artist of sensitive reaction, master of all the inflections of a lustrous cello tone.

Cir. (D 123,277) (S 151,479)

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
DEC 3 - 1953

BOSTONIANS IN BROOKLYN—Charles Munch, entering his fifth year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will appear with the group tomorrow evening at the Academy of Music for the opening program of its annual series.

Cir. (D 123,277) (S 151,479)

Ho

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

DEC 5 - 1953

MUSIC

135

Boston Symphony Offers Excellent Program Here

By PAUL AFFELDER

Charles Munch brought his Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Academy of Music last evening for its first visit of the season. With them, too, came Leo Smit to perform the solo part in Aaron Copland's Piano Concerto.

It was extremely interesting to hear a revival of this relatively early Copland work—it was written for the Boston Symphony in 1926—and to imagine with what incredulity it must have been received more than a quarter of a century ago. For, in his fine integration of blues and hot jazz with the more conventional symphonic language and his often dramatic combinations of consonance and dissonance—even polytonality—Copland surely provided a shocker for the relatively conservative ears of the late '20s.

The Concerto's reception last night was an entirely different matter. Present-day audiences have become more accustomed to dissonance and to rhythmic irregularity. Besides, on this occasion, we were rewarded with an exceptionally vital reading of the score. Mr. Smit, a Copland specialist, played with appropriate brilliance and, where it was required, brittleness, while Mr. Munch amazed us with his firm grasp of the complicated, typically American jazz idiom.

It is not every foreign-born, European-trained musician who can convey this spirit in an interpretation of our special kind of musical expression. Even for Copland, however, who was obliged by the law of supply and demand to simplify his style during the intervening years, this Concerto certainly was far ahead of its time.

We would naturally expect Mr. Munch to be completely at home in modern French music, but we were still immensely moved by his sensitive and perceptive interpretation of Debussy's "Iberia." It was a singular interpretation, a painting not in splashing colors but in veiled pastels. Nevertheless, everything was beautifully controlled and every inner orchestral voice was crystal clear.

One is accustomed to a warmer, more sensuous approach to the opening section, "On the Streets and Byways," and here [illegible] have liked the colors [illegible] somewhat brighter. [illegible] the atmospheric middle part, "Fragrance of the Night," that he worked his real magic, evoking a true air of mystery and romance. Among the most difficult of all passages to interpret with the proper effect is the transition to the final section, the gradual awakening of a Spanish town on the morning of a festival day. Seldom, if ever, have we heard this passage set forth with such a miraculous and moving impact.

It would be pleasant to report that conductor and orchestra had achieved comparable miracles with Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, the work which opened the program. Unfortunately, however, theirs was a purely surface performance, one that never plumbed the depths of this giant among symphonies. The marvelous control Mr. Munch exerted over the brasses in the Copland and Debussy works was nowhere to be found here. With their narrow, French bore instruments, the trumpets bleated and the occasionally out-of-tune horns emitted a sound not unlike kazoos. The tempi throughout were fairly brisk, which is not objectionable, but there were some strange retards in the Funeral March.

Among the near-capacity audience were many young people. It is encouraging to see the younger generation turning out for top-flight musical performances, for it is they who must grow into the adult backbone of our audiences of future years.

Cir. (D 124,110) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

DEC 6 - 1953

Munch and Burgin to Share Next Symphony Concerts Here

Next Tuesday evening in Sanders Theatre, Charles Munch will conduct the second concert of the series in Cambridge by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will consist of Mozart's "Divertimento for Strings," K. 136; Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin;" the Kabalevsky Cello Concerto with Samuel Mayes as soloist, and Brahms' Second Symphony.

On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, Richard Burgin will conduct the eighth pair of concerts of the longer series, although Mr. Munch will conduct one number in memory of the violinist, Jacques Thibaud, who lost his life in an airplane accident in France last Summer—Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole," which Thibaud often played, once with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The soloist will be Ruth Posselt, who studied this work when she coached in French repertoire with the late violinist. Richard Burgin will present Stravinsky's ballet suite, "Danses Concertantes"; the Adagio from Mahler's posthumous Tenth Symphony (to be heard for the first time in Boston) and Tchaikovsky's "Italian Capriccio."

VIOLINIST Ruth Posselt will play Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole" at the Friday-Saturday Symphony concerts and the Thursday open Rehearsal.

The third concerts of the Sunday afternoon and Tuesday evening series will take place in Symphony Hall on next Sunday, Dec. 13, and Tuesday, Dec. 15. Both concerts will be under the direction of Richard Burgin, and each will have the same program. The soloist will be Grant Johannesen, young American pianist of Norwegian descent, who is to make his first appearance here. Since his New York debut in 1944, Mr. Johannesen has played in many parts of the United States and has toured Europe and South America. He will be heard in Beethoven's Second Piano Concerto in B flat. The program will otherwise consist of Stravinsky's "Danses Concertantes," the Adagio from Mahler's Tenth Symphony and Tchaikovsky's "Italian Capriccio."

Cir. (D 145,494) (S 272,057)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

DEC 9 - 1953

Open Rehearsal of Symphony Thursday

There will be a three-star Open Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall on Thursday evening at 7:30. Both Charles Munch and Richard Burgin will conduct. Ruth Posselt, the well-known violin virtuoso from Boston, is to rehearse Lalo's exotic "Symphony Espagnole," which she will play in memory of Jacques Thibaud, the great French violinist who was killed in an airplane tragedy recently. Miss Posselt's first European tour was arranged by M. Thibaud.

Cir. (D 145,494) (S 272,057)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

DEC 6 - 1953

"Open Rehearsal" On Thursday Evening

The second "Open Rehearsal" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place Thursday evening in Symphony Hall at 7:30 P. M. The admission of the public to an actual rehearsal by this orchestra affords especial opportunity to study the scores under preparation for the program of the week.

Cir. (D 124,110) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

DEC 9 - 1953

Ruth Posselt Speaks of Her Association With French Violinist Jacques Thibaud

There will be a three-star Open Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall tomorrow evening, where both Charles Munch and Richard Burgin will conduct and Ruth Posselt will rehearse Lalo's "Symphony Espagnole."

Miss Posselt also will play the Lalo work at the Friday and Saturday concerts, in memory of the famed French violinist, Jacques Thibaud, who died recently in an airplane accident. Miss Posselt, who studied the work with Thibaud, contributes the following account of her association with him:

"When Jacques Thibaud heard me play in Boston (1932), he urged me to come to Europe and offered to arrange my debut in Paris and other major music capitals. I left for Europe within a few months and made my debut with L'Orchestre Symphonique de Paris under the direction of Pierre Monteux.

"Thibaud spoke to an important impresario, and I made further debut appearances in London, Amsterdam, The Hague, Vienna, Berlin and Milan. Later he introduced me to Pablo Casals, for whom I played several hours, and his enthusiasm was so great he immediately arranged for a tour in Spain for me the following season, where I played 18 concerts, with orchestras and in recital.

"One of the experiences I most enjoyed with Thibaud was my participation in the Bach Double Violin Concerto, and various other works written for two violins, in concerts throughout Europe. I spent two Summers with him and Mme. Thibaud at St. Jean-de-Luz, where I concentrated on the French repertoire. I truly felt like a member of the family, and will always be grateful for his intense interest and devotion. He was as happy as I over my success in Europe, and felt he had reaped his reward when I toured extensively abroad for the following seven seasons, up to the outbreak of hostilities there."

Cir. (D 6,872)

This Clipping From
HOLLYWOOD REPORTER
HOLLYWOOD, CAL.

DEC [illegible] - 1953

Mitchell Gertz Packaging Serge Koussevitsky Biog

Mitchell Gertz is finalizing acquisition of film rights to the life of the late Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Songs of famous living composers, which Koussevitsky introduced into this country, are also being cleared for use in the film package.

Cir. (D 196,[illegible]) (S 203,908)

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

DEC 9 - 1953

Heat At Concerts

I am writing to complain, not about the weird acoustics, fantastic seating arrangement, or general undesirability as a concert hall, but about the heat in Constitution Hall. I attended a concert there on December 2, and was unable to concentrate on the Boston Symphony because of the sweltering and smoky atmosphere of the place. One of my companions left early because of her discomfort, and only a stubborn determination to get my money's worth compels me to attend the remaining series performances for which I have tickets.

Can't something be done? I glanced at the lobby thermometer in the hall, and it registered 78 degrees at intermission time. How long must we suffer?

RUTH F. ROWLAND.
McLean, Va.

Cir. (D 124,110) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

DEC 6 - 1953

Garde Republicaine Band Has Special Sound--Guest Conductor Charles Munch

The famous and distinguished band from France now touring America, the Musique de la Garde Republicaine de Paris, will make its visit to Boston for a concert in Symphony Hall next Friday evening in a concert for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Charles Munch, the Boston Symphony conductor, will be guest leader of Ravel's "Bolero" on the program. He has made the following statement about the French band:

"The idea of an American tour for the Musique de la Garde Republicaine originated at a dinner party a l'Elysee in Paris, at the President's palace. Among the guests were Margaret Truman, Gen Eisenhower and the American Ambassador. I mentioned in the course of our conversation that evening what satisfaction and pride I took in the tour of the United States that I made with our national orchestra and suggested a similar tour for our national band. President Auriol liked this idea very much and immediately took the necessary steps.

The "French" Sound

"I think that it is very interesting for American audiences to hear this band that is so unlike any other. It is made up of the finest virtuosi of the world-famous French school of wind-instrument playing. Like the French orchestras, it has a special sound—for France is the only country that has created and retained a national sonority.

"The news has reached Boston of the great success that La Musique de la Garde Republicaine has enjoyed in the cities where it has already played. I hope that Boston's music-lovers too will take advantage of this extraordinary opportunity to enjoy a rare musical experience."

N. Y. STAATS-ZEITUNG UND HEROLD, MONTAG, den 7. DEZEMBER 195

Munch bringt neues Werk von Kabalevsky nach N. Y.

Von ROBERT PIRK

Der Laie staunt, vielleicht gibt's sogar einen Fachmann, der sich noch wundern kann, daß Kabalevskys Konzert für Cello und Orchester op. 49 erst jetzt in der Carnegie Hall zum erstenmal gespielt worden ist!

Das verdankt New York Charles Munch und seinen Orchestermusikern aus Boston. "Seinen" muß hier unterstrichen werden. Sie sind, abermals stellt man es mit Genugtuung fest, ganz die Seinen, sie folgen seinem unausgesprochenen Wort auf den leisesten Wink.

Mit einem urwüchsig slawischen Akzent beginnt Kabalevskys Konzert, einem Aufstieg, von dem chromatische Läufe in ruhigeres Fahrwasser zurückleiten, bis das einleitende Allegro mit einem zarten Pizzicato verrauscht. Die Pizzicati des abschließenden Allegretto wecken Balalaika-Assoziationen im Ohr, ein Kosakentanz scheint fröhlich einherzustampfen. Dazwischen das packende Hauptthema, molto espressivo eines Largo, dessen Kadenz den jungen Solisten Samuel Mayes als großen, sich klug unterordnenden Könner vorstellte.

In Ravels "Tombeau de Couperin" ließ Munch das Prélude ondulierend, wie sanften Wind über die Grabstätte streichen, "Forlane" ward ein reizend leises Tänzeln; melancholisch mit mächtiger Steigerung das Menuett, nach dem das Rigaudon mit einem Sprung, buchstäblich, begonnen wurde. — Das einleitende Concerto Grosso Nr. 2 von Ernest Bloch ist geeignet, die außerordentlichen Vorzüge dieses Streicherkörpers zu enthüllen. Zum Einsatz der 1. Geigen, in der Fuge, gesellen sich nach und nach alle übrigen Instrumente, mit einem wahren Orgelklang als Gesamtergebnis.

47

Cir. (D 653,252) (S 982,681)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL-AMERICAN

[illegible] 1953

Music Roundup:

Fine Boston Visit

TWO FIRST NEW YORK performances highlighted the first visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last week. Both Bloch's Concerto Grosso No. 2 and Kabalevsky's Cello Concerto aroused audience enthusiasm. The revival of Copland's Piano Concerto (1926) proved to be less acceptable.

Bloch's music provides a happy balance between classical and contemporary style. Throughout the four movements it spells pure beauty and communicative art. Kabalevsky's score flows with characteristic ease, a certain conventionalism, and an engaging manner. Cellists will find it written understandably for pland's ncerto, opated ggests thor-

nductth su-Ravel's perin" Iberia" hioned.
Beetho-notaved the Samuel Kabalev-

urned to rmonic-g solid Brahms'
and the certo at Eugene himself ncerto
ve in his ement of ventional ining the ny, Lalo's gnole and Berlioz's of Faust"

served to introduce Alfredo Campoli as a most accomplished violinist.

An ingratiating program including Bloch's Viola Suite, Francaix's Violin Suite, and Mozart's Sinfonia Concertante K364 marked the third concert of The Little Orchestra Society, conducted by Thomas Scherman with Jan Tomasow, violin, and Herbert Feldman, viola, as soloists.

Revive Debussy

The revival of Debussy's "Pelleas and Melisande" met with conspicuous success at the Metropolitan, chiefly because of the conducting of Pierre Monteux. The new cast composed of Nadine Conner, Jerome Hines, Theodor Uppman, Martial Singher, Martha Lipton and Vilma Georgiou had been astutely chosen and should be even better in repeated performances. The re-designed production is quite acceptable.

Three important debuts have brought Uppman, Miss Georgiou and Ettore Bastianini to the fore. Uppman's Pelleas is most persuasive dramatically and pleasing vocally. Miss Georgiou sings Yniold in the Debussy opera admirably. Bastianini's elder Germont in "Traviata" brought him an ovation thoroughly deserved.

Three Verdi operas have started the subscription rounds: "Rigoletto," "Il Trovatore" and "Traviata." On the whole the quality of singing since the opening of the opera season has been

Herald 12/9/53

he flute section of the Boston Symphony—(Standing) George en and Philip Kaplan, and (seated) James Pappoutsakis Doriot Anthony—will be featured in works for four flutes e concert tonight in Sanders Theater by the Cambridge ty for Early Music.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

Cir. (D 175,149) (S 182,397)

This Clipping From DALLAS, TEX.
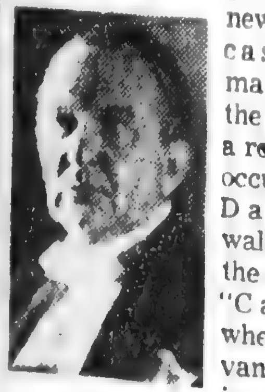
NEWS

The Musical Digest

By IRVING KOLODIN

Reiner Takes Hold Of Chicago Front

CHICAGO, Ill.—It is not customary to think of this city by the lake as a sparkling font of musical news, though occasionally it manages to be the scene of such a row as recently occurred when David Poleri walked out on the final scene of "Carmen" or when Oscar Levant took to telling Thor Johnson how to conduct in the middle of a public performance.



REINER

But its orchestra hall on the lake front has become a solid source of news, most of it good thus far, as Fritz Reiner takes hold of his new duties as conductor of its long-established and well-beloved orchestra.

Most opinions are that Reiner has given the orchestra both a stability and a lift it hasn't had in years, but one need not invoke opinion in recording the effects of his engagement on attendance. Subscription sales in the three series (Chicago has a weekly "pair" on Thursday night and Friday afternoon, plus a Tuesday afternoon series) are up 20 per cent over last year, and the single seat sale has been such that the four Thursday nights to date have been sold out.

I regretted what happened to Rafael Kubelik (he was released last spring after serving three years), as I would regret an unhappy experience for any young musician of his plentiful gifts. But certainly the orchestra I heard respond to Reiner's commanding leadership in the program-opening "Gazza Ladra" overture of Rossini with a zestful, clean-cut, alert performance was decidedly more respectable a symphonic ensemble than the one I had heard plod through Beethoven's "Eroica" under Kubelik's direction in a Carnegie Hall visit last spring.

BY WHICH I mean it is decidedly worthy of respect when the top orchestras in America are being discussed. Recognizing the supremacy of the Philadelphia Orchestra—for the while, anyway—the Chicago ensemble is edging its way into the second flight where for long the Boston Symphony and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony have been entrenched. However, there are greater signs of life in the symphonic corpus of both Chicago and Detroit and it may be that some conventional thinking is in for a fast reshuffle soon.

I don't think we will have to wait four years, or even half of that time, for Reiner's skill and experience to put Chicago, orchestrally, in the top three.

(Copyright, 1953, by the Saturday Review.)

Cir. (D 331,853) (S 567,298)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

DEC 9 - 1953

Hopalong Fears Miscasting As Moses in Biblical Film

Special to the Herald Tribune

HOLLYWOOD, Dec. 8.—William Boyd, television's Hopalong Cassidy, has been offered the role of Moses in Cecil B. DeMille's "The Ten Commandments." A spokesman for Mr. Boyd said he is "considering the offer carefully, but is worried that it will be out of character." Mr. Boyd first appeared in films in a DeMille religious epic, "Feet of Clay," in 1920.

Tentative "Egyptian" Cast

Gene Tierney, Jose Ferrer, Marlon Brando, Victor Mature, Betta St. John, Peter Ustinov, Kirk Douglas, Bella Darvi and Jean Peters were announced today as the tentative cast of Fox's "The Egyptian." The CinemaScope adaptation of Mika Waltari's novel is set for production in February, with Mike Curtiz directing.

Buy Koussevitsky Story

Film rights to the life of the late Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been acquired from his widow by Mitchell Gertz, a student of the conductor, said today. Mrs. Olga Koussevitsky has agreed to write her own "intimate and personal recollections" of her late husband for a screen play. Songs of famous living composers which Mr. Koussevitsky introduced in this country are also being cleared for use in the film.

NOTES: Dana Andrews has signed with Columbia to star in "Gun Slinger," a Western. . . . Alfred Hitchcock has signed a three-picture contract as producer-director for Paramount. His first picture will be "Catch a Thief," starring Cary Grant. . . . Rhonda Fleming said she is considering a singing role on Broadway in Cole Porter's "Ninotchka." . . . Stanley Kramer will return to independent production with a United Artists releasing contract calling for four pictures in the next three years. . . . [illegible] Clift, [illegible] and Dolores [illegible] to the [illegible] "The Broken [illegible] Spencer Tracy.

Cir. (D 34,028)

This Clipping From
YONKERS, N. Y.
HERALD STATESMAN

DEC 7 - 1953

Miss Edelman To Sing With Boston Symphony

DOBBS FERRY—Miss Barbara Edelman, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Walter Edelman of White Plains, formerly of Dobbs Ferry, will sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., on Friday and Saturday, Dec. 18-19.

Miss Edelman is a junior at the New England Conservatory of Music. She will also be heard in a concert at Jordan Hall in Boston this Saturday.

Cir. (D 172,699)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
Christian Science Monitor

DEC 9 - 1953

Boston Symphony Seeks More Financial Support

By Mary Handy
Staff Writer of The Christian Science Monitor

Boston

The 72-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra needs—for its welfare and survival—more tangible appreciation from the Boston community.

The orchestra has won world-wide acclaim and was enthusiastically received on recent tours from Berlin, Germany, to San Francisco. It now requires such support at home.

Business and industry are being called upon to consider the orchestra's value to the entire community.

The orchestra now faces the greatest gap between expenses and receipts since it was founded in 1881. "Our financial picture presents more of a challenge than ever in the past," George E. Judd, business manager, said today.

Special Invitation

Hard-pressed orchestras in Detroit, Pittsburgh, Minneapolis, and San Francisco have recently found business and industry ready to help them. Trustees of the Boston Symphony are hoping to arouse similar support.

Business and civic leaders have been invited to an orchestra rehearsal. After the rehearsal they will hear Harvard's president, Dr. Nathan M. Pusey, discuss the relation of civic leaders to a city's cultural institutions.

A new evaluation of the cultural and economic value to Boston of its world-renowned orchestra could help eliminate the growing deficit, the trustees anticipate.

All over the nation, cultural and educational institutions, confronted with extreme financial problems, are turning to business corporations for tax-free gifts.

Continuance of the American way of life, with educational and cultural institutions privately financed without government subsidy, depends upon the cooperation of the diverse elements of a community many leaders feel.

'Friends' Remembered

As the American economy changes, and the large fortunes of the past generations become less numerous, other means of support for orchestras beside individual donations must be found.

In its appeal to the community, the Boston Symphony is also remembering its 3,100 individual "friends" who gave $85,000 last year. It is hoping to increase their numbers, both from among the music lovers who sit in the seats of Symphony Hall and those who listen to the concerts at home by radio.

Present financial picture of the orchestra is this:

Deficits of the last five years have used up all unrestricted legacies and gifts, and $37,000 of this years' income has gone to pay last year's debts.

The annual budget is $1,500,000. Of this, about $1,000,000 is paid from concert receipts, $150,000 to $200,000 from royalties on records, some $40,000 from earnings on endowment, and $50,000 from such miscellaneous earnings as use of Symphony Hall. The balance must come from donations.

To bring in more revenue, ticket prices have been raised twice in the past five years.

High Standards

The musicians work more days and give more concerts than in any other American symphony orchestra. Trustees are determined that financial want must not lower the high standards of rehearsals and performance.

For 45 weeks the orchestra is busy with concerts in Boston, Cambridge, Providence, and New York. Its members give the annual festival at Tanglewood, the Esplanade and Pops concerts. Recently it has toured both Europe and the United States.

Not only do the musicians work hard. They are heard in Boston alone by an unparalleled number of series ticket holders. Nowhere else in Europe or America do 10,000 music lovers hold series tickets.

During the last two years, the Symphony has been heard on Fridays and Saturdays by thousands more listeners over station WGBH-FM. No other symphony orchestra in the nation, it is believed, gives so many full-length radio performances.

From this great wealth of enrichment and inspiration to the community, the orchestra is hoping to find the answer to its financial problems.

Beavers Contest 'Blasted' Changes

By the Associated Press

St. Joseph, Mo.

The county commissioners didn't count on the beavers being quite so eager when they decided to straighten Bee Creek.

Workmen dug a new channel. By the next morning the beavers had built a dam across it, forcing the stream back into the old channel.

A few sticks of dynamite removed the dam, but not for long. Within a week the beavers had built a new one with the same result.

More dynamite. Three weeks later, a new and stronger dam.

More dynamite—a big charge this time. The blast took away not only the dam, but part of the bank on each side as well.

That did it—the commissioners hope.

Cir. (D 203,001)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER

DEC 10 1953

Supporting the Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is in grave financial trouble. It needs help.

This remarkable organization, which has astonished the great critics of the world with its brilliance, is now in the position of having to appeal for money in order to stay in business. No less than $250,000 must be raised if the orchestra is to meet its obligations for the current season.

In view of the orchestra's importance to Boston, it should require nothing more than a simple statement of debt to persuade the public to co-operate.

Truly, this is one of the world's best cultural assets. It has been with us for 73 years. It has enchanted its listeners at home, and has enhanced the name and fame of Boston abroad. To lose it, would be like losing a piece of one's heart.

And all it's asking for is $250,000.

There are 2,370,000 people here in Metropolitan Boston. Even though many may not realize it, all share in the benefit of having the orchestra with us. Surely it should not be difficult to raise the money from such a population.

Detroit last year raised $400,230 for its symphony orchestra. Chicago raised $311,441.

Boston can equal or top those sums, by sending gifts to Richard C. Paine at Symphony Hall.

Cir. (D 653,252) (S 982,681)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL-AMERICAN

[illegible] - 1953

Music Roundup:

Fine Boston Visit

TWO FIRST NEW YORK performances highlighted the first visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last week. Both Bloch's Concerto Grosso No. 2 and Kabalevsky's Cello Concerto aroused audience enthusiasm. The revival of Copland's Piano Concerto (1926) proved to be less acceptable.

Bloch's music provides a happy balance between classical and contemporary style. Throughout the four movements it spells pure beauty and communicative art. Kabalevsky's score flows with characteristic ease, a certain conventionalism, and an engaging manner. Cellists will find it written understandably for their instrument. Copland's highly original concerto, reflecting the syncopated twenties, still suggests material not quite thoroughly digestible.

Charles Munch conducted both concerts with superb musicianship. Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" and Debussy's "Iberia" were exquisitely fashioned. His performance of Beethoven's "Eroica" was notable. Leo Smit played the Copland expertly. Samuel Mayes played the Kabalevsky persuasively.

Szell Returns

George Szell returned to conduct the Philharmonic-Symphony, offering solid interpretations of Brahms' Second Symphony and the Second Piano Concerto at his first concert. Eugene Istomin proved himself master of the concerto though too assertive in his spirited pronouncement of it. Another conventional program containing the Franck Symphony, Lalo's Symphonic Espagnole and excerpts from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" served to introduce Alfredo Campoli as a most accomplished violinist.

An ingratiating program including Bloch's Viola Suite, Francaix's Violin Suite, and Mozart's Sinfonia Concertante K364 marked the third concert of The Little Orchestra Society, conducted by Thomas Scherman with Jan Tomasow, violin, and Herbert Feldman, viola, as soloists.

Revive Debussy

The revival of Debussy's "Pelleas and Melisande" met with conspicuous success at the Metropolitan, chiefly because of the conducting of Pierre Monteux. The new cast composed of Nadine Conner, Jerome Hines, Theodor Uppman, Martial Singher, Martha Lipton and Vilma Georgiou had been astutely chosen and should sing even better in repeated performances. The re-designed production is quite acceptable.

Three important debuts have brought Uppman, Miss Georgiou and Ettore Bastianini to the fore. Uppman's Pelleas is most persuasive dramatically and pleasing vocally. Miss Georgiou sings Yniold in the Debussy opera admirably. Bastianini's elder Germont in "Traviata" brought him an ovation thoroughly deserved.

Three Verdi operas have started the subscription rounds: "Rigoletto," "Il Trovatore" and "Traviata." On the whole the quality of singing since the opening of the opera season has been superior.

—MILES KASTENDIECK

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

Cir. (D 175,149) (S 182,397)

This Clipping From DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

The Musical Digest

By IRVING KOLODIN

Reiner Takes Hold Of Chicago Front

CHICAGO, Ill.—It is not customary to think of this city by the lake as a sparkling font of musical news, though occasionally it manages to be the scene of such a row as recently occurred when David Poleri walked out on the final scene of "Carmen" or when Oscar Levant took to telling Thor Johnson how to conduct in the middle of a public performance.

REINER

But its orchestra hall on the lake front has become a solid source of news, most of it good thus far, as Fritz Reiner takes hold of his new duties as conductor of its long-established and well-beloved orchestra.

Most opinions are that Reiner has given the orchestra both a stability and a lift it hasn't had in years, but one need not invoke opinion in recording the effects of his engagement on attendance. Subscription sales in the three series (Chicago has a weekly "pair" on Thursday night and Friday afternoon, plus a Tuesday afternoon series) are up 20 per cent over last year, and the single seat sale has been such that the four Thursday nights to date have been sold out.

I regretted what happened to Rafael Kubelik (he was released last spring after serving three years), as I would regret an unhappy experience for any young musician of his plentiful gifts. But certainly the orchestra I heard respond to Reiner's commanding leadership in the program-opening "Gazza Ladra" overture of Rossini with a zestful, clean-cut, alert performance was decidedly more respectable a symphonic ensemble than the one I had heard plod through Beethoven's "Eroica" under Kubelik's direction in a Carnegie Hall visit last spring.

BY WHICH I mean it is decidedly worthy of respect when the top orchestras in America are being discussed. Recognizing the supremacy of the Philadelphia Orchestra—for the while, anyway—the Chicago ensemble is edging its way into the second flight where for long the Boston Symphony and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony have been entrenched. However, there are greater signs of life in the symphonic corpus of both Chicago and Detroit and it may be that some conventional thinking is in for a fast reshuffle soon.

I don't think we will have to wait four years, or even half of that time, for Reiner's skill and experience to put Chicago, orchestrally, in the top three.

(Copyright, 1953, by the Saturday Review.)

Cir. (D 331,[illegible]) (S [illegible])

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

DEC 9 - 1953

Hopalong Fears Miscasting As Moses in Biblical Film

Special to the Herald Tribune

HOLLYWOOD, Dec. 8.—William Boyd, television's Hopalong Cassidy, has been offered the role of Moses in Cecil B. DeMille's "The Ten Commandments." A spokesman for Mr. Boyd said he is "considering the offer carefully, but is worried that it will be out of character." Mr. Boyd first appeared in films in a DeMille religious epic, "Feet of Clay," in 1920.

Tentative "Egyptian" Cast

Gene Tierney, Jose Ferrer, Marlon Brando, Victor Mature, Betta St. John, Peter Ustinov, Kirk Douglas, Bella Darvi and Jean Peters were announced today as the tentative cast of Fox's "The Egyptian." The CinemaScope adaptation of Mika Waltari's novel is set for production in February, with Mike Curtiz directing.

Buy Koussevitsky Story

Film rights to the life of the late Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchasert, have been acquired from his widow by Mitchell Gertz, a student of the conductor, said today. Mrs. Olga Koussevitsky has agreed to write her own "intimate and personal recollections" of her late husband for a screen play. Songs of famous living composers which Mr. Koussevitsky introduced in this country are also being cleared for use in the film.

NOTES: Dana Andrews has signed with Columbia to star in "Gun Slinger," a Western. . . . Alfred Hitchcock has signed a three-picture contract as producer-director for Paramount. His first picture will be "Catch a Thief," starring Cary Grant. . . . Rhonda Fleming said she is considering a singing role on Broadway in Cole Porter's "Ninotchka." . . . Stanley Kramer will return to independent production with a United Artists releasing contract calling for four pictures in the next three years. . . . Montgomery Clift, Richard Widmark and Dolores Del Rio were added today to the cast of Fox's "The Broken Lance," starring Spencer Tracy.

Cir. (D 34,028)

This Clipping From
YONKERS, N. Y.
HERALD STATESMAN

DEC 7 - 1953

Miss Edelman To Sing With Boston Symphony

DOBBS FERRY—Miss Barbara Edelman, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Walter Edelman of White Plains, formerly of Dobbs Ferry, will sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., on Friday and Saturday, Dec. 18-19.

Miss Edelman is a junior at the New England Conservatory of Music. She will also be heard in a concert at Jordan Hall in Boston this Saturday.

---

nphony S More Financial S

By Mary Handy
Staff Writer of The Christian Science Monitor

Boston

The 72-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra needs—for its welfare and survival—more tangible appreciation from the Boston community.

The orchestra has won worldwide acclaim and was enthusiastically received on recent tours from Berlin, Germany, to San Francisco. It now requires such support at home.

Business and industry are being called upon to consider the orchestra's value to the entire community.

The orchestra now faces the greatest gap between expenses and receipts since it was founded in 1881. "Our financial picture presents more of a challenge than ever in the past," George E. Judd, business manager, said today.

Special Invitation

Hard-pressed orchestras in Detroit, Pittsburgh, Minneapolis, and San Francisco have recently found business and industry ready to help them. Trustees of the Boston Symphony are hoping to arouse similar support.

Business and civic leaders have been invited to an orchestra rehearsal. After the rehearsal they will hear Harvard's president, Dr. Nathan M. Pusey, discuss the relation of civic leaders to a city's cultural institutions.

A new evaluation of the cultural and economic value to Boston of its world-renowned orchestra could help eliminate the growing deficit, the trustees anticipate.

All over the nation, cultural and educational institutions, confronted with extreme financial problems, are turning to business corporations for tax-free gifts.

Continuance of the American way of life, with educational and cultural institutions privately financed without government subsidy, depends upon the co-operation of the diverse elements of a community many leaders feel.

'Friends' Remembered

As the American economy changes, and the large fortunes of the past generations become less numerous, other means of support for orchestras beside individual donations must be found.

In its appeal to the community, the Boston Symphony is also remembering its 3,100 individual "friends" who gave $85,000 last year. It is hoping to increase their numbers, both from among the music lovers who sit in the seats of Symphony Hall and those who listen to the concerts at home by radio.

Present financial picture of the orchestra is this:

Deficits of the last five years have used up all unrestricted legacies and gifts, and $37,000 of this years' income has gone to pay last year's debts.

The annual budget is $1,500,000. Of this, about $1,000,000 is paid from concert receipts, $150,000 to $200,000 from royalties on records, some $40,000 from earnings on endowment, and $50,000 from such miscellaneous earnings as use of Symphony Hall. The balance must come from donations.

To bring in more revenue, ticket prices have been raised twice in the past five years.

High Standards

The musicians work more days and give more concerts than in any other American symphony orchestra. Trustees are determined that financial want must not lower the high standards of rehearsals and performance.

For 45 weeks the orchestra is busy with concerts in Boston, Cambridge, Providence, and New [illegible] an[illegible] th[illegible] certs. [illegible] both Europe a[illegible] States.

Not only do the musicians work hard. They are heard in Boston alone by an unparalleled number of series ticket holders. Nowhere else in Europe or America do 10,000 music lovers hold series tickets.

During the last two years, the Symphony has been heard on Fridays and Saturdays by thousands more listeners over station WGBH-FM. No other symphony orchestra in the nation, it is believed, gives so many full-length radio performances.

From this great wealth of enrichment and inspiration to the community, the orchestra is hoping to find the answer to its financial problems.

Beavers' Contest 'Blasted' Changes

By the Associated Press

St. Joseph, Mo.

The county commissioners didn't count on the beavers being quite so eager when they decided to straighten Bee Creek.

Workmen dug a new channel. By the next morning the beavers had built a dam across it, forcing the stream back into the old channel.

A few sticks of dynamite removed the dam, but not for long. Within a week the beavers had built a new one with the same result.

More dynamite. Three weeks later, a new and stronger dam.

More dynamite — a big charge this time. The blast took away not only the dam, but part of the bank on each side as well.

That did it—the commissioners hope.

Cir. (D 203,001)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER

DEC 10 1953

Supporting the Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is in grave financial trouble. It needs help.

This remarkable organization, which has astonished the great critics of the world with its brilliance, is now in the position of having to appeal for money in order to stay in business. No less than $250,000 must be raised if the orchestra is to meet its obligations for the current season.

In view of the orchestra's importance to Boston, it should require nothing more than a simple statement of debt to persuade the public to co-operate.

Truly, this is one of the world's best cultural assets. It has been with us for 73 years. It has enchanted its listeners at home, and has enhanced the name and fame of Boston abroad. To lose it, would be like losing a piece of one's heart.

And all it's asking for is $250,000.

There are 2,370,000 people here in Metropolitan Boston. Even though many may not realize it, all share in the benefit of having the orchestra with us. Surely it should not be difficult to raise the money from such a population.

Detroit last year raised $400,230 for its symphony orchestra. Chicago raised $311,441.

Boston can equal or top those sums, by sending gifts to Richard C. Paine at Symphony Hall.

48

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE Monitor
Registered in U. S. Patent Office
AN INTERNATIONAL DAILY NEWSPAPER
VOLUME 46 NO. 12 COPYRIGHT 1953 BY THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE PUBLISHING SOCIETY BOSTON, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1953

Symphony Aid Sought in Hub

By Mary Handy
Staff Writer of The Christian Science Monitor

The 72-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra needs—for its welfare and survival—more tangible appreciation from the Boston community.

This orchestra, after bringing applause to Boston from Berlin to San Francisco in recent tours, is now asking for support at home.

Business and industry are being called upon to consider the orchestra's value to the entire community.

The orchestra now faces the greatest gap between expenses and receipts since it was founded in 1881. "Our financial picture presents more of a challenge than ever in the past," George E. Judd, business manager, said today.

Special Invitation

Hard-pressed orchestras in Detroit, Pittsburgh, Minneapolis, and San Francisco have recently found business and industry ready to help them. Trustees of the Boston Symphony are hoping to arouse similar support.

Business and civic leaders have been invited to an orchestra rehearsal this afternoon. After the rehearsal they will hear Harvard's president, Dr. Nathan M. Pusey, discuss the relation of civic leaders to a city's cultural institutions.

A new evaluation of the cultural and economic value to Boston of its world-renowned orchestra could help eliminate the growing deficit, the trustees anticipate.

All over the nation, cultural and educational institutions, confronted with extreme financial problems, are turning to business corporations for tax-free gifts.

Continuance of the American way of life, with educational and cultural institutions privately financed without government subsidy, depends upon the corporation of the diverse elements of a community many leaders feel.

'Friends' Remembered

As the American economy changes, and the large fortunes of the past generations become less numerous, other means of support for orchestras beside individual donations must be found.

In its appeal to the community, the Boston Symphony is also remembering its 3,100 individual "friends" who gave $85,000 last year. It is hoping to increase their numbers, both from among the music lovers who sit in the seats of Symphony Hall and those who listen to the concerts at home by radio.

Present financial picture of the orchestra is this:

Deficits of the last five years have used up all unrestricted legacies and gifts, and $37,000 of this years' income has gone to pay last year's debts.

The annual budget is $1,500,000. Of this, about $1,000,000 is paid from concert receipts, $150,000 to $200,000 from royalties on records, some $40,000 from earnings on endowment, and $50,000 from such miscellaneous earnings as use of Symphony Hall. The balance must come from donations.

To bring in more revenue, ticket prices have been raised twice in the past five years.

High Standards

Musicians work more days and give more concerts than in any other American symphony orchestra. Trustees are determined that financial want must not lower the high standards of rehearsals and performance.

For 45 weeks the orchestra is busy with concerts in Boston, Cambridge, Providence, and New York. Its members give the annual festival at Tanglewood, the Esplanade and Pops concerts. Recently it has toured both Europe and the United States.

Not only do the musicians work hard. They are heard in Boston alone by an unparalleled number of series ticket holders. Nowhere else in Europe or America do 10,000 music lovers hold series tickets.

During the last two years, the Symphony has been heard on Fridays and Saturdays by thousands more listeners over station WGBH-FM. No other symphony orchestra in the nation, it is believed, gives so many full-length radio performances.

From this great wealth of enrichment and inspiration to the community, the orchestra is hoping to find the answer to its financial problems.

Cir. (D 145,494) (S 272,057)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
DEC 10 1953

(Herald Staff Photo by Warren Patriquin)

SINGING FOR SUPPER? — That's very nearly the case of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Left to right, Conductor Munch, Henry B. Cabot, president of trustees, and Ruth Posselt, violin soloist this week.

$250,000 Drive on To Save Symphony

Business, Civic Leaders Respond

By FRED BRADY

Boston rallied yesterday to save for the city one of the world's majestic instruments—the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Because the Boston Symphony is nearly broke. It needs $250,000.

Response 'Con Brio'

That was the figure announced by the trustees "after careful estimates" if the orchestra "is to meet its obligations for the current season."

The announcement was made yesterday in Symphony Hall to Boston business and civic leaders, but, instead of the long faces you might expect, the response was, as Mr. Munch might say, "con brio."

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony trustees, said the drive for support "will take time and hard work."

But he reported an initial success, among insurance firms, with his plan of "donation-advertising" under which firms will pay a premium price for page advertisements in the Symphony programs.

Michael T. Kelleher, a trustee, reported that shortly after yesterday's meeting was scheduled he received a personal check for $1,000 from Harold D. Hodgkinson, general manager of Filene's, and another for $500 from Frank Sawyer, head of the Checker Taxi Co.

Kelleher will direct the drive among business organizations while that among individuals will be directed by a fellow trustee, Dr. Palfrey Perkins.

Of the new fund drive Kelleher said: "It's on the [illegible] we're going to keep this the best orchestra in the world."

BUDGET FACTS

He made a brief special tribute to Adrian O'Keeffe, president of First National Stores, Daniel Bloomfield, executive vice-president of the Boston Retail Trade Board, and Peter Fuller, son of the former govern

"Friends of the Orchestra" which averaged $151,660 per year and a check for $13,450 this year from Boston business.

STRONG HOPE

But trustees see strong hope in such examples as Detroit which last year raised $400,2[illegible] for its orchestra and Chicago which turned up $311,441.

The Boston Symphony trustees explain the purpose of their drive as three-fold—"to meet our deficit, restore our capital funds and maintain the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its traditional high level."

After its high level rehearsal yesterday the audience stood in the lobby to hear a pretty frank stewardship accounting from Trustees Cabot and Kelleher.

Kelleher said, "We could let the orchestra go or we could reduce the number of players. But we don't intend to do that."

He cited as one of the great strokes of the new drive the permission from the Boston Retail Trade Board to permit solicitation for funds in the city's department [illegible]

Cabot, who [illegible] a Kelleher tribute [illegible] the time he gives to the orchestra by willing[illegible] deal of time chasing [illegible] told the lobby group.

"I think [illegible] know what an extraor[illegible] we have here. [illegible] interest you to know [illegible] Munch, who has conduct[illegible] leading orchestras of the world, keeps saying:

" 'This orchestra keeps getting better and better. It sounds better all the time.' "

That claim certainly wasn't questioned by any of the Boston leaders during an hour-long rehearsal in which they heard Charles Munch conduct the Lalo violin concerto with Ruth Posselt as soloist.

Beaming and bespectacled and wearing a grey jacket and dark slacks, Mr. Munch took a moment before rehearsal to tell his audience how much the orchestra meant to him.

Then he said: "I would like that the Boston Symphony would be near to you, too."

George E. Judd, orchestra manager, told newsmen some of the orchestra's cold budget facts.

The annual budget for the orchestra of 104 artists is $1,500,000 and of this amount concert receipts account for about $1,000,000. The rest must come from record royalties, earnings on endowments and other earnings such as rental of the hall, etc.

But despite two rises [illegible] prices in the past five [illegible] deficits in that time have consumed all unrestricted legacies and gifts.

In addition, $37,000 of this year's income had to go to pay last year's debts.

All this holds true now despite generous contributions from

Cir. (D 203,001)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
DEC 10 1953

Symphony Drive

(See Editorial, Page 40)

A drive to save the Boston Symphony Orchestra—one of the world's finest—is now underway.

THE ORCHESTRA NEEDS $250,000 if it is to meet obligations for the current season.

This was the figure announced by the board of trustees.

BUSINESS AND civic leaders are expected to rally to the aid of the symphony.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, expects the drive for support to "take time and hard work."

HE REPORTED an initial success among insurance firms with his plan of "donation-advertising." Under the plan firms will pay a premium price for page advertisements in the Symphony programs.

Shortly after the announcement for financial aid was made, Michael T. Kelleher, a trustee, reported he received personal checks totalling $1,500. Harold D. Hodgkinson, general manager of Filene's, contributed $1,000 and Frank Sawyer, head of the Checker Taxi Co., donated $500.

Kelleher will direct the drive among business organizations.

A fellow trustee, Dr. Palfrey Perkins, will head a similar drive among individuals.

The annual budget for the orchestra of 104 artists is $1.5 million. Of this amount concert receipts account for about $1 million.

The rest must come from record royalties, earnings on endowments and other earnings such as rental of the hall.

But despite two rises in ticket prices in the past five years deficits in that time have consumed all unrestricted legacies and gifts.

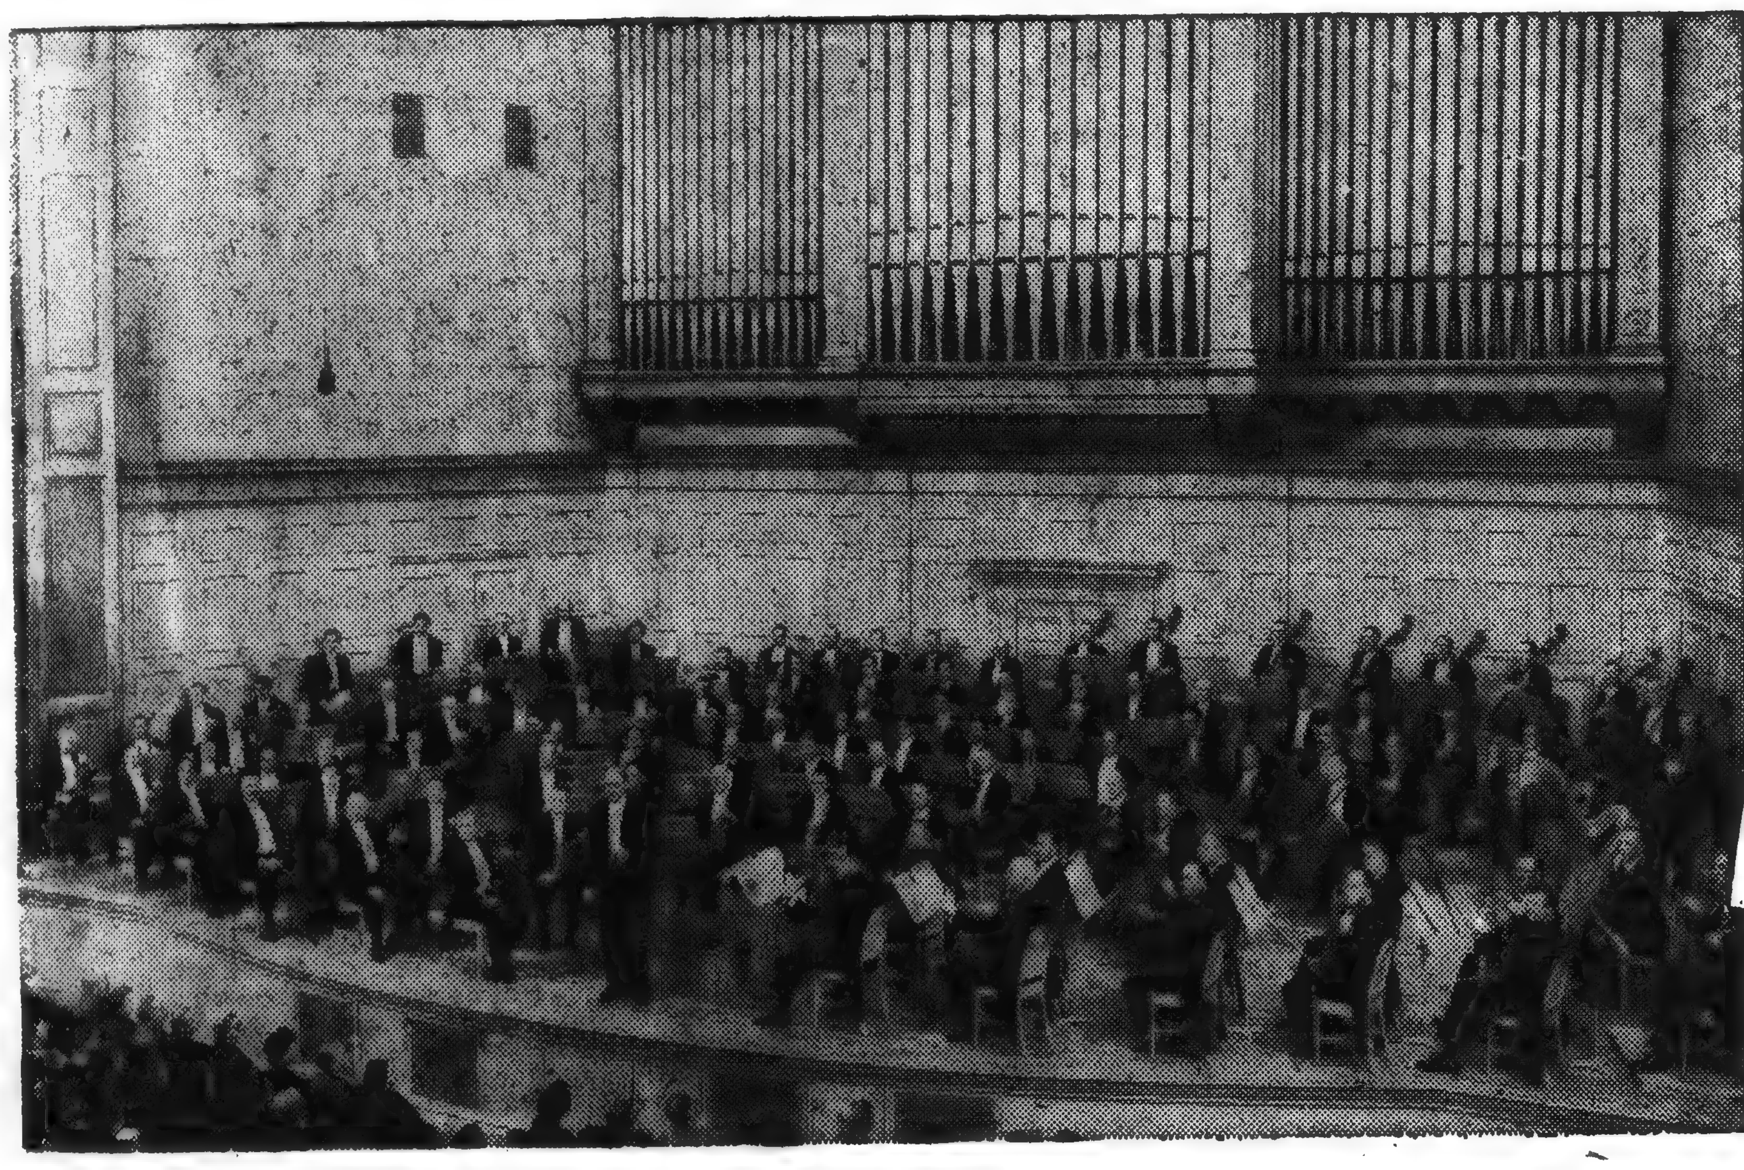
In addition, $37,000 of this year's income had to go to pay last year's debts.

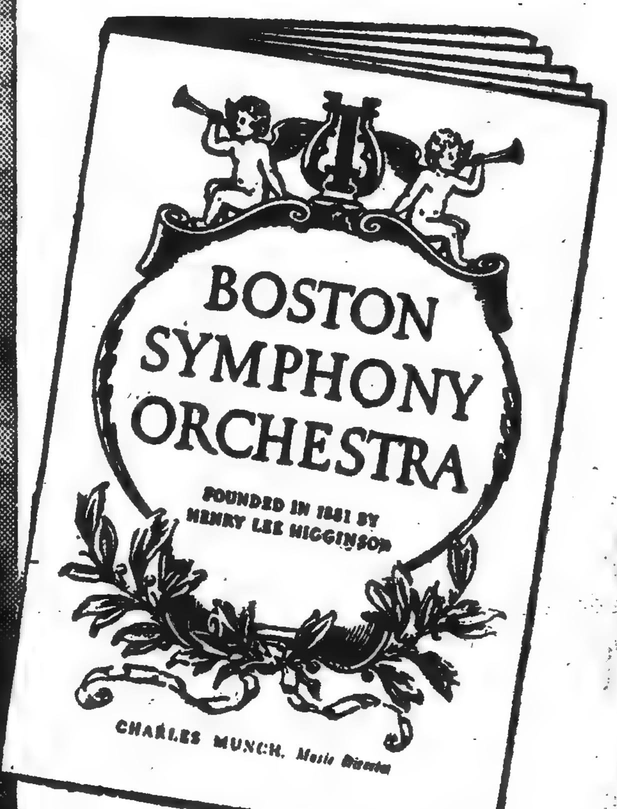
The Boston Symphony trustees explain the purpose of the drive is three-fold—"to meet our deficit, restore our capital funds and maintain the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its traditional high level."

Permission has been granted by the Boston Retail Trade Board to solicit funds in the city's department stores.

Broader Community Support must be developed without delay for the

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA





BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
FOUNDED IN 1881 BY HENRY LEE HIGGINSON
CHARLES MUNCH, Music Director

A Frank Statement from The Trustees

For seventy-three years, the Boston Symphony has been, undeniably, one of the city's great cultural assets. Competent critics have given it high rank among the great orchestras of the world.

Through its regular concerts, it provides musical enchantment for capacity audiences at Symphony Hall. Students may attend its rehearsals at prices within their means. Spring, in Boston, becomes a more joyful season thanks to the Pop Concerts. Under the stars, the Orchestra provides good music, free for all who congregate along the Esplanade in the cool of summer evenings. At Tanglewood, through its Summer School and concert series in the Shed, it provides expert instruction for students and inspiration for thousands. Through weekly broadcasts over Station WGBH the Orchestra reaches a vast audience at home.

The costs of maintaining this musical organization of 104 players and its many musical services to the community have mounted steadily. To meet this the price of tickets has been advanced twice during the past five years and economies effected wherever possible. In addition a generous public has contributed $758,300 or $151,660 per year. This large sum came from generous concert goers who banded together as Friends of the Orchestra. Encouraging too was the donation of $13,450 in 1953 by business organizations and this year Mayor Hynes and the City of Boston, realizing the Orchestra's problem, have exempted Symphony Hall from taxes.

In spite of this most generous support substantial deficits have been incurred. Here are the figures:

SEASON	DEFICIT	SURPLUS
1948–49	$139,109
1949–50	165,984
1950–51		$58,132
1951–52	48,054
1952–53	68,743

In order to meet the five-year accumulated deficit of $363,758 it has been necessary to apply all available funds, including $80,700 of unrestricted legacies, with the result that the Orchestra has no longer any available cash reserves and, in addition, has had to dip into the present season's receipts to the extent of $37,909.

After careful estimates, the Trustees find that a sum of $250,000 must be raised if the Orchestra is to meet its obligations for the current season 1953-54.

Is this asking too much of the New England community? The answer may be found in the record of sums raised in other large cities for the support of their symphony orchestras.

Total Funds Raised 1951-52 Season
Boston	$166,578
New York	265,381
Chicago	311,441
Detroit	400,230
Minneapolis	198,541
Cincinnati	235,742
Los Angeles	281,824
Pittsburgh	251,000
Houston	180,616

With the determination to meet our deficit, restore our capital funds and maintain the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its traditional high level, Dr. Palfrey Perkins, one of the trustees, will undertake a campaign for funds among individuals. Mr. Michael T. Kelleher in his capacity as trustee will seek the support of business organizations to the same end.

If you wish to share in maintaining a great civic asset, we urge you to send your tax-deductible check in any amount you can afford to Richard C. Paine, Treasurer, Symphony Hall, Boston. And from those who wish to project their influence over the years ahead we invite bequests under will. Such bequests, in the past, have meant survival for the Orchestra.

THE TRUSTEES

Henry B. Cabot, President
Jacob J. Kaplan, Vice-President
Richard C. Paine, Treasurer
Philip R. Allen
John Nicholas Brown
Theodore P. Ferris
Alvan T. Fuller
N. Penrose Hallowell
Francis W. Hatch
M. A. De Wolfe Howe
Michael T. Kelleher
Palfrey Perkins
Lewis Perry
Edward A. Taft
Raymond S. Wilkins
Oliver Wolcott

The publication of this message has been made possible by the generosity of Alvan T. Fuller

50

"No Orchestra Is So Dear to My Heart"—Charles Munch

CHARLES MUNCH, extreme right, conducts Symphony rehearsal with violin soloist Ruth Posselt playing the Symphonie Espanol.

PLAN BOOST FOR SYMPHONY—At special rehearsal meeting of Boston Symphony yesterday to plan fund campaign to eliminate orchestra's deficit were, left to right, Adrian O'Keefe, of First National Stores; Peter Fuller, of Cadillac-Olds; Henry B. Cabot, president of orchestra trustees; Michael T. Kelleher, trustee, and Daniel Bloomfield, Retail Trade Board.

(Globe Photos by Danny Goshtigian).

MUSIC LOVERS listen to plea for support by Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony trustees.

Best of the Day in Pictures

Local, National, World Wide

Cir. (D 26,991)

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
DEC 10 1953

Boston Symphony Exhausts Funds, Needs $250,000

BOSTON (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

For This Season

"We need one quarter million dollars to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of this season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group, orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

(Outlining the financial problem, George E. Judd, manager, reported that the annual budget for the 104-player orchestra is 1½ million dollars. Concert receipts are about a million. Other earnings come from record royalties, endowments and rents at Symphony Hall.

(There have been deficits over the past five years despite two boosts in admission prices. Unrestricted legacies and gifts have been consumed, he said, along with contributions from the orchestra's "Friends" organization averaging $151,600 annually.)

Cir. (D 12,226)
This Clipping From
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL

Cir. (D 43,177)
This Clipping From
WATERTOWN, N. Y.
TIMES

Cir. (D 8,895)
This Clipping From
CLAREMONT, N. H.
EAGLE

Cir. (D 143,029)
This Clipping From
CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS

Cir. (D 111,232)
This Clipping From
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
TIMES

Cir. (D 75,750)
This Clipping From
SPOKANE, WASH.
CHRONICLE
DEC 10 1953

FAMED SYMPHONY RATES SYMPATHY

BOSTON, Dec. 10. (AP)—Officials of the Boston symphony orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said:

"We need $250,000 to keep the Boston symphony orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

Cir. (D 186,970) (S 150,268)
This Clipping From TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE

Cir. (D 11,351)
This Clipping From
GREENFIELD, MASS.
RECORDER-GAZETTE

Cir. (D 6,706)
This Clipping From
LITTLE FALLS, N. Y.
TIMES

Cir. (D 414,942) (S 563,959)
This Clipping From
DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

Cir. (D 130,147)
This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-JOURNAL

Cir. (D 287,116)
This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N. Y.

(D 129,595) (S 248,
This Clipping From
OMAHA, NEBR.
MORNING WORLD-HERALD
DEC 11 1953

Financial Aid Asked for Boston Symphony

Boston, Mass. (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said Thursday that world-famous musical organization is broke.

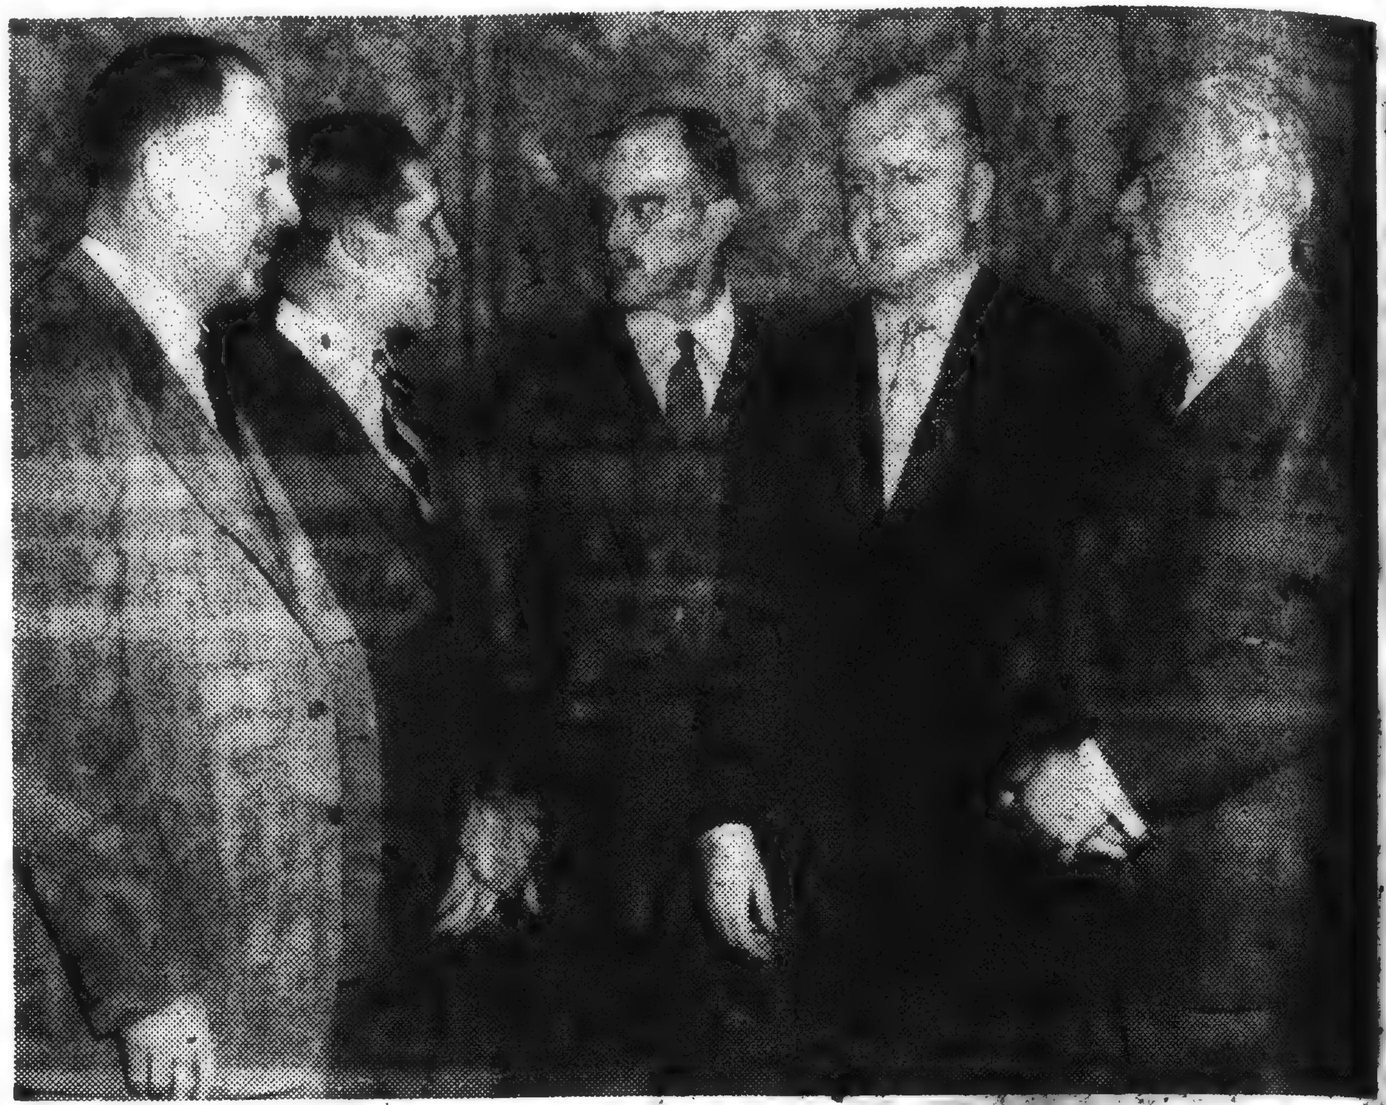
Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's trustees, said:

"We need 250 thousand dollars to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He asked a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists to consider a "premium advertising" fund-raising plan under which full pages in program books would be sold at $2,500.

"No Orchestra Is So Dear to My Heart"—Charles Munch

CHARLES MUNCH, extreme right, conducts Symphony rehearsal with violin soloist Ruth Fosselt playing the Symphonie Espanol.



PLAN BOOST FOR SYMPHONY—At special rehearsal meeting of Boston Symphony yesterday to plan fund campaign to eliminate orchestra's deficit were, left to right, Adrian O'Keefe, of First National Stores; Peter Fuller, of Cadillac-Olds; Henry B. Cabot, president of orchestra trustees; Michael T. Kelleher, trustee, and Daniel Bloomfield, Retail Trade Board.

(Globe Photos by Danny Goshtigian).

MUSIC LOVERS listen to plea for support by Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony trustees.

Best of the Day in Pictures

Local, National, World Wide

Cir. (D 26,991)

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
DEC 10 1953

Boston Symphony Exhausts Funds, Needs $250,000

BOSTON (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

For This Season

"We need one quarter million dollars to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of this season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group, orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

(Outlining the financial problem, George E. Judd, manager, reported that the annual budget for the 104-player orchestra is 1½ million dollars. Concert receipts are about a million. Other earnings come from record royalties, endowments and rents at Symphony Hall.

(There have been deficits over the past five years despite two boosts in admission prices. Unrestricted legacies and gifts have been consumed, he said, along with contributions from the orchestra's "Friends" organization averaging $151,600 annually.)

Cir. (D 12,226)

This Clipping From
ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL

Cir. (D 186,970) (S 150,268)

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE

Cir. (D 11,351)

This Clipping From
GREENFIELD, MASS.
RECORDER-GAZETTE

Cir. (D 43,177)

TIMES

DEC 1

Boston Symphony Boss Says Organization Broke

BOSTON, Dec. 10—(AP)—Officials of the Boston symphony orchestra said Thursday that world famous musical organization is broke. Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said: "We need $250,000 to keep the Boston symphony orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He asked a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists to consider a "premium advertising" fund raising plan under which full pages in program books would be sold at $2,500.

Cir. (D 6,706)

NEWS

DEC 10 1953

Boston Symphony Is Broke

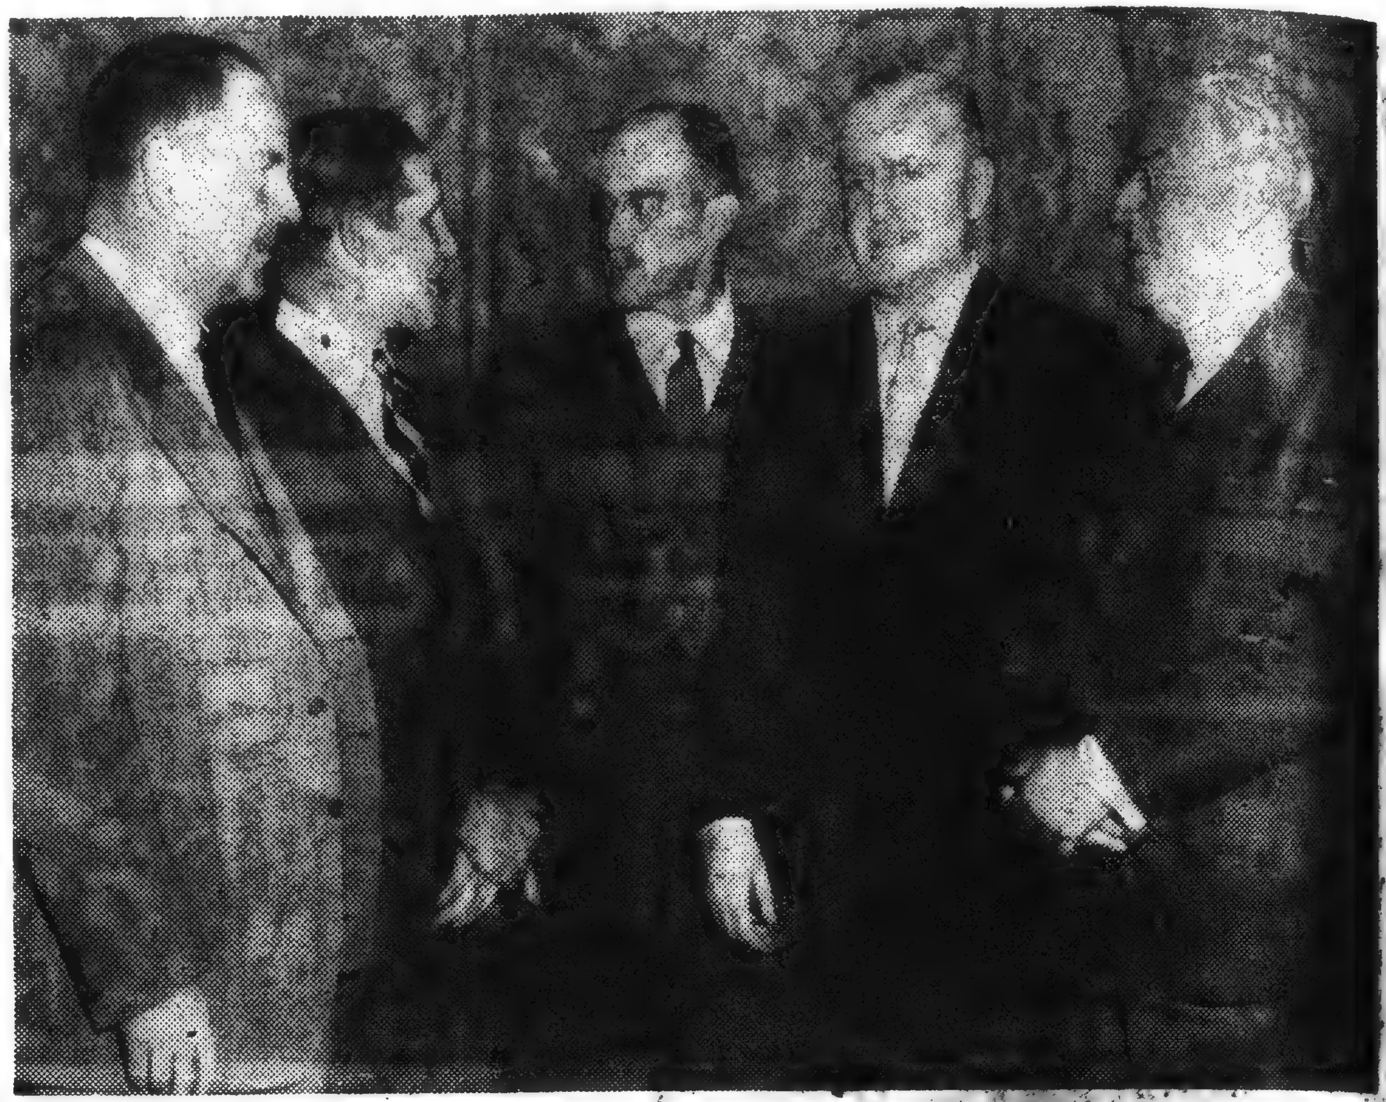
BOSTON, Dec. 10 (AP).—Executives of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that the world-famous musical organization is broke and needs $250,000 to keep solvent for the remainder of the season.

trialists.

50

"No Orchestra Is So Dear to My Heart"—Charles Munch

CHARLES MUNCH, extreme right, conducts Symphony rehearsal with violin soloist Ruth Posselt playing the Symphonie Espanol.



PLAN BOOST FOR SYMPHONY—At special rehearsal meeting of Boston Symphony yesterday to plan fund campaign to eliminate orchestra's deficit were, left to right, Adrian O'Keefe, of First National Stores; Peter Fuller, of Cadillac-Olds; Henry B. Cabot, president of orchestra trustees; Michael T. Kelleher, trustee, and Daniel Bloomfield, Retail Trade Board.

(Globe Photos by Danny Goshtigian).

MUSIC LOVERS listen to plea for support by Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony trustees.

Best of the Day in Pictures

Local, National, World Wide

Cir. (D 26,991)

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
DEC 10 195

Boston Symphony Exhausts Funds, Needs $250,000

BOSTON (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

For This Season

"We need one quarter million dollars to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of this season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group, orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

(Outlining the financial problem, George E. Judd, manager, reported that the annual budget for the 104-player orchestra is 1½ million dollars. Concert receipts are about a million. Other earnings come from record royalties, endowments and rents at Symphony Hall.

(There have been deficits over the past five years despite two boosts in admission prices. Unrestricted legacies and gifts have been consumed, he said, along with contributions from the orchestra's "Friends" organization averaging $151,600 annually.)

Cir. (D 186,970) (S 150,268)

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO

DEC 10 1953

Boston Symphony Reports It's Broke

BOSTON (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that the world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said:

"We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season." He asked a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists to consider a "premium advertising" fund raising plan under which full pages in program books would be sold at $2,500.

DEC 10 1953

IN THE NATION

BOSTON SYMPHONY BROKE

BOSTON (AP). — Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke. Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's trustees, said: "We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left. We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season." He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

58

"No Orchestra Is So Dear to My Heart"—Charles Munch

CHARLES MUNCH, extreme right, conducts Symphony rehearsal with violin soloist Ruth Posselt playing the Symphonie Espanol.

PLAN BOOST FOR SYMPHONY—At special rehearsal meeting of Boston Symphony yesterday to plan fund campaign to eliminate orchestra's deficit were, left to right, Adrian O'Keefe, of First National Stores; Peter Fuller, of Cadillac-Olds; Henry B. Cabot, president of orchestra trustees; Michael T. Kelleher, trustee, and Daniel Bloomfield, Retail Trade Board.

(Globe Photos by Danny Goshtigian).

MU
phot
—is
port by Henry B. Cabot, president of the Sym-

DEC 10 1953

EAGLE
DEC 10 1953

Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Broke

BOSTON, Dec. 10 (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke

Henry B Cabot, president of the Symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need one quarter million dollars to keep the Boston Symphony orchestra solvent for the remainder of this season."

DEC 10 1953

Boston Symphony Broke, Officials Say

BOSTON, Dec. 10 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra is broke, officials said today.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, asked a group of Boston business leaders to consider a "premium advertising" fund raising plan under which full pages in program books would be sold at $2,500. He said the orchestra needed $250,000 to operate the rest of this season.

Cir. (D 26,991)

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
DEC 10 1953

oston Symphony Exhausts Funds, Needs $250,000

BOSTON (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

For This Season

"We need one quarter million dollars to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of this season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group, orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

(Outlining the financial problem, George E. Judd, manager, reported that the annual budget for the 104-player orchestra is 1½ million dollars. Concert receipts are about a million. Other earnings come from record royalties, endowments and rents at Symphony Hall.

(There have been deficits over the past five years despite two boosts in admission prices. Unrestricted legacies and gifts have been consumed, he said, along with contributions from the orchestra's "Friends" organization averaging $151,600 annually.)

50

“No Orchestra Is So Dear to My Heart”—Charles Munch

CHARLES MUNCH, extreme right, conducts Symphony rehearsal with violin soloist Ruth Fosselt playing the Symphonie Espanol.

PLAN BOOST FOR SYMPHONY—At special rehearsal meeting of Boston Symphony yesterday to plan fund campaign to eliminate orchestra's deficit were, left to right, Adrian O'Keefe, of First National Stores; Peter Fuller, of Cadillac-Olds; Henry B. Cabot, president of orchestra trustees; Michael T. Kelleher, trustee, and Daniel Bloomfield, Retail Trade Board.

Cir. (D 26,991)

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
DEC 10 1953

Boston Symphony Exhausts Funds, Needs $250,000

BOSTON (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's trustees, said:

“We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

For This Season

“We need one quarter million dollars to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of this season.”

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group, orchestra officials have worked out a “premium advertising” plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

(Outlining the financial problem, George E. Judd, manager, reported that the annual budget for the 104-player orchestra is 1½ million dollars. Concert receipts are about a million. Other earnings come from record royalties, endowments and rents at Symphony Hall.

(There have been deficits over the past five years despite two boosts in admission prices. Unrestricted legacies and gifts have been consumed, he said, along with contributions from the orchestra's “Friends” organization averaging $151,600 annually.)

DEC 10 1953

BOSTON SYMPHONY BROKE

~~Boston, Dec.~~ 10. (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony orchestra said today that World Famous Musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said:

“We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

“We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season.”

DEC 10 1953

Boston Symphony Orchestra Broke

BOSTON (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world-famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said:

“We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

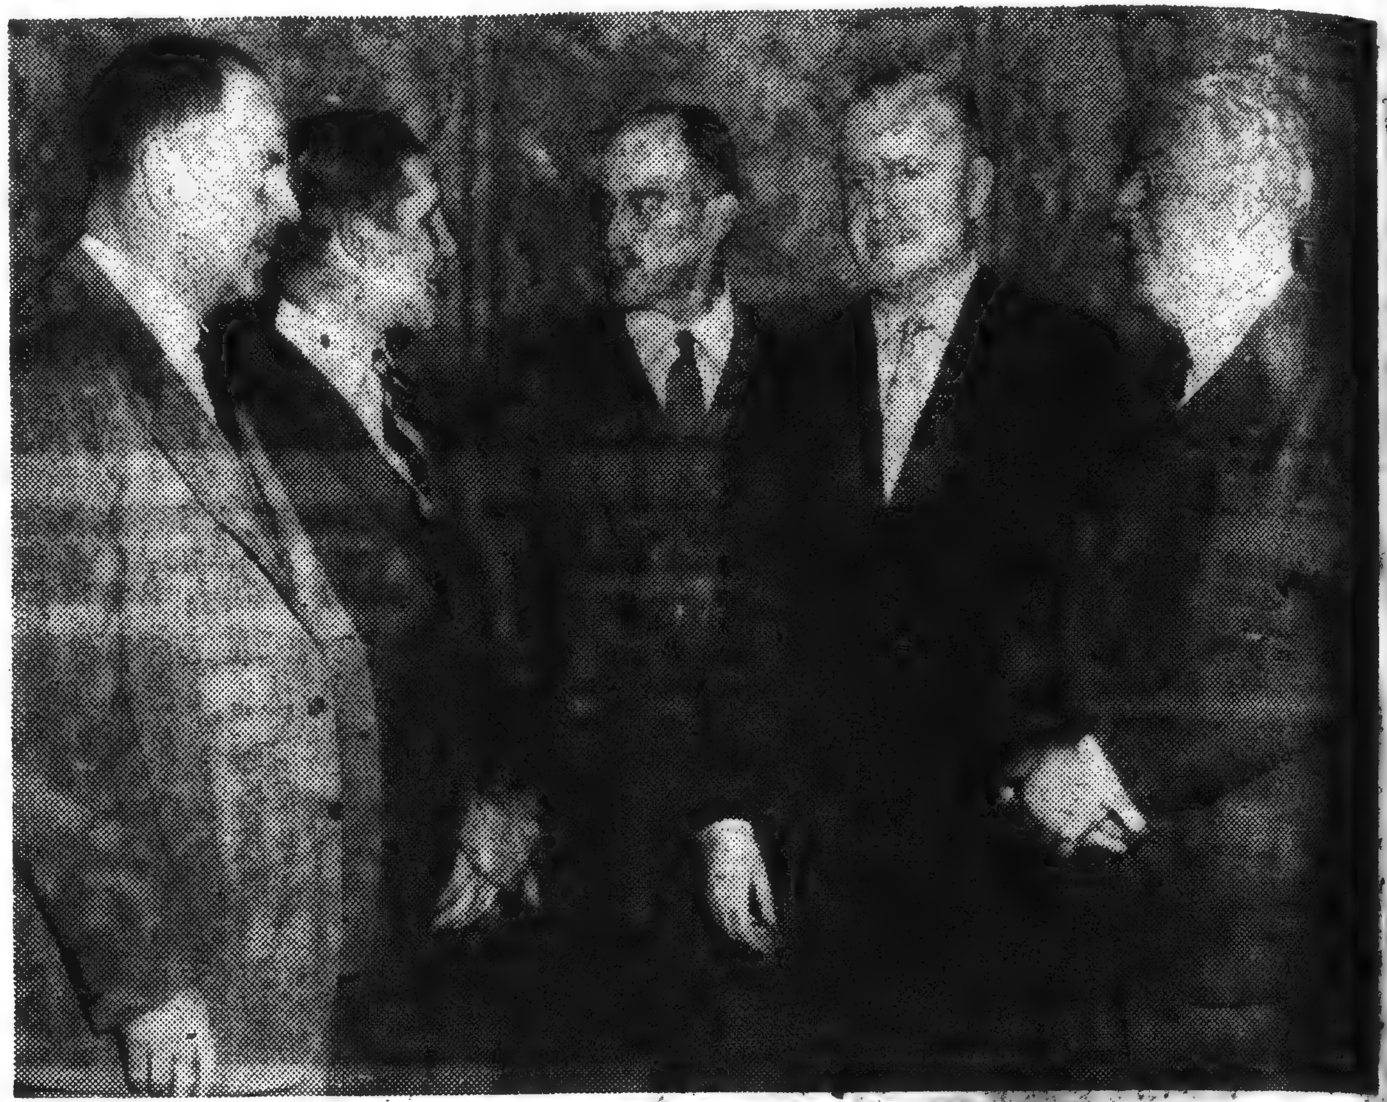
“We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season.”

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

a “premium advertising” plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

"No Orchestra Is So Dear to My Heart" – Charles Munch

ight, conducts Symphony rehearsal with violin soloist
e Espanol.



PLAN BOOST FOR SYMPHONY—At special rehearsal meeting of Boston Symphony yesterday to plan fund campaign to eliminate orchestra's deficit were, left to right, Adrian O'Keefe, of First National Stores; Peter Fuller, of Cadillac-Olds; Henry B. resident of orchestra trustees; Michael T. Kelleher, trustee, and Daniel Bloom ail Trade Board.

y Goshtigian).
of the Sym-

National,
l Wide

DEC 10 1953

Boston Symphony Goes Broke

BOSTON (AP) — Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world-famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

DEC 10 1953

Claim Boston Symphony Broke

BOSTON (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need one quarter million dollars to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of this season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group, orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

Cir. (D 26,991)

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
DEC 10 195

oston Symphony Exhausts Funds, Needs $250,000

BOSTON (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

For This Season

"We need one quarter million dollars to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of this season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group, orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

(Outlining the financial problem, George E. Judd, manager, reported that the annual budget for the 104-player orchestra is 1½ million dollars. Concert receipts are about a million. Other earnings come from record royalties, endowments and rents at Symphony Hall.

(There have been deficits over the past five years despite two boosts in admission prices. Unrestricted legacies and gifts have been consumed, he said, along with contributions from the orchestra's "Friends" organization averaging $151,600 annually.)

50

"No Orchestra Is So Dear to My Heart"—Charles Munch

right, cond
e Espan

FOR SYMPHONY—At special rehearsal meeting of Boston Symphony fund campaign to eliminate orchestra's deficit were, left to right, of First National Stores; Peter Fuller, of Cadillac-Olds; Henry B. of orchestra trustees; Michael T. Kelleher, trustee, and Daniel Bloomfield, Retail Trade Board.

Cir. (D 26,991)

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
DEC 10 195

Boston Symphony Exhausts Funds, Needs $250,000

BOSTON (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

For This Season

"We need one quarter million dollars to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of this season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group, orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

(Outlining the financial problem, George E. Judd, manager, reported that the annual budget for the 104-player orchestra is 1½ million dollars. Concert receipts are about a million. Other earnings come from record royalties, endowments and rents at Symphony Hall.

(There have been deficits over the past five years despite two boosts in admission prices. Unrestricted legacies and gifts have been consumed, he said, along with contributions from the orchestra's "Friends" organization averaging $151,600 annually.)

DEC 10 1953

Boston Symphony Goes Broke

BOSTON (AP) — Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world-famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

DEC 10 1953

Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Broke

$250,000 Needed For Current Season

BOSTON, Dec. 10 (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said:

"We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He asked a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists to consider a "premium advertising" fund raising plan under which full pages in program books would be sold at $2,500.

This Clipping From

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

DEC 10 1953

Boston Told Its Symphony Is Flat Broke

BOSTON, Dec. 10 (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today the world-famous organization is broke. Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said, "We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

---

ap at Shr

uips

ews Commentat
ards is anything e

ne of the happiest
w hasn't a lot of mo
has a lot of faith in
re and the Good Lo

The Boston Symphony i
ost broke, but business
and music lovers in Boston
not allow this famous mu
organization to die.

A New York doctor ad
hat sufferers from cardia
nents be allowed to "live
e" rather than held to lets and long lists of "do

Alfred Wallenstein
Bach's Christmas Oratorio; Philhar
Auditorium; 8:30 p.m

---

orchestral ans are broke.
y B. Cabot, president of mphony's trustees sent out ergency plea to Boston ss firms for $250,000 worth vertising in the orchestr ram right away. He s sum was needed to keep ton Symphony Orchestr nt for the remainder

This Clipping From

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR

DEC 11 1953

Boston Symphony Lacks Funds, Asks for Help

Boston, Dec. 11 (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said Thursday that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said:

"We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He asked a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists to consider a "premium advertising" fund-raising plan under which full pages in program books would be sold at $2,500.

Cir. (D 103,308)

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

Cir. (D 179,039) (S 196,432)

This Clipping From HOUSTON, TEX.
POST

Cir. (D 91,651) (S 180,496)

This Clipping From
SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
TRIBUNE

Cir. (D 391,842) (S 759,683)

This Clipping From
LOS ANGELES, CAL.
TIMES

Cir. (S 45,283)

Cir. (D 157,288) (S 216,744)

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

DEC 11 1953

Boston Symphony Needs $250,000

Cir. (D 15,484)

Cir. (D 4,967)

This Clipping From
CANANDAIGUA, N. Y.
MESSENGER

DEC 10 1953

Boston Symphony Admits Insolvency

BOSTON AP — Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world-famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

'We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH
DEC 10 1953

Boston Symphony Is Broke

Boston, Dec 10 (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need one quarter million dollars to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of this season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group, orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

---

uips

ews Commentato
vards is anything e

ne of the happiest
w hasn't a lot of mo
has a lot of faith in
re and the Good Lo

he Boston Symphony i
ost broke, but business
nd music lovers in Boston
not allow this famous mu
organization to die.

A New York doctor ad
hat sufferers from cardia
nents be allowed to "live
le" rather than held to
iets and long lists of "do

Alfred Wallenstein
Bach's Christmas Oratorio;
Auditorium; 8:30 p.m

---

orchestral
ans are broke.
ry B. Cabot, president of mphony's trustees sent out mergency plea to Boston
ess firms for $250,000 wor dvertising in the orchestr gram right away. He t sum was needed to keep
Boston Symphony Orchestr
vent for the remainder

This Clipping From DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
DEC 11 1953

★

Boston Symphony Says It's 'Broke'

BOSTON, Mass. (AP).—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said Thursday that world-famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said: "We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He asked a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists to consider a "premium advertising" fund-raising plan under which full pages in program books would be sold at $2,500.

X

Cir. (D 103,308)

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

. (D 179,039) (S 196,432)

This Clipping From

This Clipping From
ROME, N. Y.
SENTINEL
DEC 10 1953

Boston Orchestra Reportedly Broke

BOSTON (AP) — Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world-famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

This Clipping From
AKRON, OHIO
BEACON JOURNAL

DEC 11 1953

Orchestra Broke

BOSTON (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke. It needs $250,000 to keep solvent for the remainder of the season.

group of Boston business leaders yesterday: "We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left. We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He outlined a "premium advertising" plan for raising money. Under this, full pages in the program books will be sold at $2500.

plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

Quips

News Commentato
wards is anything e

ne of the happiest
w hasn't a lot of mo
has a lot of faith in
re and the Good Lo

he Boston Symphony i
ost broke, but business
nd music lovers in Boston
not allow this famous mu
organization to die.

A New York doctor ad
hat sufferers from cardia
ents be allowed to "live
e" rather than held to lets and long lists of "do

Alfred Wa
Bach's Christmas Oratorio
Auditorium; 8:30 p.m

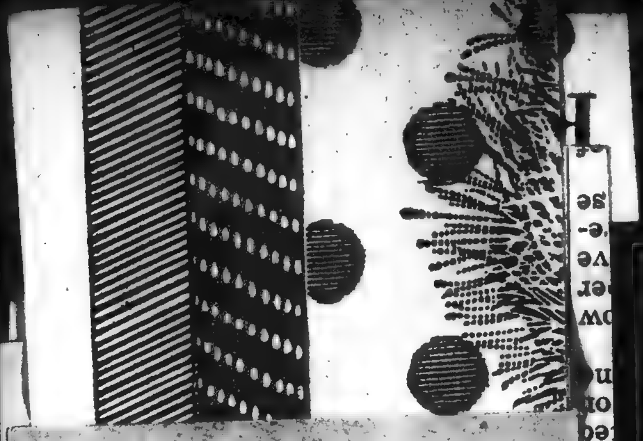
---

orchestra so," said one trustee, "or we could reduce the number of players, but we don't intend to do that."

chronic orchestral
Bostonians are broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees sent out an emergency plea to Boston business firms for $250,000 wor of advertising in the orchest program right away. He that sum was needed to kee Boston Symphony Orchest vent for the remainder

---



This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

DEG 11 1953

✓phony Is 'Broke,' Boston Trustees Say

BOSTON, Dec. 10 (AP).—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said: "we need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

Because of the difficulty told the group orchestra o "premium advertising" pla the program books will be so

---

roke

We n ars to ny Or ainder
cause o

ROKE

stick on his certainly w on his face
She can standing—a longtime parties, is standing,
and hap
Shy
gam
r the ge of
Of

Cir. (D 103,308)

This Clipping From

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

BOSTON, DEC. 11—(AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world-famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said:

"We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He asked a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists to consider a "premium advertising" fund-raising plan under which full pages in program books would be sold at $2500.

---

worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which ful pages in the program books wil be sold at $2,500.

ap at Shr

uips

ews Commentato
ards is anything e

ne of the happiest
v hasn't a lot of mo
has a lot of faith in
re and the Good Lo

he Boston Symphony i
ost broke, but business
nd music lovers in Boston
not allow this famous mu
organization to die.

A New York doctor ad
hat sufferers from cardia
nents be allowed to "live
e" rather than held to
iets and long lists of "do

Alfred
Bach's Christmas Oratorio
Auditorium; 8:30 p.m

This Clipping From,
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM & SUN
DEC 11 1953

Boston Symphony Reports It's Broke

By the Associated Press.

BOSTON, Dec. 11.—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra say that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, told a group of Boston business leaders yesterday: "We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left. We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He outlined a "premium advertising" plan for raising money. Under this, full pages in the program books will be sold at $2500.

---

plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

---

million dol-income and only partly leaving its present could let the orchestra go," said one trustee,
" or we could reduce the number
of players, but we don't intend to do that."

---

chronic orchestral
Bostonians are broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees sent out an emergency plea to Boston business firms for $250,000 wor
of advertising in the orchest program right away. He that sum was needed to keep
Boston Symphony Orchestr
vent for the remainder

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION
DEC 11 1953

Orchestra in Boston Broke

BOSTON (AP) — Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said yesterday that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves and there is just no money left.

"We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He outlined a plan
Boston business leaders and

Because of the difficulty told the group orchestra o
"premium advertising" pla
the program books will be so

ROKE

ching POCK

This Clipping From
ELMIRA, N. Y.
TELEGRAM

DEC 13 1953

Boston Symphony Orchestra 'Broke

BOSTON (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra sai Thursday that world famou musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president o the symphony's trustees, said "We have had to use all ou cash reserves, and there is jus no money left.

"We need $250,000 to kee the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which ful pages in the program books wil be sold at $2,500.

DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS-TIMES

DEC 11 1953

SYMPHONY BROKE

Boston, Dec. 11 (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony orchestra said y[redacted] world famous musical organizations are broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left. We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

chestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

---

ap at Shr

uips

ews Commentato
ards is anything e

ne of the happiest
w hasn't a lot of mo
has a lot of faith in
re and the Good Lo

he Boston Symphony i
ost broke, but business
nd music lovers in Boston
not allow this famous mu
organization to die.

A New York doctor ad
hat sufferers from cardia
nents be allowed to "live
le" rather than held to
iets and long lists of "do

Alfred Wa
Bach's Christmas Oratorio;
Auditorium; 8:30 p.m

---

orchestra so," said one trustee, "or we could reduce the number of players, but we don't intend to do that."

chronic orchestral
Bostonians are broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees sent out an emergency plea to Boston business firms for $250,000 worth of advertising in the orchestra program right away. He that sum was needed to keep Boston Symphony Orchestra vent for the remainder

---

stick on his certainly w on his face
She can standing—a longtime parties, is standing,
and hap
Shy
r gam
r the ge of
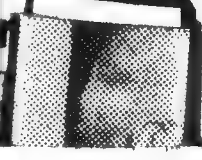
Of

ROKE



This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

DEC 10 1953

Boston Symphony Broke

• • • • • •

Orchestra Needs $250,000

BOSTON (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

TIMES

DEC 11 1953

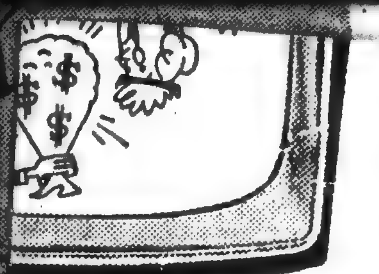
Boston Symphony Orchestra Broke; Needs $250,000

BOSTON, Dec. 10 (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today said that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said:

"We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He asked a group of Boston leaders and industrialists to consider a "premium advertising" fund raising plan under which full pages in program books would be sold at $2500.



This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
DEC 10 1953

Hub Symphony Reported Broke

Boston — (AP) — Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world-famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves and there is just no money left.

"We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot said orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

---

ap at Shr

Quips

News Commentato ards is anything e

ne of the happiest w hasn't a lot of mo has a lot of faith in re and the Good Lo

The Boston Symphony i ost broke, but business nd music lovers in Boston not allow this famous mu organization to die.

A New York doctor ad hat sufferers from cardia nents be allowed to "live le" rather than held to iets and long lists of "do

Alfred Wa
Bach's Christmas Oratorio; Philhar
Auditorium; 8:30 p.m

---

million dol- income and partly leaving its present ould let the orchestra ," said one trustee, " or we could reduce the number of players, but we don't intend to do that."

chronic orchestral Bostonians are broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees sent out an emergency plea to Boston business firms for $250,000 wor of advertising in the orchest program right away. He that sum was needed to keep Boston Symphony Orchestr vent for the remainder

---

ET and TABLE LIGHTER Set 7.95

Precision-built ... time glass wick; airtight reservoir prevents evaporation. The Ritepoint Lighter is a wonderful gift value.

Visible FUEL SUPPLY

Available in with Real

THE VIS

epend o

This Clipping From DENVER, COLO.
ROCKY MTN. NEWS
DEC 11 1953

Famous Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Broke

BOSTON, Dec. 10—(AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said Thursday that world famous musical organization is broke.

Harry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, asked a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists to consider a "premium advertising" fund raising plan. under which full pages in program books would be sold at $2500.

---

of the symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left. We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Sym-in the program books will be sold at $2500.

---

oke

We ars to ny Orc ainder cause o stick on his certainly w on his face She can standing— longtime parties, is standing, and hap Shy gam the

ROKE

DEC 11 1953

Boston Symphony Broke

BOSTON — (AP) — Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group of a plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

This Clipping From
MEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
DEC 10 1953

Drive on to Save Symphony

BOSTON (INS) — Business and civic leaders today got behind a drive to save one of Boston's biggest attractions, its symphony orchestra.

The Boston Symphony needs a quarter of a million dollars to meet its obligations for the current season.

George E. Judd, orchestra manager, said the annual budget for the 104 artists is $1,500,000, and $1 million of this must be raised from concert receipts. Despite two boosts in ticket prices in the past five years, deficits have consumed all unrestricted legacies and gifts.

Judd said $37,000 of this year's income had to go to pay last year's debts.

---

ap at Shr

uips

ews Commentato
vards is anything e

ne of the happiest
w hasn't a lot of mo
has a lot of faith in re and the Good Lor

he Boston Symphony i
ost broke, but business
nd music lovers in Boston
not allow this famous mu
organization to die.

A New York doctor ad
hat sufferers from cardia
nents be allowed to "live
le" rather than held to
iets and long lists of "do

---

emergency
orchestra go," said one trustee,
"or we could reduce the number
of players, but we don't intend
to do that."

chronic orchestral
Bostonians are broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees sent out an emergency plea to Boston business firms for $250,000 wor
of advertising in the orchest
program right away. He
that sum was needed to keep Boston Symphony Orchestr
vent for the remainder

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS
DEC 11 1953

Boston Symphony Reported Broke

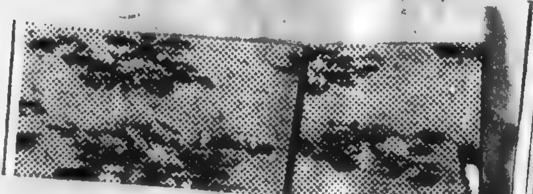
Boston (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said yesterday that the world famous musical organization is broke. Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left. We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Mr. Cabot told the group, orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

in the program books will be sold at $2500.



TIMES

DEC 10 1953

Boston Symphony Needs $250,000

Boston —(AP)— Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves.

"We need $250,000 to keep the orchestra solvent."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group of a plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

Cir. (D 134,403) (S [illegible])

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS

DEC 13 1953

Boston Symphony Reported "Broke"

BOSTON, Dec. 12.—(AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony orchestra said this week that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said:

"We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He asked a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists to consider a "premium advertising" fund raising plan under which full pages in program books would be sold at $2500.

◆◆

---

pages in the program
be sold at $2,500.

000, but box office receipts account for only one million dollars. Supplemental income and endowments have only partly made up the difference, leaving the organization in its present emergency. "We could let the orchestra go," said one trustee, "or we could reduce the number of players, but we don't intend to do that."

---

chronic orchestral
Bostonians are broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees sent out an emergency plea to Boston business firms for $250,000 worth of advertising in the orchestra program right away. He that sum was needed to keep Boston Symphony Orchestra vent for the remainder

16

---

ap at Shr

uips

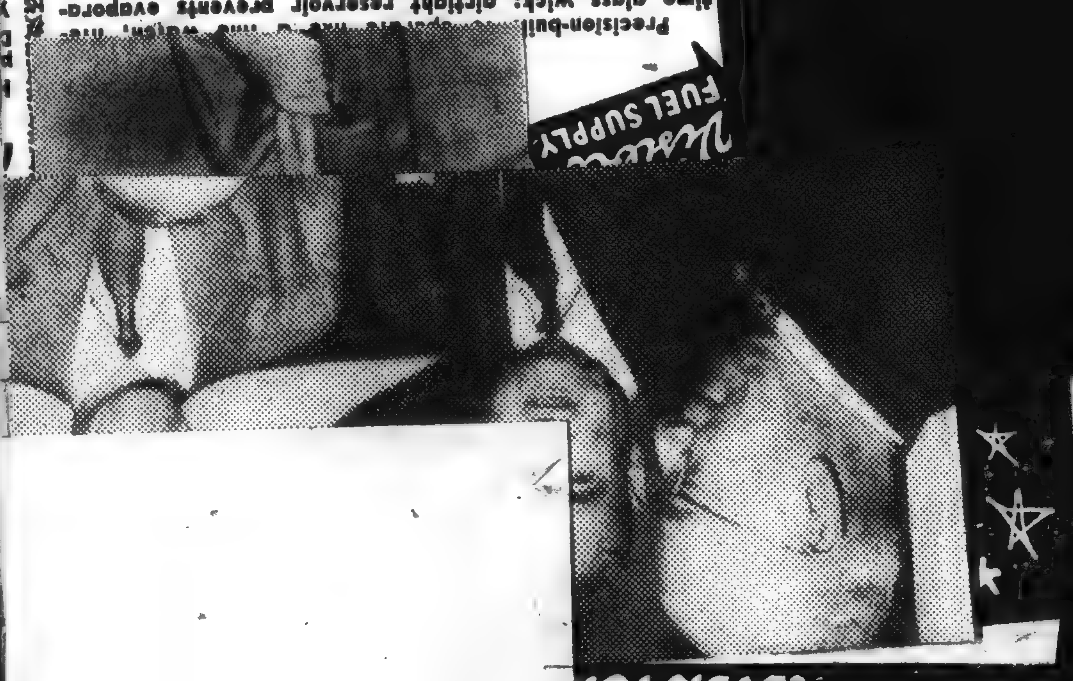
ews Commentato
wards is anything e

ne of the happiest
w hasn't a lot of mo
has a lot of faith in
re and the Good Lo

he Boston Symphony i
ost broke, but business
nd music lovers in Boston
not allow this famous mu
organization to die.

A New York doctor ad
hat sufferers from cardia
nents be allowed to "live
le" rather than held to
iets and long lists of "do

Alfred Wall
Bach's Christmas Oratorio;
Auditorium; 8:30 p.m



This Clipping From
SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
EXPRESS

DEC 11 1953

BOSTON SYMPHONY BROKE

Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said that world-famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said:

"We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He asked a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists to consider a "premium advertising" fund-raising plan under which full pages in program books would be sold at $2,500.

in the program books will be sold at $2500.

roke

We ars to ny Orc
ainder
cause o

stick on his certainly w on his face
She can standing—a longtime parties, is standing,
hap hy
gam
the ge of e Off

This Clipping From
CORTLAND, N. Y.
STANDARD

DEC 10 1953

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS REPORTED BROKE NOW

BOSTON (AP) Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world-famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

ing donations, Cabot told the group orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

000, but box office receipts account for only one million dollars. Supplemental income and endowments have only partly made up the difference, leaving the organization in its present emergency. "We could let the orchestra go," said one trustee, "or we could reduce the number of players, but we don't intend to do that."

---

chronic orchestral

Bostonians are broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees sent out an emergency plea to Boston business firms for $250,000 wort of advertising in the orchestr program right away. He s that sum was needed to keep Boston Symphony Orchestr vent for the remainder

---

ap at Shr

uips

ews Commentato
vards is anything e

ne of the happiest
w hasn't a lot of mo
has a lot of faith in
re and the Good Lo

he Boston Symphony i
ost broke, but business
nd music lovers in Boston
not allow this famous mu
organization to die.

A New York doctor ad
hat sufferers from cardia
nents be allowed to "live
le" rather than held to
iets and long lists of "do

---

ohn
adnyi,
en"
Cor-
Mal-
and dded while acts, night
nces.

Sym-
unced usical
to a
The

Alfred Wallenstein
Bach's Christmas Oratorio; Philhar
Auditorium; 8:30 p.m

This Clipping From
LYNN, MASS.
ITEM
DEC 16 1953

Hub Symphony Out of Funds

BOSTON—(AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said ~~today that~~ world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Sympohny's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need one quarter million dollars to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of this season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group, orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2500.

This Clipping From
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
DEC 10 1955

Boston Symphony Orchestra Broke

BOSTON, Dec. 10 (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

---

ap at Shr

uips

ews Commentato
vards is anything e

ne of the happiest
w hasn't a lot of mo
has a lot of faith in
re and the Good Lo

The Boston Symphony i
most broke, but business
and music lovers in Boston
not allow this famous mu
organization to die.

A New York doctor ad
hat sufferers from cardiac
nents be allowed to "live
le" rather than held to
iets and long lists of "do

Alfred Wallen
Bach's Christmas Oratorio; Philhar
Auditorium; 8:30 p.m

000, but box office receipts account for only one million dollars. Supplemental income and endowments have only partly made up the difference, leaving the organization in its present emergency. "We could let the orchestra go," said one trustee, "or we could reduce the number of players, but we don't intend to do that."

ohn
ad-
nyi,
en"
Cor-
Mal-
and dded
while acts, night
nces.

Sym-
unced usical
to a
. The
chronic orchestral
Bostonians are broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees sent out an emergency plea to Boston business firms for $250,000 worth of advertising in the orchestra program right away. He s that sum was needed to keep Boston Symphony Orchestr vent for the remainder

This Clipping From

WELLSVILLE, N. Y.
REPORTER

DEC 10 1953

Boston Symphony Orchestra Goes Broke, Says Official

BOSTON (AP) — Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world-famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

ages in the program books will e sold at $2,500.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM

DEC 0 1953

Symphony Broke; Ads To Be Sold In Program Books

BOSTON (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need one quarter million dollars to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of this season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group, orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

The [illegible] 000, but box office receipts account for only one million dollars. Supplemental income and endowments have only partly made up the difference, leaving the organization in its present emergency. "We could let the orchestra go," said one trustee, "or we could reduce the number of players, but we don't intend to do that."

---

ap at Shr

Quips

News Commentato
dwards is anything e

One of the happiest
now hasn't a lot of mo e has a lot of faith in ture and the Good Lo

The Boston Symphony i
most broke, but business
and music lovers in Boston
not allow this famous mu
organization to die.

A New York doctor ad
that sufferers from cardia
nents be allowed to "live
le" rather than held to
iets and long lists of "do

Alfred Wallenstein
Bach's Christmas Oratorio; Philhar
Auditorium; 8:30 p.m

---

chronic orchestral
Bostonians are broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees sent out an emergency plea to Boston business firms for $250,000 worth of advertising in the orchestr program right away. He s that sum was needed to keep Boston Symphony Orchestr vent for the remainder

This Clipping From

CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS

DEC 10 1953

On the Rocks

BOSTON — (AP) — Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said Thursday that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said: "We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

gram books would be sold at $2500.

a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

---

roke

'We
llars to ony Or nainder ecause o donations hestra offi premium a which full gram books wil
for
of nd

---

stick on his certainly w on his face
She can standing—a longtime parties, is standing,
band hap
the Shy fair gam
ever the stage of like Off

Cir. (D 39,532)

This Clipping From
BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE & TIMES
DEC 12 1955

ap at Shr

Editorial Quips

Bought your wreath yet?

Downtown Brockton will sure be a busy place today!

The alleged left-wing element in Lynn's GE plants were beaten by the CIO in an election to determine which element would be the bargaining agent there. Significantly, all but 813 of those eligible to vote did so.

When a man reaches the age of 70 it's estimated he has spent time amounting to one year talking on the telephone. No one dares estimate how much time a woman of 70 has spent on the phone.

News Commentator Frank Edwards is anything else but!

One of the happiest men we know hasn't a lot of money but he has a lot of faith in human nature and the Good Lord.

The Boston Symphony is almost broke, but business men and music lovers in Boston will not allow this famous musical organization to die.

A New York doctor advises that sufferers from cardiac ailments be allowed to "live a little" rather than held to stern diets and long lists of "don'ts."

Alfred Wa
Bach's Christmas Oratorio; Philhar
Auditorium; 8:30 p.m

---

of advertising at prem
prices for programs, and solicitation of individuals.

the period have consumed all unrestricted legacies and gifts.

The annual budget is $,300,000, but box office receipts account for only one million dollars. Supplemental income and endowments have only partly made up the difference, leaving the organization in its present emergency. "We could let the orchestra go," said one trustee, "or we could reduce the number of players, but we don't intend to do that."

ohn
ad-
nyi,
en"
Cor-
Mal-
and dded
while acts, night
nces.

Sym-
unced usical
to a
The

chronic orchestral
Bostonians are broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees sent out an emergency plea to Boston business firms for $250,000 worth of advertising in the orchestra program right away. He said that sum was needed to keep Boston Symphony Orchestra vent for the remainder

This Clipping From
NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS
DEC 10 1953

Boston Symphony Orchestra Broke, Its Officials Reveal

BOSTON (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need one quarter million dollars to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of this season."

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group, orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

---

son." He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

under which full pages in program books would be sold at $2500.

---

a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-AMERICAN
DEC 11 1953

Orchestra Asks Funds

Financial assistance is being sought by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

To keep the orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season, $250,000 in contributions are needed, Henry B. Cabot, president of the board of trustees, told the Associated Press.

Deficits in the last five years have used up all unrestricted legacies and gifts, despite two increases in ticket prices in that period, according to George E. Judd, orchestra manager.

Methods of obtaining the necessary money include sale of advertising at "premium" prices for programs, and solicitation of individuals.

---

the period have consumed all unrestricted legacies and gifts.

The annual budget is $ [illegible]00,000, but box office receipts account for only one million dollars. Supplemental income and endowments have only partly made up the difference, leaving the organization in its present emergency. "We could let the orchestra go," said one trustee, "or we could reduce the number of players, but we don't intend to do that."

---

chronic orchestral ail
Bostonians are broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees sent out an emergency plea to Boston business firms for $250,000 wort of advertising in the orchestr program right away. He s that sum was needed to keep Boston Symphony Orchestr vent for the remainder

---

t er a li-ue n n ow unmme
on-ohn
ad-
nyi,
en"
Cor-
Mal-
and dded
while acts, night
nces.

Sym-
unced usical
to a
. The

---

ap at Shr
stra Brok

Christmas concert by the vic Music Association featu asadena Civic Orchestra and der the direction of Richar
asadena Civic Auditorium; 3 p
Ballet Productions: Wilshire
Theater; 8:30 p.m.

Monday

Evenings on the Roof presents
cert of songs by contemporary can composers and instrumental from the classical repertoire with gery McKay, mezzo soprano,
McKay and Mildred Portney,, p
and Dixie Blackstone and Bever
Beck, violinists; Los Angeles
Auditorium, West Hollywood Park
p.m.

Tuesday

Sadler's Wells Ballet productio
"Sylvia" in three acts with Nadia
rina and Alexis Rassine dancing
leads; Shrine Auditorium; 8 p.m.

Wednesday

Helsinki University Chorus,
Turenen, conductor; Pasadena
Auditorium; 8:30 p.m.

Sadler's Wells Ballet productio
"Sylvia" in three acts with Sv
Beriosova and John Field dancin leads; Shrine Auditorium; 8:30 p.

Thursday

Los Angeles Philharmonic Orch
Alfred Wallenstein conducting, pr
Bach's Christmas Oratorio; Philhar
Auditorium; 8:30 p.m

---

to stand on. Colorful, du mar or scuff. Wide rang

Three Lett
Included F

ATHERTONS
for fine furniture
41 Centre Street Brockton

Miss Joan Steady Pre-Nuptial Guest

Miss Joan Steady of Arch St. Springfield, was guest at a pre (Anth-inato)

7:48; Mackey (Irvi-Gau), 7:54;
Bergen, 10:51.

Boston Bruins Meet Red Wings

Legion Auxiliary Plans Christmas Party Dec 15

Hollis, Dec 10—Donald C. Petry American Legion Auxiliary is planning a Christmas party at the home of Mrs Anne Parkhurst . Each member

This Clipping From
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE

DEC 10 1953

Boston Symphony Reported Broke

BOSTON AP — Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke. Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's trustees, said: "We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left. "We need one quarter million dollars to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of this season." He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

under which full pages in program books would be sold at $2500.

out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will e sold at $2,500.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

DEC 11 1953

Boston Symphony Hits Financial Skids; Seeks Help

The Boston Symphony orchestra is in financial distress. Henry B. Cabot, president of the board of trustees, was quoted by the Associated Press yesterday as saying, "We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

Among the emergency fund raising schemes adopted is a donation form of advertising, with business houses asked to pay "premium" prices for displays in the program booklets. Individual executives are being asked for cash gifts as high as $1,000.

George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, reported that despite two raises in ticket prices in the last five years, deficits of the period have consumed all unrestricted legacies and gifts.

The annual budget is $1,700,000, but box office receipts account for only one million dollars. Supplemental income and endowments have only partly made up the difference, leaving the organization in its present emergency. "We could let the orchestra go," said one trustee, "or we could reduce the number of players, but we don't intend to do that."

---

ap at Shr
estra Brok

Christmas concert by the
Civic Music Association featur Pasadena Civic Orchestra and under the direction of Richar
Pasadena Civic Auditorium; 3 p
Ballet Productions: Wilshire
Theater; 8:30 p.m.

Monday

Evenings on the Roof presents
cert of songs by contemporary
can composers and instrumental from the classical repertoire with
gery McKay, mezzo soprano,
McKay and Mildred Portney,, p
and Dixie Blackstone and Bever
Beck, violinists; Los Angeles
Auditorium, West Hollywood Park
p.m.

Tuesday

Sadler's Wells Ballet productio
"Sylvia" in three acts with Nadia
rina and Alexis Rassine dancing
leads; Shrine Auditorium; 8 p.m.

Wednesday

Helsinki University Chorus,
Turenen, conductor; Pasadena
Auditorium; 8:30 p.m.

Sadler's Wells Ballet productio
"Sylvia" in three acts with Sv
Beriosova and John Field dancin
leads; Shrine Auditorium; 8:30 p.

Thursday

Los Angeles Philharmonic Orch
Alfred Wallenstein conducting, pr
Bach's Christmas Oratorio; Philhar
Auditorium; 8:30 p.m

---

chronic orchestral . The Bostonians are broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees sent out an emergency plea to Boston business firms for $250,000 wort of advertising in the orchestr program right away. He s that sum was needed to keep Boston Symphony Orchestr vent for the remainder

This Clipping From

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST-DISPATCH

DEC 10 1953

BOSTON SYMPHONY BROKE, HEAD OF TRUSTEES SAYS

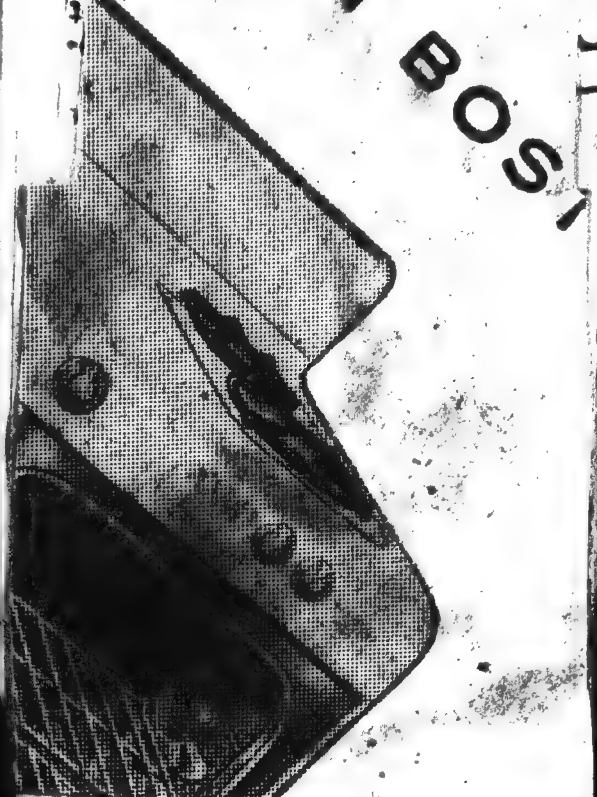
BOSTON, Dec. 10 (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said: "We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He asked a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists to consider a "premium advertising" fund-raising plan under which full pages in program books would be sold at $2500.

---

out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.



This Clipping From
HOLLYWOOD, CAL.
CITIZEN-NEWS

DEC 11 1953

THE MUSICAL SCORE

'Beauty' on Tap at Shrine; Boston Orchestra Broke

The visiting Sadler's Wells Ballet continues its Shrine Auditorium stay tonight with the first of two performances of "The Sleeping Beauty." This wonderful old fairy tale danced to Tschaikovsky music offers Margot Fonteyn one of her most celebrated roles as Princess Aurora.

Michael Somes will be her cavalier, Prince Florimund, in a ballet fairly bursting with divertissements, plus a prologue and three acts.

Rowena Jackson and John Hart take over in tomorrow night's repeat performance. Sunday afternoon, the English company ventures for the first time here this season into the contemporary realm with John Cranko's new ballet "The Shadow" to music by von Dohnanyi, and "Homage to the Queen" which is Frederick Ashton's Coronation Ballet to music by Malcolm Arnold. "Checkmate" and "Les Patineurs" will be added to the Sunday evening bill while Ashton's new ballet in three acts, "Sylvia" arrives Tuesday night for the first of two performances.

* * *

Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have announced that the world famous musical organization has succumbed to a chronic orchestral affliction. The Bostonians are broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees sent out an emergency plea to Boston business firms for $250,000 worth of advertising in the orchestra's program right away. He said that sum was needed to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the Christmas concert by the Pasadena Civic Music Association featuring the Pasadena Civic Orchestra and Chorus under the direction of Richard Lert; Pasadena Civic Auditorium; 3 p.m.

Ballet Productions: Wilshire Ebell Theater; 8:30 p.m.

Monday

Evenings on the Roof presents a concert of songs by contemporary American composers and instrumental music from the classical repertoire with Margery McKay, mezzo soprano, Howard McKay and Mildred Portney,, pianists, and Dixie Blackstone and Beverly Lebeck, violinists; Los Angeles County Auditorium, West Hollywood Park; 8:30 p.m.

Tuesday

Sadler's Wells Ballet production of "Sylvia" in three acts with Nadia Nerina and Alexis Rassine dancing the leads; Shrine Auditorium; 8 p.m.

Wednesday

Helsinki University Chorus, Martti Turenen, conductor; Pasadena Civic Auditorium; 8:30 p.m.

Sadler's Wells Ballet production of "Sylvia" in three acts with Svetlana Beriosova and John Field dancing the leads; Shrine Auditorium; 8:30 p.m.

Thursday

Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra, Alfred Wallenstein conducting, presents Bach's Christmas Oratorio; Philharmonic Auditorium; 8:30 p.m

This Clipping From

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

DEC 10 1953

Boston Symphony Called Stony Broke

BOSTON (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world-famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the eason."

He outlined a plan for raising noney to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in aising donations, Cabot told the group orchestra officials have vorked out a "premium adver-ising" plan under which full ages in the program books will e sold at $2,500.

51

65

Cir. (D 541,485) (Sat. 274,211)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM & SUN

DEC 12 1953

Music, at Least, Not Blacked Out

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI

Behind the news blackout, concert music went its merry way, with New York audiences as responsive as ever and New York critics masquerading as music lovers for a change.

Most dramatic of the readings I heard were the "Eroica" Symphony and "Coriolan" overture on Arturo Toscanini's NBC Beethoven broadcast last Sunday. The 86-year-old maestro looked as fit as a Stradivarius, and he made the music sound like all the good news anyone would ever need to hear.

Charles Munch preceded him by a day with Beethoven's "Eroica" at the Saturday matinee of the Boston Symphony. That was also a stupendous experience. I happen to be a fanatic on the subject of Arturo Toscanini, so I'd better not make any comparisons. I enjoyed both readings, and both are superlative conductors. Suppose I leave it at that.

Novelties In Boston.

Exciting novelties bristled on the Wednesday program of the Boston Symphony. Included was a brand-new cello concerto by the Soviet composer Kabalevsky, played brilliantly by Samuel Mayes. Concert colleagues of Mr. Mayes will also find it a warmly melodious, richly appealing score couched in a straightforward folk idiom.

Equally attractive was a new Concerto Grosso by Ernest Bloch, a composer who divides his time and allegiance between the classics and the moderns. The concerto represents the perfect meeting of extremes. The past fortnight has been featuring something of a Bloch Party. At least four major works of the Swiss-American master have been featured.

...the Met... change into ... and sing ... ances of ... Rob...

Cir. (D 10,048)
Cir. (D 4,421)
Cir. (D 3,196)
Cir. (D 8,016)
Cir. (D 1,221)
Cir. (D 26,192)
Cir. (D 11,500)
Cir. (D 13,153)
Cir. (D 8,231)
Cir. (D 9,994)
Cir. (D 39,532)
Cir. (D 5,715)
Cir. (D 10,736)
Cir. (D 17,771) (S 17,771)
Cir. (D 8,092)
Cir. (D 13,254)
Cir. (D 26,042)
Cir. (D 7,106) (S 7,106)
Cir. (D 215,362) (S 527,395)

This Clipping From
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER

DEC 11 1953

Symphony Asks Financial Help

BOSTON. Dec. 10.—(AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke. Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said:

"We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

...ess leaders and industrialists.

"End of a Tonal Drought"

Boston Globe 10/10/53

Munch, Symphony Brilliant in Opening of 73d Season

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Munch is back at Symphony Hall and all's well with the local world of music. This, if you don't mind rewriting a gobbett of Robert Browning, is one way of saying that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is back in glorious operation. The opening of the 73d season, yesterday afternoon, was an occasion of familiar sight and brilliant sound, and for many Bostonians the end of a tonal drought which only this orchestra can relieve.

Although for many years it has been the custom for the orchestra to rise, closely followed by the audience, when the conductor first appears on stage at an opening concert, the ritual has not become stale. People really mean it as homage to a fine man and great musician, and there was nothing perfunctory about the rising tribute to smiling Charles Munch yesterday.

The new season begins with some changes in the orchestra. Since this time a year ago, violinist Harry Dubbs and cellist Enrico Fabrizio have died, and first bassoon Raymond Allard and cellist Hippolyte Droeghmans have retired. The new first bassoon is Sherman Walt. Leonard Moss has joined the violins, and the two new cellists are Martin Hoherman and Louis Berger. There is also a new member of the board of trustees, Rev. Palfrey Perkins.

Munch's initial program for 1953-54 followed exactly his formula for good concerts, of one-quarter new music and three-quarters familiar. The new piece was Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso No. 2 for Strings; the "standard" items were the Handel F major Concerto for Two Wind Choirs and Strings, Brahms' Second Symphony, and the Tchaikovsky Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet."

To work somewhat backwards from this point, let it be said that the tempestuous account of "Romeo and Juliet" which Munch achieved, was a real stunner. Never before have I heard the work end with such a dramatic thunder of the kettledrums, nor have the musical descriptions of the Montague and Capulet brawls been more vivid. This was not, however, a grossly exaggerated performance, it was simply one of heroic size, in which the love scenes were quite as transcendent as all the rest, and at the same time sensitive.

Munch did not stifle horns, trumpets and trombones, but neither did he bring them up too high, as occasionally he is inclined to do, trumpets especially. This was a passionate reading, and a personal one, and if you conceive Shakespeare to be profound, moving, full of the roar and tumult of life, and full of poetry too, it was likewise very Shakespearean.

Apart from an unaccountable near-catastrophe in the horns at the outset of Brahms' Second Symphony, the gracious and summery masterpiece went smoothly and with great beauty of tone and architectural symmetry.

Bloch's new Concerto Grosso, which received first performance in America and which had had but one previous hearing, in London, is a fine modern example of the archaic concerto grosso form. The little concertino of four strings is nicely contrasted with the larger mass of instruments, the music sings and has that quality so often missing from contemporary music: Real rhythmic life and inner motion. There is a rousing five-voice fugue and for finale, a set of engaging variations whose foremost interest, as in Beethoven variations, is rhythmic change.

The harmony is neither lush nor acid, but something in between, flavorsome and lively, like one of those Neufchatel wines of Bloch's native Switzerland. When all is said, the Concerto Grosso gives us nothing new; other composers have done much the same thing and in the same manner. But this is engaging and pleasant music, worthy to be heard again. The strings played gorgeously, with something of that dark richness of the Koussevitzky days.

As for Handel's bracing piece, the epitome of healthy and abstract music, with two wind choirs cleverly set against the other, it was pleasure from first measure to last.

BOSTON, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1953

Monitor

mbridge—Take t

James Abresch

Ruth Posselt, week-end Symphony soloist

...in cleverness, Mr. Kabalevsky has the remarkable courage to appear quite naked, as it were, and let his auditors share what simple poetic and emotional ideas he has. While these are not, perhaps, overwhelming, they are straightforward, understandable, and altogether engaging. The result is a pleasing composition that makes you like the cello, the orchestra, and Mr. Kabalevsky, and that is, as far as I ... aware, the most effective work for the cello in nearly half a ... Mr. Münch conducted it w... scrupulous care that is characte... him, and an able cellist named Mayes played the solo part with ...erable distinction.

THE NEW YORKER

THURSDAY, DEC. 10, 1953 BOSTON DAILY RECORD,

Ballet in Sunday Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give concerts in its two shorter series in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon and next Tuesday evening.

Richard Burgin will be the conductor, and Grant Johannesen the piano soloist.

The program includes Stravinsky's ballet suite, "Danses Concertantes," Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 2, the Adagio from Mahler's posthumous Tenth Symphony and Tchaikovsky's "Italian Capriccio."

On Friday and Saturday next week Charles Munch will present for the first time at these concerts Berlioz' religious oratorio, "L'Enfance du Christ." This work is a music presentation of the Nativity, the Slaughter of the Innocents, and the Flight into Egypt. The chorus of the New England Conservatory will assist.

The soloists are Jennie Tourel, soprano; Mack Morgan, baritone; Lee Cass, bass, and John McCollum, tenor.

THE JEWISH ADVOCATE

12/11/53

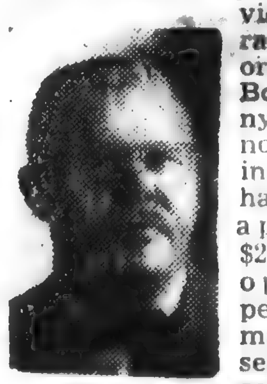
...ber 10, 1953

Teveth 4, 5714

Why Boston Symphony Cannot Pay Its Way

By CYRUS DURGIN

Most of the best things in life are not free. Most of them have to be paid for, and one of the very best is great music, especially that provided by a first-rank symphonic orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra now finds itself in the position of having to raise approximately $250,000 to meet operating expense for the remainder of this season. Cash reserves have been exhausted. There is no more money left. What would happen if this sum is not raised in the next few months?



"Well, what happens if you can't pay your bills?" asked Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, in his Federal st. office one day last week.

The implication was, you go out of business.

"This is a serious situation," continued Mr. Cabot, "and it will cause grave doubt of future seasons if this sum is not raised. I believe there are people who would step into this emergency and save us. But we don't want a rescue party. We would much prefer continuing support on a broad and solid foundation.

"There is no question of trying to save money by cutting down the size of the orchestra. You do that only when you've assumed that you're going down hill, when you admit that you've become second rate. Nor is there any question of trying to save by eliminating or curtailing the Esplanade concerts.

"There is, however, doubt whether we can operate the Berkshire Music Center beyond this next Summer, and it may be we shall have to run it on a curtailed basis in 1954. We shall know that definitely in a short time. The school at Tanglewood has been a heavy burden, much as we have been proud and glad to operate it."

There you have the whole truth in a few paragraphs. It seems unthinkable that we should ever lose the Boston Symphony, but unthinkable only if we all assume a share of the load and give what we can. That $250,000 must be raised by contribution.

In terms of what it adds to the happiness, the cultural and emotional well-being of literally hundreds of thousands of people, the value of the Boston Symphony is beyond estimate. In terms of ticket prices, the cost to the public is not exceptional. But the expense of maintaining a first rank orchestra, in all its glory of beauty and efficiency, is considerable.

Like all the rest of us the Boston Symphony has been vitally affected by the High Cost of Everything. It is not an exaggeration that public interest in its concerts, here and elsewhere, is greater than ever, and increasing.

The net income for the season of 1952-53 was greater by $206,000 than that for 1951-52. But due to that High Cost of Everything, the total expense of 1952-53 was greater by $71,000 than in the season preceding.

But the Boston Symphony is not merely a fine orchestra which gives concerts in Boston and other cities. It is, and much more importantly, one of the great institutions, cultural and practical, in Boston and New England; in fact, it is a national institution.

If the cultural value is evident, it does not require specialized analysis to find the practical value. In terms of money, the orchestra is an institution which, like the colleges and universities, attracts many of the thousands of students who come here. It is a prime attraction for visitors

Tanglew

(the complete Bo... in the Fall and ... the Pops and Esp... during the warm... Berkshire Festiv... international rep... Boston Symphon... major enterpris... character to th... centre.

Anything whic... worthy—and as ... lieve, entitled—t... throughout all s... al and business community.

Some shrewd business men ma... symphonic music as a deficit e... shouldn't it pay ...

The answers ar... and logical. Beca... tial size and qu... class orchestral ... a costly enterpr... live upon its inc... sales.

Then why not ... Because there is ... ing maximum w... exceeded without... cy. The Boston ... gives, in Boston ... the seven month... through April, ... concerts. Add to ... pension fund concerts annually, ... munity and ourselves

Save Our Symphony!

On page 12 of this issue there appears "A Frank Statement from the Trustees" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It describes the sad financial plight of this great musical organization, the pride of Boston culture and joy of music lovers the world over.

It reveals that the very survival of Boston's greatest civic asset is hanging in the balance.

A swift reading of the "Statement" is reminder enough of the priceless benefits which are ours by virtue of the Boston Symphony's presence here. Does anyone doubt how calamitous its passing would be? It is a possibilility too awful to contemplate.

The "Statement" also points out that of nine large cities which raise sums to support their symphony orchestras, the Boston public contributes the least.

The Trustees have issued an S.O.S. — Save Our Symphony! The sum of $250,000 will do it. Any amount the donor can afford will be welcomed by Richard C. Paine, Treasurer, Symphony Hall, Boston.

65

Cir. (D 541,485) (Sat. 274,991)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM & SUN

DEC 12 1953

Music, at Least, Not Blacked Out

By LOUIS BI[illegible]

Behind the news blackout, co[illegible] rt music went its merry way, [illegible] tly New York audiences as responsive as ever and New York [illegible] itics masquerading as music [illegible] vers for a change.

Most dramatic of the readings heard were the "Eroica" Symphony and "Coriolan" overture [illegible] Arturo Toscanini's NBC Beet[illegible]oven broadcast last Sunday. The [illegible]-year-old maestro looked as fit [illegible] a Stradivarius, and he made [illegible] e music sound like all the good [illegible] ws anyone would ever need to [illegible] ar.

Charles Munch preceded him [illegible] y a day with Beethoven's "Eroica" at the Saturday mat[illegible]ee of the Boston Symphony [illegible] hat was also a stupendous experience. I happen to be a fanatic [illegible] the subject of Arturo Toscanini, so I'd better not make [illegible] y comparisons. I enjoyed both readings, and both are superlative conductors. Suppose I leave [illegible] at that.

Novelties In Boston.

Exciting novelties bristled on [illegible] e Wednesday program of the [illegible] oston Symphony. Included was [illegible] brand-new cello concerto by the [illegible] oviet composer Kabalevsky [illegible] layed brilliantly by Samuel [illegible] ayes. Concert colleagues of [illegible] r. Mayes will also find [illegible] armly melodious, richly appeal[illegible] g score couched in a straight[illegible] orward folk idiom.

Equally attractive was a New [illegible] ncerto Grosso by Ernest Bloch [illegible] composer who divides his [illegible] d allegiance between the cl[illegible] s and the moderns. The co[illegible] rto represents the [illegible] eeting of extremes. The p[illegible] rtnight has been featur[illegible] [illegible] Bloch Party. [illegible] four major works of [illegible] American master [illegible] een featured.

Cir. (D 10,5[illegible])

Cir. (D 4,421)

This Clipping From
WESTERLY, R. I.
SUN

DEC 10 1953

Outlines Plan to Keep Boston Symphony Solvent

Boston (AP) — Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's trustees, said:

[illegible] cash reserves, [illegible] no money left.

"We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Cir. (W 370,017)

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 12 1953

MUSICAL EVENTS

Finding a Needle

Last week, in Carnegie Hall, I found a small, serviceable needle in Dmitri Kabalevsky's Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, which was given its first local performance by the Boston Symphony, under Charles Münch. It is not a work that is likely to save the world, or even astonish it very much. The thing that distinguishes it from most contemporary music is the modest integrity of its aims. Its technique, I am thankful to note, is almost unnoticeable, which i[illegible] it should be. Instead of clothing hi[illegible] in cleverness, Mr. Kabalevsky has [illegible] the remarkable courage to appear [illegible] naked, as it were, and let his audi[illegible] share what simple poetic and emotional ideas he has. While these are not, perhaps, overwhelming, they are [illegible]

THE NEW YORKER

forward, understandable, and altogether engaging. The result is a pleasing composition that makes you l[illegible] the cello, the orchestra, and Mr. Kabalevsky, and that is, as far [illegible] aware, the most effective work [illegible] for the cello in nearly half a [illegible] Mr. Münch conducted it w[illegible] scrupulous care that is characte[illegible] him, and an able cellist named Mayes played the solo part with [illegible]

THE JEWISH

ber 10, 1953

THURSD[illegible]

Balle[illegible]

The Bosto[illegible] tra will give[illegible] shorter serie[illegible] Sunday afte[illegible] day evening[illegible] Richard [illegible] ductor, and [illegible] piano soloist[illegible] The progr[illegible] sky's ballet[illegible] certantes, [illegible] Concerto No[illegible] Mahler's pos[illegible] phony and To[illegible] Capriccio[illegible] On Friday [illegible] week Charle[illegible] [illegible] concerts [illegible]

51

Monitor

BOSTON, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1953

[illegible]mbridge— [illegible]

James Ahrasch

Ruth Posselt, week-end Symphony soloist

Why Boston Symphony Cannot Pay Its Way

Tanglewood Music Center May Be Out By 1955

• By CYRUS DURGIN

Most of the best things in life are not free. Most of them have to be paid for, and one of the very best is great music, especially that provided by a first-rank symphonic orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra now finds itself in the position of having to raise approximately $250,000 to meet operating expense for the remainder of this season. Cash reserves have been exhausted. There is no more money left. What would happen if this sum is not raised in the next few months?

"Well, what happens if you can't pay your bills?" asked Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, in his Federal st. office one day last week.

The implication was, you go out of business.

"This is a serious situation," continued Mr. Cabot, "and it will cause grave doubt of future seasons if this sum is not raised. I believe there are people who would step into this emergency and save us. But we don't want a rescue party. We would much prefer continuing support on a broad and solid foundation.

"There is no question of trying to save money by cutting down the size of the orchestra. You do that only when you've assumed that you're going down hill, when you admit that you've become second rate. Nor is there any question of trying to save by eliminating or curtailing the Esplanade concerts.

"There is, however, doubt whether we can operate the Berkshire Music Center beyond this next Summer, and it may be we shall have to run it on a curtailed basis in 1954. We shall know that definitely in a short time. The school at Tanglewood has been a heavy burden, much as we have been proud and glad to operate it."

There you have the whole truth in a few paragraphs. It seems unthinkable that we should ever lose the Boston Symphony, but unthinkable only if we all assume a share of the load and give what we can. That $250,000 must be raised by contribution.

In terms of what it adds to the happiness, the cultural and emotional well-being of literally hundreds of thousands of people, the value of the Boston Symphony is beyond estimate. In terms of ticket prices, the cost to the public is not exceptional. But the expense of maintaining a first rank orchestra, in all its glory of beauty and efficiency, is considerable.

Like all the rest of us the Boston Symphony has been vitally affected by the High Cost of Everything. It is not an exaggeration that public interest in its concerts, here and elsewhere, is greater than ever, and increasing.

The net income for the season of 1952-53 was greater by $206,000 than that for 1951-52. But due to that High Cost of Everything, the total expense of 1952-53 was greater by $71,000 than in the season preceding.

But the Boston Symphony is not merely a fine orchestra which gives concerts in Boston and other cities. It is, and much more importantly, one of the great institutions, cultural and practical, in Boston and New England; in fact, it is a national institution.

If the cultural value is evident, it does not require specialized analysis to find the practical value. In terms of money, the orchestra is an institution which, like the colleges and universities, attracts many of the thousands of students who come here. It is a prime attraction for visitors (the complete Boston Symphony in the Fall and Winter season, the Pops and Esplanade concerts during the warm weather). The Berkshire Festivals now have international repute. In sum, the Boston Symphony is among the major enterprises which give character to this metropolitan centre.

Anything which so functions is worthy—and as many of us believe, entitled—to broad support throughout all social, professional and business layers of the community.

Some shrewd and successful business men may question why symphonic music should be run as a deficit enterprise. Why shouldn't it pay for itself?

The answers are at hand, direct and logical. Because of the essential size and quality of a first class orchestral apparatus, it is a costly enterprise, and cannot live upon its income from ticket sales.

Then why not more concerts? Because there is a definite working maximum which cannot be exceeded without loss of efficiency. The Boston Symphony now gives, in Boston and on tour over the seven months from October through April, upward of 100 concerts. Add to this figure two pension fund concerts annually, about 60 Pops, 18 on the Charles River Esplanade and a dozen or more at Tanglewood, and you have an approximate total of 200. For each of the Friday-Saturday programs in Boston some four rehearsals are necessary.

Why not play in an auditorium with larger seating capacity? Because there is a point, in matter of size, beyond which the sound and power of a first-class orchestra will be diminished. There, again, quality would suffer. The size of Symphony Hall, with its capacity of 2631, is about ideal for symphonic music at its best. Furthermore, the orchestra owns Symphony Hall, and if even by a stretch of imagination, it were considered to play in a larger hall, the cost of creating an acoustically suitable one today would be fantastic.

Unless and until endowments become large enough to provide the income—and that is most unlikely—the solution is obvious. We must plan and conduct campaigns each year to maintain the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its highest peak of artistic and institutional efficiency. Not only this $250,000, but whatever deficits may exist in other years to come. By so doing we not only help music, we help our community and ourselves.

Cir. (D 541,485) (Sat. 274,741)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM & SUN
DEC 12 1953

Music, at Least, Not Blacked Out

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI

Behind the news blackout, concert music went its merry way, with New York audiences as responsive as ever and New York critics masquerading as music lovers for a change.

Most dramatic of the readings heard were the "Eroica" Symphony and "Coriolan" overture on Arturo Toscanini's NBC Beethoven broadcast last Sunday. The 86-year-old maestro looked as fit as a Stradivarius, and he made the music sound like all the good news anyone would ever need to hear.

Charles Munch preceded him by a day with Beethoven's "Eroica"" at the Saturday matinee of the Boston Symphony. That was also a stupendous experience. I happen to be a fanatic on the subject of Arturo Toscanini, so I'd better not make any comparisons. I enjoyed both readings, and both are superlative conductors. Suppose I leave it at that.

Novelties In Boston.

Exciting novelties bristled on the Wednesday program of the Boston Symphony. Included was a brand-new cello concerto by the Soviet composer Kabalevsky, played brilliantly by Samuel Mayes. Concert colleagues of Mr. Mayes will also find it a warmly melodious, richly appealing score couched in a straightforward folk idiom.

Equally attractive was a new Concerto Grosso by Ernest Bloch, a composer who divides his time and allegiance between the classics and the moderns. The concerto represents the perfect meeting of extremes. The past fortnight has been featuring something of a Bloch Party. At least four major works of the Swiss-American master have been featured.

... the Met ... change into ... and sing ... ances ... Rob...

This Clipping From
HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
DEC 11 1953

Boston businessmen are being asked to underwrite the deficit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is now broke. Most of the big orchestras in this country depend on some kind of substantial private support. The alternative is government financing.

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Cir. (W 370,017)

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DEC 12 1953

MUSICAL EVENTS

Finding a Needle

Last week, in Carnegie Hall, I found a small, serviceable needle in Dmitri Kabalevsky's Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, which was given its first local performance by the Boston Symphony, under Charles Münch. It is not a work that is likely to save the world, or even astonish it very much. The thing that distinguishes it from most contemporary music is the modest integrity of its aims. Its technique, I am thankful to note, is almost unnoticeable, which is as it should be. Instead of clothing himself in cleverness, Mr. Kabalevsky has the remarkable courage to appear quite naked, as it were, and let his audience share what simple poetic and emotional ideas he has. While these are not, perhaps, overwhelming, they are straightforward, understandable, and altogether engaging. The result is a pleasing composition that makes you like the cello, the orchestra, and Mr. Kabalevsky, and that is, as far as I am aware, the most effective work for the cello in nearly half a century. Mr. Münch conducted it with the scrupulous care that is characteristic of him, and an able cellist named Samuel Mayes played the solo part with considerable distinction.

THE NEW YORKER

51

Monitor

BOSTON, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1953

...mbridge—Take t...

James Abresch

Ruth Posselt, week-end Symphony soloist

THURSD...

Ballet...

The Boston ... tra will give ... shorter series ... Sunday after... day evening ... Richard Bu... ductor, and G... piano soloist. The progra... sky's ballet ... certantes," ... Concerto No ... Mahler's post... phony and Tc... Capriccio ... On Friday ... week Charle... ... for the ... concerts Be... ... "L'En...

THE JEWISH...

...ber 10, 1953

Why Boston Symphony Cannot Pay Its Way

Tanglewood Music Center May Be Out By 1955

By CYRUS DURGIN

Most of the best things in life are not free. Most of them have to be paid for, and one of the very best is great music, especially that provided by a first-rank symphonic orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra now finds itself in the position of having to raise approximately $250,000 to meet operating expense for the remainder of this season. Cash reserves have been exhausted. There is no more money left. What would happen if this sum is not raised in the next few months?

"Well, what happens if you can't pay your bills?" asked Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, in his Federal st. office one day last week.

The implication was, you go out of business.

"This is a serious situation," continued Mr. Cabot, "and it will cause grave doubt of future seasons if this sum is not raised. I believe there are people who would step into this emergency and save us. But we don't want a rescue party. We would much prefer continuing support on a broad and solid foundation.

"There is no question of trying to save money by cutting down the size of the orchestra. You do that only when you've assumed that you're going down hill, when you admit that you've become second rate. Nor is there any question of trying to save by eliminating or curtailing the Esplanade concerts.

"There is, however, doubt whether we can operate the Berkshire Music Center beyond this next Summer, and it may be we shall have to run it on a curtailed basis in 1954. We shall know that definitely in a short time. The school at Tanglewood has been a heavy burden, much as we have been proud and glad to operate it."

There you have the whole truth in a few paragraphs. It seems unthinkable that we should ever lose the Boston Symphony, but unthinkable only if we all assume a share of the load and give what we can. That $250,000 must be raised by contribution.

In terms of what it adds to the happiness, the cultural and emotional well-being of literally hundreds of thousands of people, the value of the Boston Symphony is beyond estimate. In terms of ticket prices, the cost to the public is not exceptional. But the expense of maintaining a first rank orchestra, in all its glory of beauty and efficiency, is considerable.

Like all the rest of us the Boston Symphony has been vitally affected by the High Cost of Everything. It is not an exaggeration that public interest in its concerts, here and elsewhere, is greater than ever, and increasing.

The net income for the season of 1952-53 was greater by $206,000 than that for 1951-52. But due to that High Cost of Everything, the total expense of 1952-53 was greater by $71,000 than in the season preceding.

But the Boston Symphony is not merely a fine orchestra which gives concerts in Boston and other cities. It is, and much more importantly, one of the great institutions, cultural and practical, in Boston and New England; in fact, it is a national institution.

If the cultural value is evident, it does not require specialized analysis to find the practical value. In terms of money, the orchestra is an institution which, like the colleges and universities, attracts many of the thousands of students who come here. It is a prime attraction for visitors (the complete Boston Symphony in the Fall and Winter season, the Pops and Esplanade concerts during the warm weather). The Berkshire Festivals now have international repute. In sum, the Boston Symphony is among the major enterprises which give character to this metropolitan centre.

Anything which so functions is worthy—and as many of us believe, entitled—to broad support throughout all social, professional and business layers of the community.

Some shrewd and successful business men may question why symphonic music should be run as a deficit enterprise. Why shouldn't it pay for itself?

The answers are at hand, direct and logical. Because of the essential size and quality of a first class orchestral apparatus, it is a costly enterprise, and cannot live upon its income from ticket sales.

Then why not more concerts? Because there is a definite working maximum which cannot be exceeded without loss of efficiency. The Boston Symphony now gives, in Boston and on tour over the seven months from October through April, upward of 100 concerts. Add to this figure two pension fund concerts annually, about 60 Pops, 18 on the Charles River Esplanade and a dozen or more at Tanglewood, and you have an approximate total of 200. For each of the Friday-Saturday programs in Boston some four rehearsals are necessary.

Why not play in an auditorium with larger seating capacity? Because there is a point, in matter of size, beyond which the sound and power of a first-class orchestra will be diminished. There, again, quality would suffer. The size of Symphony Hall, with its capacity of 2631, is about ideal for symphonic music at its best. Furthermore, the orchestra owns Symphony Hall, and if even by a stretch of imagination, it were considered to play in a larger hall, the cost of creating an acoustically suitable one today would be fantastic.

Unless and until endowments become large enough to provide the income—and that is most unlikely—the solution is obvious. We must plan and conduct campaigns each year to maintain the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its highest peak of artistic and institutional efficiency. Not only this $250,000, but whatever deficits may exist in other years to come. By so doing we not only help music, we help our community and ourselves.

65

Cir. (D 541,465) (Sat. 274,[illegible])

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM & SUN
DEC 12 1953

Music, at Least, Not Blacked Out

By LOUIS BIA[illegible]

Behind the news blackout, con[illegible] the Met, [illegible] rt music went its merry way, [illegible] th New York audiences as re- onsive as ever and New York itics masquerading as music vers for a change.

Most dramatic of the readings heard were the "Eroica" Sym- hony and "Coriolan" overture Arturo Toscanini's NBC Beet- oven broadcast last Sunday. The -year-old maestro looked as fit a Stradivarius, and he made e music sound like all the good ws anyone would ever need to ear.

Charles Munch preceded him y a day with Beethoven's Eroica"" at the Saturday mat- ee of the Boston Symphony. hat was also a stupendous ex- erience. I happen to be a fanatic the subject of Arturo Tos- anini, so I'd better not make ny comparisons. I enjoyed both adings, and both are superla ve conductors. Suppose I leave at that.

Novelties In Boston.

Exciting novelties bristled on e Wednesday program of the oston Symphony. Included was brand-new cello concerto by the oviet composer Kabalevsky, layed brilliantly by Samuel ayes. Concert colleagues of r. Mayes will also find it a armly melodious, richly appeal g score couched in a straight orward folk idiom.

Equally attractive was a new ncerto Grosso by Ernest Bloch, composer who divides his time d allegiance between the clas s and the moderns. The con rto represents the perfect eeting of extremes. The past rtnight has been featuring mething of a Bloch Party. At ast four major works of the wiss-American master have een featured.

This Clipping From
OSWEGO, N. Y.
PALLADIUM-TIMES
DEC 10 1953

Boston Symphony Orchestra 'Broke'

BOSTON (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world-famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Cir. (W 370,017)

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DEC 12 1953

MUSICAL EVENTS

Finding a Needle

Last week, in Carnegie Hall, I found a small, serviceable needle in Dmitri Kabalevsky's Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, which was given its first local performance by the Boston Symphony, under Charles Münch. It is not a work that is likely to save the world, or even astonish it very much. The thing that distinguishes it from most contemporary music is the modest integrity of its aims. Its technique, I am thankful to note, is almost unnoticeable, which is as it should be. Instead of clothing himself in cleverness, Mr. Kabalevsky has the remarkable courage to appear quite naked, as it were, and let his audience share what simple poetic and emotional ideas he has. While these are not, perhaps, overwhelming, they are straightforward, understandable, and altogether engaging. The result is a pleasing composition that makes you like the cello, the orchestra, and Mr. Kabalevsky, and that is, as far as I aware, the most effective work for the cello in nearly half a Mr. Münch conducted it w scrupulous care that is characte him, and an able cellist named Mayes played the solo part with erable distinction.

THE NEW YORKER

51

BOSTON, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1953

Monitor

mbridge— Take t

James Abresch

Ruth Posselt, week-end Symphony soloist

THURSD

Balle

The Boston
tra will give shorter series
Sunday after day evening
Richard Bu
ductor, and G
piano soloist.
The progra sky's ballet certantes,"
Concerto No
Mahler's post phony and To Capriccio.
On Friday
week Charle
[illegible] for the concerts Be [illegible] "L'En

THE JEWISH

ber 10, 1953

Why Boston Symphony Cannot Pay Its Way

Tanglewood Music Center May Be Out By 1955

By CYRUS DURGIN

Most of the best things in life are not free. Most of them have to be paid for, and one of the very best is great music, especially that provided by a first-rank symphonic orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra now finds itself in the position of having to raise approximately $250,000 to meet operating expense for the remainder of this season. Cash reserves have been exhausted. There is no more money left. What would happen if this sum is not raised in the next few months?

"Well, what happens if you can't pay your bills?" asked Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, in his Federal st. office one day last week.

The implication was, you go out of business.

"This is a serious situation," continued Mr. Cabot, "and it will cause grave doubt of future seasons if this sum is not raised. I believe there are people who would step into this emergency and save us. But we don't want a rescue party. We would much prefer continuing support on a broad and solid foundation.

"There is no question of trying to save money by cutting down the size of the orchestra. You do that only when you've assumed that you're going down hill, when you admit that you've become second rate. Nor is there any question of trying to save by eliminating or curtailing the Esplanade concerts.

"There is, however, doubt whether we can operate the Berkshire Music Center beyond this next Summer, and it may be we shall have to run it on a curtailed basis in 1954. We shall know that definitely in a short time. The school at Tanglewood has been a heavy burden, much as we have been proud and glad to operate it."

There you have the whole truth in a few paragraphs. It seems unthinkable that we should ever lose the Boston Symphony, but unthinkable only if we all assume a share of the load and give what we can. That $250,000 must be raised by contribution.

In terms of what it adds to the happiness, the cultural and emotional well-being of literally hundreds of thousands of people, the value of the Boston Symphony is beyond estimate. In terms of ticket prices, the cost to the public is not exceptional. But the expense of maintaining a first rank orchestra, in all its glory of beauty and efficiency, is considerable.

Like all the rest of us the Boston Symphony has been vitally affected by the High Cost of Everything. It is not an exaggeration that public interest in its concerts, here and elsewhere, is greater than ever, and increasing.

The net income for the season of 1952-53 was greater by $206,000 than that for 1951-52. But due to that High Cost of Everything, the total expense of 1952-53 was greater by $71,000 than in the season preceding.

But the Boston Symphony is not merely a fine orchestra which gives concerts in Boston and other cities. It is, and much more importantly, one of the great institutions, cultural and practical, in Boston and New England; in fact, it is a national institution.

If the cultural value is evident, it does not require specialized analysis to find the practical value. In terms of money, the orchestra is an institution which, like the colleges and universities, attracts many of the thousands of students who come here. It is a prime attraction for visitors (the complete Boston Symphony in the Fall and Winter season, the Pops and Esplanade concerts during the warm weather). The Berkshire Festivals now have international repute. In sum, the Boston Symphony is among the major enterprises which give character to this metropolitan centre.

Anything which so functions is worthy—and as many of us believe, entitled—to broad support throughout all social, professional and business layers of the community.

Some shrewd and successful business men may question why symphonic music should be run as a deficit enterprise. Why shouldn't it pay for itself?

The answers are at hand, direct and logical. Because of the essential size and quality of a first class orchestral apparatus, it is a costly enterprise, and cannot live upon its income from ticket sales.

Then why not more concerts? Because there is a definite working maximum which cannot be exceeded without loss of efficiency. The Boston Symphony now gives, in Boston and on tour over the seven months from October through April, upward of 100 concerts. Add to this figure two pension fund concerts annually, about 60 Pops, 18 on the Charles River Esplanade and a dozen or more at Tanglewood, and you have an approximate total of 200. For each of the Friday-Saturday programs in Boston some four rehearsals are necessary.

Why not play in an auditorium with larger seating capacity? Because there is a point, in matter of size, beyond which the sound and power of a first-class orchestra will be diminished. There, again, quality would suffer. The size of Symphony Hall, with its capacity of 2631, is about ideal for symphonic music at its best. Furthermore, the orchestra owns Symphony Hall, and if even by a stretch of imagination, it were considered to play in a larger hall, the cost of creating an acoustically suitable one today would be fantastic.

Unless and until endowments become large enough to provide the income—and that is most unlikely—the solution is obvious. We must plan and conduct campaigns each year to maintain the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its highest peak of artistic and institutional efficiency. Not only this $250,000, but whatever deficits may exist in other years to come. By so doing we not only help music, we help our community and ourselves.

51

65

Cir. (D 541,465) (Sat. 274,[illegible])

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM & SUN

DEC 12 1953

Music, at Least, Not Blacked Out

By LOUIS BI[illegible]

Behind the news blackout, co[illegible] [illegible]rt music went its merry way, [illegible]th New York audiences as re[illegible]onsive as ever and New York [illegible]itics masquerading as music [illegible]vers for a change.

Most dramatic of the readings heard were the "Eroica" Sym[illegible]ony and "Coriolan" overture [illegible] Arturo Toscanini's NBC Beet[illegible]oven broadcast last Sunday. The [illegible]-year-old maestro looked as fit [illegible] a Stradivarius, and he made [illegible]e music sound like all the good [illegible]ws anyone would ever need to [illegible]ear.

Charles Munch preceded him [illegible] a day with Beethoven's "Eroica"" at the Saturday mat[illegible]ee of the Boston Symphony. [illegible]hat was also a stupendous ex[illegible]rience. I happen to be a fanatic [illegible] the subject of Arturo Toscanini, so I'd better not make [illegible]y comparisons. I enjoyed both [illegible]adings, and both are superl[illegible]ve conductors. Suppose I leave [illegible] at that.

Novelties In Boston.

Exciting novelties bristled on [illegible]e Wednesday program of the [illegible]oston Symphony. Included was [illegible] brand-new cello concerto by the [illegible]oviet composer Kabalevsky, [illegible]layed brilliantly by Samuel [illegible]ayes. Concert colleagues of [illegible]r. Mayes will also find [illegible] [illegible]armly melodious, richly appe[illegible] [illegible]g score couched in a straight[illegible]orward folk idiom.

Equally attractive was a New [illegible]oncerto Grosso by Ernest Bloch, [illegible] composer who divides his [illegible] [illegible]d allegiance between the clas[illegible]s and the moderns. The co[illegible]rto represents the [illegible] [illegible]eting of extremes. The pa[illegible]rtnight has been featuring [illegible]mething of a Bloch Party. [illegible] [illegible]ast four major works of th[illegible] [illegible]wiss-American master ha[illegible] [illegible]een featured.

This Clipping From
NYACK, N. Y.
JOURNAL-NEWS

DEC 11 1953

FINANCIAL CAMPAIGN TO AID BOSTON SYMPHONY

BOSTON, (INS)—Business and civic leaders are behind a drive to save one of Boston's biggest attractions, its symphony orchestra. The Boston Symphony needs a quarter of a million dollars to meet its obligation for the current season.

George E. Judd, orchestra manager, said the annual budget for the 104 artists is $1,500,000, and one million of this must be raised from concert receipts. Despite two boosts in ticket prices in the past five years, deficits have consumed all unrestricted legacies and gifts. Judd said $37,000 of this year's income had to go to pay last year's debts.

Cir. (W 370,017)

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 12 1953

MUSICAL EVENTS

Finding a Needle

Last week, in Carnegie Hall, I found a small, serviceable needle in Dmitri Kabalevsky's Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, which was given its first local performance by the Boston Symphony, under Charles Münch. It is not a work that is likely to save the world, or even astonish it very much. The thing that distinguishes it from most contemporary music is the modest integrity of its aims. Its technique, I am thankful to note, is almost unnoticeable, which is as it should be. Instead of clothing himself in cleverness, Mr. Kabalevsky has the remarkable courage to appear quite naked, as it were, and let his audience share what simple poetic and emotional ideas he has. While these are not, perhaps, overwhelming, they are straightforward, understandable, and altogether engaging. The result is a pleasing composition that makes you like the cello, the orchestra, and Mr. Kabalevsky, and that is, as far as I am aware, the most effective work written for the cello in nearly half a century. Mr. Münch conducted it with the scrupulous care that is characteristic of him, and an able cellist named Samuel Mayes played the solo part with considerable distinction.

THE NEW YORKER

Monitor

BOSTON, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1953

[illegible]mbridge— Take t[illegible]

James Abresch

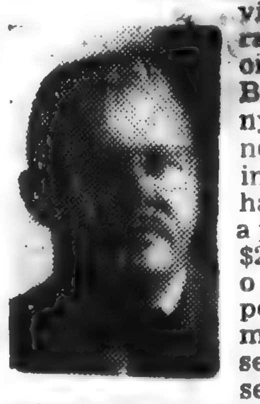
Ruth Posselt, week-end Symphony soloist

Why Boston Symphony Cannot Pay Its Way

Tanglewood Music Center May Be Out By 1955

By CYRUS DURGIN

Most of the best things in life are not free. Most of them have to be paid for, and one of the very best is great music, especially that provided by a first-rank symphonic orchestra.



The Boston Symphony Orchestra now finds itself in the position of having to raise approximately $250,000 to meet operating expense for the remainder of this season. Cash reserves have been exhausted. There is no more money left. What would happen if this sum is not raised in the next few months?

"Well, what happens if you can't pay your bills?" asked Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, in his Federal st. office one day last week.

The implication was, you go out of business.

"This is a serious situation," continued Mr. Cabot, "and it will cause grave doubt of future seasons if this sum is not raised. I believe there are people who would step into this emergency and save us. But we don't want a rescue party. We would much prefer continuing support on a broad and solid foundation.

"There is no question of trying to save money by cutting down the size of the orchestra. You do that only when you've assumed that you're going down hill, when you admit that you've become second rate. Nor is there any question of trying to save by eliminating or curtailing the Esplanade concerts.

"There is, however, doubt whether we can operate the Berkshire Music Center beyond this next Summer, and it may be we shall have to run it on a curtailed basis in 1954. We shall know that definitely in a short time. The school at Tanglewood has been a heavy burden, much as we have been proud and glad to operate it."

There you have the whole truth in a few paragraphs. It seems unthinkable that we should ever lose the Boston Symphony, but unthinkable only if we all assume a share of the load and give what we can. That $250,000 must be raised by contribution.

In terms of what it adds to the happiness, the cultural and emotional well-being of literally hundreds of thousands of people, the value of the Boston Symphony is beyond estimate. In terms of ticket prices, the cost to the public is not exceptional. But the expense of maintaining a first rank orchestra, in all its glory of beauty and efficiency, is considerable.

Like all the rest of us the Boston Symphony has been vitally affected by the High Cost of Everything. It is not an exaggeration that public interest in its concerts, here and elsewhere, is greater than ever, and increasing.

The net income for the season of 1952-53 was greater by $206,000 than that for 1951-52. But due to that High Cost of Everything, the total expense of 1952-53 was greater by $71,000 than in the season preceding.

But the Boston Symphony is not merely a fine orchestra which gives concerts in Boston and other cities. It is, and much more importantly, one of the great institutions, cultural and practical, in Boston and New England; in fact, it is a national institution.

If the cultural value is evident, it does not require specialized analysis to find the practical value. In terms of money, the orchestra is an institution which, like the colleges and universities, attracts many of the thousands of students who come here. It is a prime attraction for visitors (the complete Boston Symphony in the Fall and Winter season, the Pops and Esplanade concerts during the warm weather). The Berkshire Festivals now have international repute. In sum, the Boston Symphony is among the major enterprises which give character to this metropolitan centre.

Anything which so functions is worthy—and as many of us believe, entitled—to broad support throughout all social, professional and business layers of the community.

Some shrewd and successful business men may question why symphonic music should be run as a deficit enterprise. Why shouldn't it pay for itself?

The answers are at hand, direct and logical. Because of the essential size and quality of a first class orchestral apparatus, it is a costly enterprise, and cannot live upon its income from ticket sales.

Then why not more concerts? Because there is a definite working maximum which cannot be exceeded without loss of efficiency. The Boston Symphony now gives, in Boston and on tour over the seven months from October through April, upward of 100 concerts. Add to this figure two pension fund concerts annually, about 60 Pops, 18 on the Charles River Esplanade and a dozen or more at Tanglewood, and you have an approximate total of 200. For each of the Friday-Saturday programs in Boston some four rehearsals are necessary.

Why not play in an auditorium with larger seating capacity? Because there is a point, in matter of size, beyond which the sound and power of a first-class orchestra will be diminished. There, again, quality would suffer. The size of Symphony Hall, with its capacity of 2631, is about ideal for symphonic music at its best. Furthermore, the orchestra owns Symphony Hall, and if even by a stretch of imagination, it were considered to play in a larger hall, the cost of creating an acoustically suitable one today would be fantastic.

Unless and until endowments become large enough to provide the income—and that is most unlikely—the solution is obvious. We must plan and conduct campaigns each year to maintain the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its highest peak of artistic and institutional efficiency. Not only this $250,000, but whatever deficits may exist in other years to come. By so doing we not only help music, we help our community and ourselves.

Cir. (D 541,485) (Sat. 274,711)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM & SUN

DEC 12 1953

Music, at Least Not Blacked

By LOUIS BIA

Behind the news blackout, con rt music went its merry way, th New York audiences as re onsive as ever and New York itics masquerading as music vers for a change.

Most dramatic of the readings heard were the "Eroica" Sym hony and "Coriolan" overture Arturo Toscanini's NBC Beet ven broadcast last Sunday. The -year-old maestro looked as fit a Stradivarius, and he made e music sound like all the good ews anyone would ever need to ar.

Charles Munch preceded him y a day with Beethoven's Eroica"" at the Saturday mat ee of the Boston Symphony hat was also a stupendous ex rience. I happen to be a fanatic the subject of Arturo To nini, so I'd better not make y comparisons. I enjoyed both adings, and both are superl ve conductors. Suppose I leave at that.

Novelties In Boston.

Exciting novelties bristled e Wednesday program of th oston Symphony. Included wa brand-new cello concerto by oviet composer Kabalevsk ayed brilliantly by Sam ayes. Concert colleagues r. Mayes will also find armly melodious, richly ap g score couched in a strai rward folk idiom.

Equally attractive was a ncerto Grosso by Ernest Bl omposer who divides his l allegiance between the s and the moderns. The rto represents the pe eeting of extremes. The rtnight has been feat mething of a Bloch Party ast four major works c wiss-American master een featured.

This Clipping From
BANGOR, ME.
COMMERCIAL

DEC 10 1953

World-Famous N. E. Orchestra Nearly Broke

BOSTON (AP) — Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's trustees, said: "We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need one quarter million dollars to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of this season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Cir. (W 370,017)

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 12 1953

MUSICAL EVENTS

Finding a Needle

Last week, in Carnegie Hall, I found a small, serviceable needle in Dmitri Kabalevsky's Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, which was given its first local performance by the Boston Symphony, under Charles Münch. It is not a work that is likely to save the world, or even astonish it very much. The thing that distinguishes it from most contemporary music is the modest integrity of its aims. Its technique, I am thankful to note, is almost unnoticeable, which is as it should be. Instead of clothing himself in cleverness, Mr. Kabalevsky has the remarkable courage to appear quite naked, as it were, and let his audience share what simple poetic and emotional ideas he has. While these are not, perhaps, overwhelming, they are straightforward, understandable, and altogether engaging. The result is a pleasing composition that makes you like the cello, the orchestra, and Mr. Kabalevsky, and that is, as far as I am aware, the most effective work written for the cello in nearly half a century. Mr. Münch conducted it with the scrupulous care that is characteristic of him, and an able cellist named Samuel Mayes played the solo part with considerable distinction.

THE NEW YORKER

51

65

Monitor

BOSTON, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1953

umbridge—Take t

James Abresch

Ruth Posselt, week-end Symphony soloist

Why Boston Symphony Cannot Pay Its Way

Tanglewood Music Center May Be Out By 1955

By CYRUS DURGIN

Most of the best things in life are not free. Most of them have to be paid for, and one of the very best is great music, especially that provided by a first-rank symphonic orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra now finds itself in the position of having to raise approximately $250,000 to meet operating expense for the remainder of this season. Cash reserves have been exhausted. There is no more money left. What would happen if this sum is not raised in the next few months?

"Well, what happens if you can't pay your bills?" asked Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, in his Federal st. office one day last week.

The implication was, you go out of business.

"This is a serious situation," continued Mr. Cabot, "and it will cause grave doubt of future seasons if this sum is not raised. I believe there are people who would step into this emergency and save us. But we don't want a rescue party. We would much prefer continuing support on a broad and solid foundation.

"There is no question of trying to save money by cutting down the size of the orchestra. You do that only when you've assumed that you're going down hill, when you admit that you've become second rate. Nor is there any question of trying to save by eliminating or curtailing the Esplanade concerts.

"There is, however, doubt whether we can operate the Berkshire Music Center beyond this next Summer, and it may be we shall have to run it on a curtailed basis in 1954. We shall know that definitely in a short time. The school at Tanglewood has been a heavy burden, much as we have been proud and glad to operate it."

There you have the whole truth in a few paragraphs. It seems unthinkable that we should ever lose the Boston Symphony, but unthinkable only if we all assume a share of the load and give what we can. That $250,000 must be raised by contribution.

In terms of what it adds to the happiness, the cultural and emotional well-being of literally hundreds of thousands of people, the value of the Boston Symphony is beyond estimate. In terms of ticket prices, the cost to the public is not exceptional. But the expense of maintaining a first rank orchestra, in all its glory of beauty and efficiency, is considerable.

Like all the rest of us the Boston Symphony has been vitally affected by the High Cost of Everything. It is not an exaggeration that public interest in its concerts, here and elsewhere, is greater than ever, and increasing.

The net income for the season of 1952-53 was greater by $206,000 than that for 1951-52. But due to that High Cost of Everything, the total expense of 1952-53 was greater by $71,000 than in the season preceding.

But the Boston Symphony is not merely a fine orchestra which gives concerts in Boston and other cities. It is, and much more importantly, one of the great institutions, cultural and practical, in Boston and New England; in fact, it is a national institution.

If the cultural value is evident, it does not require specialized analysis to find the practical value. In terms of money, the orchestra is an institution which, like the colleges and universities, attracts many of the thousands of students who come here. It is a prime attraction for visitors (the complete Boston Symphony in the Fall and Winter season, the Pops and Esplanade concerts during the warm weather). The Berkshire Festivals now have international repute. In sum, the Boston Symphony is among the major enterprises which give character to this metropolitan centre.

Anything which so functions is worthy—and as many of us believe, entitled—to broad support throughout all social, professional and business layers of the community.

Some shrewd and successful business men may question why symphonic music should be run as a deficit enterprise. Why shouldn't it pay for itself?

The answers are at hand, direct and logical. Because of the essential size and quality of a first class orchestral apparatus, it is a costly enterprise, and cannot live upon its income from ticket sales.

Then why not more concerts? Because there is a definite working maximum which cannot be exceeded without loss of efficiency. The Boston Symphony now gives, in Boston and on tour over the seven months from October through April, upward of 100 concerts. Add to this figure two pension fund concerts annually, about 60 Pops, 18 on the Charles River Esplanade and a dozen or more at Tanglewood, and you have an approximate total of 200. For each of the Friday-Saturday programs in Boston some four rehearsals are necessary.

Why not play in an auditorium with larger seating capacity? Because there is a point, in matter of size, beyond which the sound and power of a first-class orchestra will be diminished. There, again, quality would suffer. The size of Symphony Hall, with its capacity of 2631, is about ideal for symphonic music at its best. Furthermore, the orchestra owns Symphony Hall, and if even by a stretch of imagination, it were considered to play in a larger hall, the cost of creating an acoustically suitable one today would be fantastic.

Unless and until endowments become large enough to provide the income—and that is most unlikely—the solution is obvious. We must plan and conduct campaigns each year to maintain the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its highest peak of artistic and institutional efficiency. Not only this $250,000, but whatever deficits may exist in other years to come. By so doing we not only help music, we help our community and ourselves.

65

Cir. (D 541,485) (Sat. 274,741)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM & SUN
DEC 12 1953

Music, at Le… Not Blacked…

By LOUIS BI…

Behind the news blackout, con… …rt music went its merry way, … …th New York audiences as re…onsive as ever and New York …itics masquerading as music …vers for a change.

Most dramatic of the readings heard were the "Eroica" Sym…hony and "Coriolan" overture … Arturo Toscanini's NBC Beet…oven broadcast last Sunday. The …-year-old maestro looked as fit … a Stradivarius, and he made … music sound like all the good …ws anyone would ever need to …ar.

Charles Munch preceded him … a day with Beethoven's "Eroica" at the Saturday mat…ee of the Boston Symphony … that was also a stupendous ex…erience. I happen to be a fana… … the subject of Arturo To…nini, so I'd better not make …y comparisons. I enjoyed both …adings, and both are superl…ve conductors. Suppose I leav… at that.

Novelties In Boston.

Exciting novelties bristled o… …e Wednesday program of th… …oston Symphony. Included w… brand-new cello concerto by t… …oviet composer Kabalevs… …layed brilliantly by Sam… …ayes. Concert colleagues … …r. Mayes will also find … …armly melodious, richly app… …g score couched in a strai…orward folk idiom.

Equally attractive was a … …ncerto Grosso by Ernest Bl… composer who divides his … …d allegiance between the … …s and the moderns. The … …rto represents the … …eeting of extremes. Th… …rtnight has been fe… …mething of a Bloch Pa… …ast four major works … …wiss-American master … …een featured.

This Clipping From
GLOVERSVILLE, N. Y.
LEADER-REPUBLICAN
DEC 10 1953

Boston Symphony Orchestra 'Broke'

BOSTON (AP) — Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world-famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists. …, Cabot told the group, orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

Cir. (W 370,617)

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DEC 12 1953

MUSICAL EVENT…

Finding a Needle

Last week, in Carnegie Hall, I found a small, serviceable needle in Dmitri Kabalevsky's Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, which was given its first local performance by the Boston Symphony, under Charles Münch. It is not a work that is likely to save the world, or even astonish it very much. The thing that distinguishes it from most contemporary music is the modest integrity of its aims. Its technique, I am thankful to note, is almost unnoticeable, which is as it should be. Instead of clothing him… in cleverness, Mr. Kabalevsky has … the remarkable courage to appear qu… naked, as it were, and let his audi… share what simple poetic and emotional ideas he has. While these are not, perhaps, overwhelming, they are straight… forward, understandable, and altogether engaging. The result is a pleasing composition that makes you li… the cello, the orchestra, and Mr. Kabalevsky, and that is, as far as I a… aware, the most effective work writt… for the cello in nearly half a centur… Mr. Münch conducted it with th… scrupulous care that is characteristic o… him, and an able cellist named Samu… Mayes played the solo part with considerable distinction.

THE NEW YORKER

51

Monitor

BOSTON, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1953

…mbridge—Take t…

James Abresch

Ruth Posselt, week-end Symphony soloist

THURSD…

Balle…

The Boston … tra will give … shorter serie… Sunday after… day evening… … Richard Bu… ductor, and … piano soloist.

The progr… sky's ballet … certantes," … Concerto No. … Mahler's pos… phony and To… Capriccio …

On Friday … week Charle… … for the … concerts Be… …torio, "L'E…

Why Boston Symphony Cannot Pay Its Way

Tanglewood Music Center May Be Out By 1955

By CYRUS DURGIN

Most of the best things in life are not free. Most of them have to be paid for, and one of the very best is great music, especially that provided by a first-rank symphonic orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra now finds itself in the position of having to raise approximately $250,000 to meet operating expense for the remainder of this season. Cash reserves have been exhausted. There is no more money left. What would happen if this sum is not raised in the next few months?

"Well, what happens if you can't pay your bills?" asked Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, in his Federal st. office one day last week.

The implication was, you go out of business.

"This is a serious situation," continued Mr. Cabot, "and it will cause grave doubt of future seasons if this sum is not raised. I believe there are people who would step into this emergency and save us. But we don't want a rescue party. We would much prefer continuing support on a broad and solid foundation.

"There is no question of trying to save money by cutting down the size of the orchestra. You do that only when you've assumed that you're going down hill, when you admit that you've become second rate. Nor is there any question of trying to save by eliminating or curtailing the Esplanade concerts.

"There is, however, doubt whether we can operate the Berkshire Music Center beyond this next Summer, and it may be we shall have to run it on a curtailed basis in 1954. We shall know that definitely in a short time. The school at Tanglewood has been a heavy burden, much as we have been proud and glad to operate it."

There you have the whole truth in a few paragraphs. It seems unthinkable that we should ever lose the Boston Symphony, but unthinkable only if we all assume a share of the load and give what we can. That $250,000 must be raised by contribution.

In terms of what it adds to the happiness, the cultural and emotional well-being of literally hundreds of thousands of people, the value of the Boston Symphony is beyond estimate. In terms of ticket prices, the cost to the public is not exceptional. But the expense of maintaining a first rank orchestra, in all its glory of beauty and efficiency, is considerable.

Like all the rest of us the Boston Symphony has been vitally affected by the High Cost of Everything. It is not an exaggeration that public interest in its concerts, here and elsewhere, is greater than ever, and increasing.

The net income for the season of 1952-53 was greater by $206,000 than that for 1951-52. But due to that High Cost of Everything, the total expense of 1952-53 was greater by $71,000 than in the season preceding.

But the Boston Symphony is not merely a fine orchestra which gives concerts in Boston and other cities. It is, and much more importantly, one of the great institutions, cultural and practical, in Boston and New England; in fact, it is a national institution.

If the cultural value is evident, it does not require specialized analysis to find the practical value. In terms of money, the orchestra is an institution which, like the colleges and universities, attracts many of the thousands of students who come here. It is a prime attraction for visitors (the complete Boston Symphony in the Fall and Winter season, the Pops and Esplanade concerts during the warm weather). The Berkshire Festivals now have international repute. In sum, the Boston Symphony is among the major enterprises which give character to this metropolitan centre.

Anything which so functions is worthy—and as many of us believe, entitled—to broad support throughout all social, professional and business layers of the community.

Some shrewd and successful business men may question why symphonic music should be run as a deficit enterprise. Why shouldn't it pay for itself?

The answers are at hand, direct and logical. Because of the essential size and quality of a first class orchestral apparatus, it is a costly enterprise, and cannot live upon its income from ticket sales.

Then why not more concerts? Because there is a definite working maximum which cannot be exceeded without loss of efficiency. The Boston Symphony now gives, in Boston and on tour over the seven months from October through April, upward of 100 concerts. Add to this figure two pension fund concerts annually, about 60 Pops, 18 on the Charles River Esplanade and a dozen or more at Tanglewood, and you have an approximate total of 200. For each of the Friday-Saturday programs in Boston some four rehearsals are necessary.

Why not play in an auditorium with larger seating capacity? Because there is a point, in matter of size, beyond which the sound and power of a first-class orchestra will be diminished. There, again, quality would suffer. The size of Symphony Hall, with its capacity of 2631, is about ideal for symphonic music at its best. Furthermore, the orchestra owns Symphony Hall, and if even by a stretch of imagination, it were considered to play in a larger hall, the cost of creating an acoustically suitable one today would be fantastic.

Unless and until endowments become large enough to provide the income—and that is most unlikely—the solution is obvious. We must plan and conduct campaigns each year to maintain the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its highest peak of artistic and institutional efficiency. Not only this $250,000, but whatever deficits may exist in other years to come. By so doing we not only help music, we help our community and ourselves.

51 65

Cir. (D 541,485) (Sat. 274,741)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM & SUN

DEC 12 1953

usic, at ot Black

By LOUIS

nd the news blackout, co
usic went its merry way,
New York audiences as re
ve as ever and New York masquerading as music
for a change.

t dramatic of the readings
d were the "Eroica" Symand "Coriolan" overture rturo Toscanini's NBC Beet-n broadcast last Sunday. The ar-old maestro looked as fit Stradivarius, and he made music sound like all the good anyone would ever need to harles Munch preceded him

a day with Beethoven's oica"" at the Saturday mat-of the Boston Symphony.
was also a stupendous ex-ence. I happen to be a fan the subject of Arturo To ni, so I'd better not ma comparisons. I enjoyed bo ings, and both are superi conductors. Suppose I leav t that.

Novelties In Boston.

Exciting novelties bristled
Wednesday program of t ston Symphony. Included w brand-new cello concerto by viet composer Kabalevs yed brilliantly by Sa
yes. Concert colleague
. Mayes will also find rmly melodious, richly ap score couched in a strai
rward folk idiom.

Equally attractive was a ncerto Grosso by Ernest Bl composer who divides his d allegiance between the s and the moderns. The rto represents the eting of extremes. Th
rtnight has been fe
omething of a Bloch Pa
ast four major works
wiss-American master
een featured.

This Clipping From
KEENE, N. H.
SENTINEL

DEC 10 1953

Boston Symphony Reported Broke

BOSTON (AP) — Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need one quarter million dollars to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of this season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group, orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

Cir. (W 370,917)

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 12 1953

MUSICAL EVENTS

Finding a Needle

Last week, in Carnegie Hall, I found a small, serviceable needle in Dmitri Kabalevsky's Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, which was given its first local performance by the Boston Symphony, under Charles Münch. It is not a work that is likely to save the world, or even astonish it very much. The thing that distinguishes it from most contemporary music is the modest integrity of its aims. Its technique, I am thankful to note, is almost unnoticeable, which is as it should be. Instead of clothing himself in cleverness, Mr. Kabalevsky has the remarkable courage to appear quite naked, as it were, and let his audience share what simple poetic and emotional ideas he has. While these are not, perhaps, overwhelming, they are straightforward, understandable, and altogether engaging. The result is a pleasing composition that makes you like the cello, the orchestra, and Mr. Kabalevsky, and that is, as far as I am aware, the most effective work written for the cello in nearly half a century. Mr. Münch conducted it with the scrupulous care that is characteristic of him, and an able cellist named Samuel Mayes played the solo part with considerable distinction.

THE NEW YORKER

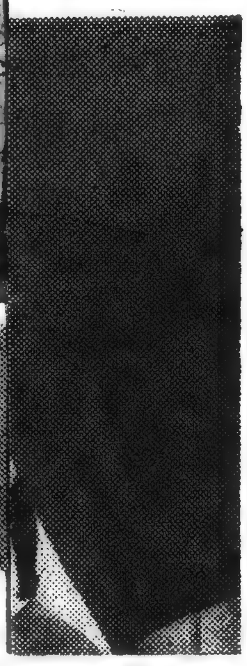
Monitor

BOSTON, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1953

mbridge—Take t

James Abresch
Ruth Posselt, week-end Symphony soloist



Why Boston Symphony Cannot Pay Its Way

Tanglewood Music Center May Be Out By 1955

By CYRUS DURGIN

Most of the best things in life are not free. Most of them have to be paid for, and one of the very best is great music, especially that provided by a first-rank symphonic orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra now finds itself in the position of having to raise approximately $250,000 to meet operating expense for the remainder of this season. Cash reserves have been exhausted. There is no more money left. What would happen if this sum is not raised in the next few months?

"Well, what happens if you can't pay your bills?" asked Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, in his Federal st. office one day last week.

The implication was, you go out of business.

"This is a serious situation," continued Mr. Cabot, "and it will cause grave doubt of future seasons if this sum is not raised. I believe there are people who would step into this emergency and save us. But we don't want a rescue party. We would much prefer continuing support on a broad and solid foundation.

"There is no question of trying to save money by cutting down the size of the orchestra. You do that only when you've assumed that you're going down hill, when you admit that you've become second rate. Nor is there any question of trying to save by eliminating or curtailing the Esplanade concerts.

"There is, however, doubt whether we can operate the Berkshire Music Center beyond this next Summer, and it may be we shall have to run it on a curtailed basis in 1954. We shall know that definitely in a short time. The school at Tanglewood has been a heavy burden, much as we have been proud and glad to operate it."

There you have the whole truth in a few paragraphs. It seems unthinkable that we should ever lose the Boston Symphony, but unthinkable only if we all assume a share of the load and give what we can. That $250,000 must be raised by contribution.

In terms of what it adds to the happiness, the cultural and emotional well-being of literally hundreds of thousands of people, the value of the Boston Symphony is beyond estimate. In terms of ticket prices, the cost to the public is not exceptional. But the expense of maintaining a first rank orchestra, in all its glory of beauty and efficiency, is considerable.

Like all the rest of us the Boston Symphony has been vitally affected by the High Cost of Everything. It is not an exaggeration that public interest in its concerts, here and elsewhere, is greater than ever, and increasing.

The net income for the season of 1952-53 was greater by $206,000 than that for 1951-52. But due to that High Cost of Everything, the total expense of 1952-53 was greater by $71,000 than in the season preceding.

But the Boston Symphony is not merely a fine orchestra which gives concerts in Boston and other cities. It is, and much more importantly, one of the great institutions, cultural and practical, in Boston and New England; in fact, it is a national institution.

If the cultural value is evident, it does not require specialized analysis to find the practical value. In terms of money, the orchestra is an institution which, like the colleges and universities, attracts many of the thousands of students who come here. It is a prime attraction for visitors (the complete Boston Symphony in the Fall and Winter season, the Pops and Esplanade concerts during the warm weather). The Berkshire Festivals now have international repute. In sum, the Boston Symphony is among the major enterprises which give character to this metropolitan centre.

Anything which so functions is worthy—and as many of us believe, entitled—to broad support throughout all social, professional and business layers of the community.

Some shrewd and successful business men may question why symphonic music should be run as a deficit enterprise. Why shouldn't it pay for itself?

The answers are at hand, direct and logical. Because of the essential size and quality of a first class orchestral apparatus, it is a costly enterprise, and cannot live upon its income from ticket sales.

Then why not more concerts? Because there is a definite working maximum which cannot be exceeded without loss of efficiency. The Boston Symphony now gives, in Boston and on tour over the seven months from October through April, upward of 100 concerts. Add to this figure two pension fund concerts annually, about 60 Pops, 18 on the Charles River Esplanade and a dozen or more at Tanglewood, and you have an approximate total of 200. For each of the Friday-Saturday programs in Boston some four rehearsals are necessary.

Why not play in an auditorium with larger seating capacity? Because there is a point, in matter of size, beyond which the sound and power of a first-class orchestra will be diminished. There, again, quality would suffer. The size of Symphony Hall, with its capacity of 2631, is about ideal for symphonic music at its best. Furthermore, the orchestra owns Symphony Hall, and if even by a stretch of imagination, it were considered to play in a larger hall, the cost of creating an acoustically suitable one today would be fantastic.

Unless and until endowments become large enough to provide the income—and that is most unlikely—the solution is obvious. We must plan and conduct campaigns each year to maintain the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its highest peak of artistic and institutional efficiency. Not only this $250,000, but whatever deficits may exist in other years to come. By so doing we not only help music, we help our community and ourselves.

Cir. (D 541,485) (Sat. 274,741)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM & SUN

DEC

Music, at Not Black

By LOUIS B

ind the news blackout, con music went its merry way. New York audiences as re ive as ever and New York s masquerading as music s for a change.

t dramatic of the readings rd were the "Eroica" Sym y and "Coriolan" overture Arturo Toscanini's NBC Beet n broadcast last Sunday. The ear-old maestro looked as fit Stradivarius, and he made music sound like all the good s anyone would ever need to r.

harles Munch preceded him a day with Beethoven's oica"" at the Saturday mat of the Boston Symphony. t was also a stupendous ex ience. I happen to be a fanatic the subject of Arturo Tos ini, so I'd better not make comparisons. I enjoyed both dings, and both are superb conductors. Suppose I leave t that.

Novelties In Boston.

Exciting novelties bristled o e Wednesday program of th oston Symphony. Included w brand-new cello concerto by t viet composer Kabalevs layed brilliantly by Sam ayes. Concert colleagues r. Mayes will also find armly melodious, richly app g score couched in a strai rward folk idiom.

Equally attractive was a T ncerto Grosso by Ernest Blo omposer who divides his allegiance between the s and the moderns. The rto represents the eeting of extremes. The rtnight has been fea mething of a Bloch Part ast four major works wiss-American master een featured.

Szell at Philharmonic

This Clipping From
BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE & TIMES
DEC 10 1953

Boston Symphony Reported 'Broke'

BOSTON. — (AP) — Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves and there is just no money left.

"We need one quarter million dollars to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of this season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations Cabot told the group orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2500.

Cir. (W 370,017)

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 12 1953

MUSICAL EVENTS

Finding a Needle

Last week, in Carnegie Hall, I found a small, serviceable needle in Dmitri Kabalevsky's Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, which was given its first local performance by the Boston Symphony, under Charles Münch. It is not a work that is likely to save the world, or even astonish it very much. The thing that distinguishes it from most contemporary music is the modest integrity of its aims. Its technique, I am thankful to note, is almost unnoticeable, which is as it should be. Instead of clothing himself in cleverness, Mr. Kabalevsky has had the remarkable courage to appear quite naked, as it were, and let his audience share what simple poetic and emotional ideas he has. While these are not, perhaps, overwhelming, they are straightforward, understandable, and altogether engaging. The result is a pleasing composition that makes you like the cello, the orchestra, and Mr. Kabalevsky, and that is, as far as I am aware, the most effective work written for the cello in nearly half a century. Mr. Münch conducted it with the scrupulous care that is characteristic of him, and an able cellist named Samuel Mayes played the solo part with considerable distinction.

THE NEW YORKER

51

Monitor

BOSTON, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1953

mbridge—Take t

James Abresch

Ruth Posselt, week-end Symphony soloist

Why Boston Symphony Cannot Pay Its Way

Tanglewood Music Center May Be Out By 1955

By CYRUS DURGIN

Most of the best things in life are not free. Most of them have to be paid for, and one of the very best is great music, especially that provided by a first-rank symphonic orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra now finds itself in the position of having to raise approximately $250,000 to meet operating expense for the remainder of this season. Cash reserves have been exhausted. There is no more money left. What would happen if this sum is not raised in the next few months?

"Well, what happens if you can't pay your bills?" asked Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, in his Federal st. office one day last week.

The implication was, you go out of business.

"This is a serious situation," continued Mr. Cabot, "and it will cause grave doubt of future seasons if this sum is not raised. I believe there are people who would step into this emergency and save us. But we don't want a rescue party. We would much prefer continuing support on a broad and solid foundation.

"There is no question of trying to save money by cutting down the size of the orchestra. You do that only when you've assumed that you're going down hill, when you admit that you've become second rate. Nor is there any question of trying to save by eliminating or curtailing the Esplanade concerts.

"There is, however, doubt whether we can operate the Berkshire Music Center beyond this next Summer, and it may be we shall have to run it on a curtailed basis in 1954. We shall know that definitely in a short time. The school at Tanglewood has been a heavy burden, much as we have been proud and glad to operate it."

There you have the whole truth in a few paragraphs. It seems unthinkable that we should ever lose the Boston Symphony, but unthinkable only if we all assume a share of the load and give what we can. That $250,000 must be raised by contribution.

In terms of what it adds to the happiness, the cultural and emotional well-being of literally hundreds of thousands of people, the value of the Boston Symphony is beyond estimate. In terms of ticket prices, the cost to the public is not exceptional. But the expense of maintaining a first rank orchestra, in all its glory of beauty and efficiency, is considerable.

Like all the rest of us the Boston Symphony has been vitally affected by the High Cost of Everything. It is not an exaggeration that public interest in its concerts, here and elsewhere, is greater than ever, and increasing. The net income for the season of 1952-53 was greater by $206,000 than that for 1951-52. But due to that High Cost of Everything, the total expense of 1952-53 was greater by $71,000 than in the season preceding.

But the Boston Symphony is not merely a fine orchestra which gives concerts in Boston and other cities. It is, and much more importantly, one of the great institutions, cultural and practical, in Boston and New England; in fact, it is a national institution.

If the cultural value is evident, it does not require specialized analysis to find the practical value. In terms of money, the orchestra is an institution which, like the colleges and universities, attracts many of the thousands of students who come here. It is a prime attraction for visitors (the complete Boston Symphony in the Fall and Winter season, the Pops and Esplanade concerts during the warm weather). The Berkshire Festivals now have international repute. In sum, the Boston Symphony is among the major enterprises which give character to this metropolitan centre.

Anything which so functions is worthy—and as many of us believe, entitled—to broad support throughout all social, professional and business layers of the community.

Some shrewd and successful business men may question why symphonic music should be run as a deficit enterprise. Why shouldn't it pay for itself?

The answers are at hand, direct and logical. Because of the essential size and quality of a first class orchestral apparatus, it is a costly enterprise, and cannot live upon its income from ticket sales.

Then why not more concerts? Because there is a definite working maximum which cannot be exceeded without loss of efficiency. The Boston Symphony now gives, in Boston and on tour over the seven months from October through April, upward of 100 concerts. Add to this figure two pension fund concerts annually, about 60 Pops, 18 on the Charles River Esplanade and a dozen or more at Tanglewood, and you have an approximate total of 200. For each of the Friday-Saturday programs in Boston some four rehearsals are necessary.

Why not play in an auditorium with larger seating capacity? Because there is a point, in matter of size, beyond which the sound and power of a first-class orchestra will be diminished. There, again, quality would suffer. The size of Symphony Hall, with its capacity of 2631, is about ideal for symphonic music at its best. Furthermore, the orchestra owns Symphony Hall, and if even by a stretch of imagination, it were considered to play in a larger hall, the cost of creating an acoustically suitable one today would be fantastic.

Unless and until endowments become large enough to provide the income—and that is most unlikely—the solution is obvious. We must plan and conduct campaigns each year to maintain the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its highest peak of artistic and institutional efficiency. Not only this $250,000, but whatever deficits may exist in other years to come. By so doing we not only help music, we help our community and ourselves.

51

Cir. (D 541,485)

This Clipping
NEW YORK
WORLD-TELEG
DEC

usic, at ot Black

By LOUIS BI

nd the news blackout, con usic went its merry way, New York audiences as re ve as ever and New York masquerading as music for a change.

t dramatic of the readings rd were the "Eroica" Sym and "Coriolan" overture rturo Toscanini's NBC Beet broadcast last Sunday. The ar-old maestro looked as fit Stradivarius, and he made music sound like all the good anyone would ever need to arles Munch preceded him a day with Beethoven's ica"" at the Saturday mat of the Boston Symphony. was also a stupendous ex ence. I happen to be a fanatic the subject of Arturo Tos ni, so I'd better not make comparisons. I enjoyed both ings, and both are superl conductors. Suppose I leave t that.

Novelties In Boston.

Exciting novelties bristled o Wednesday program of th ston Symphony. Included w rand-new cello concerto by t viet composer Kabalevs yed brilliantly by Sam yes. Concert colleagues . Mayes will also find rmly melodious, richly app score couched in a strai ward folk idiom.

Equally attractive was a ncerto Grosso by Ernest Bl composer who divides his l allegiance between the s and the moderns. The rto represents the p eeting of extremes. The rtnight has been fe mething of a Bloch Part ast four major works wiss-American master en featured.

This Clipping From
PORTSMOUTH, N. H.
HERALD

DEC 10 1953

Boston Symphony On Financial Rocks

BOSTON (AP) — Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and ther is just no money left .

"We need one quarter million dollars to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of this season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group, orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

Cir. (W 370,017)

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 12 1953

MUSICAL EVENT

Finding a Needle

Last week, in Carnegie Hall, I found a small, serviceable needle in Dmitri Kabalevsky's Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, which was given its first local performance by the Boston Symphony, under Charles Münch. It is not a work that is likely to save the world, or even astonish it very much. The thing that distinguishes it from most contemporary music is the modest integrity of its aims. Its technique, I am thankful to note, is almost unnoticeable, which is as it should be. Instead of clothing him in cleverness, Mr. Kabalevsky has the remarkable courage to appear qu naked, as it were, and let his audi share what simple poetic and emotional ideas he has. While these are not, perhaps, overwhelming, they are straight forward, understandable, and altogether engaging. The result is a pleasing composition that makes you li the cello, the orchestra, and Mr. Kabalevsky, and that is, as far as I a aware, the most effective work writt for the cello in nearly half a century. Mr. Münch conducted it with th scrupulous care that is characteristic o him, and an able cellist named Samue Mayes played the solo part with considerable distinction.

THE NEW YORKER

Monitor

BOSTON, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1953

mbridge— Take t

James Abresch

Ruth Posselt, week-end Symphony soloist

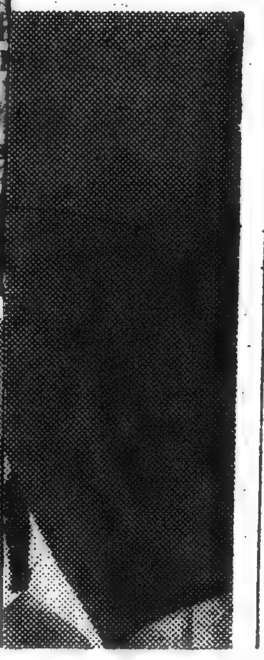
THURSDA

Ballet

The Boston tra will give shorter series Sunday aftern day evening ichard Bu ductor, and G piano soloist.

The progra sky's ballet certantes, Concerto No Mahler's post phony and Tc Capriccio.

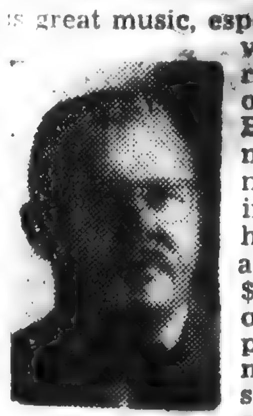
On Friday week Charles ... for the concerts Ber torio, "L'En



Why Boston Symphony Cannot Pay Its Way

Tanglewood Music Center May Be Out By 1955

By CYRUS DURGIN



Most of the best things in life are not free. Most of them have to be paid for, and one of the very best is great music, especially that provided by a first-rank symphonic orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra now finds itself in the position of having to raise approximately $250,000 to meet operating expense for the remainder of this season. Cash reserves have been exhausted. There is no more money left. What would happen if this sum is not raised in the next few months?

"Well, what happens if you can't pay your bills?" asked Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, in his Federal st. office one day last week.

The implication was, you go out of business.

"This is a serious situation," continued Mr. Cabot, "and it will cause grave doubt of future seasons if this sum is not raised. I believe there are people who would step into this emergency and save us. But we don't want a rescue party. We would much prefer continuing support on a broad and solid foundation.

"There is no question of trying to save money by cutting down the size of the orchestra. You do that only when you've assumed that you're going down hill, when you admit that you've become second rate. Nor is there any question of trying to save by eliminating or curtailing the Esplanade concerts.

"There is, however, doubt whether we can operate the Berkshire Music Center beyond this next Summer, and it may be we shall have to run it on a curtailed basis in 1954. We shall know that definitely in a short time. The school at Tanglewood has been a heavy burden, much as we have been proud and glad to operate it."

There you have the whole truth in a few paragraphs. It seems unthinkable that we should ever lose the Boston Symphony, but unthinkable only if we all assume a share of the load and give what we can. That $250,000 must be raised by contribution.

In terms of what it adds to the happiness, the cultural and emotional well-being of literally hundreds of thousands of people, the value of the Boston Symphony is beyond estimate. In terms of ticket prices, the cost to the public is not exceptional. But the expense of maintaining a first rank orchestra, in all its glory of beauty and efficiency, is considerable.

Like all the rest of us the Boston Symphony has been vitally affected by the High Cost of Everything. It is not an exaggeration that public interest in its concerts, here and elsewhere, is greater than ever, and increasing.

The net income for the season of 1952-53 was greater by $206,000 than that for 1951-52. But due to that High Cost of Everything, the total expense of 1952-53 was greater by $71,000 than in the season preceding.

But the Boston Symphony is not merely a fine orchestra which gives concerts in Boston and other cities. It is, and much more importantly, one of the great institutions, cultural and practical, in Boston and New England; in fact, it is a national institution.

If the cultural value is evident, it does not require specialized analysis to find the practical value. In terms of money, the orchestra is an institution which, like the colleges and universities, attracts many of the thousands of students who come here. It is a prime attraction for visitors (the complete Boston Symphony in the Fall and Winter season, the Pops and Esplanade concerts during the warm weather). The Berkshire Festivals now have international repute. In sum, the Boston Symphony is among the major enterprises which give character to this metropolitan centre.

Anything which so functions is worthy—and as many of us believe, entitled—to broad support throughout all social, professional and business layers of the community.

Some shrewd and successful business men may question why symphonic music should be run as a deficit enterprise. Why shouldn't it pay for itself?

The answers are at hand, direct and logical. Because of the essential size and quality of a first class orchestral apparatus, it is a costly enterprise, and cannot live upon its income from ticket sales.

Then why not more concerts? Because there is a definite working maximum which cannot be exceeded without loss of efficiency. The Boston Symphony now gives, in Boston and on tour over the seven months from October through April, upward of 100 concerts. Add to this figure two pension fund concerts annually, about 60 Pops, 18 on the Charles River Esplanade and a dozen or more at Tanglewood, and you have an approximate total of 200. For each of the Friday-Saturday programs in Boston some four rehearsals are necessary.

Why not play in an auditorium with larger seating capacity? Because there is a point, in matter of size, beyond which the sound and power of a first-class orchestra will be diminished. There, again, quality would suffer. The size of Symphony Hall, with its capacity of 2631, is about ideal for symphonic music at its best. Furthermore, the orchestra owns Symphony Hall, and if even by a stretch of imagination, it were considered to play in a larger hall, the cost of creating an acoustically suitable one today would be fantastic.

Unless and until endowments become large enough to provide the income—and that is most unlikely—the solution is obvious. We must plan and conduct campaigns each year to maintain the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its highest peak of artistic and institutional efficiency. Not only this $250,000, but whatever deficits may exist in other years to come. By so doing we not only help music, we help our community and ourselves.

51

65

Cir. (D 541,485)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK
WORLD-TELEG

DEC 1

Music, at L ot Blacke

By LOUIS BIA

ind the news blackout, con music went its merry way, New York audiences as re- lve as ever and New York s masquerading as music for a change.

t dramatic of the readings rd were the "Eroica" Sym- y and "Coriolan" overture rturo Toscanini's NBC Beet- n broadcast last Sunday. The ear-old maestro looked as fit Stradivarius, and he made music sound like all the good anyone would ever need to arles Munch preceded him a day with Beethoven's ica"" at the Saturday mat- of the Boston Symphony. was also a stupendous ex- ence. I happen to be a fanatic the subject of Arturo Tos ni, so I'd better not make comparisons. I enjoyed both ings, and both are superl conductors. Suppose I leav t that.

Novelties In Boston.

Exciting novelties bristled Wednesday program of ston Symphony. Included rand-new cello concerto by viet composer Kabalev yed brilliantly by Sa yes. Concert colleagu . Mayes will also find rmly melodious, richly app score couched in a strai ward folk idiom.

Equally attractive was a ncerto Grosso by Ernest B omposer who divides his allegiance between s and the moderns. to represents the eting of extremes. rtnight has been mething of a Bloch F ast four major work wiss-American mast en featured.

Szell at Philh

This Clipping From
BIDDEFORD, ME.
JOURNAL

DEC 10 1953

Boston Symphony Orchestra Broke, Say Its Officials

Boston, Dec. 10—(AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world-famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's trustees, said: "We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need one-quarter million dollars to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of this season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raiisng donations, Cabot told the group, orchestra officials have worked out a "premium- advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

Cir. (W 370,017)

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 12 1953

MUSICAL EVENTS

Finding a Needle

Last week, in Carnegie Hall, I found a small, serviceable needle in Dmitri Kabalevsky's Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, which was given its first local performance by the Boston Symphony, under Charles Münch. It is not a work that is likely to save the world, or even astonish it very much. The thing that distinguishes it from most contemporary music is the modest integrity of its aims. Its technique, I am thankful to note, is almost unnoticeable, which is as it should be. Instead of clothing himself in cleverness, Mr. Kabalevsky has the remarkable courage to appear quite naked, as it were, and let his audience share what simple poetic and emotional ideas he has. While these are not, perhaps, overwhelming, they are straightforward, understandable, and altogether engaging. The result is a pleasing composition that makes you like the cello, the orchestra, and Mr. Kabalevsky, and that is, as far as I am aware, the most effective work written for the cello in nearly half a century. Mr. Münch conducted it with the scrupulous care that is characteristic of him, and an able cellist named Samuel Mayes played the solo part with considerable distinction.

THE NEW YORKER

Monitor

BOSTON, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1953

mbridge—Take t

James Abresch

Ruth Posselt, week-end Symphony soloist

Why Boston Symphony Cannot Pay Its Way

Tanglewood Music Center May Be Out By 1955

By CYRUS DURGIN

Most of the best things in life are not free. Most of them have to be paid for, and one of the very best is great music, especially that provided by a first-rank symphonic orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra now finds itself in the position of having to raise approximately $250,000 to meet operating expense for the remainder of this season. Cash reserves have been exhausted. There is no more money left. What would happen if this sum is not raised in the next few months?

"Well, what happens if you can't pay your bills?" asked Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, in his Federal st. office one day last week.

The implication was, you go out of business.

"This is a serious situation," continued Mr. Cabot, "and it will cause grave doubt of future seasons if this sum is not raised. I believe there are people who would step into this emergency and save us. But we don't want a rescue party. We would much prefer continuing support on a broad and solid foundation.

"There is no question of trying to save money by cutting down the size of the orchestra. You do that only when you've assumed that you're going down hill, when you admit that you've become second rate. Nor is there any question of trying to save by eliminating or curtailing the Esplanade concerts.

"There is, however, doubt whether we can operate the Berkshire Music Center beyond this next Summer, and it may be we shall have to run it on a curtailed basis in 1954. We shall know that definitely in a short time. The school at Tanglewood has been a heavy burden, much as we have been proud and glad to operate it."

There you have the whole truth in a few paragraphs. It seems unthinkable that we should ever lose the Boston Symphony, but unthinkable only if we all assume a share of the load and give what we can. That $250,000 must be raised by contribution.

In terms of what it adds to the happiness, the cultural and emotional well-being of literally hundreds of thousands of people, the value of the Boston Symphony is beyond estimate. In terms of ticket prices, the cost to the public is not exceptional. But the expense of maintaining a first rank orchestra, in all its glory of beauty and efficiency, is considerable.

Like all the rest of us the Boston Symphony has been vitally affected by the High Cost of Everything. It is not an exaggeration that public interest in its concerts, here and elsewhere, is greater than ever, and increasing.

The net income for the season of 1952-53 was greater by $206,000 than that for 1951-52. But due to that High Cost of Everything, the total expense of 1952-53 was greater by $71,000 than in the season preceding.

But the Boston Symphony is not merely a fine orchestra which gives concerts in Boston and other cities. It is, and much more importantly, one of the great institutions, cultural and practical, in Boston and New England; in fact, it is a national institution.

If the cultural value is evident, it does not require specialized analysis to find the practical value. In terms of money, the orchestra is an institution which, like the colleges and universities, attracts many of the thousands of students who come here. It is a prime attraction for visitors (the complete Boston Symphony in the Fall and Winter season, the Pops and Esplanade concerts during the warm weather). The Berkshire Festivals now have international repute. In sum, the Boston Symphony is among the major enterprises which give character to this metropolitan centre.

Anything which so functions is worthy—and as many of us believe, entitled—to broad support throughout all social, professional and business layers of the community.

Some shrewd and successful business men may question why symphonic music should be run as a deficit enterprise. Why shouldn't it pay for itself?

The answers are at hand, direct and logical. Because of the essential size and quality of a first class orchestral apparatus, it is a costly enterprise, and cannot live upon its income from ticket sales.

Then why not more concerts? Because there is a definite working maximum which cannot be exceeded without loss of efficiency. The Boston Symphony now gives, in Boston and on tour over the seven months from October through April, upward of 100 concerts. Add to this figure two pension fund concerts annually, about 60 Pops, 18 on the Charles River Esplanade and a dozen or more at Tanglewood, and you have an approximate total of 200. For each of the Friday-Saturday programs in Boston some four rehearsals are necessary.

Why not play in an auditorium with larger seating capacity? Because there is a point, in matter of size, beyond which the sound and power of a first-class orchestra will be diminished. There again, quality would suffer. The size of Symphony Hall, with its capacity of 2631, is about ideal for symphonic music at its best. Furthermore, the orchestra owns Symphony Hall, and if even by a stretch of imagination, it were considered to play in a larger hall, the cost of creating an acoustically suitable one today would be fantastic.

Unless and until endowments become large enough to provide the income—and that is most unlikely—the solution is obvious. We must plan and conduct campaigns each year to maintain the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its highest peak of artistic and institutional efficiency. Not only this $250,000, but whatever deficits may exist in other years to come. By so doing we not only help music, we help our community and ourselves.

65

Cir. (D 541,465)

This Clippi

NEW YORK
WORLD-TE

Music, at
Not Black

By LOUIS

hind the news blackout, co music went its merry way. New York audiences as re sive as ever and New York cs masquerading as music rs for a change.

Most dramatic of the readings eard were the "Eroica" Sym ny and "Coriolan" overture Arturo Toscanini's NBC Beet en broadcast last Sunday. The year-old maestro looked as fit a Stradivarius, and he made music sound like all the good ws anyone would ever need to r.

Charles Munch preceded him a day with Beethoven's roica"" at the Saturday mat of the Boston Symphony at was also a stupendous ex rience. I happen to be a fanatic the subject of Arturo Tos nini, so I'd better not make y comparisons. I enjoyed both adings, and both are superl ye conductors. Suppose I leave at that.

Novelties In Boston.

Exciting novelties bristled on e Wednesday program of the oston Symphony. Included was brand-new cello concerto by the oviet composer Kabalevsky, layed brilliantly by Samuel ayes. Concert colleagues of r. Mayes will also find it armly melodious, richly appe g score couched in a straight orward folk idiom.

Equally attractive was a new ncerto Grosso by Ernest Bloch, composer who divides his time d allegiance between the clas s and the moderns. The con rto represents the perfe eeting of extremes. The pa rtnight has been featuri mething of a Bloch Party. A ast four major works of th wiss-American master hav een featured.

NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

DEC 10 1953

Famed Hub Symphony Orchestra 'Broke'

BOSTON (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need one quarter million dollars to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of this season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group, orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

Cir. (W 370,017)

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 12 1953

MUSICAL EVENTS

Finding a Needle

Last week, in Carnegie Hall, I found a small, serviceable needle in Dmitri Kabalevsky's Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, which was given its first local performance by the Boston Symphony, under Charles Münch. It is not a work that is likely to save the world, or even astonish it very much. The thing that distinguishes it from most contemporary music is the modest integrity of its aims. Its technique, I am thankful to note, is almost unnoticeable, which is as it should be. Instead of clothing himself in cleverness, Mr. Kabalevsky has the remarkable courage to appear naked, as it were, and let his audience share what simple poetic and emotional ideas he has. While these are not, perhaps, overwhelming, they are straightforward, understandable, and altogether engaging. The result is a pleasing composition that makes you like the cello, the orchestra, and Mr. Kabalevsky, and that is, as far as I am aware, the most effective work written for the cello in nearly half a century. Mr. Münch conducted it with the scrupulous care that is characteristic of him, and an able cellist named Samuel Mayes played the solo part with considerable distinction.

THE NEW YORKER

51

Monitor

BOSTON, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1953

James Abresch

Ruth Posselt, week-end Symphony soloist

Why Boston Symphony Cannot Pay Its Way

Tanglewood Music Center May Be Out By 1955

By CYRUS DURGIN

Most of the best things in life are not free. Most of them have to be paid for, and one of the very best is great music, especially that provided by a first-rank symphonic orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra now finds itself in the position of having to raise approximately $250,000 to meet operating expense for the remainder of this season. Cash reserves have been exhausted. There is no more money left. What would happen if this sum is not raised in the next few months?

"Well, what happens if you can't pay your bills?" asked Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, in his Federal st. office one day last week.

The implication was, you go out of business.

"This is a serious situation," continued Mr. Cabot, "and it will cause grave doubt of future seasons if this sum is not raised. I believe there are people who would step into this emergency and save us. But we don't want a rescue party. We would much prefer continuing support on a broad and solid foundation.

"There is no question of trying to save money by cutting down the size of the orchestra. You do that only when you've assumed that you're going down hill, when you admit that you've become second rate. Nor is there any question of trying to save by eliminating or curtailing the Esplanade concerts.

"There is, however, doubt whether we can operate the Berkshire Music Center beyond this next Summer, and it may be we shall have to run it on a curtailed basis in 1954. We shall know that definitely in a short time. The school at Tanglewood has been a heavy burden, much as we have been proud and glad to operate it."

There you have the whole truth in a few paragraphs. It seems unthinkable that we should ever lose the Boston Symphony, but unthinkable only if we all assume a share of the load and give what we can. That $250,000 must be raised by contribution.

In terms of what it adds to the happiness, the cultural and emotional well-being of literally hundreds of thousands of people, the value of the Boston Symphony is beyond estimate. In terms of ticket prices, the cost to the public is not exceptional. But the expense of maintaining a first rank orchestra, in all its glory of beauty and efficiency, is considerable.

Like all the rest of us the Boston Symphony has been vitally affected by the High Cost of Everything. It is not an exaggeration that public interest in its concerts, here and elsewhere, is greater than ever, and increasing.

The net income for the season of 1952-53 was greater by $206,000 than that for 1951-52. But due to that High Cost of Everything, the total expense of 1952-53 was greater by $71,000 than in the season preceding.

But the Boston Symphony is not merely a fine orchestra which gives concerts in Boston and other cities. It is, and much more importantly, one of the great institutions, cultural and practical, in Boston and New England; in fact, it is a national institution.

If the cultural value is evident, it does not require specialized analysis to find the practical value. In terms of money, the orchestra is an institution which, like the colleges and universities, attracts many of the thousands of students who come here. It is a prime attraction for visitors (the complete Boston Symphony in the Fall and Winter season, the Pops and Esplanade concerts during the warm weather). The Berkshire Festivals now have international repute. In sum, the Boston Symphony is among the major enterprises which give character to this metropolitan centre.

Anything which so functions is worthy—and as many of us believe, entitled—to broad support throughout all social, professional and business layers of the community.

Some shrewd and successful business men may question why symphonic music should be run as a deficit enterprise. Why shouldn't it pay for itself?

The answers are at hand, direct and logical. Because of the essential size and quality of a first class orchestral apparatus, it is a costly enterprise, and cannot live upon its income from ticket sales.

Then why not more concerts? Because there is a definite working maximum which cannot be exceeded without loss of efficiency. The Boston Symphony now gives, in Boston and on tour over the seven months from October through April, upward of 100 concerts. Add to this figure two pension fund concerts annually, about 60 Pops, 18 on the Charles River Esplanade and a dozen or more at Tanglewood, and you have an approximate total of 200. For each of the Friday-Saturday programs in Boston some four rehearsals are necessary.

Why not play in an auditorium with larger seating capacity? Because there is a point, in matter of size, beyond which the sound and power of a first-class orchestra will be diminished. There, again, quality would suffer. The size of Symphony Hall, with its capacity of 2631, is about ideal for symphonic music at its best. Furthermore, the orchestra owns Symphony Hall, and if even by a stretch of imagination, it were considered to play in a larger hall, the cost of creating an acoustically suitable one today would be fantastic.

Unless and until endowments become large enough to provide the income—and that is most unlikely—the solution is obvious. We must plan and conduct campaigns each year to maintain the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its highest peak of artistic and institutional efficiency. Not only this $250,000, but whatever deficits may exist in other years to come. By so doing we not only help music, we help our community and ourselves.

Cir. (D 541,4

This Clip
NEW YO
WORLD-TELE
DEC

Music, at Not Black

By LOUIS

Behind the news blackout, co music went its merry way, New York audiences as responsive as ever and New York critics masquerading as music for a change.

Most dramatic of the readings heard were the "Eroica" Symphony and "Coriolan" overture Arturo Toscanini's NBC Beethoven broadcast last Sunday. The year-old maestro looked as fit a Stradivarius, and he made the music sound like all the good news anyone would ever need to hear.

Charles Munch preceded him a day with Beethoven's "Eroica"" at the Saturday matinee of the Boston Symphony. That was also a stupendous experience. I happen to be a fanatic on the subject of Arturo Toscanini, so I'd better not make any comparisons. I enjoyed both readings, and both are superlative conductors. Suppose I leave it at that.

Novelties In Boston.

Exciting novelties bristled on the Wednesday program of the Boston Symphony. Included was a brand-new cello concerto by the Soviet composer Kabalevsky, played brilliantly by Samuel Mayes. Concert colleagues of Mr. Mayes will also find it a warmly melodious, richly appealing score couched in a straightforward folk idiom.

Equally attractive was a new Concerto Grosso by Ernest Bloch, composer who divides his time and allegiance between the classics and the moderns. The concerto represents the perfect meeting of extremes. The past fortnight has been featuring something of a Bloch Party. At least four major works of the Swiss-American master have been featured.

This Clipping From
TAUNTON, MASS.
GAZETTE
DEC 10 1953

Hub Symphony Listed Broke

BOSTON (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need one quarter million dollars to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of this season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group, orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

Cir. (W 370,017)

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DEC 12 1953

MUSICAL EVENTS

Finding a Needle

Last week, in Carnegie Hall, I found a small, serviceable needle in Dmitri Kabalevsky's Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, which was given its first local performance by the Boston Symphony, under Charles Münch. It is not a work that is likely to save the world, or even astonish it very much. The thing that distinguishes it from most contemporary music is the modest integrity of its aims. Its technique, I am thankful to note, is almost unnoticeable, which is as it should be. Instead of clothing himself in cleverness, Mr. Kabalevsky has the remarkable courage to appear quite naked, as it were, and let his audience share what simple poetic and emotional ideas he has. While these are not, perhaps, overwhelming, they are straightforward, understandable, and altogether engaging. The result is a pleasing composition that makes you like the cello, the orchestra, and Mr. Kabalevsky, and that is, as far as I am aware, the most effective work written for the cello in nearly half a century. Mr. Münch conducted it with the scrupulous care that is characteristic of him, and an able cellist named Samuel Mayes played the solo part with considerable distinction.

THE NEW YORKER

51

Monitor

BOSTON, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1953

mbridge—Take t

James Abresch

Ruth Posselt, week-end Symphony soloist

Why Boston Symphony Cannot Pay Its Way

Tanglewood Music Center May Be Out By 1955

By CYRUS DURGIN

Most of the best things in life are not free. Most of them have to be paid for, and one of the very best is great music, especially that provided by a first-rank symphonic orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra now finds itself in the position of having to raise approximately $250,000 to meet operating expense for the remainder of this season. Cash reserves have been exhausted. There is no more money left. What would happen if this sum is not raised in the next few months?

"Well, what happens if you can't pay your bills?" asked Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, in his Federal st. office one day last week.

The implication was, you go out of business.

"This is a serious situation," continued Mr. Cabot, "and it will cause grave doubt of future seasons if this sum is not raised. I believe there are people who would step into this emergency and save us. But we don't want a rescue party. We would much prefer continuing support on a broad and solid foundation.

"There is no question of trying to save money by cutting down the size of the orchestra. You do that only when you've assumed that you're going down hill, when you admit that you've become second rate. Nor is there any question of trying to save by eliminating or curtailing the Esplanade concerts.

"There is, however, doubt whether we can operate the Berkshire Music Center beyond this next Summer, and it may be we shall have to run it on a curtailed basis in 1954. We shall know that definitely in a short time. The school at Tanglewood has been a heavy burden, much as we have been proud and glad to operate it."

There you have the whole truth in a few paragraphs. It seems unthinkable that we should ever lose the Boston Symphony, but unthinkable only if we all assume a share of the load and give what we can. That $250,000 must be raised by contribution.

In terms of what it adds to the happiness, the cultural and emotional well-being of literally hundreds of thousands of people, the value of the Boston Symphony is beyond estimate. In terms of ticket prices, the cost to the public is not exceptional. But the expense of maintaining a first rank orchestra, in all its glory of beauty and efficiency, is considerable.

Like all the rest of us the Boston Symphony has been vitally affected by the High Cost of Everything. It is not an exaggeration that public interest in its concerts, here and elsewhere, is greater than ever, and increasing.

The net income for the season of 1952-53 was greater by $206,000 than that for 1951-52. But due to that High Cost of Everything, the total expense of 1952-53 was greater by $71,000 than in the season preceding.

But the Boston Symphony is not merely a fine orchestra which gives concerts in Boston and other cities. It is, and much more importantly, one of the great institutions, cultural and practical, in Boston and New England; in fact, it is a national institution.

If the cultural value is evident, it does not require specialized analysis to find the practical value. In terms of money, the orchestra is an institution which, like the colleges and universities, attracts many of the thousands of students who come here. It is a prime attraction for visitors (the complete Boston Symphony in the Fall and Winter season, the Pops and Esplanade concerts during the warm weather). The Berkshire Festivals now have international repute. In sum, the Boston Symphony is among the major enterprises which give character to this metropolitan centre.

Anything which so functions is worthy—and as many of us believe, entitled—to broad support throughout all social, professional and business layers of the community.

Some shrewd and successful business men may question why symphonic music should be run as a deficit enterprise. Why shouldn't it pay for itself?

The answers are at hand, direct and logical. Because of the essential size and quality of a first class orchestral apparatus, it is a costly enterprise, and cannot live upon its income from ticket sales.

Then why not more concerts? Because there is a definite working maximum which cannot be exceeded without loss of efficiency. The Boston Symphony now gives, in Boston and on tour over the seven months from October through April, upward of 100 concerts. Add to this figure two pension fund concerts annually, about 60 Pops, 18 on the Charles River Esplanade and a dozen or more at Tanglewood, and you have an approximate total of 200. For each of the Friday-Saturday programs in Boston some four rehearsals are necessary.

Why not play in an auditorium with larger seating capacity? Because there is a point, in matter of size, beyond which the sound and power of a first-class orchestra will be diminished. There, again, quality would suffer. The size of Symphony Hall, with its capacity of 2631, is about ideal for symphonic music at its best. Furthermore, the orchestra owns Symphony Hall, and if even by a stretch of imagination, it were considered to play in a larger hall, the cost of creating an acoustically suitable one today would be fantastic.

Unless and until endowments become large enough to provide the income—and that is most unlikely—the solution is obvious. We must plan and conduct campaigns each year to maintain the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its highest peak of artistic and institutional efficiency. Not only this $250,000, but whatever deficits may exist in other years to come. By so doing we not only help music, we help our community and ourselves.

Cir. (D 541,485

This Clipp

NEW YO

WORLD-TELE

DEC

Music, at Not Black

By LOUIS BI

ehind the news blackout, con music went its merry way, New York audiences as re nsive as ever and New York lics masquerading as music ers for a change.

Most dramatic of the readings heard were the "Eroica" Symony and "Coriolan" overture Arturo Toscanini's NBC Beetven broadcast last Sunday. The year-old maestro looked as fit a Stradivarius, and he made e music sound like all the good ews anyone would ever need to ear.

Charles Munch preceded him a day with Beethoven's Eroica"" at the Saturday matee of the Boston Symphony. hat was also a stupendous exrience. I happen to be a fanatic n the subject of Arturo Tosnini, so I'd better not make ny comparisons. I enjoyed both adings, and both are superl ve conductors. Suppose I leave at that.

Novelties In Boston.

Exciting novelties bristled on e Wednesday program of the oston Symphony. Included was brand-new cello concerto by the oviet composer Kabalevsky, layed brilliantly by Samuel Mayes. Concert colleagues of Mr. Mayes will also find it warmly melodious, richly appeal ng score couched in a straightorward folk idiom.

Equally attractive was a new oncerto Grosso by Ernest Bloch composer who divides his tim d allegiance between the clas s and the moderns. The con rto represents the perfect eeting of extremes. The past rtnight has been featuring omething of a Bloch Party. At ast four major works of the wiss-American master have een featured.

This Clipping From

JAMESTOWN, N. Y.

POST-JOURNAL

DEC 12 1953

Boston Symphony Broke, Seeks Funds

BOSTON (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said here that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group, orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

Cir. (W 370,017)

This Clipping From

NEW YORKER

NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 12 1953

MUSICAL EVENTS

Finding a Needle

Last week, in Carnegie Hall, I found a small, serviceable needle in Dmitri Kabalevsky's Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, which was given its first local performance by the Boston Symphony, under Charles Münch. It is not a work that is likely to save the world, or even astonish it very much. The thing that distinguishes it from most contemporary music is the modest integrity of its aims. Its technique, I am thankful to note, is almost unnoticeable, which is as it should be. Instead of clothing himself in cleverness, Mr. Kabalevsky has had the remarkable courage to appear quite naked, as it were, and let his audience share what simple poetic and emotional ideas he has. While these are not, perhaps, overwhelming, they are straightforward, understandable, and altogether engaging. The result is a pleasing composition that makes you like the cello, the orchestra, and Mr. Kabalevsky, and that is, as far as I am aware, the most effective work written for the cello in nearly half a century. Mr. Münch conducted it with the scrupulous care that is characteristic of him, and an able cellist named Samuel Mayes played the solo part with considerable distinction.

THE NEW YORKER

51

Monitor

BOSTON, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1953

mbridge— Take t

James Abresch

Ruth Posselt, week-end Symphony soloist

THURSDA

Ballet

The Boston tra will give shorter series Sunday aftern day evening Richard Bu ductor, and G piano soloist. The progra sky's ballet certantes," Concerto No. Mahler's post phony and Tc Capriccio.

On Friday week Charles for the concerts Ber torio, "L'En

65

Why Boston Symphony Cannot Pay Its Way

Tanglewood Music Center May Be Out By 1955

By CYRUS DURGIN

Most of the best things in life are not free. Most of them have to be paid for, and one of the very best is great music, especially that provided by a first-rank symphonic orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra now finds itself in the position of having to raise approximately $250,000 to meet operating expense for the remainder of this season. Cash reserves have been exhausted. There is no more money left. What would happen if this sum is not raised in the next few months?

"Well, what happens if you can't pay your bills?" asked Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, in his Federal st. office one day last week.

The implication was, you go out of business.

"This is a serious situation," continued Mr. Cabot, "and it will cause grave doubt of future seasons if this sum is not raised. I believe there are people who would step into this emergency and save us. But we don't want a rescue party. We would much prefer continuing support on a broad and solid foundation.

"There is no question of trying to save money by cutting down the size of the orchestra. You do that only when you've assumed that you're going down hill, when you admit that you've become second rate. Nor is there any question of trying to save by eliminating or curtailing the Esplanade concerts.

"There is, however, doubt whether we can operate the Berkshire Music Center beyond this next Summer, and it may be we shall have to run it on a curtailed basis in 1954. We shall know that definitely in a short time. The school at Tanglewood has been a heavy burden, much as we have been proud and glad to operate it."

There you have the whole truth in a few paragraphs. It seems unthinkable that we should ever lose the Boston Symphony, but unthinkable only if we all assume a share of the load and give what we can. That $250,000 must be raised by contribution.

In terms of what it adds to the happiness, the cultural and emotional well-being of literally hundreds of thousands of people, the value of the Boston Symphony is beyond estimate. In terms of ticket prices, the cost to the public is not exceptional. But the expense of maintaining a first rank orchestra, in all its glory of beauty and efficiency, is considerable.

Like all the rest of us the Boston Symphony has been vitally affected by the High Cost of Everything. It is not an exaggeration that public interest in its concerts, here and elsewhere, is greater than ever, and increasing.

The net income for the season of 1952-53 was greater by $206,000 than that for 1951-52. But due to that High Cost of Everything, the total expense of 1952-53 was greater by $71,000 than in the season preceding.

But the Boston Symphony is not merely a fine orchestra which gives concerts in Boston and other cities. It is, and much more importantly, one of the great institutions, cultural and practical, in Boston and New England; in fact, it is a national institution.

If the cultural value is evident, it does not require specialized analysis to find the practical value. In terms of money, the orchestra is an institution which, like the colleges and universities, attracts many of the thousands of students who come here. It is a prime attraction for visitors (the complete Boston Symphony in the Fall and Winter season, the Pops and Esplanade concerts during the warm weather). The Berkshire Festivals now have international repute. In sum, the Boston Symphony is among the major enterprises which give character to this metropolitan centre.

Anything which so functions is worthy—and as many of us believe, entitled—to broad support throughout all social, professional and business layers of the community.

Some shrewd and successful business men may question why symphonic music should be run as a deficit enterprise. Why shouldn't it pay for itself?

The answers are at hand, direct and logical. Because of the essential size and quality of a first class orchestral apparatus, it is a costly enterprise, and cannot live upon its income from ticket sales.

Then why not more concerts? Because there is a definite working maximum which cannot be exceeded without loss of efficiency. The Boston Symphony now gives, in Boston and on tour over the seven months from October through April, upward of 100 concerts. Add to this figure two pension fund concerts annually, about 60 Pops, 18 on the Charles River Esplanade and a dozen or more at Tanglewood, and you have an approximate total of 200. For each of the Friday-Saturday programs in Boston some four rehearsals are necessary.

Why not play in an auditorium with larger seating capacity? Because there is a point, in matter of size, beyond which the sound and power of a first-class orchestra will be diminished. There, again, quality would suffer. The size of Symphony Hall, with its capacity of 2631, is about ideal for symphonic music at its best. Furthermore, the orchestra owns Symphony Hall, and if even by a stretch of imagination, it were considered to play in a larger hall, the cost of creating an acoustically suitable one today would be fantastic.

Unless and until endowments become large enough to provide the income—and that is most unlikely—the solution is obvious. We must plan and conduct campaigns each year to maintain the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its highest peak of artistic and institutional efficiency. Not only this $250,000, but whatever deficits may exist in other years to come. By so doing we not only help music, we help our community and ourselves.

51

65

NEW WORLD-T
DE

Music, at
Not Black

By LOUIS

ehind the news blackout, co
music went its merry way,
New York audiences as rensive as ever and New York ics masquerading as music
ers for a change.

Most dramatic of the readings heard were the "Eroica" Symony and "Coriolan" overture
Arturo Toscanini's NBC Beet-ven broadcast last Sunday. The year-old maestro looked as fit a Stradivarius, and he made e music sound like all the good ws anyone would ever need to ar.

Charles Munch preceded him
a day with Beethoven's Eroica"" at the Saturday mate of the Boston Symphony.
hat was also a stupendous ex-rience. I happen to be a fanatic the subject of Arturo Tosnini, so I'd better not make y comparisons. I enjoyed both adings, and both are superl e conductors. Suppose I leave at that.

Novelties In Boston.

Exciting novelties bristled on e Wednesday program of the oston Symphony. Included was brand-new cello concerto by the oviet composer Kabalevsky, layed brilliantly by Samuel ayes. Concert colleagues of
r. Mayes will also find it a armly melodious, richly appeal g score couched in a straight-
rward folk idiom.

Equally attractive was a new ncerto Grosso by Ernest Bloch, composer who divides his time
l allegiance between the class and the moderns. The conrto represents the perfect eting of extremes. The past rtnight has been featuring mething of a Bloch Party. At ast four major works of the wiss-American master have een featured.

This Clipping From BATH, N. Y.
STEUBEN ADVOCATE
DEC 11 1953

Boston Symphony Out of Money

BOSTON (AP) — Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said yesterday that world-famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group, orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

Cir. (W 370,017)

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DEC 12 1953

MUSICAL EVENTS

Finding a Needle

Last week, in Carnegie Hall, I found a small, serviceable needle in Dmitri Kabalevsky's Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, which was given its first local performance by the Boston Symphony, under Charles Münch. It is not a work that is likely to save the world, or even astonish it very much. The thing that distinguishes it from most contemporary music is the modest integrity of its aims. Its technique, I am thankful to note, is almost unnoticeable, which is as it should be. Instead of clothing himself in cleverness, Mr. Kabalevsky has had the remarkable courage to appear quite naked, as it were, and let his audience share what simple poetic and emotional ideas he has. While these are not, perhaps, overwhelming, they are straightforward, understandable, and altogether engaging. The result is a pleasing composition that makes you like the cello, the orchestra, and Mr. Kabalevsky, and that is, as far as I am aware, the most effective work written for the cello in nearly half a century. Mr. Münch conducted it with the scrupulous care that is characteristic of him, and an able cellist named Samuel Mayes played the solo part with considerable distinction.

THE NEW YORKER

Monitor

BOSTON, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1953

mbridge— Take t

James Abresch

Ruth Posselt, week-end Symphony soloist

Why Boston Symphony Cannot Pay Its Way

Tanglewood Music Center May Be Out By 1955

By CYRUS DURGIN

Most of the best things in life are not free. Most of them have to be paid for, and one of the very best is great music, especially that provided by a first-rank symphonic orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra now finds itself in the position of having to raise approximately $250,000 to meet operating expense for the remainder of this season. Cash reserves have been exhausted. There is no more money left. What would happen if this sum is not raised in the next few months?

"Well, what happens if you can't pay your bills?" asked Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, in his Federal st. office one day last week.

The implication was, you go out of business.

"This is a serious situation," continued Mr. Cabot, "and it will cause grave doubt of future seasons if this sum is not raised. I believe there are people who would step into this emergency and save us. But we don't want a rescue party. We would much prefer continuing support on a broad and solid foundation.

"There is no question of trying to save money by cutting down the size of the orchestra. You do that only when you've assumed that you're going down hill, when you admit that you've become second rate. Nor is there any question of trying to save by eliminating or curtailing the Esplanade concerts.

"There is, however, doubt whether we can operate the Berkshire Music Center beyond this next Summer, and it may be we shall have to run it on a curtailed basis in 1954. We shall know that definitely in a short time. The school at Tanglewood has been a heavy burden, much as we have been proud and glad to operate it."

There you have the whole truth in a few paragraphs. It seems unthinkable that we should ever lose the Boston Symphony, but unthinkable only if we all assume a share of the load and give what we can. That $250,000 must be raised by contribution.

In terms of what it adds to the happiness, the cultural and emotional well-being of literally hundreds of thousands of people, the value of the Boston Symphony is beyond estimate. In terms of ticket prices, the cost to the public is not exceptional. But the expense of maintaining a first rank orchestra, in all its glory of beauty and efficiency, is considerable.

Like all the rest of us the Boston Symphony has been vitally affected by the High Cost of Everything. It is not an exaggeration that public interest in its concerts, here and elsewhere, is greater than ever, and increasing.

The net income for the season of 1952-53 was greater by $206,000 than that for 1951-52. But due to that High Cost of Everything, the total expense of 1952-53 was greater by $71,000 than in the season preceding.

But the Boston Symphony is not merely a fine orchestra which gives concerts in Boston and other cities. It is, and much more importantly, one of the great institutions, cultural and practical, in Boston and New England; in fact, it is a national institution.

If the cultural value is evident, it does not require specialized analysis to find the practical value. In terms of money, the orchestra is an institution which, like the colleges and universities, attracts many of the thousands of students who come here. It is a prime attraction for visitors (the complete Boston Symphony in the Fall and Winter season, the Pops and Esplanade concerts during the warm weather). The Berkshire Festivals now have international repute. In sum, the Boston Symphony is among the major enterprises which give character to this metropolitan centre.

Anything which so functions is worthy—and as many of us believe, entitled—to broad support throughout all social, professional and business layers of the community.

Some shrewd and successful business men may question why symphonic music should be run as a deficit enterprise. Why shouldn't it pay for itself?

The answers are at hand, direct and logical. Because of the essential size and quality of a first class orchestral apparatus, it is a costly enterprise, and cannot live upon its income from ticket sales.

Then why not more concerts? Because there is a definite working maximum which cannot be exceeded without loss of efficiency. The Boston Symphony now gives, in Boston and on tour over the seven months from October through April, upward of 100 concerts. Add to this figure two pension fund concerts annually, about 60 Pops, 18 on the Charles River Esplanade and a dozen or more at Tanglewood, and you have an approximate total of 200. For each of the Friday-Saturday programs in Boston some four rehearsals are necessary.

Why not play in an auditorium with larger seating capacity? Because there is a point, in matter of size, beyond which the sound and power of a first-class orchestra will be diminished. There, again, quality would suffer. The size of Symphony Hall, with its capacity of 2631, is about ideal for symphonic music at its best. Furthermore, the orchestra owns Symphony Hall, and if even by a stretch of imagination, it were considered to play in a larger hall, the cost of creating an acoustically suitable one today would be fantastic.

Unless and until endowments become large enough to provide the income—and that is most unlikely—the solution is obvious. We must plan and conduct campaigns each year to maintain the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its highest peak of artistic and institutional efficiency. Not only this $250,000, but whatever deficits may exist in other years to come. By so doing we not only help music, we help our community and ourselves.

Cir. (D 541,4

This Clip

NEW YO

WORLD-TELE

DEC

Music, at Not Black

By LOUIS BI

Behind the news blackout, co music went its merry way, h New York audiences as re- onsive as ever and New York itics masquerading as music vers for a change.

Most dramatic of the readings heard were the "Eroica" Sym- ony and "Coriolan" overture Arturo Toscanini's NBC Beet- oven broadcast last Sunday. The -year-old maestro looked as fit a Stradivarius, and he made e music sound like all the good ws anyone would ever need to ear.

Charles Munch preceded him a day with Beethoven's Eroica'''' at the Saturday mat- ee of the Boston Symphony. hat was also a stupendous ex- erience. I happen to be a fanatic the subject of Arturo Tos- nini, so I'd better not make y comparisons. I enjoyed both adings, and both are superla- ve conductors. Suppose I leave at that.

Novelties In Boston.

Exciting novelties bristled on e Wednesday program of the oston Symphony. Included was brand-new cello concerto by the oviet composer Kabalevsky, layed brilliantly by Samuel ayes. Concert colleagues of r. Mayes will also find it a armly melodious, richly appeal- g score couched in a straight- orward folk idiom.

Equally attractive was a new ncerto Grosso by Ernest Bloch, composer who divides his time d allegiance between the clas- s and the moderns. The con- rto represents the perfect eeting of extremes. The past rtnight has been featuring mething of a Bloch Party. At ast four major works of the wiss-American master have een featured.

This Clipping From

ENDICOTT, N. Y.
BULLETIN

DEC 11 1953

Top Orchestra Goes Broke

● Boston, (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that the world-famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said: "We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group, orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

Cir. (W 370,017)

This Clipping From

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 18 1953

MUSICAL EVENTS

Finding a Needle

Last week, in Carnegie Hall, I found a small, serviceable needle in Dmitri Kabalevsky's Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, which was given its first local performance by the Boston Symphony, under Charles Münch. It is not a work that is likely to save the world, or even astonish it very much. The thing that distinguishes it from most contemporary music is the modest integrity of its aims. Its technique, I am thankful to note, is almost unnoticeable, which is as it should be. Instead of clothing himself in cleverness, Mr. Kabalevsky has the remarkable courage to appear quite naked, as it were, and let his audience share what simple poetic and emotional ideas he has. While these are not, perhaps, overwhelming, they are straightforward, understandable, and altogether engaging. The result is a pleasing composition that makes you like the cello, the orchestra, and Mr. Kabalevsky, and that is, as far as I am aware, the most effective work written for the cello in nearly half a century. Mr. Münch conducted it with the scrupulous care that is characteristic of him, and an able cellist named Samuel Mayes played the solo part with considerable distinction.

THE NEW YORKER

51

65

Monitor

BOSTON, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1953

mbridge—Take t

James Abresch

Ruth Posselt, week-end Symphony soloist

Why Boston Symphony Cannot Pay Its Way

Tanglewood Music Center May Be Out By 1955

By CYRUS DURGIN

Most of the best things in life are not free. Most of them have to be paid for, and one of the very best is great music, especially that provided by a first-rank symphonic orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra now finds itself in the position of having to raise approximately $250,000 to meet operating expense for the remainder of this season. Cash reserves have been exhausted. There is no more money left. What would happen if this sum is not raised in the next few months?

"Well, what happens if you can't pay your bills?" asked Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, in his Federal st. office one day last week.

The implication was, you go out of business.

"This is a serious situation," continued Mr. Cabot, "and it will cause grave doubt of future seasons if this sum is not raised. I believe there are people who would step into this emergency and save us. But we don't want a rescue party. We would much prefer continuing support on a broad and solid foundation.

"There is no question of trying to save money by cutting down the size of the orchestra. You do that only when you've assumed that you're going down hill, when you admit that you've become second rate. Nor is there any question of trying to save by eliminating or curtailing the Esplanade concerts.

"There is, however, doubt whether we can operate the Berkshire Music Center beyond this next Summer, and it may be we shall have to run it on a curtailed basis in 1954. We shall know that definitely in a short time. The school at Tanglewood has been a heavy burden, much as we have been proud and glad to operate it."

There you have the whole truth in a few paragraphs. It seems unthinkable that we should ever lose the Boston Symphony, but unthinkable only if we all assume a share of the load and give what we can. That $250,000 must be raised by contribution.

In terms of what it adds to the happiness, the cultural and emotional well-being of literally hundreds of thousands of people, the value of the Boston Symphony is beyond estimate. In terms of ticket prices, the cost to the public is not exceptional. But the expense of maintaining a first rank orchestra, in all its glory of beauty and efficiency, is considerable.

Like all the rest of us the Boston Symphony has been vitally affected by the High Cost of Everything. It is not an exaggeration that public interest in its concerts, here and elsewhere, is greater than ever, and increasing.

The net income for the season of 1952-53 was greater by $206,000 than that for 1951-52. But due to that High Cost of Everything, the total expense of 1952-53 was greater by $71,000 than in the season preceding.

But the Boston Symphony is not merely a fine orchestra which gives concerts in Boston and other cities. It is, and much more importantly, one of the great institutions, cultural and practical, in Boston and New England; in fact, it is a national institution.

If the cultural value is evident, it does not require specialized analysis to find the practical value. In terms of money, the orchestra is an institution which, like the colleges and universities, attracts many of the thousands of students who come here. It is a prime attraction for visitors (the complete Boston Symphony in the Fall and Winter season, the Pops and Esplanade concerts during the warm weather). The Berkshire Festivals now have international repute. In sum, the Boston Symphony is among the major enterprises which give character to this metropolitan centre.

Anything which so functions is worthy—and as many of us believe, entitled—to broad support throughout all social, professional and business layers of the community.

Some shrewd and successful business men may question why symphonic music should be run as a deficit enterprise. Why shouldn't it pay for itself?

The answers are at hand, direct and logical. Because of the essential size and quality of a first class orchestral apparatus, it is a costly enterprise, and cannot live upon its income from ticket sales.

Then why not more concerts? Because there is a definite working maximum which cannot be exceeded without loss of efficiency. The Boston Symphony now gives, in Boston and on tour over the seven months from October through April, upward of 100 concerts. Add to this figure two pension fund concerts annually, about 60 Pops, 18 on the Charles River Esplanade and a dozen or more at Tanglewood, and you have an approximate total of 200. For each of the Friday-Saturday programs in Boston some four rehearsals are necessary.

Why not play in an auditorium with larger seating capacity? Because there is a point, in matter of size, beyond which the sound and power of a first-class orchestra will be diminished. There, again, quality would suffer. The size of Symphony Hall, with its capacity of 2631, is about ideal for symphonic music at its best. Furthermore, the orchestra owns Symphony Hall, and if even by a stretch of imagination, it were considered to play in a larger hall, the cost of creating an acoustically suitable one today would be fantastic.

Unless and until endowments become large enough to provide the income—and that is most unlikely—the solution is obvious. We must plan and conduct campaigns each year to maintain the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its highest peak of artistic and institutional efficiency. Not only this $250,000, but whatever deficits may exist in other years to come. By so doing we not only help music, we help our community and ourselves.

Cir. (D 541,4

This Cli
NEW Y
WORLD-TE

DEC

Music, at
Not Blacke

By LOUIS BI

Behind the news blackout, com music went its merry way, New York audiences as responsive as ever and New York ...ics masquerading as music ...ers for a change.

Most dramatic of the readings heard were the "Eroica" Symphony and "Coriolan" overture Arturo Toscanini's NBC Beethoven broadcast last Sunday. The year-old maestro looked as fit a Stradivarius, and he made music sound like all the good ...ws anyone would ever need to ...ar.

Charles Munch preceded him a day with Beethoven's "Eroica"" at the Saturday mat... of the Boston Symphony. ...at was also a stupendous experience. I happen to be a fanatic the subject of Arturo Toscanini, so I'd better not make comparisons. I enjoyed both readings, and both are superl... conductors. Suppose I leave at that.

Novelties In Boston.

Exciting novelties bristled on the Wednesday program of the Boston Symphony. Included was brand-new cello concerto by the Soviet composer Kabalevsky, played brilliantly by Samuel Mayes. Concert colleagues of Mr. Mayes will also find it a warmly melodious, richly appealing score couched in a straightforward folk idiom.

Equally attractive was a new Concerto Grosso by Ernest Bloch, composer who divides his time allegiance between the classics and the moderns. The concerto represents the perfect meeting of extremes. The past fortnight has been featuring something of a Bloch Party. At least four major works of the Swiss-American master have been featured.

Szell at Philharmonic

Cir. (D 3,190)

This Clipping From BATH, ME.
TIMES

DEC 10 1953

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IS BROKE

Needs Quarter of a Million Dollars To Keep Going This Season

Boston (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need one-quarter million dollars to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of this season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group, orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

Cir. (W 370,017)

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 12 1953

MUSICAL EVENTS

Finding a Needle

Last week, in Carnegie Hall, I found a small, serviceable needle in Dmitri Kabalevsky's Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, which was given its first local performance by the Boston Symphony, under Charles Münch. It is not a work that is likely to save the world, or even astonish it very much. The thing that distinguishes it from most contemporary music is the modest integrity of its aims. Its technique, I am thankful to note, is almost unnoticeable, which is as it should be. Instead of clothing himself in cleverness, Mr. Kabalevsky has had the remarkable courage to appear quite naked, as it were, and let his audience share what simple poetic and emotional ideas he has. While these are not, perhaps, overwhelming, they are straightforward, understandable, and altogether engaging. The result is a pleasing composition that makes you like the cello, the orchestra, and Mr. Kabalevsky, and that is, as far as I am aware, the most effective work written for the cello in nearly half a century. Mr. Münch conducted it with the scrupulous care that is characteristic of him, and an able cellist named Samuel Mayes played the solo part with considerable distinction.

THE NEW YORKER

51

Monitor

BOSTON, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1953

...mbridge—Take t

James Abresch
Ruth Posselt, week-end Symphony soloist

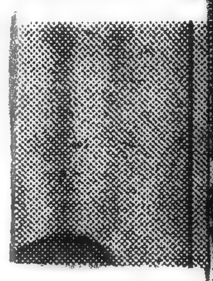
THURSDA

Ballet

The Boston ... tra will give ... shorter series ... Sunday after... day evening ... Richard Bu... ductor, and G... piano soloist.

The progra... sky's ballet ... certante," ... Concerto No. ... Mahler's post... phony and Tc... Capriccio...

On Friday ... week Charles ... ent for the ... concerts Ber... torio, "L'En...



Why Boston Symphony Cannot Pay Its Way

Tanglewood Music Center May Be Out By 1955

By CYRUS DURGIN

Most of the best things in life are not free. Most of them have to be paid for, and one of the very best is great music, especially that provided by a first-rank symphonic orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra now finds itself in the position of having to raise approximately $250,000 to meet operating expense for the remainder of this season. Cash reserves have been exhausted. There is no more money left. What would happen if this sum is not raised in the next few months?

"Well, what happens if you can't pay your bills?" asked Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, in his Federal st. office one day last week.

The implication was, you go out of business.

"This is a serious situation," continued Mr. Cabot, "and it will cause grave doubt of future seasons if this sum is not raised. I believe there are people who would step into this emergency and save us. But we don't want a rescue party. We would much prefer continuing support on a broad and solid foundation.

"There is no question of trying to save money by cutting down the size of the orchestra. You do that only when you've assumed that you're going down hill, when you admit that you've become second rate. Nor is there any question of trying to save by eliminating or curtailing the Esplanade concerts.

"There is, however, doubt whether we can operate the Berkshire Music Center beyond this next Summer, and it may be we shall have to run it on a curtailed basis in 1954. We shall know that definitely in a short time. The school at Tanglewood has been a heavy burden, much as we have been proud and glad to operate it."

There you have the whole truth in a few paragraphs. It seems unthinkable that we should ever lose the Boston Symphony, but unthinkable only if we all assume a share of the load and give what we can. That $250,000 must be raised by contribution.

In terms of what it adds to the happiness, the cultural and emotional well-being of literally hundreds of thousands of people, the value of the Boston Symphony is beyond estimate. In terms of ticket prices, the cost to the public is not exceptional. But the expense of maintaining a first rank orchestra, in all its glory of beauty and efficiency, is considerable.

Like all the rest of us the Boston Symphony has been vitally affected by the High Cost of Everything. It is not an exaggeration that public interest in its concerts, here and elsewhere, is greater than ever, and increasing.

The net income for the season of 1952-53 was greater by $206,000 than that for 1951-52. But due to that High Cost of Everything, the total expense of 1952-53 was greater by $71,000 than in the season preceding.

But the Boston Symphony is not merely a fine orchestra which gives concerts in Boston and other cities. It is, and much more importantly, one of the great institutions, cultural and practical, in Boston and New England; in fact, it is a national institution.

If the cultural value is evident, it does not require specialized analysis to find the practical value. In terms of money, the orchestra is an institution which, like the colleges and universities, attracts many of the thousands of students who come here. It is a prime attraction for visitors (the complete Boston Symphony in the Fall and Winter season, the Pops and Esplanade concerts during the warm weather). The Berkshire Festivals now have international repute. In sum, the Boston Symphony is among the major enterprises which give character to this metropolitan centre.

Anything which so functions is worthy—and as many of us believe, entitled—to broad support throughout all social, professional and business layers of the community.

Some shrewd and successful business men may question why symphonic music should be run as a deficit enterprise. Why shouldn't it pay for itself?

The answers are at hand, direct and logical. Because of the essential size and quality of a first class orchestral apparatus, it is a costly enterprise, and cannot live upon its income from ticket sales.

Then why not more concerts? Because there is a definite working maximum which cannot be exceeded without loss of efficiency. The Boston Symphony now gives, in Boston and on tour over the seven months from October through April, upward of 100 concerts. Add to this figure two pension fund concerts annually, about 60 Pops, 18 on the Charles River Esplanade and a dozen or more at Tanglewood, and you have an approximate total of 200. For each of the Friday-Saturday programs in Boston some four rehearsals are necessary.

Why not play in an auditorium with larger seating capacity? Because there is a point, in matter of size, beyond which the sound and power of a first-class orchestra will be diminished. There, again, quality would suffer. The size of Symphony Hall, with its capacity of 2631, is about ideal for symphonic music at its best. Furthermore, the orchestra owns Symphony Hall, and if even by a stretch of imagination, it were considered to play in a larger hall, the cost of creating an acoustically suitable one today would be fantastic.

Unless and until endowments become large enough to provide the income—and that is most unlikely—the solution is obvious. We must plan and conduct campaigns each year to maintain the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its highest peak of artistic and institutional efficiency. Not only this $250,000, but whatever deficits may exist in other years to come. By so doing we not only help music, we help our community and ourselves.

65

51

65

Cir. (D 5

This

NEW

WORLD-T

DE

Music, at Not Black

By LOUIS B

Behind the news blackout, con music went its merry way, New York audiences as re- nsive as ever and New York ics masquerading as music ers for a change.

Most dramatic of the readings heard were the "Eroica" Sym- ony and "Coriolan" overture Arturo Toscanini's NBC Beet- ven broadcast last Sunday. The year-old maestro looked as fit a Stradivarius, and he made music sound like all the good ws anyone would ever need to ar.

Charles Munch preceded him a day with Beethoven's roica"" at the Saturday mat- e of the Boston Symphony. at was also a stupendous ex- ience. I happen to be a fanatic the subject of Arturo Tos- ini, so I'd better not make comparisons. I enjoyed both dings, and both are superl e conductors. Suppose I leave at that.

Novelties In Boston.

Exciting novelties bristled on Wednesday program of the ston Symphony. Included was brand-new cello concerto by the viet composer Kabalevsky, yed brilliantly by Samuel yes. Concert colleagues of Mayes will also find rmly melodious, richly appeal score couched in a straight- ward folk idiom.

Equally attractive was a new ncerto Grosso by Ernest Bloch, omposer who divides his time allegiance between the clas- s and the moderns. The con- to represents the perfect eting of extremes. The past rtnight has been featuring mething of a Bloch Party. At st four major works of the iss-American master have en featured.

Szell at Philharmonic

This Clipping From
ATHOL, MASS.
NEWS

0 1953

Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Broke

Boston (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need one quarter million dollars to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of this season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group, orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

Cir. (W 370,017)

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 12 1953

MUSICAL EVENTS

Finding a Needle

Last week, in Carnegie Hall, I found a small, serviceable needle in Dmitri Kabalevsky's Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, which was given its first local performance by the Boston Symphony, under Charles Münch. It is not a work that is likely to save the world, or even astonish it very much. The thing that distinguishes it from most contemporary music is the modest integrity of its aims. Its technique, I am thankful to note, is almost unnoticeable, which is as it should be. Instead of clothing himself in cleverness, Mr. Kabalevsky has had the remarkable courage to appear quite naked, as it were, and let his audience share what simple poetic and emotional ideas he has. While these are not, perhaps, overwhelming, they are straightforward, understandable, and altogether engaging. The result is a pleasing composition that makes you like the cello, the orchestra, and Mr. Kabalevsky, and that is, as far as I am aware, the most effective work written for the cello in nearly half a century. Mr. Münch conducted it with the scrupulous care that is characteristic of him, and an able cellist named Samuel Mayes played the solo part with considerable distinction.

THE NEW YORKER

Monitor

BOSTON, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1953

mbridge— Take t

James Abresch

Ruth Posselt, week-end Symphony soloist

THURSDA

Ballet

The Boston tra will give shorter series Sunday aftern day evenings Richard Bu ductor, and G piano soloist. The progra sky's ballet certantes," Concerto No. Mahler's post phony and Tc Capriccio.

On Friday week Charles selt for the concerts Ber iota, "L'En

Why Boston Symphony Cannot Pay Its Way

Tanglewood Music Center May Be Out By 1955

By CYRUS DURGIN

Most of the best things in life are not free. Most of them have to be paid for, and one of the very best is great music, especially that provided by a first-rank symphonic orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra now finds itself in the position of having to raise approximately $250,000 to meet operating expense for the remainder of this season. Cash reserves have been exhausted. There is no more money left. What would happen if this sum is not raised in the next few months?

"Well, what happens if you can't pay your bills?" asked Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, in his Federal st. office one day last week.

The implication was, you go out of business.

"This is a serious situation," continued Mr. Cabot, "and it will cause grave doubt of future seasons if this sum is not raised. I believe there are people who would step into this emergency and save us. But we don't want a rescue party. We would much prefer continuing support on a broad and solid foundation.

"There is no question of trying to save money by cutting down the size of the orchestra. You do that only when you've assumed that you're going down hill, when you admit that you've become second rate. Nor is there any question of trying to save by eliminating or curtailing the Esplanade concerts.

"There is, however, doubt whether we can operate the Berkshire Music Center beyond this next Summer, and it may be we shall have to run it on a curtailed basis in 1954. We shall know that definitely in a short time. The school at Tanglewood has been a heavy burden, much as we have been proud and glad to operate it."

There you have the whole truth in a few paragraphs. It seems unthinkable that we should ever lose the Boston Symphony, but unthinkable only if we all assume a share of the load and give what we can. That $250,000 must be raised by contribution.

In terms of what it adds to the happiness, the cultural and emotional well-being of literally hundreds of thousands of people, the value of the Boston Symphony is beyond estimate. In terms of ticket prices, the cost to the public is not exceptional. But the expense of maintaining a first rank orchestra, in all its glory of beauty and efficiency, is considerable.

Like all the rest of us the Boston Symphony has been vitally affected by the High Cost of Everything. It is not an exaggeration that public interest in its concerts, here and elsewhere, is greater than ever, and increasing.

The net income for the season of 1952-53 was greater by $206,000 than that for 1951-52. But due to that High Cost of Everything, the total expense of 1952-53 was greater by $71,000 than in the season preceding.

But the Boston Symphony is not merely a fine orchestra which gives concerts in Boston and other cities. It is, and much more importantly, one of the great institutions, cultural and practical, in Boston and New England; in fact, it is a national institution.

If the cultural value is evident, it does not require specialized analysis to find the practical value. In terms of money, the orchestra is an institution which, like the colleges and universities, attracts many of the thousands of students who come here. It is a prime attraction for visitors (the complete Boston Symphony in the Fall and Winter season, the Pops and Esplanade concerts during the warm weather). The Berkshire Festivals now have international repute. In sum, the Boston Symphony is among the major enterprises which give character to this metropolitan centre.

Anything which so functions is worthy—and as many of us believe, entitled—to broad support throughout all social, professional and business layers of the community.

Some shrewd and successful business men may question why symphonic music should be run as a deficit enterprise. Why shouldn't it pay for itself?

The answers are at hand, direct and logical. Because of the essential size and quality of a first class orchestral apparatus, it is a costly enterprise, and cannot live upon its income from ticket sales.

Then why not more concerts? Because there is a definite working maximum which cannot be exceeded without loss of efficiency. The Boston Symphony now gives, in Boston and on tour over the seven months from October through April, upward of 100 concerts. Add to this figure two pension fund concerts annually, about 60 Pops, 18 on the Charles River Esplanade and a dozen or more at Tanglewood, and you have an approximate total of 200. For each of the Friday-Saturday programs in Boston some four rehearsals are necessary.

Why not play in an auditorium with larger seating capacity? Because there is a point, in matter of size, beyond which the sound and power of a first-class orchestra will be diminished. There, again, quality would suffer. The size of Symphony Hall, with its capacity of 2631, is about ideal for symphonic music at its best. Furthermore, the orchestra owns Symphony Hall, and if even by a stretch of imagination, it were considered to play in a larger hall, the cost of creating an acoustically suitable one today would be fantastic.

Unless and until endowments become large enough to provide the income—and that is most unlikely—the solution is obvious. We must plan and conduct campaigns each year to maintain the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its highest peak of artistic and institutional efficiency. Not only this $250,000, but whatever deficits may exist in other years to come. By so doing we not only help music, we help our community and ourselves.

Music, at Not Black

By LOUIS B

Behind the news blackout, co... music went its merry way, ... New York audiences as responsive as ever and New York ... tics masquerading as music ... vers for a change.

Most dramatic of the readings heard were the "Eroica" Symphony and "Coriolan" overture ... Arturo Toscanini's NBC Beethoven broadcast last Sunday. The ...-year-old maestro looked as fit ... a Stradivarius, and he made ... music sound like all the good news anyone would ever need to hear.

Charles Munch preceded him ... a day with Beethoven's "Eroica"" at the Saturday matinee of the Boston Symphony. That was also a stupendous experience. I happen to be a fanatic ... the subject of Arturo Toscanini, so I'd better not make any comparisons. I enjoyed both readings, and both are superla... conductors. Suppose I leave ... at that.

Novelties In Boston.

Exciting novelties bristled on the Wednesday program of the Boston Symphony. Included was ... brand-new cello concerto by the Soviet composer Kabalevsky, played brilliantly by Samuel Mayes. Concert colleagues of Mr. Mayes will also find it a warmly melodious, richly appealing score couched in a straightforward folk idiom.

Equally attractive was a new Concerto Grosso by Ernest Bloch, composer who divides his time and allegiance between the classics and the moderns. The concerto represents the perfect meeting of extremes. The past fortnight has been featuring something of a Bloch Party. At least four major works of the Swiss-American master have been featured.

Szell at Philharmonic

CONCORD, N. H.
MONITOR & N. H. PATRIOT

DEC 10 1953

Orchestra In Boston Broke

Reserves Are Used Up To Keep Going Rest Of Season

BOSTON, Dec. 10 (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony orchestra said today that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the Symphony's trustees, said:

"We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no money left.

"We need one quarter million dollars to keep the Boston Symphony orchestra solvent for the remainder of this season."

He outlined a plan for raising money to a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists.

Because of the difficulty in raising donations, Cabot told the group, orchestra officials have worked out a "premium advertising" plan under which full pages in the program books will be sold at $2,500.

Cir. (W 370,017)

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 12 1953

MUSICAL EVENTS

Finding a Needle

Last week, in Carnegie Hall, I found a small, serviceable needle in Dmitri Kabalevsky's Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, which was given its first local performance by the Boston Symphony, under Charles Münch. It is not a work that is likely to save the world, or even astonish it very much. The thing that distinguishes it from most contemporary music is the modest integrity of its aims. Its technique, I am thankful to note, is almost unnoticeable, which is as it should be. Instead of clothing him... in cleverness, Mr. Kabalevsky has ... the remarkable courage to appear ... naked, as it were, and let his audi... share what simple poetic and emotional ideas he has. While these are not, perhaps, overwhelming, they are straightforward, understandable, and altogether engaging. The result is a pleasing composition that makes you like the cello, the orchestra, and Mr. Kabalevsky, and that is, as far as I am aware, the most effective work written for the cello in nearly half a century. Mr. Münch conducted it with the scrupulous care that is characteristic of him, and an able cellist named Samuel Mayes played the solo part with considerable distinction.

THE NEW YORKER

51

65

Monitor

BOSTON, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1953

...mbridge—Take t...

James Abresch

Ruth Posselt, week-end Symphony soloist

THURSDA...

Ballet...

The Boston ... tra will give ... shorter series ... Sunday aftern... day evening... Richard Bu... ductor, and G... piano soloist.

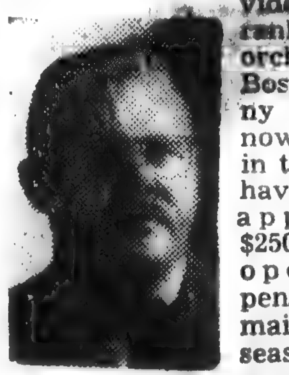
The progra... sky's ballet ... certantes," ... Concerto No. ... Mahler's post... phony and Tc... Capriccio...

On Friday ... week Charles ... ...concerts Ber... ...L'En...

Why Boston Symphony Cannot Pay Its Way

Tanglewood Music Center May Be Out By 1955

By CYRUS DURGIN



Most of the best things in life are not free. Most of them have to be paid for, and one of the very best is great music, especially that provided by a first-rank symphonic orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra now finds itself in the position of having to raise approximately $250,000 to meet operating expense for the remainder of this season. Cash reserves have been exhausted. There is no more money left. What would happen if this sum is not raised in the next few months?

"Well, what happens if you can't pay your bills?" asked Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, in his Federal st. office one day last week.

The implication was, you go out of business.

"This is a serious situation," continued Mr. Cabot, "and it will cause grave doubt of future seasons if this sum is not raised. I believe there are people who would step into this emergency and save us. But we don't want a rescue party. We would much prefer continuing support on a broad and solid foundation.

"There is no question of trying to save money by cutting down the size of the orchestra. You do that only when you've assumed that you're going down hill, when you admit that you've become second rate. Nor is there any question of trying to save by eliminating or curtailing the Esplanade concerts.

"There is, however, doubt whether we can operate the Berkshire Music Center beyond this next Summer, and it may be we shall have to run it on a curtailed basis in 1954. We shall know that definitely in a short time. The school at Tanglewood has been a heavy burden, much as we have been proud and glad to operate it."

There you have the whole truth in a few paragraphs. It seems unthinkable that we should ever lose the Boston Symphony, but unthinkable only if we all assume a share of the load and give what we can. That $250,000 must be raised by contribution.

In terms of what it adds to the happiness, the cultural and emotional well-being of literally hundreds of thousands of people, the value of the Boston Symphony is beyond estimate. In terms of ticket prices, the cost to the public is not exceptional. But the expense of maintaining a first rank orchestra, in all its glory of beauty and efficiency, is considerable.

Like all the rest of us the Boston Symphony has been vitally affected by the High Cost of Everything. It is not an exaggeration that public interest in its concerts, here and elsewhere, is greater than ever, and increasing.

The net income for the season of 1952-53 was greater by $206,000 than that for 1951-52. But due to that High Cost of Everything, the total expense of 1952-53 was greater by $71,000 than in the season preceding.

But the Boston Symphony is not merely a fine orchestra which gives concerts in Boston and other cities. It is, and much more importantly, one of the great institutions, cultural and practical, in Boston and New England; in fact, it is a national institution.

If the cultural value is evident, it does not require specialized analysis to find the practical value. In terms of money, the orchestra is an institution which, like the colleges and universities, attracts many of the thousands of students who come here. It is a prime attraction for visitors (the complete Boston Symphony in the Fall and Winter season, the Pops and Esplanade concerts during the warm weather). The Berkshire Festivals now have international repute. In sum, the Boston Symphony is among the major enterprises which give character to this metropolitan centre.

Anything which so functions is worthy—and as many of us believe, entitled—to broad support throughout all social, professional and business layers of the community.

Some shrewd and successful business men may question why symphonic music should be run as a deficit enterprise. Why shouldn't it pay for itself?

The answers are at hand, direct and logical. Because of the essential size and quality of a first class orchestral apparatus, it is a costly enterprise, and cannot live upon its income from ticket sales.

Then why not more concerts? Because there is a definite working maximum which cannot be exceeded without loss of efficiency. The Boston Symphony now gives, in Boston and on tour over the seven months from October through April, upward of 100 concerts. Add to this figure two pension fund concerts annually, about 60 Pops, 18 on the Charles River Esplanade and a dozen or more at Tanglewood, and you have an approximate total of 200. For each of the Friday-Saturday programs in Boston some four rehearsals are necessary.

Why not play in an auditorium with larger seating capacity? Because there is a point, in matter of size, beyond which the sound and power of a first-class orchestra will be diminished. There, again, quality would suffer. The size of Symphony Hall, with its capacity of 2631, is about ideal for symphonic music at its best. Furthermore, the orchestra owns Symphony Hall, and if even by a stretch of imagination, it were considered to play in a larger hall, the cost of creating an acoustically suitable one today would be fantastic.

Unless and until endowments become large enough to provide the income—and that is most unlikely—the solution is obvious. We must plan and conduct campaigns each year to maintain the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its highest peak of artistic and institutional efficiency. Not only this $250,000, but whatever deficits may exist in other years to come. By so doing we not only help music, we help our community and ourselves.

52

Cir. (D 145,494) (S 272,067)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
DEC 12 1953

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony gave the ninth program of the 73d season yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Ruth Posselt, violin. Charles Munch conducted one number on the program: the rest was conducted by Richard Burgin. The program:

Danses Concertantes .... Stravinsky
Symphonie Espagnole .... Lalo
Adagio from the Tenth Symphony .... Mahler
Italian Capriccio, Op. 45 .... Tchaikovsky

By RUDOLPH ELIE

RUTH POSSELT, without much room for doubt, is now the foremost woman violinist of the land.

She appeared yesterday as soloist in Lalo's perennially beautiful Symphonie Espagnole to honor the memory of the late Jacques Thibaud with whom she and Charles Munch were long and devotedly associated; both, in fact, were his pupils. While this no doubt lent additional fervor to the occasion for both artists, there is no questioning that it was one of the very finest traversals by soloists, conductor and orchestra alike.

Although Miss Posselt's accomplishments on [illegible] fingerboard are miracles [illegible]eed and accuracy of intonation, it is her bowing arm that provides the chiefest wonder here, for with it she draws a tone of great beauty but one of infinite gradations of color, and expressivity as well. If on occasion she is inclined to attack the G string so lustily as to produce a rasp, particularly in passages requiring the sul G effect of playing notes on that string usually played on the higher strings, it only serves to heighten the tension.

For while she plays with ease and grace, and indeed is as beautiful to watch as she is to hear, her playing is characterized by an inner fire and verve of great force. Yet with all her force of expression there is always sensibility and poetry in her playing. In short, it mingles the best aspects of the virtuoso and the musicianly, of the stage personality and the serious, devoted artist.

As it happened, her fiery approach to a whirling pizzicato passage in the finale managed to snap a string, but she exchanged instruments with Alfred Krips, the first violinist, and resumed after the slightest pause. Despite the seeming uniformity of violins, there are wide differences to sensitized fingers, and this sort of thing can throw a lesser artist, but Miss Posselt finished as though nothing had happened. Feats of this kind always especially endear a performer to an audience and Miss Posselt was given four stage calls.

Although Mr. Munch conducted this one piece, the rest of the program was led by Richard Burgin, who began the concert with a curious little set of dances by Stravinsky. The master hand is always to be heard in these five pieces for a chamber orchestra, and there are moments of great beauty, particularly in the Theme Varie and the Pas de deux. Due, however, to rather more Stravinskian emphasis than usual on angular, ever-changing rhythms, the work really needs the fluidity of motion on the ballet stage to achieve its best effect. It belongs, in fine, more in the orchestra pit than on the concert stage, but it is a work of singular charm nonetheless.

MR. BURGIN has always had a special place for Mahler and he has always demonstrated an elevated and very gifted ability to conduct it as well. The work, one of the two movements the composer completed before his death, is a lyric meditation of the most sombre and unusual beauty. Its anguish is so apparent throughout as to be almost unendurable at times and when it reaches its climax in a gigantic chord of a searing dissonance few living experts in the field could achieve it is momentously affecting. And the reluctance with which Mahler gropes his way to the final chord, as if dreading to touch it, is an awesome thing to hear.

The concert came to a clamorous conclusion with Tchaikovsky's "Italian Capriccio," a piece, obvious although it is, that sends you out into the street feeling as warm and sunny as Tchaikovsky's Italy. The program next week will be given over Berlioz' exquisite "L'Enfance du [illegible]" with soloists and [illegible]

Cir. (D 149,902) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
DEC 12 1953

MUSIC

Burgin, Munch, Posselt Appear With Symphony

Eighth pair of concerts in the Friday afternoon–Saturday evening series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Symphony Hall. The program: Stravinsky: Danses Concertantes (first performances at these concerts); Lalo: Symphonie Espagnole (in memory of Jacques Thibaud; soloist, Ruth Posselt; conducted by Charles Munch); Mahler: Adagio from the Tenth Symphony (first performances in Boston); Tchaikovsky: Italian Caprice. All but the Symphonie Espagnole was conducted by Richard Burgin.

By CYRUS DURGIN

It was a peculiar and mostly rewarding program—even if it did peter out at the end—that Richard Burgin chose for his first appearances this season conducting the Boston Symphony. Nor does he conduct the entire concert, for in the first half comes the Lalo Symphonie Espagnole, in memory of Jacques Thibaud, conducted by the late violinist's old friend and former pupil, Charles Munch. Also a devoted pupil of Thibaud was the soloist this week, violinist Ruth Posselt. No better tribute to a great French musician could have been arranged, for in addition to the personal association between him and the soloist and condoctor, the Lalo work is one which Thibaud himself had played here.

Miss Posselt gave another of her beautifully-poised, clearly-bowed and fingered performances, one that rode on a tone large and rich and bright. That is, until a point toward the close of the finale, when her E string snapped. Miss Posselt took the accident coolly in stride, swapped instruments with temporary concert master Alfred Krips and finished the piece. Meanwhile, Mr. Munch and the orchestra had given Miss Posselt a superb and full-bodied collaboration. The Symphonie Espagnole is well-worn today, old-fashioned, too, but its tunes are nice, the structure solid, and it is well worth hearing from time to time. There was most cordial response from the Friday audience, especially for Miss Posselt.

Stravinsky's Danses Concertantes, new to these concerts, probably will not turn up frequently hereafter. They are good Stravinsky and good ballet music, also decorative [illegible] but they are synthetic and sterile, and the harmonic complication sounds mostly like artificial out-of-key additions to a basically plain texture. In their tricky, buoyant rhythms the Danses Concertantes are most effective, and even there I suspect they make best effect if presented as accompaniment to dancing. Anyway, it was good to hear them from a first-rate orchestra.

The Mahler excerpt was very interesting, if long for its substance. Ernest Krenek finished in 1924 the orchestration of the incompleted sketch left by Mahler at his death in 1911. It is a meditative and sad song of death, punctuated by a horrendously dissonant chord that is both a powerful emotional climax and a chilling suggestion of annihilation. The style is typical Mahler, long-phrased melodies and a restless, constantly changing harmonic foundation which convinces you that Mahler, had he lived a while longer, would have ended in something analogous to the 12-tone style. The performance, apart from one conspicuously bad stretch of string ensemble, was eloquent and sensitive.

Mr. Burgin's conducting was, as always, of the superior and scholarly sort which has helped to win him his reputation as a notable musician. But what does he hear in Tchaikovsky's Italian Caprice that justifies disturbing the dust upon this plodding, banal score?

Cir. (D 124,110) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE
DEC 10 1953

Symphony Asks Business to Help Raise $250,000

(Pictures on Page 21)

"We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of this season," said Henry B. Cabot at a meeting of industrial leaders and others at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. "We have had to use all our cash reserves, and there is just no more money left."

"Last January we embarked upon the project of getting business interested in the orchestra," continued the president of the Symphony's trustees.

"We have had encouraging response, but there is a habit hereabouts for business to give mainly to much philanthropic causes as the Community Fund, and we know it will take a long time to alter this habit. Some forms of business enterprise, like utilities, are prevented by regulatory statutes from making contributions.

"We have worked out an idea, however, which I think will make it possible for some forms of business to donate money to the orchestra: I have outlined the plan to four insurance men and they thought favorably of it.

"This plan would be what you might call 'premium advertising' in the Boston Symphony program book, at a page rate of about $2500. Thereby they can both advertise and simultaneously assist Boston's great cultural asset."

Won't Reduce Quality

Cabot and Michael T. Kelleher, also a Symphony trustee and former Fire Commissioner of Boston, were the principal speakers at this meeting, which was another step in the campaign to enlist financial support of business in the New England area.

"The Boston Symphony is one of the great orchestras of the world; we need help and we are going to get it, with all your help," said Kelleher. "We are not going to let the orchestra go, or cut down the number or quality of musicians.

"By 1954 I think we shall have worked out a method whereby some businesses, such as banks, now prevented from giving money, will be able to do so. I am happy to report that through the efforts of Daniel Bloomfield, head of the Retail Trade Board, the stores of Boston have agreed to permit solicitation of funds in the stores. I want also to thank Herbert Fenderson of the City of Boston law department for his efforts which led to action upon the part of Mayor Hynes and the City of Boston in exempting the Symphony Hall property from taxes. That will save us $34,000 this year.

"Just today Harold D. Hodgkinson sent us a personal gift of $1000. That is new money for the orchestra. This had nothing to do with Filene's; that gift will come later. I have to thank, also, Frank Sawyer of the Checker Taxi Company for $500, more new money for the orchestra. We have been helped, too, by Adrian O'Keefe of the First National Stores—one of the early contributors; by Peter Fuller, president of the Boston Cadillac agency, for his father, Alvan T. Fuller; Peter Fuller was responsible for the large advertisement which appeared in the Boston newspapers today. The Polaroid Company, too, has been helpful."

Donors at Meeting

All of the donors and others named by Kelleher present at the meeting, as were Ralph Lowell, president of the Boston Safe Deposit and Trust Company; Rev. Palfrey Perkins, Francis W. Hatch, Edward A. Taft, M. A. De Wolfe Howe and Philip R. Allen of the Boston Symphony trustees and Jerome D. Greene.

Before the meeting the guests listened to a rehearsal of Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole, conducted by Charles Munch, with Ruth Posselt as violin soloist. Munch addressed the gathering:

"Gentlemen: Thank you for coming. I wish to tell you that I have conducted many orchestras in my lifetime, but not one is so close to my heart as the Boston Symphony. I hope it will be close to your hearts, also."

In this campaign for funds, Kelleher will seek contributions from business firms, while Rev. Palfrey Perkins will solicit individuals.

SYM[illegible]NY HALL

Guard Republican Band of Paris

The Guard Republican Band of Pa Capt. Francois-Julien Brun conduct gave a concert last night in Sympho Hall; Arthur Fiedler and Charles Mun were the guest conductors. The pr gram:

Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini" .... Berl
Recitative and Polonaise .... Web
Second Hungarian Rhapsody Li
Bolero .... Ra
Prelude a L'Apres-Midi D'un Faune .... Debu
"Till Eulenspiegel's" Merry Pranks .... R. Stra Martial Music from the Revolution to Present.

Last year the Boston Symphony conquered France; wi meticulous Gallic courtes France returned the favor i Symphony Hall last night.

The Guard Republican Band o Paris, playing before a capacit —and wildly enthusiastic—aud ence for the Symphony's Pensio Fund, triumphed so completel it is almost superfluous to ad they are the ranking musical o ganization of its kind in th world today. The musicians, re splendent in red, blue and blac uniforms, cockaded fore-and-a hats, medals and clusters braid, are a treat to the ey They are even kinder to the ea

If you can imagine a symphonic band, accustomed as w are to the "oomph" traditio that has the character of t best French playing in string light, dry, crisp and eminent musical, you might get a remo idea of how the Guard Repub can sounds; not a brass band the true sense of the word, sin double base and harp are e ployed, but an instrument of finite military precision a buoyant resonance. Their rector, Capt. François-Juli Brun, presents his clarinets the fore and the other choirs balanced and blended w matchless virtuosity.

Capt. Brun's conducting military, too, sharply-defin free of mannerism. The ensem reacts as though on a para ground, but with the ideal thusiasm apparent in pr sionals who know their wo an extraordinarily respon spirit informing the music. T are, as any great band should spirited. The brass floods in bright, golden unique surge; woodwinds are liquid in text the temper of the band is f precise, spit-and-polish.

Moreover their arrangem are superb. I didn't th "L'Apres Midi," came off, m nificently played though it since the final effect of [illegible] tenuous delicacy seems [illegible] thing of a tour-de-force [illegible] a band. "Till Eulenspiegel," [illegible] ever, sounded as if Stra[illegible] had written with brass concertizing in [illegible]. Charles Munch [illegible] on hand to lend animation [illegible] Ravel's "Bolero" and Arthur [illegible], Chevalier of the Legion [illegible], led "The Stars and Stripes Forever," with immense [illegible]. A special word should [illegible] for the exceptional so[illegible] of Henri Bruart and [illegible] on clarinet and flu[illegible] close, the audienc[illegible] called back Capt. [illegible] again, conquered by [illegible] and refusing to surre[illegible] moment.

[illegible]

Cir. (D 294,859) (S 252,207)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
DEC 12 1953

/

12, 1953

Violinist Not Upset By Snapped String

Violinist Ruth Posselt [illegible] more than 2000 people [illegible] programmed thrill at [illegible] day afternoon's concert in Symphony Hall. A string of [illegible] violin snapped while she played as soloist the "Symphonie Espagnole" with the 100-man Boston Symphony Orchestra. There was a moment of hush in the audience. The orchestra came to a stop. Miss Posselt calmly walked to the first violinist, exchanged fiddles with him, conferred briefly with Conductor Charles Munch about where to pick up the symphony, then continued brilliantly, finishing to an ovation. Veteran observers said the incident was almost unprecedented.

Garde Republicaine Band Wins Rousing Reception

Concert by the Garde Republicaine Band of Paris, at Symphony Hall last night, to benefit the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Capt Francois-Julien Brun, conductor. The program: Berlioz Overture, "Benvenuto Celini"; Weber: Recitative and Polonaise (clarinet soloist, Henri Druart); Liszt: Second Hungarian Rhapsody; Ravel: Bolero (conducted by Charles Munch); Debussy: Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun (flute soloist, Henri Lebon); Strauss: "Till Eulenspiegal"; French Martial Music from the Revolution to the Present—Chant du Depart, Mehul: Marche Consulaire, traditional: "Sambre et Meuse," Planquette: "Pere de la Victoire," Ganne: "Rhin et Danube," Brun: Marche Americaine ("The Stars and Stripes Forever"), Sousa (conducted by Arthur Fiedler).

Symphony Hall rang with applause, cheers and stamping last night, after Capt François-Julien Brun had conducted encores following the stated program of the Garde Republicaine Band. Every decibel was thoroughly merited, for here is one of the great bands of the world, a truly virtuoso aggregation that can play with the delicacy of a symphonic orchestra or roar with a fortissimo of thunder.

Properly styled Batterie et Musique de la Garde Republicaine, this band is large, with many clarinets, and generous proportions of flutes, oboes and brass. Its players are the pick of French wind musicians. For concert occasions like this, there are also two string basses and a harp.

The high peak of virtuosity—and dazzling, indeed, it was! — came with band arrangements of the Debussy and Strauss symphonic works. Re-scored with amazing cleverness, and performed in the same fashion, these familiar pieces showed what a gossamer tone the Garde Republicaine Band can sustain, as well as its extreme sensitivity, lightning response and flexibility of rhythm. The same was true with Ravel's Bolero, which, conducted by the man we now regard as "our own" Charles Munch, went at a fine, deliberate pace and was a steady crescendo.

But it was the French military music, and Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever," which put everyone in Symphony Hall to sitting straight up, raised hair on one's head and chills along the spine. Here you were faced with that fundamental, semi-exalting effect of a great military band which plays with glittering precision and an unconquerable fierceness of spirit.

The Sousa work, incidentally, was conducted by Arthur Fiedler upon invitation of Capt Brun, as Harry Ellis Dickson, Boston Symphony violinist, explained from the stage. As a director of the orchestra's pension fund, Mr. Dickson thanked the Garde Republicaine Band for their friendly cooperation. The evening began with the National Anthems.

Capt Brun was recalled again and again, and the terrific enthusiasm was as much a token of regard for his splendid [illegible] as conductor as for the [illegible] performance of a truly g[illegible] band.

C. W. D.

52

Cir. (D 145,494) (S 272,057)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
DEC 12 1953

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony gave the ninth program of the 73d season yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Ruth Posselt, violin. Charles Munch conducted one number on the program: the rest was conducted by Richard Burgin. The program:

Danses Concertantes .... Stravinsky
Symphonie Espagnole .... Lalo
Adagio from the Tenth Symphony .... Mahler
Italian Capriccio, Op. 45 ... Tchaikovsky

By RUDOLPH ELIE

RUTH POSSELT, without much room for doubt, is now the foremost woman violinist of the land.

She appeared yesterday as soloist in Lalo's perennially beautiful Symphonie Espagnole to honor the memory of the late Jacques Thibaud with whom she and Charles Munch were long and devotedly associated; both, in fact, were his pupils. While this no doubt lent additional fervor to the occasion for both artists, there is no questioning that it was one of the very finest traversals by soloists, conductor and orchestra alike.

Although Miss Posselt's accomplishments on [illegible] fingerboard are miracles [illegible]eed and accuracy of intonation, it is her bowing arm that provides the chiefest wonder here, for with it she draws a tone of great beauty but one of infinite gradations of color, and expressivity as well. If on occasion she is inclined to attack the G string so lustily as to produce a rasp, particularly in passages requiring the sul G effect of playing notes on that string usually played on the higher strings, it only serves to heighten the tension.

For while she plays with ease and grace, and indeed is as beautiful to watch as she is to hear, her playing is characterized by an inner fire and verve of great force. Yet with all her force of expression there is always sensibility and poetry in her playing. In short, it mingles the best aspects of the virtuoso and the musicianly, of the stage personality and the serious, devoted artist.

As it happened, her fiery approach to a whirling pizzicato passage in the finale managed to snap a string, but she exchanged instruments with Alfred Krips, the first violinist, and resumed after the slightest pause. Despite the seeming uniformity of violins, there are wide differences to sensitized fingers, and this sort of thing can throw a lesser artist, but Miss Posselt finished as though nothing had happened. Feats of this kind always especially endear a performer to an audience and Miss Posselt was given four stage calls.

Although Mr. Munch conducted this one piece, the rest of the program was led by Richard Burgin, who began the concert with a curious little set of dances by Stravinsky. The master hand is always to be heard in these five pieces for a chamber orchestra, and there are moments of great beauty, particularly in the Theme Varie and the Pas de deux. Due, however, to rather more Stravinskian emphasis than usual on angular, ever-changing rhythms, the work really needs the fluidity of motion on the ballet stage to achieve its best effect. It belongs, in fine, more in the orchestra pit than on the concert stage, but it is a work of singular charm nonetheless.

MR. BURGIN has always had a special place for Mahler and he has always demonstrated an elevated and very gifted ability to conduct it as well. The work, one of the two movements the composer completed before his death, is a lyric meditation of the most sombre and unusual beauty. Its anguish is so apparent throughout as to be almost unendurable at times and when it reaches its climax in a gigantic chord of a searing dissonance few living experts in the field could achieve it is momentously affecting. And the reluctance with which Mahler gropes his way to the final chord, as if dreading to touch it, is an awesome thing to hear.

The concert came to a clamorous conclusion with Tchaikovsky's "Italian Capriccio," a piece, obvious although it is, that sends you out into the street feeling as warm and sunny as Tchaikovsky's Italy. The program next week will be given over Berlioz' exquisite "L'Enfance du Christ" with soloists and [illegible]

Cir. (D 149,902) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
DEC 12 1953

MUSIC

Burgin, Munch, Posselt Appear With Symphony

Eighth pair of concerts in the Friday afternoon-Saturday evening series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Symphony Hall. The program: Stravinsky: Danses Concertantes (first performances at these concerts); Lalo: Symphonie Espagnole (in memory of Jacques Thibaud; soloist, Ruth Posselt; conducted by Charles Munch); Mahler: Adagio from the Tenth Symphony (first performances in Boston); Tchaikovsky: Italian Caprice. All but the Symphonie Espagnole was conducted by Richard Burgin.

By CYRUS DURGIN

It was a peculiar and mostly rewarding program—even if it did peter out at the end—that Richard Burgin chose for his first appearances this season conducting the Boston Symphony. Nor does he conduct the entire concert, for in the first half comes the Lalo Symphonie Espagnole, in memory of Jacques Thibaud, conducted by the late violinist's old friend and former pupil, Charles Munch. Also a devoted pupil of Thibaud was the soloist this week, violinist Ruth Posselt. No better tribute to a great French musician could have been arranged, for in addition to the personal association between him and the soloist and condoctor, the Lalo work is one which Thibaud himself had played here.

Miss Posselt gave another of her beautifully-poised, clearly-bowed and fingered performances, one that rode on a tone large and rich and bright. That is, until a point toward the close of the finale, when her E string snapped. Miss Posselt took the accident coolly in stride, swapped instruments with temporary concert master Alfred Krips and finished the piece. Meanwhile, Mr. Munch and the orchestra had given Miss Posselt a superb and full-bodied collaboration. The Symphonie Espagnole is well-worn today, old-fashioned, too, but its tunes are nice, the structure solid, and it is well worth hearing from time to time. There was most cordial response from the Friday audience, especially for Miss Posselt.

Stravinsky's Danses Concertantes, new to these concerts, probably will not turn up frequently hereafter. They are good Stravinsky and good ballet music, also decorative [illegible] but they are synthetic and sterile, and the harmonic complication sounds mostly like artificial out-of-key additions to a basically plain texture. In their tricky, buoyant rhythms the Danses Concertantes are most effective, and even there I suspect they make best effect if presented as accompaniment to dancing. Anyway, it was good to hear them from a first-rate orchestra.

The Mahler excerpt was very interesting, if long for its substance. Ernest Krenek finished in 1924 the orchestration of the incompleted sketch left by Mahler at his death in 1911. It is a meditative and sad song of death, punctuated by a horrendously dissonant chord that is both a powerful emotional climax and a chilling suggestion of annihilation. The style is typical Mahler, long-phrased melodies and a restless, constantly changing harmonic foundation which convinces you that Mahler, had he lived a while longer, would have ended in something analogous to the 12-tone style. The performance, apart from one conspicuously bad stretch of string ensemble, was eloquent and sensitive.

Mr. Burgin's conducting was, as always, of the superior and scholarly sort which has helped to win him his reputation as a notable musician. But what does he hear in Tchaikovsky's Italian Caprice that justifies disturbing the dust upon this plodding, banal score?

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Guard Republican Band of Paris

The Guard Republican Band of Paris, Capt. Francois-Julien Brun conductor, gave a concert last night in Symphony Hall; Arthur Fiedler and Charles Munch were the guest conductors. The program:

Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini" .... Berlioz
Recitative and Polonaise .... Weber
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
Bolero .... Ravel
Prelude a L'Apres-Midi D'un Faune .... Debussy
"Till Eulenspiegel's" Merry Pranks .... R. Strauss Martial Music from the Revolution to the Present.

Last year the Boston Symphony conquered France; with meticulous Gallic courtesy France returned the favor in Symphony Hall last night.

The Guard Republican Band of Paris, playing before a capacity—and wildly enthusiastic—audience for the Symphony's Pension Fund, triumphed so completely it is almost superfluous to add they are the ranking musical organization of its kind in the world today. The musicians, resplendent in red, blue and black uniforms, cockaded fore-and-aft hats, medals and clusters of braid, are a treat to the eye. They are even kinder to the ear.

If you can imagine a symphonic band, accustomed as we are to the "oomph" tradition, that has the character of the best French playing in strings, light, dry, crisp and eminently musical, you might get a remote idea of how the Guard Republican sounds; not a brass band in the true sense of the word, since double base and harp are employed, but an instrument of infinite military precision and buoyant resonance. Their director, Capt. Francois-Julien Brun, presents his clarinets to the fore and the other choirs are balanced and blended with matchless virtuosity.

Capt. Brun's conducting is military, too, sharply-defined, free of mannerism. The ensemble reacts as though on a parade-ground, but with the ideal enthusiasm apparent in professionals who know their work, an extraordinarily responsive spirit informing the music. They are, as any great band should be, spirited. The brass floods in a bright, golden unique surge; the woodwinds are liquid in texture; the temper of the band is fiery, precise, spit-and-polish.

Moreover their arrangements are superb. I didn't think "L'Apres Midi," came off, magnificently played though it was, since the final effect of this tenuous delicacy seems something of a tour-de-force with a band. "Till Eulenspiegel," however, sounded as if Strauss had written with brass concertizing in mind. Charles Munch was on hand to lend animation to Ravel's "Bolero" and Arthur Fiedler, Chevalier of the Legion of Honor, led "The Stars and Stripes Forever," with immense [illegible]. A special word should be added for the exceptional solo work of Henri Bruart and [illegible] Lebon on clarinet and flute. [illegible] the close, the audience [illegible] called back Capt. [illegible] again, conquered by the old guard and refusing to surrender the moment.

Cir. (D 294,859) (S 252,207)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
DEC 12 1953

Music in Review

By TUCKER KEISER

Yesterday afternoon Charles Munch shared podium honors with Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor, at the Symphony Concert. Mr. Burgin conducted two works never before performed during these concerts, Stravinsky's Danses Concertantes and the Adagio from Mahler's Tenth Symphony, as well as the Tchaikovsky warhorse, Italian Caprice. Mr. Munch dedicated his reading of Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole to the memory of Jacques Thibaud, the great French violinist who died earlier this year. Ruth Posselt was the soloist.

The Danses Concertantes, scored for chamber orchestra, is a ballet arranged by the composer for concert performances and is a brilliant academic exercise in sonorities and tricky rhythms. A ballet version makes visible the melodic line and rhythmic complexities; but, like most ballet scores performed in concert halls, this work is considerably less effective when its appeal is purely aural.

Mahler, like Bruckner with whom he is so often linked, is most eloquent in his adagios, always movements of some length. This Adagio from the posthumous Tenth Symphony is a powerful work, expansive and profound. The long opening theme in the violas describes a tortured soul seeking the meaning of life, the violent outburst in the middle portrays the anguished realization that man wages a battle he cannot win, and the long epilogue expresses poignantly the resigned acceptance of fated disaster.

Symphonie Espagnole was an odd work to be dedicated to the memory of one of our greatest violinists. Perhaps some very personal and private reason prompted Mr. Munch in this choice. Nevertheless, there was great rapport between conductor and soloist and the performance made the effect intended, flashy and colorful. Miss Posselt merited the resounding ovation she received for her spirited playing and for her poise exhibited in the last movement when a broken string forced her to borrow the concertmaster's instrument to conclude the final bars.

Tchaikovsky's Italian Caprice, another hemi-demi-semi-classical item, closed the program. Mr. Burgin elected to take this short piece at snail's pace, squeezing every bit of resonance from Tchaikovsky's notes. This deprived the work of its Italian vivacity but made it evident that a conductor who wishes to can still draw a beautiful and rich tone from our orchestra.

12, 1953

Violinist Not Upset By Snapped String

Violinist Ruth Posselt gave more than 2000 people an unprogrammed thrill at yesterday afternoon's concert in Symphony Hall. A string of her violin snapped while she played as soloist the "Symphonie Espagnole" with the 100-man Boston Symphony Orchestra. There was a moment of hush in the audience. The orchestra came to a stop. Miss Posselt calmly walked to the first violinist, exchanged fiddles with him, conferred briefly with Conductor Charles Munch about where to pick up the symphony, then continued brilliantly, finishing to an ovation. Veteran observers said the incident was almost unprecedented.

Garde Republicaine Band Wins Rousing Reception

Concert by the Garde Republicaine Band of Paris, at Symphony Hall last night, to benefit the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Capt Francois-Julien Brun, conductor. The program: Berlioz: Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"; Weber: Recitative and Polonaise (clarinet soloist, Henri Druart); Liszt: Second Hungarian Rhapsody; Ravel: Bolero (conducted by Charles Munch); Debussy: Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun (flute soloist, Henri Lebon); Strauss: "Till Eulenspiegal"; French Martial Music from the Revolution to the Present—Chant du Depart, Mehul: Marche Consulaire, traditional: "Sambre et Meuse," Planquette: "Pere de la Victoire," Ganne: "Rhin et Danube," Brun: Marche Americaine ("The Stars and Stripes Forever"), Sousa (conducted by Arthur Fiedler).

Symphony Hall rang with applause, cheers and stamping last night, after Capt François-Julien Brun had conducted encores following the stated program of the Garde Republicaine Band. Every decibel was thoroughly merited, for here is one of the great bands of the world, a truly virtuoso aggregation that can play with the delicacy of a symphonic orchestra or roar with a fortissimo of thunder.

Properly styled Batterie et Musique de la Garde Republicaine this band is large, with many clarinets, and generous proportions of flutes, oboes and brass. Its players are the pick of French wind musicians. For concert occasions like this, there are also two string basses and a harp.

The high peak of virtuosity—and dazzling, indeed, it was! — came with band arrangements of the Debussy and Strauss symphonic works. Re-scored with amazing cleverness, and performed in the same fashion, these familiar pieces showed what a gossamer tone the Garde Republicaine Band can sustain, as well as its extreme sensitivity, lightning response and flexibility of rhythm. The same was true with Ravel's Bolero, which, conducted by the man we now regard as "our own" Charles Munch, went at a fine, deliberate pace and was a steady crescendo.

But it was the French military music, and Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever," which put everyone in Symphony Hall to sitting straight up, raised hair on one's head and chills along the spine. Here you were faced with that fundamental, semi-exalting effect of a great military band which plays with glittering precision and an unconquerable fierceness of spirit.

The Sousa work, incidentally was conducted by Arthur Fiedler upon invitation of Capt Brun, as Harry Ellis Dickson, Boston Symphony violinist, explained from the stage. As a director of the orchestra's pension fund, Mr. Dickson thanked the Garde Republicaine Band for their friendly cooperation. The evening began with the National Anthems.

Capt Brun was recalled again and again, and the terrific enthusiasm was as much a token of regard for his splendid qualities as conductor as for the marvelous performance of a truly great band.

C. W. D.

Dear Su

Do you
The reg and New season; players that mor and tha records
prise i

Of this on reco a consi contrib an esse front r financi

Your att feelings
Trustees would fi
two thou
Mr. Cabo year, ho
Won't yo Orchestr

I enclo
in the 53 65

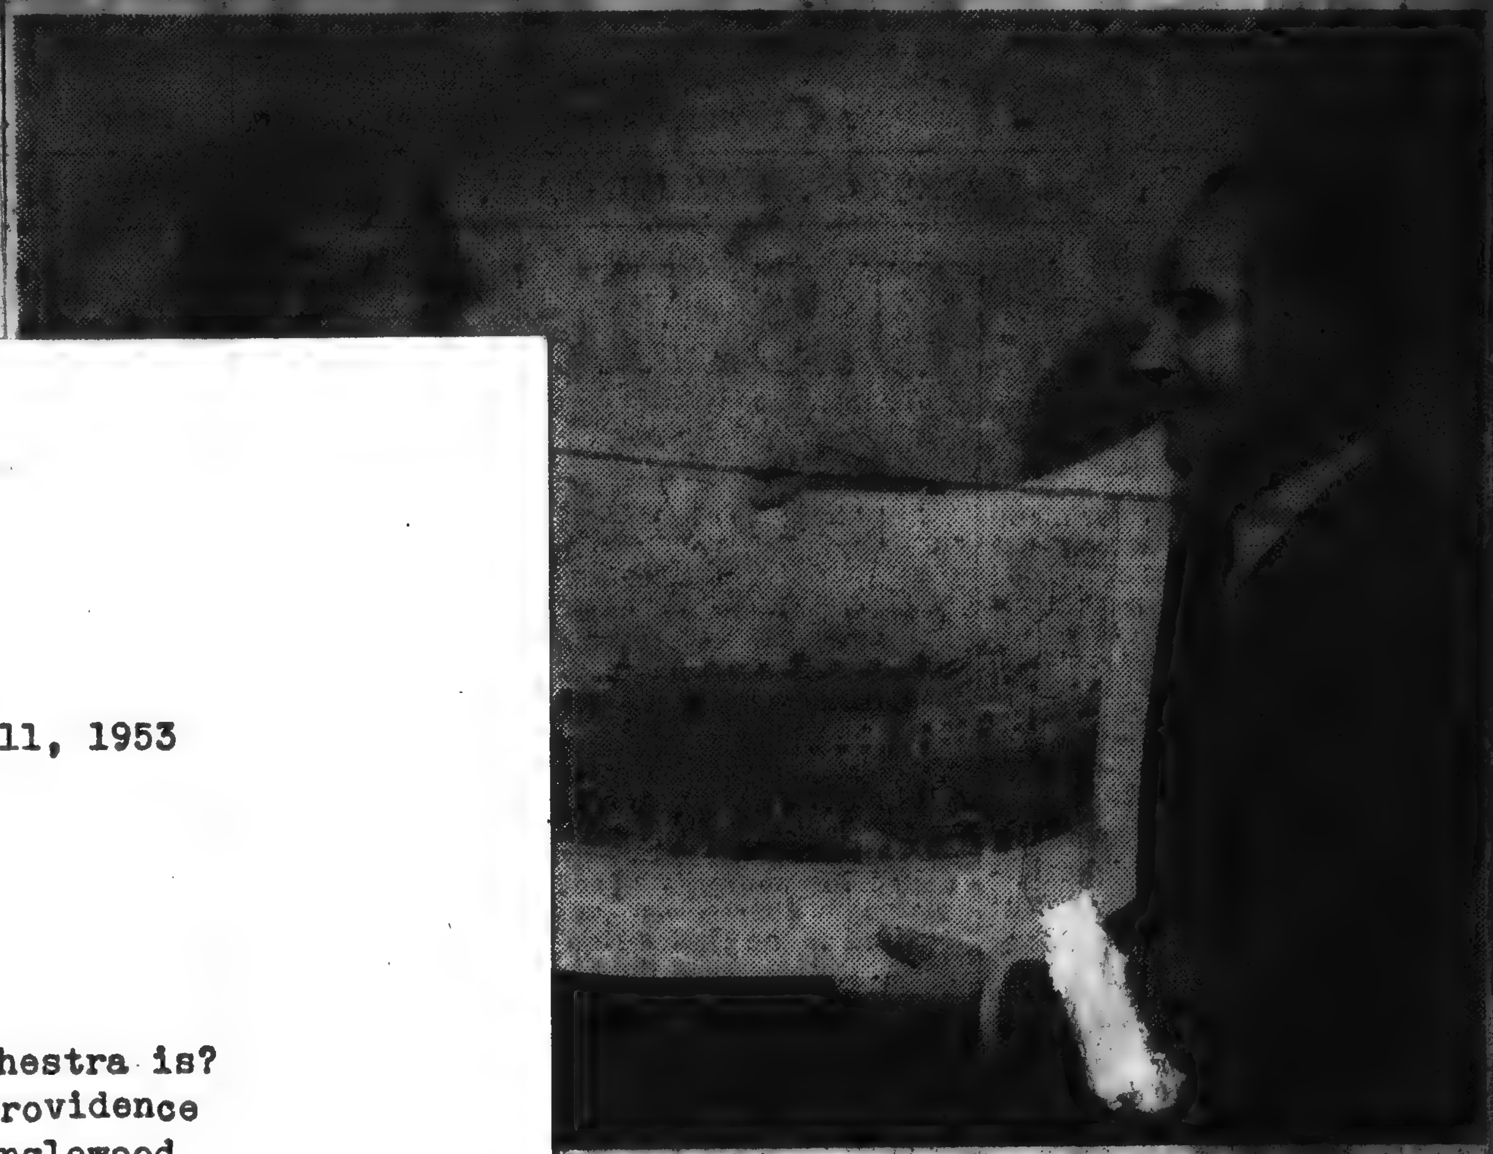
This Clipping From
NEW YORK TIMES
DEC 13 1953

PICKING UP AGAIN

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1953



Jubilee. Mr. Whitney heard the band just 50 years ago in San Francisco and now has come to Boston from Connecticut to hear it again. He met the French consul-general, François Charles-Roux, right, at Symphony Hall.

SYMPHONY HALL · BOSTON

December 11, 1953

Dear Subscriber,

Do you realize how hard-working the Boston Symphony Orchestra is? The regular subscription series in Boston, Cambridge, Providence and New York; the Pops and Esplanade concerts; the Tanglewood season; the extended tours - these occupy the full time of the players for at least forty-five weeks each year. Do you realize that more than 700,000 "live" listeners hear its performances, and that there are thousands more who listen on radio and on records? Do you realize that the cost of operating this enterprise is about 1 3/4 million dollars a year?

Of this great sum roughly 85% comes from ticket sales, royalties on recordings and endowment income. The remaining 15% - a considerable amount if you figure it out - must be raised by contributions from those men and women who value the Orchestra as an essential asset to our community and who believe that its very front rank place in the world of music must not be endangered by financial insecurity.

Your attendance at these concerts is evidence that you share these feelings. Your interest has been deeply appreciated by the Trustees. Indeed, were it not for friends like you, the Orchestra would find it difficult - perhaps impossible - to continue. Nearly two thousand Friends have already responded generously to Mr. Cabot's October letter. If we are to make both ends meet this year, however, another hundred score must respond as generously. Won't you be among them and make a Christmas gift to your Orchestra now?

Yours sincerely,

Palfrey Perkins

Chairman, Special Friends' Committee

I enclose a reprint of the advertisement you may have already seen in the Boston papers.

THE WOONSOCKET (R.I.) CALL
December 11, 1953

Editorial

Save The Symphony

New Englanders rightfully regard as their own, institutions, aggregations or what have you that are actually located in Boston. We think at once of athletic teams such as the Red Sox, the Bruins and the Celtics. None of them could exist, financially, if they depended solely upon the city of Boston for their support. So they don't. They get support from all over New England which, incidentally, didn't think enough of the Braves in recent years, forcing that baseball team to seek financial refuge in Milwaukee.

No doubt Boston athletic institutions receive far more support from New England than does the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is too bad because in musical circles the Boston Symphony is regarded as the greatest symphony orchestra in the world. It is an orchestra of which all New England can be proud; and right now it needs financial help.

No doubt this help will be forthcoming, especially from business and industrial firms which can afford it. Yet, the Boston Symphony is certainly beneficial to the cultural welfare of our entire area and everyone who possibly can should contribute his share. Boston, itself, is rallying to save the symphony which, by the way, needs $250,000 to meet its obligations for the current season. That may seem like a lot of money to maintain an orchestra, but after all, there is only one Boston Symphony.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony trustees, admits that the drive for support will take time and hard work, but he reported an initial success, among insurance firms, with his plan of "donation-advertising" under which firms will pay a premium price for page advertisements in symphony programs. At the same time, a number of business establishments in Boston have pledged generous financial contributions.

What does it cost to maintain such an aggregation? Well, George E. Judd, orchestra manager, reports that the annual budget of the orchestra of 104 artists is $1,500,000. Of this amount concert receipts account for about $1 million. The rest must come from record royalties, earnings on endowments and other income such as rental of Symphony Hall.

But despite two increases in ticket prices in the past five years deficits in that time have consumed all unrestricted legacies and gifts. In addition, $37,000 of this year's income had to go to pay last year's debts. All this holds true now, Mr. Judd reported, despite generous contributions from "Friends of the Orchestra" which averaged $151,660 per year and a check for $13,450 this year from Boston business places.

So the symphony is in financial difficulties. But New Englanders who regard the orchestra as their own will, we have no doubt, come to its aid and keep in this area the world's finest symphony orchestra.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
DEC 13 1953

Berkshire Hills C
Offers Servic

Even Arranged Baby-Sitting f ed to Hear Boston

Pittsfield—The year-round attractions of Massachusetts' famed Berkshire Hills are made more convenient for tourists by the Berkshire Hills Conference.

Conference Director John F. Downing and his staff handle all types of requests from persons who want to spend their vacations or week ends here.

It was only last summer that the conference received a request from a Boston couple who wanted erature and further information will be provided on request.

Orchestra—or an art museum, a public library, a Latin School or a cathedral—on a cold cash basis.

Yet the Boston Symphony orchestra needs money.

You have to pay Samuel Mayes even if you couldn't buy the tone of his cello for a hundred times his salary.

It costs money to operate the busiest symphony in the country—the regular series, the open rehearsals, the Sunday series and the Tuesday series, the Cambridge performances, Tanglewood, Pops, the Esplanade, recordings and FM broadcasts, a European and a transcontinental tour. But you cannot tell, in dollars and cents, what those performances have meant to the spirit and mind of those who have come under the orchestra's spell.

Beauty—free, creative, original beauty—can't be sold on the market place. Its cultivation can mean prestige for a city, it can attract people to a shopping center, it can bring people to live nearby, it can inspire students, it can argue a way of life—of a million dollars. In an anci society a duke might become patron; in Europe the state suppo its orchestras; in other days a f rich people could underwrite the lo

Last year Boston business ga
$13,450. Perhaps this is the begi ning of an exciting trend in whi free business enterprise will suppo
free artistic enterprise.

We are not sure. We are su that some answer must be found.

Civilization is measured by thos societies which have given expres sion to the ideas, emotions, hope dreams and sensibilities which are th core of that thing we call the sou of man.

The Boston Symphony Orchestr is a great, free voice which give man's spirit both song and comfor
Without our great necessary lux uries—the symphony, the library the art museum, the classroom, the church, the garden, the theatre—our life would be an empty room.

Living would be a matter of longevity alone. We desperately need the great, free voice of the Boston Symphony, alive and lusty in our midst.

---

more of the "in memoriam" mood, eloquently impassioned and richly toned. The Finale, 53 65

1953

1953 iolinist Not Upse

y Snapped String
Violinist Ruth

ymphonic
d with amazing performed in the
ese familiar pieces
ossamer tone the ne Band can sus-its extreme senresponse and ythm. The same Ravel's Bolero,
by the man we ur own" Charles a fine, deliberate
steady crescendo.
French military sa's "Stars and
," which put mphony Hall to
, raised hair on chills along the were faced with l, semi-exalting
t military band glittering precinquerable fierce-

rk, incidentally,
y Arthur Fiedler, of Capt Brun, as son, Boston Sym-explained from director of the on fund, Mr. Dick-
e Garde Republitheir friendly covening began with
thems.
as recalled again
the terrific en-much [illegible] of splendi[illegible]lities for the [illegible]lous truly g[illegible]and.

C. W. D.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK TIMES
DEC 13 1953

PICKING UP AGAIN

Musical Excellence of 'Pelleas'; M
And Morel's Conducting Im

By OLIN DOWNES

Brahms Program

On Thursday evening, George was guest conductor of the armonic-Symphony, with an -Brahms program. He was as- d by Eugene Istomin, as solo- in the performance of the B- Piano Concerto. The lovely No. 2, with the great made a full evening's But the evening was a too happy one for the inter- Brahms either! The mphony moved stiffly and dryly. Istomin, whose youthful fire and enthusiasm are immediately manifest, pounded and forced tone of the time.

The week of orchestral concerts ended for this writer with a final : Charles Munch's reading of Eroica" Symphony. This was aturday afternoon, December in Carnegie Hall, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first movement, in particular, was memorable, and, in the same sense as the interpretation of the Elgar piece, a fresh experience. We had not heard, in a long time, in such momentous accents, the true voice of Beethoven. Indeed, in certain aspects and inflections, the reading was heroic in utterance, Promethean in spirit, yet wonderfully plastic and tender.

Mr. Munch played the Funeral March as the epical lament that it is, yet he also made it intensely human and poignant. The height of it all was the finale, with the mysterious summons of the reiter- B-flats, and the variants that cosmic.

One could speak almost as highly of the performance of Debussy's "Iberia" that followed. It was rarely full-blooded, spontaneous, direct and virile. In this score Debussy holds out both hands to life, and such was the nature of the performance.

Copland Concerto

Aaron Copland's Piano Concerto, with Leo Smit as soloist, brought this concert to an end. The concerto, played very efficiently and understandingly by Mr. Smit, is boldly experimental, here and there, with motives fashioned from the stuff of our "blues" and "jazz." This is Copland in a formative stage. The concerto dates from 1927. It is not well put together, continuous in its thinking. Mr. Copland has written much better music.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK TIMES
DEC 13 1953

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN NEW FUND PLEA

Business Men Urged to Bolster 72-Year-Old Organization—$250,000 Needed for Season

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Dec. 12—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has enriched this city's cultural life for seventy-two years, called this week on the business community to help restore its depleted capital assets.

In a frank statement on the orchestra's financial condition, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, told a group of business leaders that $250,000 was needed to keep the world-famous institution solvent in this seventy-third season.

Mr. Cabot said that there had been an "encouraging response" to a drive among business men since last January, but that regulatory statutes, for example, had prevented some enterprises, such as utilities, from contributing. He added that he had worked out a plan to overcome that snag.

The orchestra will offer advertising space in its program book at a rate of about $2,500 a page, which would permit any business house to advertise, and at the same time "assist Boston's great cultural asset," Mr. Cabot went on.

Leaders Attend Rehearsal

As a setting for the appeal, Boston's business leaders were invited to attend a rehearsal of the orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch, who conducted the Lalo Violin Concerto, with Ruth Posselt as soloist.

Mr. Munch, who succeeded Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in 1949, told his audience that while he had conducted many orchestras, "none is so close to my heart as the Boston Symphony, and I hope it will be close to your hearts, also."

Later, George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, reported that the annual budget for the organization of 104 artists was $1,500,000. He said that concert receipts accounted for $1,000,000, but that the rest must come from record royalties, earnings on endowments and rentals of Symphony Hall for other purposes.

Despite two increases in seat prices in the last five years, deficits have consumed all unrestricted legacies and gifts, Mr. Judd added. He revealed further that $37,000 of this year's receipts had gone to pay last year's debts.

This has held true despite contributions averaging $151,660 from "friends of the orchestra," and $13,450 from Boston business this year so far, he explained.

Noting that Detroit had raised $400,230 for its orchestra last year and Chicago $311,441, Michael T. Kelleher, a trustee, emphasized that Boston "could let our orchestra go, or reduce the number of players, but we don't intend to do that."

Cir. (D. 89,838)

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
DEC 13 1953

Berkshire Hills
Offers Servi

Even Arranged Baby-Sittin
ed to Hear Bost

Pittsfield—The year-round attractions of Massachusetts' famed Berkshire Hills are made more convenient for tourists by the Berkshire Hills Conference.

Conference Director John F. Downing and his staff handle all types of requests from persons who want to spend their vacations or week ends here.

It was only last summer that the conference received a reques from a Boston couple who wanted to progr

Orch
ern was child
ters.
Th
lem secu of t regi
The
hom
of whil thei
Al be shir
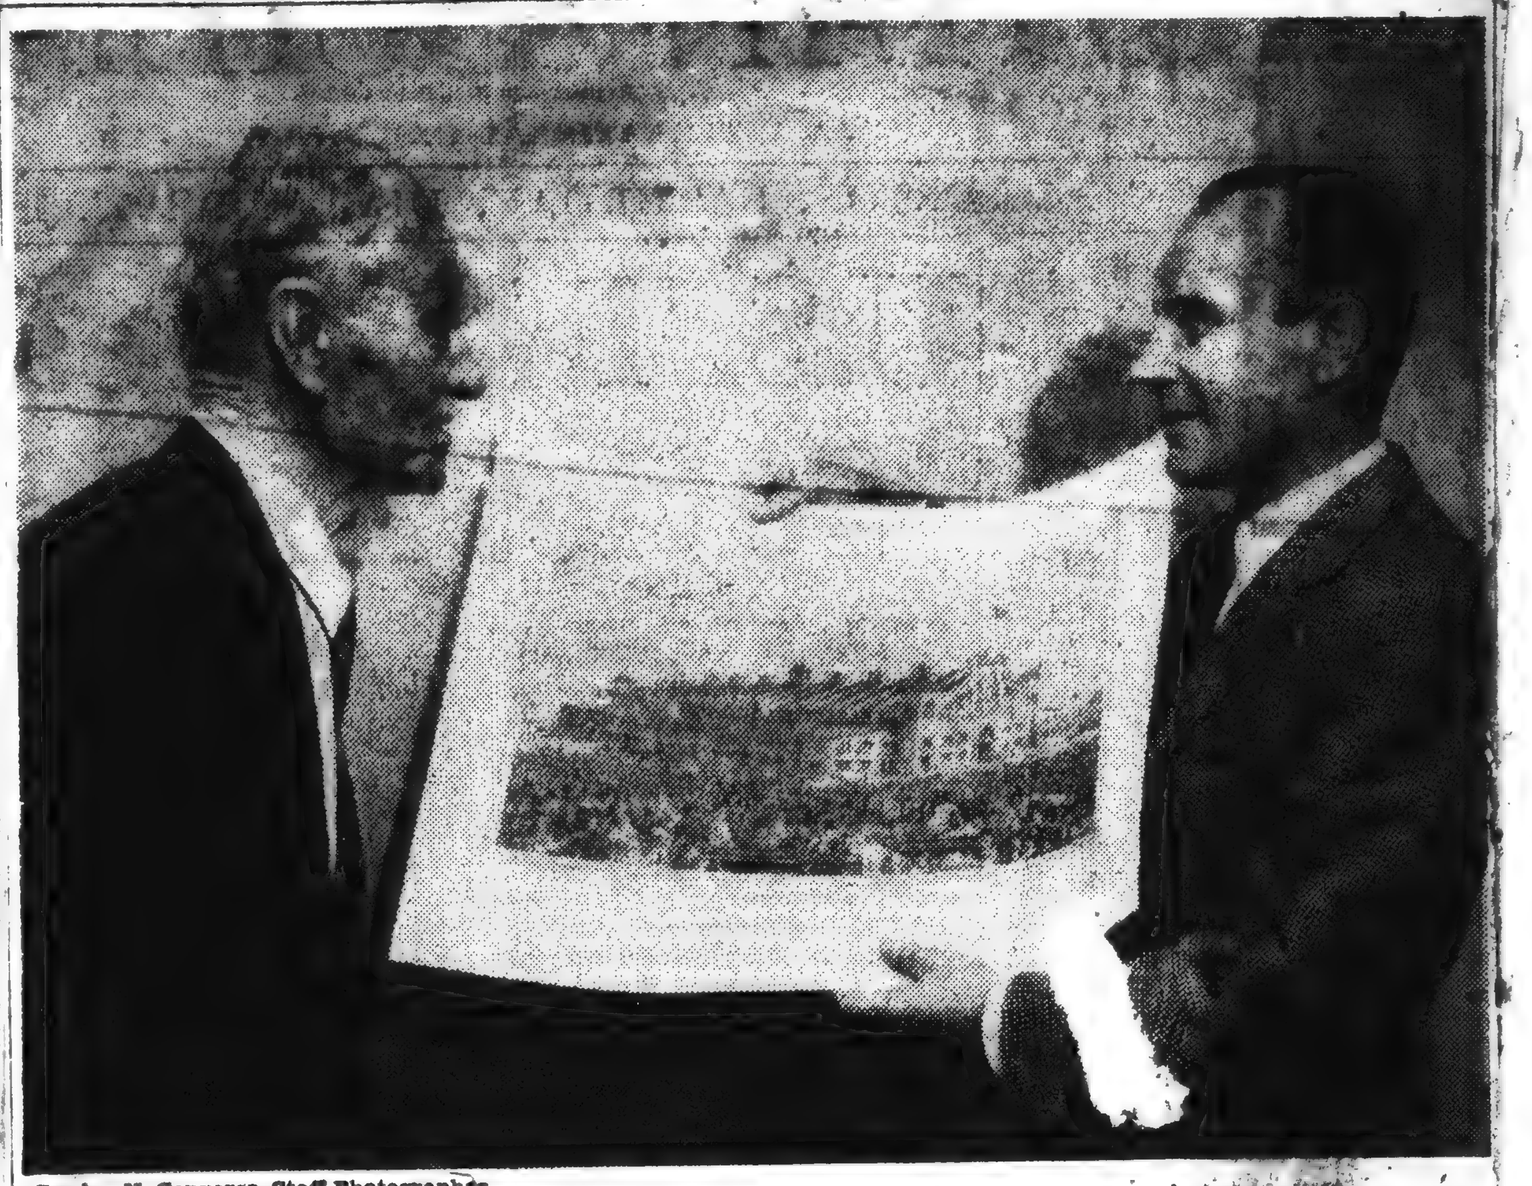
Cou
erature and further information will be provided on request.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1953



Gordon N. Converse, Staff Photographer

Charles A. Whitney of New Britain, Conn. (left), looks at old print of the Great Coliseum that was once located in Copley Square, Boston. At this spot the Guard Republican Band of Paris first played in 1872 at the World Peace Jubilee. Mr. Whitney heard the band just 50 years ago in San Francisco and now has come to Boston from Connecticut to hear it again. He met the French consul-general, François Charles-Roux, right, at Symphony Hall.

Monitor

TURDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1953

er Adagio in B

Ruth Posselt Solo
In Lalo V

By Harold Roge

There's a great deal going on at the Symphony Hall concerts this week end. Yesterday afternoon Richard Burgin left his chair as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony and took up his baton as associate conductor.

Charles Munch, however, conducted the Lalo Symphonie Espagnole. Ruth Posselt, soloist for the Lalo, further heightened the drama of her performance by breaking the E-string of her

with its deliciou
Mr. B with St
certante
but not Mahler be a r romanti variably
With S
cism, h
dry or l

more of the "in memoriam" mood, eloquently impassioned and richly toned. The Finale,

---

E

l, N.Y.

)

eat Free Voice dollars and our daugh-either can Symphony

useum, a hool or a basis.
ny orches-uel Mayes

he tone of times his erate the country—rehears-the Tues-perform-

he Esplanade, recordings and FM broadcasts, a European and a transcontinental tour. But you cannot tell, in dollars and cents, what those performances have meant to the spirit and mind of those who have come under the orchestra's spell.

Beauty—free, creative, original beauty—can't be sold on the market place. Its cultivation can mean prestige for a city, it can attract people to a shopping center, it can bring people to live nearby, it can inspire students, it can argue a way of life—but it cannot be pegged down t price tag.

The symphony, plagued with hi costs and a restricted number of sea to sell, desperately needs a quar of a million dollars. In an ancie society a duke might become patron; in Europe the state suppo its orchestras; in other days a fe rich people could underwrite the los

Last year Boston business ga $13,450. Perhaps this is the begi ning of an exciting trend in whic free business enterprise will suppo free artistic enterprise.

We are not sure. We are sur that some answer must be found.

Civilization is measured by thos societies which have given expres sion to the ideas, emotions, hopes dreams and sensibilities which are th core of that thing we call the sou of man.

The Boston Symphony Orchestr is a great, free voice which give man's spirit both song and comfort Without our great necessary luxuries—the symphony, the library, the art museum, the classroom, the church, the garden, the theatre—our life would be an empty room.

Living would be a matter of longevity alone. We desperately need the great, free voice of the Boston Symphony, alive and lusty in our midst.

THE WOONSOCKET (R.I.) CALL
December 11, 1953

Editorial

Save The Symphony

New Englanders rightfully regard as their own, institutions, aggregations or what have you that are actually located in Boston. We think at once of athletic teams such as the Red Sox, the Bruins and the Celtics. None of them could exist, financially, if they depended solely upon the city of Boston for their support. So they don't. They get support from all over New England which, incidentally, didn't think enough of the Braves in recent years, forcing that baseball team to seek financial refuge in Milwaukee.

No doubt Boston athletic institutions receive far more support from New England than does the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is too bad because in musical circles the Boston Symphony is regarded as the greatest symphony orchestra in the world. It is an orchestra of which all New England can be proud; and right now it needs financial help.

No doubt this help will be forthcoming, especially from business and industrial firms which can afford it. Yet, the Boston Symphony is certainly beneficial to the cultural welfare of our entire area and everyone who possibly can should contribute his share. Boston, itself, is rallying to save the symphony which, by the way, needs $250,000 to meet its obligations for the current season. That may seem like a lot of money to maintain an orchestra, but after all, there is only one Boston Symphony.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony trustees, admits that the drive for support will take time and hard work, but he reported an initial success, among insurance firms, with his plan of "donation-advertising" under which firms will pay a premium price for page advertisements in symphony programs. At the same time, a number of business establishments in Boston have pledged generous financial contributions.

What does it cost to maintain such an aggregation? Well, George E. Judd, orchestra manager, reports that the annual budget of the orchestra of 104 artists is $1,500,000. Of this amount concert receipts account for about $1 million. The rest must come from record royalties, earnings on endowments and other income such as rental of Symphony Hall.

But despite two increases in ticket prices in the past five years deficits in that time have consumed all unrestricted legacies and gifts. In addition, $37,000 of this year's income had to go to pay last year's debts. All this holds true now, Mr. Judd reported, despite generous contributions from "Friends of the Orchestra" which averaged $151,660 per year and a check for $13,450 this year from Boston business places.

So the symphony is in financial difficulties. But New Englanders who regard the orchestra as their own will, we have no doubt, come to its aid and keep in this area the world's finest symphony orchestra.

1953

Violinist Not Upse

y Snapped String

Violinist Ruth Po

This Clipping From
NEW YORK TIMES
DEC 13 1953

PICKING U

Musical Excellence of
And Morel's Conduc

By OLIN DOW

Brahms Program

On Thursday evening, George Szell was guest conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony, with an all-Brahms program. He was assisted by Eugene Istomin, as soloist, in the performance of the B-flat Piano Concerto. The lovely Symphony No. 2, with the great concerto, made a full evening's program. But the evening was a none too happy one for the interpreters—or Brahms either! The symphony moved stiffly and dryly. Mr. Istomin, whose youthful fire and enthusiasm are immediately manifest, pounded and forced tone most of the time.

The week of orchestral concerts ended for this writer with a final thrill: Charles Munch's reading of the "Eroica" Symphony. This was Saturday afternoon, December in Carnegie Hall, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first movement, in particular, was memorable, and, in the same sense as the interpretation of the Elgar piece, a fresh experience. We had not heard, in a long time, in such momentous accents, the true voice of Beethoven. Indeed, in certain aspects and inflections, the reading was heroic in utterance, Promethean in spirit, yet wonderfully plastic and tender.

Mr. Munch played the Funeral March as the epical lament that it is, yet he also made it intensely human and poignant. The height of it all was the finale, with the mysterious summons of the reiterated B-flats, and the variants that re cosmic.

One could speak almost as highly of the performance of Debussy's "Iberia" that followed. It was rarely full-blooded, spontaneous, direct and virile. In this score Debussy holds out both hands to life, and such was the nature of the performance.

Copland Concerto

Aaron Copland's Piano Concerto, with Leo Smit as soloist, brought this concert to an end. The concerto, played very efficiently and understandingly by Mr. Smit, is boldly experimental, here and there, with motives fashioned from the stuff of our "blues" and "jazz." This is Copland in a formative stage. The concerto dates from 1927. It is not well put together, or continuous in its thinking. Mr. Copland has written much better music.

Violin Concerto, with Ruth Posselt as soloist.

Mr. Munch, who succeeded Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in 1949, told his audience that while he had conducted many orchestras, "none is so close to my heart as the Boston Symphony, and I hope it will be close to your hearts, also."

Later, George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, reported that the annual budget for the organization of 104 artists was $1,500,000. He said that concert receipts accounted for $1,000,000, but that the rest must come from record royalties, earnings on endowments and rentals of Symphony Hall for other purposes.

Despite two increases in seat prices in the last five years, deficits have consumed all unrestricted legacies and gifts, Mr. Judd added. He revealed further that $37,000 of this year's receipts had gone to pay last year's debts.

This has held true despite contributions averaging $151,660 from "friends of the orchestra," and $13,450 from Boston business this year so far, he explained.

Noting that Detroit had raised $400,230 for its orchestra last year and Chicago $311,441, Michael T. Kelleher, a trustee, emphasized that Boston "could let our orchestra go, or reduce the number of players, but we don't intend to do that."

was 61 years old.
An editorial employe of The Trenton Times newspapers for twenty-eight years, Mr. Cleary be-

---

SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, SA

Gordon N. Converse, Staff Photographer

Charles A. Whitney of New Britain, Conn. (left), looks at old print of the Great Coliseum that was once located in Copley Square, Boston. At this spot the Guard Republican Band of Paris first played in 1872 at the World Peace

---

chestra budget of the $1,500,000. Of this amount account for about $1 million. must come from record royalties, earnings on endowments and other income such as rental of Symphony Hall.

But despite two increases in ticket prices in the past five years deficits in that time have consumed all unrestricted legacies and gifts. In addition, $37,000 of this year's income had to go to pay last year's debts. All this holds true now, Mr. Judd reported, despite generous contributions from "Friends of the Orchestra" which averaged $151,660 per year and a check for $13,450 this year from Boston business places.

~~So~~ the symphony is in financial difficulties. But New Englanders who regard the orchestra as their own will, we have no doubt, come to its aid and keep in this area the world's finest symphony orchestra.

Golden Trumpet
Gleaming golden finish... over 13" long. Complete with music book and carrying case.

GOLDEN S-L-I-D-E Trombone
Gleaming golden finish... solid brass tubing slide operates ... professional trom... 27" lo...

CHOOSE FROM MAN

Look like the real thing — Play real songs without a single lesson.

Edit

C S Monitor

BOSTON. SATURDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1953

-Mahler Adagio in Boston Premiere

Ruth Posselt Soloist In Lalo Violin Work

By Harold Rogers

There's a great deal going on at the Symphony Hall concerts this week end. Yesterday afternoon Richard Burgin left his chair as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony and took up his baton as associate conductor.

Charles Munch, however, conducted the Lalo Symphonie Espagnole. Ruth Posselt, soloist for the Lalo, further heightened the drama of her performance by breaking the E-string of her with its soupçon of a tango, was delicious.

Mr. Burgin opened the concert with Stravinsky's Danses Concertantes, which he played well but not half so well as he did the Mahler Adagio. At heart he must be a romantic; his readings of romantic scores are almost invariably luminous and moving. With Stravinsky's neoclassicism, however, he is generally dry or lackluster.

Adagio (posthu- shed in playable composer's sketch pared by Ernst ally amaz- writing con- the 20th cen- no doubt that he explored the possi- atonal realms. gio periods of con- ternate with sharp- tion. During these melodic and har- ts are splayed apart t areas, producing gnant effects that old the emotions. movement is too such tension, but c piece of musical dly delineated. It's t the composer was omplete the sym- ished form.

's closing selection ikovsky Italian Ca- with dark, brassy nd hummable folk sed the concert on k Mr. Munch will lioz' religious ora- fance du Christ," s the Nativity, the the Innocents, and to Egypt. The solo- Jennie Tourel, so- Morgan, baritone; s, and John McCol- The New England Chorus, prepared oke deVaron, will listener more of the "in memoriam" mood, eloquently impassioned and richly toned. The Finale,

---

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 145,494) (S 272,057)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
DEC 10 1953

Great Free Voice

Give an answer in dollars and cents: How much for your daughter's laughter?

You can't answer. Neither can you defend the Boston Symphony Orchestra—or an art museum, a public library, a Latin School or a cathedral—on a cold cash basis.

Yet the Boston Symphony orchestra needs money.

You have to pay Samuel Mayes even if you couldn't buy the tone of his cello for a hundred times his salary.

It costs money to operate the busiest symphony in the country—the regular series, the open rehearsals, the Sunday series and the Tuesday series, the Cambridge performances, Tanglewood, Pops, the Esplanade, recordings and FM broadcasts, a European and a transcontinental tour. But you cannot tell, in dollars and cents, what those performances have meant to the spirit and mind of those who have come under the orchestra's spell.

Beauty—free, creative, original beauty—can't be sold on the market place. Its cultivation can mean prestige for a city, it can attract people to a shopping center, it can bring people to live nearby, it can inspire students, it can argue a way of life—but it cannot be pegged down to a price tag.

The symphony, plagued with high costs and a restricted number of seats to sell, desperately needs a quarter of a million dollars. In an ancient society a duke might become its patron; in Europe the state supports its orchestras; in other days a few rich people could underwrite the loss.

Last year Boston business gave $13,450. Perhaps this is the beginning of an exciting trend in which free business enterprise will support free artistic enterprise.

We are not sure. We are sure that some answer must be found.

Civilization is measured by those societies which have given expression to the ideas, emotions, hopes, dreams and sensibilities which are the core of that thing we call the soul of man.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is a great, free voice which gives man's spirit both song and comfort. Without our great necessary luxuries—the symphony, the library, the art museum, the classroom, the church, the garden, the theatre—our life would be an empty room.

Living would be a matter of longevity alone. We desperately need the great, free voice of the Boston Symphony, alive and lusty in our midst.

Cir. (D 89,838)

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
DEC 13 1953

Berkshire Hills C Offers Servic

Even Arranged Baby-Sitting f ed to Hear Boston

Pittsfield—The year-round attractions of Massachusetts' famed Berkshire Hills are made more convenient for tourists by the Berkshire Hills Conference.

Conference Director John F. Downing and his staff handle all types of requests from persons who want to spend their vacations or week ends here.

It was only last summer that the conference received a request from a Boston couple who wanted to ta progr Orch ern was child ters. Th lem secu of t regi The hom of whil thei Al be shir Coun erature and further information will be provided on request.

Stra symphonic red with amazing performed in the these familiar pieces gossamer tone the aine Band can sus- s its extreme sen- ing response and rhythm. The same Ravel's Bolero, ed by the man we "our own" Charles t a fine, deliberate steady crescendo. he French military ousa's "Stars and er," which put Symphony Hall to up, raised hair on chills along the u were faced with tal, semi-exalting eat military band h glittering preci- conquerable fierce-work, incidentally, by Arthur Fiedler, of Capt Brun, as kson, Boston Sym- t, explained from a director of the sion fund, Mr. Dick- he Garde Republi- their friendly co- evening began with nthems.

was recalled again the terrific en- s much a token of splendid ilities for the ous a truly g band.

C. W. D.

1953

Violinist Not Upset By Snapped String

Violinist Ruth

This Clipping From
NEW YORK TIMES
DEC 13 1953

PICKING U

Musical Excellence of
And Morel's Conduc

By OLIN DOW

Brahms Program

On Thursday evening, George Szell was guest conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony, with an all-Brahms program. He was assisted by Eugene Istomin, as soloist, in the performance of the B-flat Piano Concerto. The lovely Symphony No. 2, with the great concerto, made a full evening's program. But the evening was a none too happy one for the interpreters—or Brahms either! The symphony moved stiffly and dryly. Mr. Istomin, whose youthful fire and enthusiasm are immediately manifest, pounded and forced tone most of the time.

The week of orchestral concerts ended for this writer with a final thrill: Charles Munch's reading of the "Eroica" Symphony. This was Saturday afternoon, December in Carnegie Hall, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first movement, in particular, was memorable, and, in the same sense as the interpretation of the Elgar piece, a fresh experience. We had not heard, in a long time, in such momentous accents, the true voice of Beethoven. Indeed, in certain aspects and inflections, the reading was heroic in utterance, thean in spirit, yet won plastic and tender.

Mr. Munch played the March as the epical lamen is, yet he also made it human and poignant. The of it all was the finale, mysterious summons of th B-flats, and the vari cosmic.

One could speak almost ly of the performance of "Iberia" that followed. It ly full-blooded, spontaneo and virile. In this scor holds out both hands t such was the nature of formance.

Copland Concerto

Aaron Copland's Pian with Leo Smit as solo this concert to an end certo, played very effi understandingly by M boldly experimental, there, with motives fas the stuff of our "blues" This is Copland in stage. The concerto 1927. It is not well continuous in its Copland has written music.

Violin Concerto, with Ruth Posselt as soloist.

Mr. Munch, who succeeded Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in 1949, told his audience that while he had conducted many orchestras, "none is so close to my heart as the Boston Symphony, and I hope it will be close to your hearts, also."

Later, George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, reported that the annual budget for the organization of 104 artists was $1,500,000. He said that concert receipts accounted for $1,000,000, but that the rest must come from record royalties, earnings on endowments and rentals of Symphony Hall for other purposes.

Despite two increases in seat prices in the last five years, deficits have consumed all unrestricted legacies and gifts, Mr. Judd added. He revealed further that $37,000 of this year's receipts had gone to pay last year's debts.

This has held true despite contributions averaging $151,660 from "friends of the orchestra," and $13,450 from Boston business this year so far, he explained.

Noting that Detroit had raised $400,230 for its orchestra last year and Chicago $311,441, Michael T. Kelleher, a trustee, emphasized that Boston "could let our orchestra go, or reduce the number of players, but we don't intend to do that."

SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, SAT

Gordon N. Converse, Staff Photographer

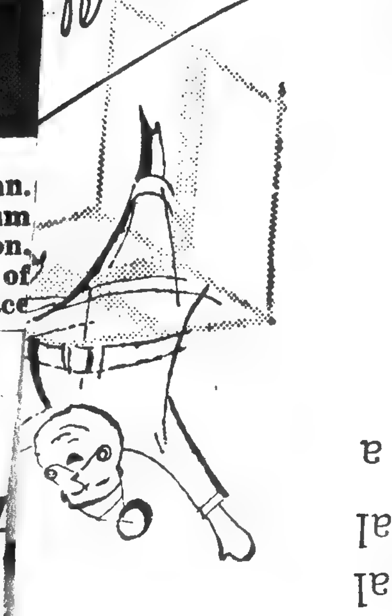
Charles A. Whitney of New Britain, Conn. (left), looks at old print of the Great Coliseum that was once located in Copley Square, Boston. At this spot the Guard Republican Band of Paris first played in 1872 at the World Peace

---

aggr chestra m budget of the or $1,500,000. Of this amou account for about $1 million. must come from record royalties, earn on endowments and other income such as rental of Symphony Hall.

But despite two increases in ticket prices in the past five years deficits in that time have consumed all unrestricted legacies and gifts. In addition, $37,000 of this year's income had to go to pay last year's debts. All this holds true now, Mr. Judd reported, despite generous contributions from "Friends of the Orchestra" which averaged $151,660 per year and a check for $13,450 this year from Boston business places.

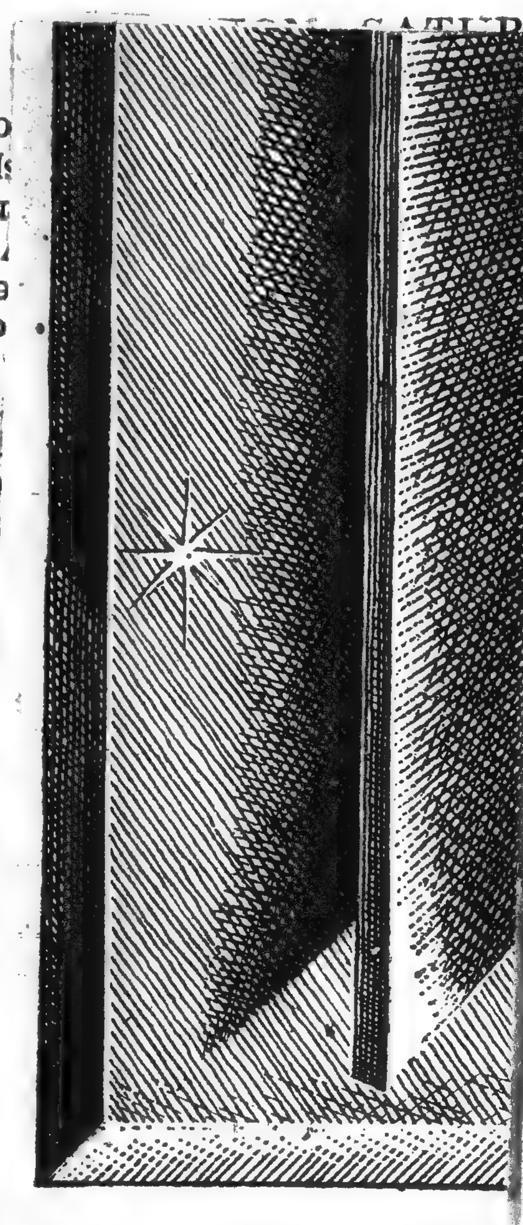
~~So~~ the symphony is in financial difficulties. But New Englanders who regard the orchestra as their own will, we have no doubt, come to its aid and keep in this area the world's finest symphony orchestra.



Edit

C. S. Monitor

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1953



Adagio in Boston Premiere

Ruth Posselt Soloist In Lalo Violin Work

By Harold Rogers

There's a great deal going on at the Symphony Hall concerts this week end. Yesterday afternoon Richard Burgin left his chair as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony and took up his baton as associate conductor.

Charles Munch, however, conducted the Lalo Symphonie Espagnole. Ruth Posselt, soloist for the Lalo, further heightened the drama of her performance by breaking the E-string of her violin right at the climax of the final movement.

The program also includes a first performance for Boston—the Adagio from Mahler's Tenth Symphony. All these elements—together with the diversity of talents provided by Stravinsky, Lalo, Mahler, and Tchaikovsky—provided much that was intriguing and entertaining, plus several portions that were inspiring.

♪ ♪ ♪

Miss Posselt's minor catastrophe in the Lalo did nothing to spoil the excellence of her work and really turned out to be a triumph. True, the music came to a stop while she traded instruments with Alfred Krips, seated in the first chair for these concerts. Mr. Munch meanwhile consulted the score and asked the musicians to backtrack a few bars. Then, with a fresh start, Miss Posselt, Mr. Munch, and the orchestra came through with colors flying. The ovation was tremendous.

Mr. Munch and Miss Posselt had a reason, other than a musical one, for appearing together in the Lalo work. They played it in memory of Jacques Thibaud, the eminent French violinist who had been their close friend. Mr. Munch was once Thibaud's pupil. Miss Posselt coached with him in French repertoire. In 1924 Thibaud was soloist with the Boston Symphony in this same work.

Miss Posselt's playing was warmly communicative, though perhaps slightly less so than in times past. She has the remarkable ability to combine a masculine quality of strength with a serene feminine tenderness. For the Scherzando her playing had a buoyant lilt that swept the listener along. The Andante had more of the "in memoriam" mood, eloquently impassioned and richly toned. The Finale, with its soupçon of a tango, was delicious.

Mr. Burgin opened the concert with Stravinsky's Danses Concertantes, which he played well but not half so well as he did the Mahler Adagio. At heart he must be a romantic; his readings of romantic scores are almost invariably luminous and moving. With Stravinsky's neoclassicism, however, he is generally dry or lackluster.

♪ ♪ ♪

The Mahler Adagio (posthumously published in playable form after the composer's sketch had been deciphered by Ernst Křenek) is [illegible] amazing. Had Mahler's writing continued further into the 20th century, there is no doubt that he would have explored the possibilities of the atonal realms.

In this Adagio periods of contemplation alternate with rhapsodic aspiration. During these climaxes the melodic and harmonic elements are splayed apart into dissonant areas, producing intensely poignant effects that seize and hold the emotions. Perhaps the movement is too long to sustain such tension, but it is a heroic piece of musical tapestry, boldly delineated. It's a shame that the composer was unable to complete the symphony in finished form.

Mr. Burgin's closing selection was the Tchaikovsky Italian Capriccio, filled with dark, brassy statements and hummable folk tunes. It closed the concert on a jovial note.

Next week Mr. Munch will present Berlioz' religious oratorio, "L'Enfance du Christ," which depicts the Nativity, the Massacre of the Innocents, and the Flight into Egypt. The soloists will be Jennie Tourel, soprano; Mac Morgan, baritone; Lee Cass, bass, and John McCollum, tenor. The New England Conservatory Chorus, prepared by Lorna Cooke deVaron, will assist.

Cir. (D 89,838)

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
DEC 13 1953

Berkshire Hills Conference Offers Service to Tourists

Even Arranged Baby-Sitting for Couple Who Wanted to Hear Boston Symphony

Pittsfield—The year-round attractions of Massachusetts' famed Berkshire Hills are made more convenient for tourists by the Berkshire Hills Conference.

Conference Director John F. Downing and his staff handle all types of requests from persons who want to spend their vacations or week ends here.

It was only last summer that the conference received a request from a Boston couple who wanted to take in a series of weekend programs by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Southern Berkshire. The only difficulty was that they had three young children and no portable baby sitters.

The conference solved that problem for them. Downing's staff secured the couple rooms at one of the many private tourist homes registered with the organization. The couple running the tourist home agreed to house the family of five and do the baby sitting while the Boston couple enjoyed their music.

All types of accommodations can be secured by writing the Berkshire Hills Conference, Berkshire County Courthouse, Pittsfield. Literature and further information will be provided on request.

Stra symphonic ored with amazing d performed in the hese familiar pieces a gossamer tone the caine Band can sus s its extreme sen ing response and rhythm. The same a / Ravel's Bolero, ed by the man we "our own" Charles t a fine, deliberate a steady crescendo. he French military ousa's "Stars and ver," which put Symphony Hall to up, raised hair on d chills along the u were faced with ntal, semi-exalting eat military band th glittering precision conquerable fierce-work, incidentally, by Arthur Fiedler, of Capt Brun, as ckson, Boston Symst, explained from a director of the sion fund, Mr. Dickhe Garde Republi their friendly coevening began with nthems.

was recalled again d the terrific en s much a token of splendi ilities for the ous a truly g band.

C. W. D.

554

Cir. (D 149,902) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
DEC 15 1953

Symphony Leader Honored by France

NEW YORK, Dec. 15 (UP)—Pierre Monteux, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today held the rank of commander in the French Legion of Honor.

He received the award from Consul General Jean de Legarde here last night and was cited for his "outstanding contribution to the diffusion of French music in the United States."

Monteux was guest conductor at the Berkshire Music Festival last Summer and also will lead the Boston orchestra in its present season.

Cir. (D 99,838)

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
DEC 15 1953

France Honors Orchestra Conductor

NEW YORK, Dec. 15 (UP)—Pierre Monteux, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now has the rank of commander in the French Legion of Honor.

Mr. Monteux

He received the award from consul general Jean De Legarde here last night and was cited for his "outstanding contribution to the diffusion of French music in the United States."

Monteux was guest conductor at the Berkshire Music Festival last Summer and also will lead the Boston orchestra in its present season.

NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1953

Brief Reviews of Recent Events

MUNCH AND BASTIANINI

On Dec. 5, Charles Munch conducted the Boston Symphony in Copland's Piano Concerto with Leo Smit as soloist, in a performance that did "immense credit to all concerned." Alfredo Campoli, violinist, made his American debut playing Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole." "His playing is warm and definitely lyric in nature. It is not, as one might expect, bravura, although it occasionally has the superficial brilliance of such." Ettore Bastianini, baritone, making his debut at the Met as Germont in "Traviata," was said to have "a fine, ringing and resonant voice. It is big, it is clear. And it projects."

• • •

This Clipping From
HERALD TRIBUNE N.Y.
DEC 13 1953

Brief Revi

The following are excerpts and paraphrases from reviews by Herald Tribune critics of musical events which took place during the period in which this paper was not published:

"TROVATORE" AND BOSTON

Verdi's "Trovatore," back at the Met on Dec. 2 after a year's absence, was presented with "a resounding lack of success. It was an off night for all concerned." The Boston Symphony presented Bloch's Concerto Grosso No. 2, a new work which "provides ample variety of instrumental sonorities." Also played was Kabalevsky's Cello Concerto, "a simple, fluent and melodious piece." [illegible] proved to be "a skillful pianist, but not a very interesting one."

• • •

LASKER AND

THE NEW YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1953

EVENTS OF ELEVEN DAYS IN REVIEW

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

ANY musician spends countless weeks and months preparing himself for the ordeal of a New York appearance. If he is an artist with an established reputation, his career cannot be affected seriously by a failure to be noticed in the press. But if he is a young performer, everything—past and future as well as the quivering present—is at stake, and if he is a living composer getting a performance, he has a great deal to gain from favorable attention and a great deal to lose from no attention at all.

For better or for worse, the influence of New York on musical careers of all sorts has become pivotal in the great majority of cases, and the critical opinions that appear in the New York newspapers weigh heavily in molding this impact. This is why the shutting down of the city's newspapers in recent days struck the musical world as a grave blow.

Artists, managers, friends of artists and interested laymen phoned, wrote and wired appeals to the musical staff of this newspaper, asking that all the scheduled events be covered. And they were covered. The full-length reviews that might have been writ-

A Digest of Criticisms That Were Not Printed During the Strike

self a gifted young violinist" at a young people's concert of the Philharmonic. (R. P.)

Grace Castagnetta, pianist. "Standard program, with improvisations at end. At best in small works by Couperin and Debussy. In larger pieces, such as the Bach-Tausig Toccata and Fugue in D minor, she let the notes get somewhat out of hand." (H. C. S.)

"Rigoletto," Metropolitan Opera. "Best singing by Robert Merrill and Eugene Conley." (R. P.)

Composers' Forum, first of season. "A beautifully sustained, deeply thoughtful string quartet by Irving Fine was outstanding work." (R. P.)

Sunday, Nov. 29

N. B. C. Symphony, Toscanini conducting. Fresh poetry in "Tannhaeuser," Act III Prelude, and breadth of conception in Berlioz "Harold in Italy," with Carlton Cooley as fine viola soloist. (H. T.)

Marisa Regules, pianist. "Made best impression in the romantic

"An artist of intelligence and musical integrity, she has a pleasant voice, marred by nasality and tremolo. Her best impression was made in songs by German composers; she was less happy with music demanding more in vocal technique." (J. B.)

Barbara Custance, pianist. "Competent, straightforward playing without great subtlety or variety. As nervousness wore off, performance improved. Beethoven's 'Appassionata' Sonata and Bach's C minor Fantasy received sound, musicianly readings, and a Brahms group was among the best of the evening's offerings." (J. B.)

Wednesday, Dec. 2

Boston Symphony. Bloch's Concerto Grosso No. 2, in New York première, had the touch and vitality of the master, and Kabalevsky's 'Cello Concerto, played brilliantly by Samuel Mayes, led off with two romantically spacious movements and crashed to earth with a trashy third. (H. T.)

"Trovatore," Metropolitan, "Competent run-through under Cleva, with Zinka Milanov singing with angelic beauty after she had warmed up." Others in the cast were Kurt Baum, Robert Merrill and Jean Madeira. (J. B.)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK TIMES
DEC 13 1953

EVENTS OF E

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

Wednesday, Dec. 2

Boston Symphony. Bloch's Concerto Grosso No. 2, in New York première, had the touch and vitality of the master, and Kabalevsky's 'Cello Concerto, played brilliantly by Samuel Mayes, led off with two romantically spacious movements and crashed to earth with a trashy third. (H. T.)

"Trovatore," Metropolitan, "Com-

Cir. (D 145,494) (S 272,057)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
DEC 14 1953

SYMPHONY HALL

Grant Johannesen

The third program in the Sunday afternoon series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was played yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Richard Burgin conducting. Grant Johannesen was the piano soloist:

Danses Concertantes .... Stravinsky
Piano Concerto No. 2, in B-flat major, Op. 19 .... Beethoven
Adagio from the Tenth Symphony .... Mahler
Italian Capriccio, Op. 45.... Tchaikovsky

While it is manifestly impossible to assess the capacities of a pianist on the basis of one performance, I'd say Grant Johannesen made an attractive debut here in Beethoven's B-flat major piano concerto at the Sunday afternoon series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday.

Of all five of the master's concertos, the B-flat major is the most Mozartean in character and although it has its own special charms, it seems to me the weakest in the quintet. Actually it is the first of the series, preceded by the C major only by virtue of the publishing date. The demands it makes on the artist are not punishing; the extended development of the opening allegro calls for a fleet dexterity in embroidering the melodic line, considerable elegance and polish, but in the final analysis, little of the profound aesthetic insights of the mature works.

That is not to say the interpreter can get by on mere facility, for the requirements of the B-flat impose a limitation of style in which technical exuberance often leads to disaster. Mr. Johannesen's interpretation was spacious without bravado; of a finely-flowing architecture. His tone was deep and lustrous and despite a passing phrase in the allegro, his technical equipment was disclosed as being of the first order. In matters of touch, the ability to lend weight and sonority and a variegated color to his playing, he proved especially vivid.

His personal approach seems rather mannered, but the intelligent scope of his artistic conception is direct and communicative. This was the B-flat without undue frills, cleanly and gracefully executed by a young pianist of considerable attainment. Richard Burgin conducted throughout the program, a glowing reprise of the Friday concert.

—R.S.T.

Cir. (D 172,699)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
Christian Science Monitor
DEC 15 1953

Youth Should Be Heard

By Elizabeth Taylor

From a background of religious upbringing and musical training which the late Reverend Joshua H. Green and Mrs. Goldie Green of Baltimore conferred upon their 10 children, came a voice and personality of the caliber of Miss Theresa Green.

Miss Green, now garnering triumphs in all parts of the United States for her concert work, and well known for her recent appearance on Broadway in the musical extravaganza "My Darlin' Aida," has amazingly enough 19 years to her credit as a performer. Theresa, whose mother was a church organist and teacher, at an early age began to sing, and at the very advanced age of 5 had sufficient control of her voice to make her first public appearance. The audience of 1,100 pronounced her debut successful.

* * *

She continued her studies with her mother, and when she was 12, a kindly school principal, recognizing her talent, found her a job that paid a dollar and a quarter a week so that she could begin private lessons. The new teacher, in turn, was so impressed by Theresa's talent that she gave her pupil additional lessons free of charge.

Miss Green, being a hard-working and rarely determined young lady, it is not surprising that under the expert tutelage of Mme Eva Gauthier of New York she soon began to win one coveted award after another. First it was the Marion Anderson award, and in 1946 she received a scholarship for study at the Curtis Institute.

* * *

Proof of her aptitude at the institute came when she was chosen twice to represent the school, at the 25th anniversary program in the Philadelphia Academy of Music, where she sang the role of Tatjana in "Eugene Onegin" in Russian, and again as a representative at the American Students' Symposium in Rochester.

Awards thereafter rained casually on her modest and unperturbed head. An organization to promote outstanding musicians called the Juggs, bestowed their annual award on her in 1949—the prize a recital in New York's Town Hall; then came a John Hay Whitney fellowship which, breaking all precedent, was extended for a second year. She was also granted a fellowship at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood and consequently was engaged to appear there as soloist under Leonard Bernstein in Mahler's "Resurrection" Symphony.

Theresa Green, soprano

Miss Green has sometime in these busy years managed to perfect French, and sings also in Italian, Spanish, German, and Russian. These and a well-balanced repertory, including Bach, Handel, early French and Italian music, and a wide acquaintance with the moderns make her a great favorite with concert audiences.

Cir. (D 149,902) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
DEC 14 1953

MUSIC

Johannesen Soloist at Sunday Symphony

Third Sunday afternoon concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Symphony Hall, Richard Burgin conducting. The program: Stravinsky: Danses Concertantes; Beethoven: Piano Concerto No. 2, in B-flat (soloist, Grant Johannesen, who made his Boston debut); Mahler: Adagio from the Tenth Symphony; Tchaikovsky: Itallian Caprice.

Strange as it seems, the Boston Symphony Orchestra had never played the B-flat Piano Concerto of Beethoven in Boston until yesterday. On this occasion Grant Johannesen, a young American pianist of repute elsewhere, made his Boston debut as soloist. The first of the five Beethoven Concertos to be composed, the B-flat is not the sort of music to attract the virtuoso, and probably is not especially appealing to the scholarly musician either, for apart from the gay rondo and the nice tunes of the adagio, the work is second-rank, or at least, young, Beethoven.

Mr. Johannesen is a good pianist, with all the essential equipment of finger articulation, strength, delicacy, a sense of style and command of rhythm. That he showed any personal distinction in this work is something which cannot be claimed [illegible] very few, if any, pianists [illegible]. But it was a solid and competent performance, and it aroused interest to hear Mr. Johannesen again in something more varied, substantial and rewarding. He [illegible] received cordially by the [illegible] subscribers.

The program otherwise was the same that Mr. Burgin had conducted last Friday and Saturday. I was glad to have another hearing of the Adagio from Mahler's posthumous and incomplete Symphony. It is very touching and resourceful music, and like most of Mahler grows upon acquaintance.—C. W. D.

This Clipping From VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DEC 16 1953

Hub Symph Makes 250G Fund Plea

Boston, Dec. 15.

In an unprecedented move here last week, trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra sent out an SOS for funds to meet obligations for the current season via half-page ads in two Hub dailies. Ads stated frankly that the BSO is in critical financial condition, pointing out the dire need to raise $250,000 for this season, and urging broader community support. In addition to the public appeal, several committees have been organized to solicit individuals and business houses for contributions with the feelings in some quarters that if this method fails, the only alternative is to cut down personnel or drop the orchestra entirely. However, regarding the latter course, trustee Michael Kelleher optimistically believes no such drastic move will be necessary and that the citizens will dig up the coin to underwrite the orchestra.

The annual budget for the organization, which includes 104 musicians, is $1,500,000, but only $1,000,000 of that amount is raised by concerts. The balance is dependent on record royalties, earnings on endowments, rental of Symphony Hall, which this year has been exempted from taxes, and contributions of "friends of the orchestra".

55

65

12, 1953

Music in Review

By TUCKER KEISER

Boston Symphony

Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ," a sacred trilogy, promised by Mr. Munch for two seasons ago and cancelled because of the conductor's illness, received a belated performance yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Both Hector Berlioz and Charles Munch have a fondness for striking effects which led to the suspicion that sensationalism rather than sensitivity was the outstanding characteristic of both the composer and the conductor. Yesterday's performance, probably the first in Boston of this work, demonstrated that neither is incapable of meditative serenity.

The work is divided into three big parts: Herod's Dream, the Flight into Egypt, and the Arrival at Sais. Berlioz, who wrote his own libretto, freely adapting the St. Matthew account of the early years of Jesus, uses the device of a narrator to introduce various sections, to shift the scenes, and to comment on the action. Each of the big scenes is divided into orchestral interludes, solos, duets and choruses.

As in all oratorios, a large apparatus is necessary, comprised of soloists, orchestra and chorus. The soloists yesterday were the incomparable Jennie Tourel, listed on the program as a soprano; Mac Morgan, baritone; Lee Cass, bass, and the ubiquitous John McCollum, tenor.

The New England Conservatory Chorus, augmented for the occasion apparently, sang the choral part with a precision which even they must have found unbelievable. Trained to a faretheewell by Lorna Cooke de Varen, they sang, if anything, just a bit too well; they got honors for beauty of tone, they got honors for French diction, for vitality — they passed. Only a mechanical brain makes absolutely no mistakes; an error or two now and then is evidence that the artist is in the throes of current creation. (For example, Miss Tourel, Bar 48, Scene 5.) A chorus rehearsing feverishly for an important concert can, and in this case did, go a little stale in the process of polishing perfection.

Accustomed to the violent dynamic contrasts in the other works of Berlioz, one is apt to be surprised and disappointed by the lack of peaks and valleys in this consistently subdued score. There are, it is true, certain passages of greater comparative interest: the modal Herod's Air, the rhythmic Incantation Music, the etherial Angels' Song, and the fugual Ishmaelite Chorus.

Regretably, Mr. Munch chose to shorten two other interesting sections; he omitted the middle stanza of the naive Shepherd's Farewell to the Holy Family and allowed the two flutists, Doriot Anthony and James Pappoutsakis, and harpist Bernard Zighera, no repeats in the most beautiful instrumental selection, the Serenade.

Of the soloists, the most impressive was, of course, our Jennie, who as usual batted for 1000—well, anyway, 1000 minus one quarter-note. John McCollum, a rising star in the musical firmament, sang the part of the narrator with distinction. Mac Morgan and Lee Cass, baritone and bass, respectively, though singing with assurance, seemed rather disturbed by the conflicting demands made on their vocal organs by French diction and voice production. Accuracy of pitch is the first casualty when one does battle with the Gallis tongue, and Mr. Cass lost several such battles.

Although "L'Enfance du Christ" may never replace the "Messiah" as a Boston Christmas rite, it would afford a welcome change from the Handelian fare offered us by every local choral group every year.

This Clipping From
BOSTON MASS.
GLOBE

DEC 16 1953

Chorus Leader Lorna de Varon Rising Star in Hub Music World

By CYRUS DURGIN

One of the rising stars of music in Boston is a slim, dark-haired, dark-eyed lady who conducts the New England Conservatory Chorus. Her name is Lorna Cooke de Varon, and in five years she has held the post she has brought the Conservatory Chorus to new distinction and excellence. Her most recent contribution to music in this city is the preparation of the choral part of Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ," which Charles Munch will present at the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

LORNA COOKE de VARON

Although she is all vivacity and authority when on the conductor's stand, it was plain to see, one day in the trustees' room at the New England Conservatory last week, that Mrs. de Varon does not especially enjoy talking about herself. The basic facts came easily enough: that she was born Lorna Cooke in Chicago, moved with her family when she was 15 to Rhode Island, went to Wellesley, and took graduate study at Radcliffe.

But there were just modest and pleasant "Thank you's" when it was mentioned that only this Fall, starting with 50 percent new members, she had accomplished a notable feat in so admirably drilling the Conservatory Chorus for its recent Jordan Hall concert. Nor was there forthcoming any quick or voluble listing of what she has done. Mrs. de Varon is the modest sort, quiet but thoroughly knowing of her business.

A Good Pinch-Hitter

The usual early studies in piano were amplified by voice training and organ lessons by the time she was a Wellesley undergraduate. Then she got a chance to work with G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, and that started the de Varon career in choral conducting. For two years she studied with the widely esteemed Mr. Woodworth, and became his assistant. Then came two Summers as a pupil of Robert Shaw, founder of the famed Robert Shaw Chorale, at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood. There was, too, study of theory with Nadia Boulanger, composition with Walter Piston and choral composition with Dr. Archibald T. Davison.

Then one mid-season, Mrs. de Varon received a summons from Bryn Mawr College to replace the chorus leader, who had resigned. A stint of pinch-hitting lengthened into a stay of nearly four years as assistant professor of music. That, as she says, "was very fortunate in all respects, musical and personal, because at that time my husband returned from military service." He is Jose de Varon, a Boston lawyer. Last Summer Mrs. de Varon was on the staff of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood as assistant to Hugh Ross in the choral department. She will resume the post again next Summer.

Music is in the family. Mrs. de Varon's mother, Hazel Watts Cooke, was a professional and wrote several operettas for children. Mrs. de Varon obviously has in her veins what theatre people would call "trouping blood." Just a few weeks ago she got a call asking that she prepare the singing parts in the Polovetsian Dances of Borodin, which were to be presented by the Boston Symphony. It was the Thanksgiving week-end, but she got on the telephone, rounded up as many as she could of the Conservatory Alumni Chorus, and had prepared them in four days. I for one, can testify they sang very nicely.

What, in Mrs. de Varon's belief, is required for choral conducting in addition to musical competence? "You have to know people," she smiles.

Cir. (D 10 871)

This Clipping From
LOCKPORT, N. Y.
UNION-SUN & JOURNAL

DEC 17 1953

Today's Birthday

ARTHUR FIEDLER

ARTHUR FIEDLER, born Dec. 17, 1894, in Boston. Conductor of the famed "Pops" concerts which play everything from Bach to boogie-woogie, he has been called by his first name by his "Pops" audiences since he started the concerts in 1930. He studied in Vienna and Berlin, but returned home at the age of 19 to play second violin in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He served in the U. S. Army in World War I

Cir. (D 294,859) (S 252,207)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

DEC 18 1953

1500 Firms Asked To Aid Symphony

Fifteen hundred New England business firms have been asked to help the Boston Symphony Orchestra's campaign for funds in letters sent out yesterday by Michael T. Kelleher, one of the trustees of the orchestra.

The appeal to businessmen is something new, the first widespread campaign to enlist the aid of industry in the preservation of a cultural activity. The Boston Symphony, Mr. Kelleher's letter to the leaders points out, "has made New England a better place to live and work."

A campaign for contributions from individuals has also been launched for the orchestra by Dr. Palfrey Perkins, of King's Chapel, another trustee. In order to be able to continue, the Symphony Orchestra must raise $250,000.

Cir. (D 131,670) (S 258,529)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

DEC 19 1953

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the ninth program of the 73d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloists were Jennie Tourel, soprano; Mac Morgan, bass; John McCollum, tenor and Lee Cass, bass. Assisting was the N. E. Conservatory orchestra, Lorna DeVaron Cooke, conductor. The program was given over the performance of Berlioz' "L'Enface du Christ."

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Berlioz' non-liturgial cantata "L'Enfance du Christ" is one of the most singular—and most singularly beautiful—works in all music.

Given its first Boston performance in many years yesterday afternoon it held the audience enthralled both by the poetry of the words and the music, and the poetry of the performance itself, which was on a spiritual plane of almost mystical character. Indeed, the performance was of such a lofty character it all but obscured the fact that Berlioz' methods here, as in the Requiem, are entirely secular.

However, if the music is secular, in contrast, say, to Bach's St. John Passion, its atmosphere throughout is of infinite spiritual tenderness. At no time, even in the scene in which the soothsayers of Herod's troubled dreams demand that he put to death every child under two in Bethlehem does the composer call upon the violent forces so typical of his style. There hardly exisits a real fortissimo in the entire 90 minutes, nor a fast or rushing tempo. The work is quiet almost to the point of inaudibility at times; the moods gentle and meditative, the rhythms soft and flowing and yielding always, the melodies long and untroubled and ever expressive.

Skill Prodigious

In close examination perhaps, the music is anything but substantial; reduced to a piano score it would be found to be thin and tenuous, but this applies to the whole body of Berlioz' music. Yet so prodigious is his skill with sounds, whether in the use of a thesaurus of orchestral colors and tints (in this case with the transparency of water colors) or in the use of the human voice, he evokes a mood not less than magical.

As this affecting legend of the flight of Mary and Joseph into Egypt with the Christchild to escape Herod's terror unfolds, the very essence of Berlioz'—and all French composer's—wonderful ear for the musical value of words is revealed. Where in Italian music (in connection with opera, of course), it is the voice and in Greman music it is the orchestra, in French music it is the word, and Berlioz here demonstrates that rule of thumb in truly classic fashion. Not a syllable escapes its precise musical value, not a word ever appears out of its musical context (as, for example, words appear so ludicrously out of musical context in Stravinsky's "The Rake's Progress"). And always these words are italicized in the orchestral music itself; when Mary cries out that she suffers, that cry is echoed ever so sadly in the strings. This sort of thing, which might be obvious in another's treatment abounds in the score, even to the sound of Joseph's knocking on the door. And always, too, the words can be heard, comprehended, even felt.

All this, it goes without saying, depends on a performance in which lingual capacities of the soloists and chorus are on the highest level, and so it was yesterday. Mr. Munch himself has always displayed a particular sensitivity to language in its musical expressivity and, with a quite evident devotion to this particular work, he achieved stunning results with soloists and chorus alike. Since French is not my native tongue I am of course unable to state that that accent was unimpeachable, but it seemed to me to be so.

I was a little fearful, before the concert, that the Messr. Morgan, Cass and McCollum might be at a disadvantage to be cast with Jennie Tourel in the leading roles, but such didn't prove to be the case. Miss Tourel herself certainly dominated in the always matchless quality of her singing, but Mac Morgan sang Joseph with great authority and splendor of tone. John McCollum and Lee Cass sang very well, too, but their voices were not always of sufficient carrying power and range, though stylistically excellent. The chorus of the New England Conservatory, trained for the occasion by Lorna Cooke DeVaron, was in every way perfection, responding to the softest pianissimos of the conductor in a beautiful tone—a very difficult thing for an amateur chorus to do. A speecial word at this point, also for that exquisite trio of Doriot Anthony and James Pappoutsakis, flutes, and Bernard Zighera, harp.

All in all, a choice event for the connoisseur who will hardly believe that Berlioz brought out the second part in Paris 100 years ago under the name of Pierre Ducles, terming him "an unknown 18th century composer"! Nicolle Henriot appears next Thursday afternoon and Saturday night in Saint-Saen's Third Piano Concerto. Brahms' Fourth is also on the program.

THE

MUSIC

"L'Enfance du Christ" Presented at Symphony

Ninth concerts in the Friday afternoon—Saturday evening series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, music director, at Symphony Hall. The program: Berlioz: "L'Enfance du Christ," Sacred Trilogy, Op. 25. The soloists: Jennie Tourel, soprano, Mary; Mac Morgan, baritone, Joseph; Lee Cass, bass, Herod and The Father of a Family; John McCollum, tenor, The Narrator. Chorus: The New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke de Varon, conductor.

By CYRUS DURGIN

Yesterday afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will, I think, go down as one of the great occasions in the history of this organization. For only then, nearly 100 years after its creation, the Sacred Trilogy, "L'Enfance du Christ," of Hector Berlioz, was for the first time in the history of these concerts, presented complete, and in a performance of the utmost beauty.

In this world perfection is a quality—and, for that matter, a quantity—often hoped for and rarely attained. Yet if any musical experience within my memory ever has approached perfection, it was this performance of "L'Enfance du Christ." Here was symphonic playing of the highest order, of a richness, delicacy and precision of style which this reviewer has never heard exceeded and, added to it, vocal excellence, from soloists and chorus, of equal caliber.

A product of Berlioz' later years and highest maturity, "L'Enfance du Christ" is another telling of that most fabulous of all stories, the birth of Christ; the massacre of the babies, by Herod; the flight of the Holy Family into Egypt, and the simple kindliness of the Ishmaelite family who received in their home Mary, Joseph and the Infant. In terms of elaborate orchestral apparatus, and of large expression, this work is quite unlike the Berlioz of the better-known masterworks, the "Fantastic" Symphony, "Harold in Italy," "Les Troyens," "The Damnation of Faust" and the Requiem.

Though of large dimensions in length and conception, "L'Enfance du Christ" is remarkably simple and intimate in manner. The orchestra rarely speaks out in grand or proclamatory fashion; the chorus more often sings soft, then loud, and even the sometimes plainly operatic style of the vocal solos is tempered to the nature of the story. Nonetheless, the musical fabric is Berlioz at his most individual: the melodies frequently have that assymetrical cast so natural to the composer, and so eloquent because it is so rare; the patterns of the rhythms are both unconventional and even after a Century, so seemingly new and fresh; the harmonic background, as always with Berlioz is a mingling of ordinary practices and of distinct chromatic originality; the orchestration, for all its subdued dynamic nature, is extraordinarily rich and multi-colored.

Charles Munch's regime here may ultimately be known, among its other excellences, as the time when Berlioz came to be known again in Boston. Certainly this performance has brought us a mostly unfamiliar work in the best possible light. The strings glowed with an amazing, unearthly beauty; the winds were mellow and luminous, and the brass, when called upon, had a truly magical brilliance. Here, too, was all the bright clarity of a genuine "French tone." The harp-and-flutes trio was magnificently done.

You will not often hear any chorus sing with the marvelous subtlety and the keen shadings which the New England Conservatory Chorus, trained with consummate taste and discipline by Lorna Cooke de Varon, brought to "L'Enfance du Christ." When it was supposed to be a choir of angels, it sounded exactly as you might suppose the angelic host to sound. Miss Tourel, and Messrs. Morgan, Cass and McCollum, in each case sang gloriously, both for quality of tone and musical expression. And, incidentally, the program notes of John Burk were never more splendidly written than this week. If all this was not perfection, it came mighty close!

55

65

19, 1953

Music in Review

By TUCKER KEISER

Boston Symphony

Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ," a sacred trilogy, promised by Mr. Munch for two seasons ago and cancelled because of the conductor's illness, received a belated performance yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Both Hector Berlioz and Charles Munch have a fondness for striking effects which led to the suspicion that sensationalism rather than sensitivity was the outstanding characteristic of both the composer and the conductor. Yesterday's performance, probably the first in Boston of this work, demonstrated that neither is incapable of meditative serenity.

The work is divided into three big parts: Herod's Dream, the Flight into Egypt, and the Arrival at Sais. Berlioz, who wrote his own libretto, freely adapting the St. Matthew account of the early years of Jesus, uses the device of a narrator to introduce various sections, to shift the scenes, and to comment on the action. Each of the big scenes is divided into orchestral interludes, solos, duets and choruses.

As in all oratorios, a large apparatus is necessary, comprised of soloists, orchestra and chorus. The soloists yesterday were the incomparable Jennie Tourel, listed on the program as a soprano; Mac Morgan, baritone; Lee Cass, bass, and the ubiquitous John McCollum, tenor.

The New England Conservatory Chorus, augmented for the occasion apparently, sang the choral part with a precision which even they must have found unbelievable. Trained to a fare-theewell by Lorna Cooke de Varen, they sang, if anything, just a bit too well; they got honors for beauty of tone, they got honors for French diction, for vitality — they passed. Only a mechanical brain makes absolutely no mistakes; an error or two now and then is evidence that the artist is in the throes of current creation. (For example, Miss Tourel, Bar 48, Scene 5.) A chorus rehearsing feverishly for an important concert can, and in this case did, go a little stale in the process of polishing perfection.

Accustomed to the violent dynamic contrasts in the other works of Berlioz, one is apt to be surprised and disappointed by the lack of peaks and valleys in this consistently subdued score. There are, it is true, certain passages of greater comparative interest: the modal Herod's Air, the rhythmic Incantation Music, the etherial Angels' Song, and the fugual Ishmaelite Chorus.

Regretably, Mr. Munch chose to shorten two other interesting sections; he omitted the middle stanza of the naive Shepherd's Farewell to the Holy Family and allowed the two flutists, Doriot Anthony and James Pappoutsakis, and harpist Bernard Zighera, no repeats in the most beautiful instrumental selection, the Serenade.

Of the soloists, the most impressive was, of course, our Jennie, who as usual batted for 1000—well, anyway, 1000 minus one quarter-note. John McCollum, a rising star in the musical firmament, sang the part of the narrator with distinction. Mac Morgan and Lee Cass, baritone and bass, respectively, though singing with assurance, seemed rather disturbed by the conflicting demands made on their vocal organs by French diction and voice production. Accuracy of pitch is the first casualty when one does battle with the Gallis tongue, and Mr. Cass had several such battles.

Although "L'Enfance du Christ" may never replace the "Messiah" as a Boston Christmas rite, it would afford a welcome change from the Handelian fare offered us by every local choral group every year.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE

DEC 18 1953

Chorus Leader Lorna de Varon Rising Star in Hub Music World

By CYRUS DURGIN

One of the rising stars of music in Boston is a slim, dark-haired, dark-eyed lady who conducts the New England Conservatory Chorus. Her name is Lorna Cooke de Varon, and in five years she has held the post she has brought the Conservatory Chorus to new distinction and excellence. Her most recent contribution to music in this city is the preparation of the choral part of Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ," which Charles Munch will present at the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Although she is all vivacity and authority when on the conductor's stand, it was plain to see, one day in the trustees' room at the New England Conservatory last week, that Mrs. de Varon does not especially enjoy talking about herself. The basic facts came easily enough: that she was born Lorna Cooke in Chicago, moved with her family when she was 15 to Rhode Island, went to Wellesley, and took graduate study at Radcliffe.

But there were just modest and pleasant "Thank you's" when it was mentioned that only this Fall, starting with 50 percent new members, she had accomplished a notable feat in so admirably drilling the Conservatory Chorus for its recent Jordan Hall concert. Nor was there forthcoming any quick or voluble listing of what she has done. Mrs. de Varon is the modest sort, quiet but thoroughly knowing of her business.

A Good Pinch-Hitter

The usual early studies in piano were amplified by voice training and organ lessons by the time she was a Wellesley undergraduate. Then she got a chance to work with G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, and that started the de Varon career in choral conducting. For two years she studied with the widely esteemed Mr. Woodworth, and became his assistant. Then came two Summers as a pupil of Robert Shaw, founder of the famed Robert Shaw Chorale, at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood. There was, too, study of theory with Nadia Boulanger, composition with Walter Piston and choral composition with Dr. Archibald T. Davison.

LORNA COOKE de VARON

Then one mid-season, Mrs. de Varon received a summons from Bryn Mawr College to replace the chorus leader, who had resigned. A stint of pinch-hitting lengthened into a stay of nearly four years as assistant professor of music. That, as she says, "was very fortunate in all respects, musical and personal, because at that time my husband returned from military service." He is Jose de Varon, a Boston lawyer. Last Summer Mrs. de Varon was on the staff of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood as assistant to Hugh Ross in the choral department. She will resume the post again next Summer.

Music is in the family. Mrs. de Varon's mother, Hazel Watts Cooke, was a professional and wrote several operettas for children. Mrs. de Varon obviously has in her veins what theatre people would call "trouping blood." Just a few weeks ago she got a call asking that she prepare the singing parts in the Polovetsian Dances of Borodin, which were to be presented by the Boston Symphony. It was the Thanksgiving week-end, but she got on the telephone, rounded up as many as she could of the Conservatory Alumni Chorus, and had prepared them in four days. I for one, can testify they sang very nicely.

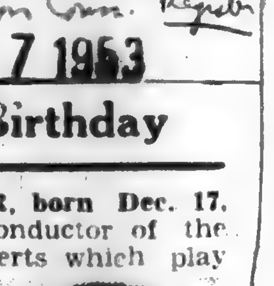
What in Mrs. de Varon's belief is required for choral conducting in addition to musical competence? "You have to know people," she smiles.

Cir. (D 10,871)

This Clipping From
LOCKPORT, N. Y.
UNION-SUN & JOURNAL
also Torrington Conn. Register

DEC 17 1953

Today's Birthday



ARTHUR FIEDLER

ARTHUR FIEDLER, born Dec. 17, 1894, in Boston. Conductor of the famed "Pops" concerts which play everything from Bach to boogie-woogie, he has been called by his first name by his "Pops" audiences since he started the concerts in 1930. He studied in Vienna and Berlin, but returned home at the age of 19 to play second violin in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He served in the U. S. Army in World War I.

Cir. (D 294,859) (S 252,707)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

DEC 18 1953

1500 Firms Asked To Aid Symphony

Fifteen hundred New England business firms have been asked to help the Boston Symphony Orchestra's campaign for funds in letters sent out yesterday by Michael T. Kelleher, one of the trustees of the orchestra.

The appeal to businessmen is something new, the first widespread campaign to enlist the aid of industry in the preservation of a cultural activity. The Boston Symphony, Mr. Kelleher's letter to the leaders points out, "has made New England a better place to live and work."

A campaign for contributions from individuals has also been launched for the orchestra by Dr. Palfrey Perkins, of King's Chapel, another trustee. In order to be able to continue, the Symphony Orchestra must raise $[illegible]

Cir. (D 131,670) (S 255,529)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

19 1953

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the ninth program of the 73d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloists were Jennie Tourel, soprano; Mac Morgan, bass; John McCollum, tenor and Lee Cass, bass. Assisting was the N. E. Conservatory orchestra, Lorna DeVaron Cooke, conductor. The program was given over the performance of Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ."

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Berlioz' non-liturgial cantata "L'Enfance du Christ" is one of the most singular—and almost singularly beautiful—works in all music.

Given its first Boston performance in many years yesterday afternoon it held the audience enthralled both by the poetry of the words and the music, and the poetry of the performance itself, which was on a spiritual plane of almost mystical character. Indeed, the performance was of such a lofty character it all but obscured the fact that Berlioz' methods here, as in the Requiem, are entirely secular.

However, if the music is secular, in contrast, say, to Bach's St. John Passion, its atmosphere throughout is of infinite spiritual tenderness. At no time, even in the scene in which the soothsayers of Herod's troubled dreams demand that he put to death every child under two in Bethlehem does the composer call upon the violent forces so typical of his style. There hardly exisits a real fortissimo in the entire 90 minutes, nor a fast or rushing tempo. The work is quiet almost to the point of inaudibility at times; the moods gentle and meditative, the rhythms soft and flowing and yielding always, the melodies long and untroubled and ever expressive.

Skill Prodigious

In close examination perhaps, the music is anything but substantial; reduced to a piano score it would be found to be thin and tenuous, but this applies to the whole body of Berlioz' music. Yet so prodigious is his skill with sounds, whether in the use of a thesaurus of orchestral colors and tints (in this case with the transparency of water colors) or in the use of the human voice, he evokes a mood not less than magical.

As this affecting legend of the flight of Mary and Joseph into Egypt with the Christchild to escape Herod's terror unfolds, the very essence of Berlioz'—and all French composer's—wonderful ear for the musical value of words is revealed. Where in Italian music (in connection with opera, of course), it is the voice and in Greman music it is the orchestra, in French music it is the word, and Berlioz here demonstrates that rule of thumb in truly classic fashion. Not a syllable escapes its precise musical value, not a word ever appears out of its musical context (as, for example, words appear so ludicrously out of musical context in Stravinsky's "The Rake's Progress"). And always these words are italicized in the orchestral music itself; when Mary cries out that she suffers, that cry is echoed ever so sadly in the strings. This sort of thing, which might be obvious in another's treatment abounds in the score, even to the sound of Joseph's knocking on the door. And always, too, the words can be heard, comprehended, even felt.

All this, it goes without saying, depends on a performance in which lingual capacities of the soloists and chorus are on the highest level, and so it was yesterday. Mr. Munch himself has always displayed a particular sensitivity to language in its musical expressivity and, with a quite evident devotion to this particular work, he achieved stunning results with soloists and chorus alike. Since French is not my native tongue I am of course unable to state that that accent was unimpeachable, but it seemed to me to be so.

I was a little fearful, before the concert, that the Messr. Morgan, Cass and McCollum might be at a disadvantage to be cast with Jennie Tourel in the leading roles, but such didn't prove to be the case. Miss Tourel herself certainly dominated in the always matchless quality of her singing, but Mac Morgan sang Joseph with great authority and splendor of tone. John McCollum and Lee Cass sang very well, too, but their voices were not always of sufficient carrying power and range, though stylistically excellent. The chorus of the New England Conservatory, trained for the occasion by Lorna Cooke DeVaron, was in every way perfection, responding to the softest pianissimos of the conductor in a beautiful tone—a very difficult thing for an amateur chorus to do. A speccial word at this point, also for that exquisite trio of Dorjot Anthony and James Pappoutsakis, flutes, and Bernard Zighera, harp.

All in all, a choice event for the connoisseur who will hardly believe that Berlioz brought out the second part in Paris 100 years ago under the name of Pierre Ducles, terming him "an unknown 18th century composer"! Nicolle Henriot appears next Thursday afternoon and Saturday night in Saint-Saen's Third Piano Concerto. Brahms' Fourth is also on the program.

THE

MUSIC

"L'Enfance du Christ" Presented at Symphony

Ninth concerts in the Friday afternoon—Saturday evening series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, music director, at Symphony Hall. The program: Berlioz: "L'Enfance du Christ," Sacred Trilogy, Op. 25. The cast: Jennie Tourel, soprano, Mary; Mac Morgan, baritone, Joseph; Lee Cass, bass, Herod and The Father of a Family; John McCollum, tenor, The Narrator. Chorus: The New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke de Varen, conductor.

By CYRUS DURGIN

Yesterday afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will, I think, go down as one of the great occasions in the history of this organization. For only then, nearly 100 years after its creation, the Sacred Trilogy, "L'Enfance du Christ," of Hector Berlioz, was for the first time in the history of these concerts, presented complete, and in a performance of the utmost beauty.

In this world perfection is a quality—and, for that matter, a quantity—often hoped for and rarely attained. Yet if any musical experience within my memory ever has approached perfection, it was this performance of "L'Enfance du Christ." Here was symphonic playing of the highest order, of a richness, delicacy and precision of style which this reviewer has never heard exceeded and, added to it, vocal excellence, from soloists and chorus, of equal caliber.

A product of Berlioz' later years and highest maturity, "L'Enfance du Christ" is another telling of that most fabulous of all stories, the birth of Christ; the massacre of the babies by Herod; the flight of the Holy Family into Egypt, and the simple kindliness of the Ishmaelite family who received in their home Mary, Joseph and the Infant. In terms of elaborate orchestral apparatus, and of large expression, this work is quite unlike the Berlioz of the better-known masterworks, the "Fantastic" Symphony, "Harold in Italy," "Les Troyens," "The Damnation of Faust" and the Requiem.

Though of large dimensions in length and conception, "L'Enfance du Christ" is remarkably simple and intimate in manner. The orchestra rarely speaks out in grand or proclamatory fashion; the chorus more often sings soft, then loud, and even the sometimes plainly operatic style of the vocal solos is tempered to the nature of the story. Nonetheless, the musical fabric is Berlioz at his most individual: the melodies frequently have that assymetrical cast so natural to the composer, and so eloquent because it is so rare; the patterns of the rhythms are both unconventional and even after a Century, so seemingly new and fresh; the harmonic background, as always with Berlioz is a mingling of ordinary practices and of distinct chromatic originality; the orchestration, for all its subdued dynamic nature, is extraordinarily rich and multi-colored.

Charles Munch's regime here may ultimately be known, among its other excellences, as the time when Berlioz came to be known again in Boston. Certainly this performance has brought us a mostly unfamiliar work in the best possible light. The strings glowed with an amazing, unearthly beauty, the winds were mellow and luminous, and the brass, when called upon, had a truly magical brilliance. Here, too, was all the bright clarity of a genuine "French tone." The harp-and-flutes trio was magnificently done.

You will not often hear any chorus sing with the marvelous subtlety and the keen shadings which the New England Conservatory Chorus, trained with consummate taste and discipline by Lorna Cooke de Varon, brought to "L'Enfance du Christ." When it was supposed to be a choir of angels, it sounded exactly as you might suppose the angelic host to sound. Miss Tourel, and Messrs. Morgan, Cass and McCollum, in each case sang gloriously, both for quality of tone and musical expression. And, incidentally, the program notes of John Burk were never more splendidly written than this week. If all this was not perfection, it came mighty close.

56

ce du Christ' at Symphony

Munch Conducts Berlioz' Sacred Trilogy

By Harold Rogers

The Berlioz renaissance in Boston, initiated by Charles Munch when he assumed the directorship of the Boston Symphony in 1949, is now coming into full effulgence with the performances this week of "L'Enfance du Christ." This "sacred trilogy" on events surrounding the infant Jesus is a masterful example of what Berlioz could do with a restrained hand, a tender touch, a devoted heart.

When first heard in 1854 this oratorio found immediate acceptance with the same public that rebelled against Berlioz' massive works for augmented instrumental forces. He expressed his annoyance in a letter to Liszt. "So be it—," he wrote, "I have become a good little boy, human, clear, melodic. I am at least writing music like everybody else. We are all agreed on that point."

But surely Berlioz did not sincerely believe that. He was too clearly aware of his unique individuality. He seldom said anything in a conventional way, yet what he did say was exactly right for the idea he was expressing. Therein lies his genius—the ability to speak with originality in universal terms.

* * *

We can easily see, almost a full century later, that in "L'Enfance du Christ" Berlioz was not "writing music like everybody else." Every bar is stamped with his original seal. He wrote his own text of the Christmas story. He set it to music that is at the same time both dramatic and devotional. Other composers have achieved this, of course, but only the great ones seem to know the secrets of such alchemy.

In "Herod's Dream" of Part I we are given music of terror and foreboding while Herod tells of his nightly dream of the child that is to be born who will dethrone him and take away his power. Here Lee Cass, the bass soloist, sang with intense conviction. Since his voice is more lyrical than dramatic, it is especially suited to the changing colors of this score.

The instrumental portion in seven-four time, representing the incantations of the soothsayers, who recommend the Slaughter of the Innocents, is an awesome piece of composing. Mr. Munch and his forces played as if covered by a mystical veil.

Part I also includes the scene in the stable at Bethlehem. Here the roles of Mary and Joseph were sung by Jennie Tourel and Mac Morgan, whose voices are well matched in power, if not in style.

Miss Tourel, of course, has long been known as a specialist in French music, and her work yesterday afternoon was in her best vein. Within the past few seasons Mr. Morgan has come up rapidly with his excellent operatic performances, both with the New England Opera Theater and elsewhere. His singing yesterday was also in his best vein, though his style, in juxtaposition with Miss Tourel's, was more American than French.

Bender

Jennie Tourel, soprano soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ" yesterday afternoon and this evening.

* * *

Another singer who is coming rapidly to the fore is James McCollum, a California tenor who has sung, within the past few weeks, the role of Pelléas in Boris Goldovsky's production of "Pelléas and Mélisande," the tenor solos in the Handel and Haydn Society's performances of "The Messiah," and now the role of the Narrator in "L'Enfance du Christ." His tenor is silver in quality, the kind that compasses the range with ease and carries well. Yesterday he sang beautifully, and if his French pronunciation was not always of the finest, his enunciation was of the best.

One could expand at length on the many beauties of this work. Mention should be made of the fine choral singing — especially in the "Farewell of the Shepherds" in Part II, the "Flight into Egypt." Trained by Lorna Cooke deVaron, the chorus of the New England Conservatory of Music sang with eloquence, precision, and sensitive dynamic control.

Next Week's Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its tenth pair of concerts in Symphony Hall next week on Thursday afternoon, Dec. 24, instead of Christmas Day, and on Saturday evening as usual. The soloist will be Nicole Henriot, who will be heard in two concertos new to Boston—the Suite Concertante for Piano and Orchestra by Darius Milhaud and the Third Piano Piano Concerto by Saint-Saëns.

The Milhaud piece had its first public performance in Paris last summer by Miss Henriot under the direction of Charles Munch. Mr. Munch will open the program with Auber's Overture to "La Muette de Portici" (Masaniello), and close it with the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor.

Cir. (D 172,699)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
Christian Science Monitor

DEC 19 1953

Szell, Ormandy, and Munch in New York

By Miles Kastendieck
New York

When George Szell returned to the Philharmonic Symphony as guest conductor for a two-weeks' span, the programs, as was expected, took a conservative slant. A conservative course might also be noted in the concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra which has made three visits so far this season. It remained for Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony to inject the most contemporary interest at one time on its first trip to the city this season.

A Brahms' program consisting of the Second Symphony and the Second Piano Concerto opened Mr. Szell's fortnight. It was followed by another, listing the Franck Symphony, Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole and Berlioz's Excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust."

Performances of all these works were characterized by a studied approach, which meant a workmanlike rather than an enlightened presentation of the music. Eugene Istomin played the Brahms Concerto in masterly fashion, but resorted to pounding in doing so. Alfredo Campoli proved himself an accomplished musician as the violin soloist in the Lalo work.

In a shift of program, Mr. Szell greatly enhanced the next week's offerings by including the New York première of Bloch's "Sinfonia Breve." His enthusiasm for this work is wholly justified. In contrast to the Concerto Grosso No. 2, which Mr. Munch introduced, this work is more modern in concept and in content. Once again it is clear that Bloch writes with genuine feeling, though perhaps not all of this shone through the performance. As usual, the score is impressively written.

The symphony of that program was Schumann's Fourth, tastefully but not exuberantly projected. Paul Badura-Skoda played Mozart's Piano Concerto (K491) in somewhat the same manner. A later concert brought Rudolf Firkusny as soloist in the Beethoven Fourth Piano Concerto. He played with more brilliance than insight into its subjective nature.

Genuine Pleasure

Eugene Ormandy has conducted all the Philadelphia concerts to date. In each of them the orchestral playing has been a source of genuine pleasure. His first program, listing Bach, Brahms, and Debussy, also included Hindemith's Concert Music for Strings and Brass, op. 50, which holds up well after a score of years, and which audiences definitely like.

On its second visit, Mr. Ormandy offered an all-Wagner program; and on the third, an all-Beethoven program. The Wagner items were standard, probably because of an eleventh-hour shift, when Margaret Harshaw became indisposed. Under those circumstances the orchestral playing was a tour-de-force. The audience luxuriated in its tonal beauty, though some of the music moved rather heavily.

The Beethoven concert listed the First Symphony and the Ninth Symphony. This music came alive chiefly in the Choral Finale of the Ninth, through the brilliant singing of the Temple University Choirs and the vital contribution of Kenneth Smith, the bass soloist. Rita Kolacz, soprano, Eunice Alberts, contralto, and Harold Haugh, tenor, completed the quartet.

Boston Symphony

Two first New York performances marked the Boston Symphony's first concert—Bloch's Concerto Grosso No. 2, and the Kabalevsky 'Cello Concerto op 49, both of which were enthusiastically received. The Bloch work had a beauty, purity, and vitality that made grateful listening. The Kabalevsky 'Cello Concerto proved delightful, though somewhat conventional for two movements, then grew too showy in the last. Samuel Mayes, the soloist, gave a brilliant account of his part.

The second program brought notable performances of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and Debussy's "Iberia." It included Copland's Piano Concerto, expertly set forth by Leo Smit. The audience did not find this early Copland work too palatable.

Meanwhile, the Little Orchestra Society, under Thomas Scherman's direction, has been giving stimulating programs at regular intervals. Among the highlights have been performances of Paul Creston's Second Symphony and Bartók's Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta.

Cir. (D 46,023) (S 174,898)

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 20 1953

Nicole Henriot will be soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra at Veterans Memorial Auditorium night of Dec. 29.

Young French Pianist To Be Concert Soloist

A SLIM, blonde Parisienne who has been called the "frail thunderer" will be the piano soloist with Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra when the musical organization plays its second concert of the season here, in Veterans Memorial Auditorium on the evening of Tuesday, Dec. 29.

She is Nicole Henriot and although she is still in her twenties she has already appeared with 38 orchestras on three continents. She has appeared here once before, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1950.

Mlle. Henriot will play Saint-Saens' Third Piano Concerto at next week's concert.

Made Debut at 15

The young pianist began her musical studies at the age of seven and soon entered the Paris Conservatoire. At 15 she made her debut with the Pasdeloup Orchestra and achieved such success that she was engaged as soloist with the Colonne, the Lamoureux and the Conservatoire groups in her native city. Later she appeared with the Brussels Philharmonic and at Liege and Anvers.

When France fell in the recent war she continued her musical career, acting at the same time as the innocent cover for brave work in the Underground. She still bears scars from the morning after D-day, when the Gestapo raided her home and knocked her unconscious. Fortunately, just before their visit she had managed to dispose of papers hidden by her brother, an active member of the Resistance.

For her service to France in this dangerous work she was decorated with the badge of the Commandos d'Afrique, given to only some three dozen civilians.

After the German surrender she was the first French pianist to be heard in England. This was the beginning of a postwar music career which has included Holland, Belgium, Portugal, Czechoslovakia, Germany, Austria, Luxembourg, Switzerland, Scandinavia, Egypt, Israel and Turkey as well as the United States, Canada and Cuba.

Hailed Everywhere

She received the nickname "The Frail Thunderer," from Time magazine on the occasion of her American debut in 1948. Everywhere she was hailed as a charming girl and a great pianist.

"Here," wrote the critic Virgil Thomson, "is an artist one can enjoy with all the faculties—with the sentiments, with the mind, and with the musical ear."

Conservative Boston critics bowled over when she made her first appearance with the Boston Symphony in February, 1949, playing the Liszt E Flat Concerto.

The rest of the Dec. 29 program here will consist of Mozart's Divertimento in D, K.136; Debussy's "Iberia," Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and Ravel's Second Suite from the Ballet "Daphnis and Chloe." Charles Munch will conduct.

57 65

Cir. (S 3,543)

This Clipping From
OGDENSBURG, N. Y.
ADVANCE-NEWS

DEC 20 1953

Symphony Orchestra In Straits

The world famed Boston Symphony orchestra, which was heard in Ogdensburg during the days of the old Musical Festival, is feeling the financial pinch and unless additional revenue can be discovered its future is precarious.

In a frank statement on the orchestra's financial condition, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, told a group of Boston business leaders that $250,000 was needed to keep the world-famous institution solvent in this seventy-third season.

Mr. Cabot said that there had been an "encouraging response" to a drive among business men since last January, but that regulatory statutes, for example, had prevented some enterprises, such as utilities, from contributing. He added that he had worked out a plan to overcome that snag.

The orchestra will offer advertising space in its program book at a rate of about $2,500 a page, which would permit any business house to advertise, and at the same time "assist Boston's great cultural asset," Mr. Cabot went on.

As a setting for the appeal, Boston's business leaders were invited to attend a rehearsal of the orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch, who conducted the Lalo Violin Concerto, with Ruth Posselt as soloist.

Mr. Munch, who succeeded Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in 1949, told his audience that while he had conducted many orchestras, "none is so close to my heart as the Boston Symphony, and I hope it will be close to your hearts, also."

Later, George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, reported that the annual budget for the organization of 104 artists was $1,500,000. He said that concert receipts accounted for $1,000,000, but that the rest must come from record royalties, earnings on endowments and rentals of Symphony Hall for other purposes.

Despite two increases in seat prices in the last five years, deficits have consumed all unrestricted legacies and gifts, Mr. Judd added. He revealed further that $37,000 of this year's receipts had gone to pay last year's debts.

Cir. (D 80,555) (S 79,110)

This Clipping From
FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL

DEC 20 1953

Boston Symphony 'Broke,' Needs $250,000 for Year

Boston (AP)—Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said last week that world famous musical organization is broke.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the symphony's trustees, said: "We need $250,000 to keep the Boston Symphony solvent for the remainder of the season."

He asked a group of Boston business leaders and industrialists to consider a "premium advertising" fund raising plan under which full pages in program books would be sold at $2,500.

Cir. (D 294,859) (S 252,207)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

DEC 17 1953

About People

By GRACE DAVIDSON

Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, lived through 33 seconds that seemed to him like a decade last Friday. His wife Ruth Posselt's violin string snapped as she played the solo part with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Busy backstage, he felt his heart leap to his throat as the music stopped dead in the midst of an exciting virtuoso movement of Lalo's "Symphonie Espanole."

Someone shouted, "It's Posselt's string." But all that he heard was "Posselt." Before he could reach the wings, he was calmed with the sound of his wife's brilliant tones as that concerto came to its climactic end.

"It was awful for my husband," Miss Posselt said yesterday at their Salisbury rd. home in Brookline. "It was a hair-raising experience for everyone, the audience, Mr. Munch, for me, and especially for my husband."

Asked if it happens often that a violinist's string breaks during a solo, she replied, "Well, it's happened to me three times in 30 years." Miss Posselt made her debut at Carnegie Hall at the age of 9.

The pause was just 33 seconds, one of the musicians told her afterwards. Usually when a string breaks, the soloist goes backstage, picks up a spare violin and resumes playing. But Miss Posselt did not do the usual thing. After her string snapped, she immediately walked to the first violinist, Alfred Krips, and exchanged fiddles with him, conferred briefly with conductor Charles Munch, about where to pick up the symphony, and finished received an ovation from a packed house of 2800 people.

"My husband was pleased with me, I must admit," said Miss Posselt, whom Europe calls "the blonde American doll—the Adelina Patti of the Violin." He told her that she showed "real presence of mind and ingenuity in an emergency." His words made a triumphant concert "something very special" for her.

To make it a perfect event—this her 43rd appearance as soloist with the Boston Symphony—Miss Posselt's great teacher, Emanuel Ondricek, was in the audience; he, was proud of her.

"Now," she said, "we can laugh at the episode. But Mr. Krips' violin felt very strange to me. The cushion was hard." She explained that violin cushions are arranged for long, medium and short necks. She has a medium neck that takes a medium cushion. Then, too, a violinist must get accustomed to a violin, however excellent it is. Each violin has its own tone, its own individuality.

The Burgins—Miss Posselt and her conductor husband—have between them three Guadagnini violins and a Gand used as a spare. "Of course," she said, "we would love to have a Strad. Maybe some day." She and her husband interchange the violins. She insists a lot of twaddle is voiced about violins and the difference between the playing of a man and a woman.

"Some people say I produce tones that sound like a man's. That's nonsense," she said. "There are men that produce small tones and women who produce big tones. The volume of the tone has nothing to do with sex; it depends upon the player."

The Burgins live with their two children, Diana, 10, who goes to the Driscoll School, and Richard, 6, the Rivers Country Day School, in a 17-room house. Mr. Burgin has the third floor for his studio; Miss Posselt, the second floor, and the children each have a practice room on the first floor. For they are extraordinarily musical. Diana plays Bach on the piano and violin; Richard plays the piano as well as many a gifted boy of 12.

"The trouble is Richard wants to play all the time. May Heaven help him," said Miss Posselt. "You have to give up so much to be a musician. But there's one thing I didn't give up and that's marriage. People thought I was quite mad to marry. She revealed her husband, then Symphony Orchestra concertmaster and first violinist, noticed her for the first time when she broke a horse's hair on her bow at a 1938 concert at Symphony Hall. "He was a bachelor and supposed to be a woman-hater," laughed Miss Posselt.

This Clipping From
BOSTON MASS.
GLOBE

DEC 20 1953

Symphony Concerts on Thursday and Saturday This Week

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its 10th pair of concerts in Symphony Hall this week on Thursday afternoon, Dec. 24, instead of Christmas Day, and on Saturday evening as usual. The soloist will be Nicole Henriot, who will be heard in two concertos new to Boston, the Suite Concertante for Piano and Orchestra by Darius Milhaud and the Third Piano Concerto by Saint-Saens.

The Milhaud piece had its first public performance in Paris last Summer by Miss Henriot under the direction of Charles Munch. Mr. Munch will open the program with Auber's Averture to "La Muette de Portici" (Masaniello), and close it with the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor.

NICOLE HENRIOT will be soloist in two piano concertos with the Boston Symphony at the concerts on Thursday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Cir. (D 294,859) (S 252,207)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

DEC 20 1953

Symphony Orchestra

Boston Must Aid Great Organization for Reasons Reported Here by Trustee

By FRANCIS W. HATCH

(Ed. Note: Mr. Hatch is a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.)

Not since the old Music Hall was condemned in the 1890's, which threatened to leave the Boston Symphony without a home, has there been such a furor about saving the orchestra. Boston then rose to the occasion and its citizens provided the funds with which to build Symphony Hall, involving an outlay of about $700,000. At that time the founder of the orchestra, Major Higginson, was still living and taking care of all operating deficits. It was not until after World war I when Mr. Higginson, already past 80, turned the orchestra over to a board of trustees that any further financial assistance was asked from the citizens of Boston.

In fact, in the '20s, most of the money needed was raised privately and it was not until the '30s that wide public support was sought.

It was the great good fortune of the orchestra to be able to set its standards and policies without compromise. For 20 years now, the orchestra has needed and sought wider and wider support, and hand in hand with this expanded support has gone expanded service to the community.

In 1929, Arthur Fiedler was able to start the free Esplanade concerts, backed by a few friends, including several trustees of the orchestra. In 1936, the orchestra added to its world reputation by the establishment of the Berkshire Festival, now the most important summer Festival in the world. In 1940 it started the one and only music school supported by an orchestra. During all this period the orchestra has continued to add to the number of concerts it gives in Boston in the symphony season, until now, with its symphony concerts, Pops, Esplanade, Festival, and tours, it gives approximately two concerts in every three days throughout the year.

As if this were not enough, it now helps to carry the running cost of radio station WGBH [illegible] Greater [illegible], in fact an area with a radius [illegible] miles, can hear two full Symphony broadcasts each week, another unprecedented public service.

The Boston Post has told this expanding story again and again, in its daily news columns and its Sunday feature stories. One article by Eleanor Roberts was entitled "Music for the Millions." The Post was one of the first to point out that symphony music now attracts more people annually than professional baseball.

Literally thousands of people help support the orchestra. There are the 10,000 who own season tickets, besides all those who are "regulars" at the Boston Pops and at the Esplanade, both of which are developments which grew out of an existence of a symphony orchestra in this city. Without them these popular musical contributions could not exist.

The question most often asked is why not have ticket prices high enough to pay the orchestra's bills? The simplest answer is that such a policy would keep away many of the most genuine music lovers. It has been the orchestra's policy from the beginning to make the concerts widely available.

Last week the trustees, in advertisements, told the orchestra's financial story and the need and occasion for additional support, especially from industry.

Although the day of the single patron has passed, something more substantial has taken his place. Nearly 4000 people individually assist the orchestra each year, but gifts in larger amounts are badly needed, and if obtainable, must come from business.

Within the last 20 months the Boston Symphony Orchestra has carried the name of Boston from Berlin to San Francisco. Millions of lines of news have been published in the world press, bringing this city of Boston favorably to the attention of the western world. This is promotion for Boston that could not be bought at any price. It can only be earned by our institutions, which make a national and international contribution to our good name and our fame.

BOSTON, MASS
CHRONICLE
12/19/53

Award Winner

MISS THERESA GREEN, soprano, who hails from Baltimore. Daughter of the late Rev. Joshua H. Green and Mrs. Goldie Green, she is one of ten children. During the past several years she has gained such outstanding [illegible] as the Marion Anderson Award and the John Hay Whitney Fellowship, having won a scholarship in 1946 to study at the Curtis Institute, which she represented at its 25th anniversary program in the Philadelphia Academy of Music. She was also granted a fellowship at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

Cir. (D 91,651) (S 180,496)

This Clipping From
SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
TRIBUNE
DEC 20 1953

Music

Musical World Watching Progress Of Fine Arts Department Bill

by Lowell Durham

Many people in the musical world are wishing that Santa Claus would wave his magic wand Christmas Eve and make it possible for the so-called Howell Bill (HR 5397) to become law in the current session of the national Congress.

However, it seems highly unlikely that any such thing will transpire. For those readers who are unfamiliar with this particular piece of proposed legislation it should be stated that the so-called Howell Bill proposes:

1. To establish a federal arts commission to encourage and increase the accessibility of the fine arts.

2. To establish an opera house in Washington, D. C.

The proposed arts commission would be authorized:

1. To assist arts projects, both public and private, through grants, loans and other forms of aid.

2. To award scholarships for fine arts study.

3. To administer an opera house in the nation's capital.

The proposed commission would be composed of representatives of the government and 15 leaders in the fields of fine arts, education, recreation and public affairs.

Defines Arts

The Howell Bill defines the fine arts as including opera and other forms of music, drama, ballet and other forms of dance, literature, architecture, painting and other plastic and graphic arts, and the communication arts, radio television, etc.

The current issue of Musical America carries the opinions of many of the nation's music leaders on this project. They are varied and interesting. I present some of them for the readers' information:

Henry B. Cabot, president, trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc.: "As Calvin Coolidge said when asked about sin, which is a large subject, so I, when asked about governmental support of the fine arts, also a large subject, would like to reply, 'I'm agin it.'"

Floyd G. Blair, president, Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York: ". . . difficult as the financial problems of our orchestras may be, they should be met by each community which the orchestra serves and not solved by grants from Washington."

Supports Idea

Newbold Morris, chairman of the board, New York City Center of Music and Drama, writes in favor of the idea: "Of course, I am in favor of any proposal which will pave the way for government support. . . . We have a public education system from which millions of young people are graduating, and among some of them surely are sensitive young people interested in the finer things of life.

"The government appropriates funds for libraries, museums, aquariums and zoological gardens and, of course, that is one of the big arguments for New York City's appropriating a small amount each year in aid of the City Center . . ."

James C. Petrillo, president, American Federation of Musicians, also favors the bill "since these proposals would assign to the government the desirable and necessary function of promoting and stimulating the cultural and artistic progress of America in a manner consistent with our traditional ideals of democracy and free enterprise."

Not 'Control'

Patrick Hayes, Hayes Concert Bureau, Washington, D. C.: "I do not argue for government 'control' of the arts—far from it. The Department of Agriculture does not 'control' our national agriculture . . . the Department of Labor does not 'control' labor. These departments give the nation the benefit of research, information, advice, necessary regulation to prevent abuses, and moral leadership in their fields. Thus I would construe the work of a Department of Fine Arts."

Eric Oldberg, president, Orchestral Association, sponsoring organization of the Chicago Symphony, suggests a middle-of-the-road course. ". . . I do feel that the time has come when our government takes an interest (and possibly backs it financially) in the fine arts of our own USA . . . the only fear is that the government subsidy might mean government control. I hope a method can be worked out as was done for many decades in the European countries . . . by which a mutually satisfactory and controlling administration can be instituted in which both government and the private individual or enterprise participates."

Cir. (D 32,166)

This Clipping From RETAILING DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 23 1953

KAUFMAN AD TERMED 'VERY DISAPPOINTING'

BOSTON, Dec. 22.—Response to an advertisement by the Kaufman Electric Co., to help support the Boston Symphony Orchestra was termed "very disappointing" by a store spokesman.

The store donated the entire profits from the sale of RCA Victor Boston Symphony recordings for one week, Dec. 14-20. Kaufman's offered the services of its record department to help secure funds for the maintenanse of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mail and phone orders were urged by the ad. Even though there was a re-run of the ad, the over-all results were "very bad."

Cir. (D 149,902) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE

DEC 22 1953

TV Notebook . . . . by Mary Cremmen

Esplanade Violinist, 12, a Hit on Godfrey Show

Fiedler's Daughter "Scouted" Castleman

Arthur Godfrey had better prepare himself for a flood of letters of protest from Boston. Last night he had his annual pre-Christmas children's show and his first talent scout was 8-year-old Johanna Fiedler.

Rather than have her sit on a regular chair and be lost behind the desk, Arthur invited bright-eyed Johanna to climb up on his knee. When asked where she had met 12-year-old Charles Castleman, the boy she had brought to the talent scout show, Johanna replied, "At the Esplanade concert. He plays the violin."

Godfrey put his head close to the little guest: "Did he ever appear with your daddy?"

"Yes."

Godfrey coaxingly: "With what orchestra?"

When Johanna failed to answer, Arthur declared confidentially, "The Boston Symphony."

"What About Christmas," presented by Robert Montgomery, was "a sort of magical trick . . . to see how Christmas touches different people."

To get the hour-long drama under way, the camera hopped from one scene to the next. From a clerk in a post office . . . to a laboratory where scientists were experimenting with white mice . . . to the sick bed of a little girl . . . and even to a movie set to catch the hero and his leading lady embracing in a lifeboat. It also took in brief glimpses of different passengers on a train and later switched to the interior of a bus. Throughout almost every scene, the voice of Montgomery narrated.

Technically the production met the usual Montgomery standards of excellence. But instead of a sound, cohesive dramatic effect, the result was more like a string of lights held together by the wire of Christmas.

Just before time ran out, someone pulled a switch and every one of the characters began to grow with the true meaning of the Holy Day.

Since thre always seems to be room for one more panel show, "Masquerade Party" has been added to Channel 7.

Ogden Nash, Buff Cobb, Peter Donald and Ilka Chase constitute just about the most varied quartet of "experts" on TV. The special gimmick in their guessing game is that each of the mystery celebrities arrives on stage under a bewildering camouflage which includes an elaborate shapeless costume and unusually heavy makeup.

Last night the panel puzzled over Santa Claus.

Asked Donald: "Are you pretty elderly?"

Master of Ceremonies Doug Edwards tactfully interrupted: "O no."

Donald again: "Do you sit around on park benches advising Presidents?"

"No."

"Are you an entertainer?"

Buff Cob finally broke up the contest by exclaiming, "Something about his eyes is driving me crazy."

The panel stared earnestly into the mystery face. Then Donald let out a roar: "Ezio Pinza."

A hushed audience watched patiently while "Mr. South Pacific" removed a gummy addition to his nose, peeled off false cheeks and whisked off a beard.

★ ★ ★

Now that "Dragnet" has set the trend for a new tight lipped, sophisticated kind of crime show, it is really fun to tune in an old-fashioned whodunit like "Mr. and Mrs. North."

Things happen just as they did in the old days. Pamela reached into the closet for a broom and discovered a body. Later in the evening she and husband Jerry were washing the dinner dishes when a mysterious thump, thump could be heard in the cellar. Of course, at that crucial moment, the lights went out.

Jerry went in search of a flashlight, but Pamela's curiosity was so aroused that she couldn't wait for his return. Slowly, stealthily she started down the pitch black cellar stairs. After she had taken a few steps, the creaking door inevitably closed slowly behind her.

At last in the basement, Pamela lighted a match and instantly that famous who-dun it hand reached out of the darkness and grabbed her around the mouth.

When Jerry finally came to her rescue (not without first falling headlong down the cellar stairs), they heard low moans coming from behind a curtain.

Later, when the Norths were ready for bed, Pamela decided to go down stairs for a piece of pie. She stood in the kitchen (no lights, of course) and started to cut the pie.

And guess what? An ice pick, the missing murder weapon, was neatly tucked under the bottom crust

---

Cir. ([illegible]) (Sat. 274,941)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM & SUN

DEC 26 1953

Records

Record Makers Rush To Beat Any Strike

By RICHARD KLEINER

* * *

On the Classics: A recumbent brunette, ever so lightly veiled, features the cheesecake envelope in which RCA-Victor wraps its new sensual pressing of Scriabin's Poem of Ecstasy. She wears little more than a deep pink light. Papa Monteux led the Boston (!!!) Symphony through this one—blindfolded, we trust. Columbia's only hope of recouping is to bring out the liebestodt with Marilyn Monroe.

made with only vocalists and no musical accompaniment.

James Caesar Petrillo's AFM

THE PROVIDENCE JEWISH HERALD, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 25, 1

Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday

Next Tuesday evening in the Veterans Memorial Auditorium the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second visit to Providence of the season to play under the direction of Charles Munch. The soloist of the occasion will be Nicole Henriot, the brilliant young French pianist who was likewise soloist at these concerts in Providence in 1950. At this concert she will be heard in the Third Piano Concerto by Camille Saint-Saens. Miss Henriot, who was active in the French Underground during the occupation when she was still a very young girl, has since established her name as one of the foremost pianists of her sex in Europe and America, having appeared in many of our cities with orchestras and in recital.

Mr. Munch will open the program with a little Divertimento for String Orchestra by Mozart in D major, K. 136, written at the age of sixteen. The other numbers will be Brahms' "Variations on a Theme by Haydn", Debussy's "Iberia" ("Images" for Orchestra, No. 2) and the Second Suite from Ravel's 'Daphnis et Chloe".

Music i
Review

By TUCKER KEIS
Deferring to an audien
cupied with seasonal fes
Boston Symphony Or
steday afternoon ran light-hearted if rather cert, made brighter ristmas presence from damoiselle Nicole Hen
remely attractive blond who plays the piano
e play.
uber's Overture to "La Portici," nosily meld
-trap like the overt mpa and to Harold, ope
gram. If it is necess ive overtures of such k quality simply to fil
gram, why not resu
ething by Rossini;
ld be no more deman
intellect and consi
e pleasure to the ear.
orted reluctance to li own compositions is able; a village band p this selection on th
mon would be in its e
ilhaud's Suite Conc
Piano and Orchestra
pretentious, let alo nd, but we were d
its performance,
time in America,
pretty 28-year-old first movement, a heavily syncopated, i nearly for piano alon
nd movement, slov
ntatiously melancholy
the prominence of th
, the strings interjecti sional comments. T
ement, lively and ro
pt for a quiet middle s along with very lit
other than to aff
icians a good time.
the Piano Concerto
Major, Opus 29, No t-Saens, the only fa
ment one can make
. Henriot played it.
previously been hea
concerts; after one
he reason is obvious.

Cir. (D 131,670) (S 25

This Clipping Fro
BOSTON, MAS
HERALD
DEC 27

w Year's Conce
Boston Sympho
e Boston Symphony will give the eleventh erts of the season i y Hall next Friday and Saturday
uary 1 and 2, and th
ert of the Tuesday
s on the following uary 5. The third O
al of the season wi
following evening,
January 6.
r. Munch will open
's pair of concerts b ement of Bach's
Old Year is Past", which he also op
ent year. A first will be Walter ntasy for English Ho Strings", in which will be Louis Spe
nard Zighera. Hayd ny No. 100, the "
phony, will be re program. The closi will be Saint-Saen
y for Organ and O
3. E. Power Bigg
organist.
he program for the cert will consist of ydn Variations", th
lo Concerto, in wh ist will be Paul French virtuoso fo
mber of this Orche Organ Symphony b
ens.

59 65

Music in Review

By TUCKER KEISER

Deferring to an audience preoccupied with seasonal festivities, the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon ran through a light-hearted if rather tinselly concert, made brighter by a Christmas presence from France, Madamoiselle Nicole Henriot, an extremely attractive blonde pianist who plays the piano as if it were play.

Auber's Overture to "La Muette de Portici," noisily meldramatic clap-trap like the overtures to Zampa and to Harold, opened the program. If it is necessary to revive overtures of such pinchback quality simply to fill out a program, why not resuscitate something by Rossini; there would be no more demand upon the intellect and considerably more pleasure to the ear. Auber's reported reluctance to listen to his own compositions is understanable; a village band performing this selection on the town common would be in its element.

Milhaud's Suite Concertante for Piano and Orchestra is not even pretentious, let alone profound, but we were delighted with its performance, for the first time in America, by the very pretty 28-year-old Nicole. The first movement, animated and heavily syncopated, is scored very nearly for piano alone. The second movement, slow and ostentatiously melancholy, maintains the prominence of the piano part, the strings interjecting only occasional comments. The last movement, lively and rollicking except for a quiet middle section, races along with very little purpose other than to afford the musicians a good time.

Of the Piano Concerto in E-flat Major, Opus 29, No. 3, by Saint-Saens, the only favorable comment one can make is that Mlle. Henriot played it. It has not previously been heard at these concerts; after one hearing the reason is obvious. It is an extremely weak composition with pallid suggestions of faintly interesting themes in the second movement; even these thematic gleams die out, however, without getting anywhere. It is a tribute to the personality of the artist that her spirited performance was pleasant to watch even though the work itself was empty.

After the intermission, Mr. Munch led the orchestra in Brahms Symphony in E Minor, Opus 98, No. 4. By contrast with the confections which preceded it, the Brahms sounded quite nourishing. I am sure that it was not simply the atmosphere of holiday benevolence that made me feel that this was the best reading of Brahms that has been heard in Symphony Hall for some time.

Boston milk giants deadlocked in a labor-management dispute over a new contract for five months.

The action followed an announcement that the companies had agreed with the Milk Wagon Drivers' and Creamery Workers' Union, Local No. 380 to settle the issues through arbitration.

Cir. (D 131,670) (S 258,529)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
DEC 27 1953

New Year's Concert By Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the eleventh pair of concerts of the season in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, January 1 and 2, and the fourth concert of the Tuesday evening series on the following Tuesday, January 5. The third Open Rehearsal of the season will be on the following evening, Wednesday, January 6.

Mr. Munch will open the New Year's pair of concerts by his arrangement of Bach's Chorale, "The Old Year is Past", a piece with which he also opened the present year. A first performance will be Walter Piston's "Fantasy for English Horn, Harp and Strings", in which the soloists will be Louis Speyer and Bernard Zighera. Haydn's Symphony No. 100, the "Military" Symphony, will be revived on this program. The closing number will be Saint-Saens' Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, No. 3. E. Power Biggs will be the organist.

The program for the Tuesday concert will consist of Brahms' "Haydn Variations", the Haydn Cello Concerto, in which the soloist will be Paul Tortelier, the French virtuoso formerly a member of this Orchestra, and the Organ Symphony by Saint-Saens.

---

mphony uesday

ay evening in the morial Auditorium.
Symphony Orchestra
econd visit to Provi-eason to play under
of Charles Munch.
the occasion will be
, the brilliant young
t who was likewise
e concerts in Provi-
At this concert she
in the Third Piano
Camille Saint-Saens.
who was active in Underground during n when she was still girl, has since estab-
me as one of the fore-of her sex in Europe having appeared in cities with orchestra l.
n will open the pro-
a little Divertimento rchestra by Mozart in
. 136, written at the
en. The other numbers hms' "Variations on a aydn", Debussy's "Ib-
es" for Orchestra, No.
Second Suite from hnis et Chloe".

This Clipping From
BOSTON MASS.
GLOBE
DEC 25 1953

MUSIC

Henriot Piano Soloist With Boston Symphony

Tenth pair of concerts in the Friday afternoon (this week changed to Thursday) and Saturday evening series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch music director. At Symphony Hall. The program: Auber: Overture to "La Muette de Portici"; Milhaud: Suite Concertante for Piano and Orchestra (first performances in America); Saint-Saens: Piano Concerto No. 3. in E-flat major (first performances at these concerts); Brahms: Fourth Symphony. Nicole Henriot, French pianist, was soloist for Milhaud and Saint-Saens.

By CYRUS DURGIN

If it were the Spring of the year, you could make some sort of joke about the house-cleaning going on in the library of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, since the program this week begins with Auber's Overture to "La Muette de Portici". It is difficult otherwise to account for bringing out this old and desiccated and hurdy-gurdy piece for the first times since 1882. Nonetheless, it is something to have heard it played up to the nines by the Boston Symphony. Once is enough, however.

Saint-Saens' E-flat Piano Concerto is also fairly old and desiccated, but it probably was not on the Symphony Hall shelves because this orchestra never had played it before. The reason for this resurrection is obvious, however, for it contains many pages of pianistic fireworks, and the soloist of the week is the young and spectacular French musician, Nicole Henriot. Were the whole piece as lively as these pages of display, you would wonder why it had not remained active in the repertory. But the truth is, the venerable Camille here had his nodding moments, of genuine dullness.

Miss Henriot, with her high-wristed, wiry and powerful technic, gave the work a stunning performance. It is amazing how much strength lies in those arms and hands, and it continues to be a joyous phenomenon of the contemporary world how much fine musicianship was bestowed upon her. At 28 she is a fully-fledged virtuoso, and though there have been a few occasions in the past where her technic was more impressive than maturity of expression, that situation now appears to be changed.

She must be virtually an ideal soloist for Milhaud's Suite Concertante. Though probably not one of Milhaud's greater scores, and certainly not one of the biggest, it is music of true contemporary manner and matter. This is, too, music that "sings" beneath its outward coating of harmonic dissonance; it "sings" as melody and as bright, warm, brisk rhythmic patterns. Perhaps it is more engaging in the two fast movements than when the tempo is slow and Milhaud seems to wander, but no hard and fast conclusions can be drawn from, but one hearing. At any rate, the music pleased and Miss Henriot pleased enormously and was rapturously received.

Brahms' great architectural Fourth Symphony is one of the 19th Century masterworks that Mr. Munch plays magnificently. Yesterday's performance was flexible, powerful, warm and beautifully-toned apart from a little dryness in some woodwind chords of the first movement.

DECEMBER 26, 1953 Art—Music—Theater 7

Nicole Henriot at Symphony

Pianist Heard in Concertos By Milhaud and Saint-Saëns

By Harold Rogers

Nicole Henriot scored another triumph Thursday afternoon when she returned to Symphony Hall as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Again the [illegible] French pianist astonished her listeners with a dynamically brilliant performance—as she did when she first played in [illegible] five seasons ago.

[illegible] was heard in two works [illegible] a first American performance, and the other, a first performance for Boston. Judging by her smiles, one could see that she took much joy in her traversal of the Milhaud Suite Concertante.

And so did her listeners, for one would hardly wish to resist the blandishments of this captivating score. It's the same work that Milhaud composed in 1947 and named his Concerto for Marimba, Opus 278. In its original form it was performed by the St. Louis Symphony in 1949 under Golschman with Jack Connor as soloist.

However, last year Milhaud provided a piano part to take the place of the marimba, the orchestration remaining the same. In his transmutation (Opus 278a) it was first heard last summer when Mlle Henriot played it with the Orchestre de la Radiodiffusion in Paris, Charles Munch conducting. And she played the first American performance yesterday.

* * *

The piano part is economical and expostulatory—just right for Mlle Henriot's electric style. The opening Animé sparkled with much joie de vivre as she struck off the coruscating notes. The middle Lent movement has a lyrical quality, a mood of meditation and monologue. The final Vif rippled off with a toccata-like syncopation.

Mlle Henriot's playing is clean, crisp, accurate, and big. She produces the kind of penetrating tone that cuts through any orchestral texture. In the past she has led one to believe that she is primarily a concerto pianist—an artist who performs better in the dramatic surroundings of an orchestra than when alone in the intimate salon atmosphere of the recital hall.

But there were several times yesterday when Mlle Henriot displayed a poetic quality that she didn't possess before. These times took place in the second work she played—the Saint-Saëns Piano Concerto No. 3 in E flat major. Moments of sensitivity appeared in the cadenza of the first movement and again in the Andante. One welcomes these signs of growing maturity in a pianist who is so technically gifted.

* * *

The Saint-Saëns work is listed as a first performance at these concerts, though available records do not show that it has been heard before in Boston. The first four notes of the main theme in the first movement are identical with those of Addinsell's "Warsaw" Concerto—undoubtedly a happenstance, since such coincidences are forever occurring.

But if the two works do not continue note for note in theme, they do sound rather alike in style, though the Saint-Saëns work is put together with greater finesse. It apparently consists mainly of cascading torrents of arpeggios, scales, and other watery figures, all of which give the pianist much work that is out of proportion to the emotional return. Mlle Henriot played it brilliantly, of course. It took 83 years for Bostonians to hear it the first time. Another 83 years may pass before they hear it again.

Mr. Munch opened with a snappy reading of Auber's Overture to "La Muette de Portici" and closed with the Brahms Symphony No. 4.

Symphony Program

For the New Year's pair of concerts—to be held in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 1 and 2—Charles Munch will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his own arrangement of Bach's chorale, "The Old Year Is Past." He also opened the present year with this piece.

His program will include a first performance—that of Walter Piston's "Fantasy for English Horn, Harp, and Strings." The soloists will be Louis Speyer and Bernard Zighera. The rest of the concert will be devoted to Haydn's Symphony No. 100, the "Military," and to Saint-Saëns' Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, No. 3.

DECEMBER 25, 1953

BOSTON HERALD, FRIDAY

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 10th program of the 73d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Nicolle Henriot, pianist. The program:

Overture to "La Muette de Portici" ... Auber
Suite Concertante ... Milhaud
Concerto No. 3 in E flat, Op. 29 ... Saint Saens
Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98 ... Brahms

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Every piano virtuoso is confronted annually with the perplexing question, which Beethoven, Chopin, Liszt, Brahms or Rachmaninoff concerto shall I work up this year for the tour.

Nicole Henriot, appearing as soloist yesterday afternoon did none of them, nor, indeed, did she fall back on the Tchaikovsky, the Grieg or the Schumann. On the contrary, she came up with two works for piano and orchestra never done at these concerts before, and if neither of them may be said to rank with the greatest essays in this field, they certainly provided an admirable vehicle for Miss Henriot's astonishing technique.

Recent Work

Milhaud's Suite Concertante, a very recent work, finds the composer turning back to the high spirits and charm of the familiar "Scaramouche" suite for two pianos. Nowhere in the three brief movements is there a cloud to trouble the spirits, nor is there anywhere an insistance on a difficult harmonic medium to crease the brow.

The textures are often spicily dissonant but they merely serve to heighten the interplay between the contrasted forces of piano and orchestra; the melodies are jocular and good natured and, in the slow movement, relaxed and contemplative rather than profound or searching. It is, in short, an unpretentious and ingenious little piece making no demands on the listener save that he comprehend the jokes and asides that abound in the work.

If the Milhaud is unpretentious, the Saint Saens' Third is the last word in elaborate pretentiousness. You sense the grandiloquent character of what is to follow from the moment the pianist, following a great wind-up of rushing passages, pitches a melody that the orchestra knocks right out of the hall. This splendid proclamation, which Addinsell would have thought well of, appears again and again, and each time it does it gets just a little funnier.

The second movement finds the composer in an elegantly triste mood but you know he's perfectly happy all the while; he is merely gazing through a thick plate glass window at some touching scene at a very safe distance. The last movement, with echoes of the Carnival of the Animals and all, is gay and scintillating and very fetching. But when it is all over it is pretty hard to remember quite what it was all about. The only remaining impression, in fact, is that Miss Henriot played it with astounding style and bravura to achieve a great success with the audience, which has always had a very soft spot in its heart for this charming young French girl . . . as well it might.

Rock the Pops

Mr. Munch began the concert with Auber's Overture to "La Muette de Portici, a piece that would rock the Pops to their foundation. Remarkable particularly for the fact that it is the only piece in the whole repertoire that employs not one but two triangles, it is loud and clamorous and very busy and, to a contemporary audience, as empty as a stocking an hour after Christmas dawn. Nonetheless, Mr. Munch is entirely right in playing a thing like this once in a while if only to keep us posted on the whole musical scene. Personally, I would enjoy hearing more of this forgotten music, a symphony of Raff, for instance, Rubinstein's Ocean Symphony or even Spohr's Symphony for Two Symphony orchestras. There's no need to have to like it all, but there is, I think, a need to hear it if only to better understand the esthetic and historical forces behind it. Could anyone yesterday have imagined that this music led to the independence of Belgium in 1831 had he not read his program book?

All in all, Brahms' Fourth symphony, which brought the program to a close, went about as well as I have ever heard it go. Mr. Munch has occasionally inclined to overdoing Brahms, but yesterday he struck the vein from the very outset and gave us a reading of incomparable clarity, at once forceful and vigorous, but of sound and beautiful atmosphere. The orchestra played beautifully for him, too, but that, of course, is hardly a novelty; it always does.

The next program features the first performance of Walter Piston's Fantasy for English Horn, Harp and Strings, with Saint Saens' Third Symphony, Haydn's Military Symphony, and Mr. Munch's own transcription of a Bach Prelude and Chorale also on the program.

ON
ade 0 ton
of im-
Ar-
tor
ut-ich in onrts
es-
gs,
onrts
rn-ch nu-ox, ire
onse,
val
ys,
ys.

Cir. (D 244,889) (S 262,207)

60

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

DEC 27 1953

"L' Enfance"

Munch at His Best in Berlioz Work

By TUCKER KEISER

The performance last week end of Berlioz' sacred trilogy, "L'Enfance du Christ," evoked those qualities in Charles Munch which make him, if not a conductor of the first magnitude in the musical firmament, a brilliant though variable star. For his genius shines most brightly when several of the following factors are in conjunction: when the style of composition is French generally; when the composer is Berlioz particularly; when the score employs a chorus prominently; when the mood is religious profoundly.

"L'Enfance" is characteristically French in delicacy of sound and orderliness of development. It employs [illegible] 17th century French declamatory recitative of Rameau and [illegible] and utilizes modal scales with typical Gallic love for and knowledge of traditional forms. The naive text, the very essence of Gallicism, molds every melodic inflection. Had the score not been so saturated in the French [illegible], had it been Russian, [illegible] English, Mr. Munch [illegible] have been nearly so effective.

That the conductor is in complete sympathy with the composer of "L'Enfance" has been demonstrated again and again. He has conducted here with great success Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique," "Romeo and Juliet," the "Requiem," and various concert overtures and excerpts. The temperamental variety of Berlioz is reflected in the personality of Mr. Munch.

Choristers who sing under his direction agree that he has an ear very finely attuned to choral timbres, a steadying solidity in indicating entrances, and a wonderfully expressive countenance to suggest the emotional nuances required for particular passages. So preoccupied is he with effects he draws from the singers that he has little time to worry the orchestra; the result is that the orchestral tone is often better in choral works than in purely instrumental works.

Both Berlioz and Munch love orchestral and choral effects, and while emphasis on this element in a composition may lead to the theatrical, there was nothing stagy about the beautifully ethereal offstage chorus of Les' Anges last week. Artistic genius involves, it has been said, both great emotional sensitivity and great intellectual control; neither is lacking when Mr. Munch is dealing with a religious theme.

The restraint with which the conductor handles such moving material is perhaps imposed upon him by the nature of the material. When such restraint is not imposed, Mr. Munch sometimes al-of a Tchaikovsky or a Wagner score is likely to be painfully passionate.

When under no necessity to control the orchestral accompaniment of a soloist, or to follow a choral text, or to maintain a tone of piety, the conductor frequently overdramatizes flamboyant transitional passages and purple harmonies. The results in most cases are striking and even momentarily stunning, but the overall consequence is a lack of focus and a warping of the formal design.

Since in "L'Enfance du Christ" the short sections require only a steady movement from one to another, the subdued mood permits few dynamic outbursts, the conventional harmonies need no underlining, and attention to a text keeps the proportions in balance, we had Mr. Munch's finest performance to date. He conducted with genuine inspiration, blending his large forces with exquisite taste to give us the most beautiful tone he has so far produced.

"The Damnation of Faust," by Berlioz, promised for performance in February, should, by every logical line of reasoning, be an exceptionally fine production. It is a very French choral work by a composer with whom the conductor is in complete sympathy, and it has religious overtones, if not a strictly religious content.

Although, like Saint-Saens, this reviewer has certain reservations about this score, it is not, like the piano concerto, entirely Saint-Saens. Mr. Munch and the orchestra gave a vigorous performance and made the piece sound at least like first-rate Saint-Saens.

---

plete approval after the first movement of the Concerto last evening comes to mind as an immediate example of this). And we continue to be grateful to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to Dr. Munch for their visits here and for their part in these developments.

This was the 302nd concert in Providence by the Boston Symphony and it was completely sold out well before curtain time. It was a high point in the 1953 musical year.

Cir. (D 159,619)

This Clipping From
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS

JAN 1 - 1954

'Big 3' of Symphonies Too Good to Compare

By DELOS SMITH,
UP Reporter

NEW YORK—New York audiences now have heard the country's "big three" among symphony orchestras — their own, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, and the Boston and the Philadelphia.

Thus it can be reported that the states of their health are excellent. Only an incautious person would venture a detailed comparison.

But it can be said the Philadelphia's strings are even more incredibly beautiful and Conductor Eugene Ormandy's skill in capitalizing on this asset becomes more impressive with each new season.

The Boston is the minutely disciplined instrument it always has been. Discipline is particularly evident with the conductorial style of Charles Munch, who is less a rhythm-drive man than a manipulator of chords, standing them on end and every which way.

His way of unreeling Beethoven's "Eroica" with the dramatic consistently understated and the shifting components of the chordial layer cake perhaps as consistently overstated, was novel.

Being the regular tenant of Carnegie Hall, the Philharmonic-Symphony has more jaundiced ears in the house, but there have been few complaints since George Szell began his term with the baton and Dmitri Mitropoulos, the music director, began his midseason rest.

Some of the customers have been "getting on" Mitropoulos for some alleged eccentricities of tempi and his programming. Szell has a faculty of pleasing everyone, even members of the orchestra. Yet he's a tight-rein man, a precise, just-so man.

Cir. (D 13,153)

This Clipping From
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

DEC 31 1953

Works of Berlioz Will Be Played At Tanglewood

A half dozen of the more important works of Hector Berlioz will be performed during the Berkshire Symphonic festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, next summer in recognition of the 150th anniversary of the composer's birth, Charles Munch, music director of the festival and of the Boston Symphony orchestra announced today.

Choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe will do "The Damnation of Faust" with the orchestra, the Music Center chorus will perform "Romeo and Juliet" and the "Requiem" with the orchestra, and "Harold in Italy," the "Fantastic" symphony, and the song cycle, "Summer Nights," also will be on the program.

Berlioz was born Dec. 11, 1803.

BERLIOZ WORKS TO BE PLAYED

Composer's 150th Year to Be Honored at Tanglewood

Boston, Dec. 30—The sesquicentennial season of Berlioz will be observed by Charles Munch at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, next summer with a performance of a number of the great works of this composer.

"The Damnation of Faust" will be performed with the choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe, "Harold in Italy" with William Primrose as viola soloist, the "Fantastic Symphony," and the song cycle, "Summer Nights." The festival chorus of the Berkshire Music Center, will appear with the orchestra in "Romeo and Juliet" in its complete form and in the famous "Requiem," which will conclude the festival. The festival will extend from the first week of July through Aug. 15.

Since the birth of Hector Berlioz one hundred and fifty years ago (Dec. 11, 1803) his artistic stature has risen increasingly in general estimation, notably in recent years.

Full pro[illegible] will be available shortly on application to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Symphony Hall, [illegible] 15.

SPRINGFIELD UNION, SPRINGFIELD, MASS., DECEMBER 31,

He. Dec 31

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Laning Humphrey's 'Cargo' Is Revealed

The mystery is solved at last. Now I know what Laning Humphrey carries around in that battered, that zipperless, that forlorn and that weary briefcase of his, and why all his pockets bulge out to make him look twice as big as he is.

As all editors and music writers around town know, Laning is the liaison man between The Boston Symphony orchestra and the press and as such he comes around with news of programs, guest conductors, and various other events transpiring around Symphony Hall about once a week.

He's been coming around for 18 or so years, too, filled with cheerful anecdotes, pleasantries and, most of all, the wildest assortment of miscellaneous information on everything. If any of us receives a letter in Portuguese or Finnish or Arabic or anything else we wait until Laning comes around for a translation. If any of us need to know what day it will be on August [illegible], 1976, we wait until Laning comes around. He'll have the dope. If any of us needs a letter weighed to see if it will go for three cents, we wait until Laning comes around. He'll have scales with him.

Air of Mystery

It was the fact that he did have some scales with him the other day that started the train of events that solved the mystery of his briefcase. For Laning, who is a lean, spare, busy sort of a man who can't make anyone believe he's well over 50, since he looks to be well under 40, has been coming around with a load of cargo that would stagger a dromedary which from the bulges in his pockets, he often resembles.

He frequently appears, indeed, not only with briefcase (the zipper burst a decade ago but he sticks one handle through the other which, he says, exerts more pressure on the contents so nothing falls out) and bulging pockets, but with four or five dusty tomes picked up in some second hand shop on the way or, perhaps, a large pen and ink sketch drawn by his artist wife, Martha Burnham. Moreover, he has always managed to preserve an air of mystery about all the things he's loaded down with. Up to the other day, that is, when he produced the scales.

"Laning," I said, "I have got to know what you are carrying around and that is all there is to it."

There followed, to my astonishment, a complete inventory of Laning Humphrey, inside pockets and all. "I never really thought about it before," he said, "but I guess I have got quite a lot of stuff with me. Let's see now," he added, undoing the interlocked leather handles.

"First of all," he began, "there is stationery, carbons, flimsies, string, labels and various size envelopes for mailing anything. You never know when you're going to need those.

There followed a recitation of contents by Mr. Humphrey who, as "Delver Forfax," contributes a bright page of musical anecdotes to the Symphony program for the Employer's Group Insurance Company, that left me breathless.

He had an inch-thick folio of biographies of most of the musicians and personalities of the Boston Symphony;

An inch-thick folio on Arthur Fiedler and matters related to the Pops and the Esplanade, complete with photos;

A folio on every aspect of the regular Symphony season complete with all dates past and present, as well as similar information on every aspect of the Tanglewood season;

Nine monographs on the lives of the composers;

A thick dictionary of dates;

'You Never Know'

A large volume entitled "Le Violon et la Lutherie," by Francis Cabos ("You never know when somebody is going to ask you about violins");

Another large volume, "Greatness in Music," by Alfred Einstein;

A folio containing data, with pictures, photos and souvenirs of the great Peace Jubilee of 1872 when 1000 firemen beat anvils during a performance (by an or-

"That's all there is in the briefcase," he said, putting the handles together. But there were the pockets of suit and overcoat to go, and these turned up a total of 72 letters wrapped in rubber bands, along with three commuter's time tables ("So I can always find one in a hurry"), commuter's tickets, six lead pencils of varying degree of hardness and three colored pencils, a typographical ruler, a fountain pen, an alphabetical note book containing notations on all subjects imaginable, various photographs of his family, stamps, and miscellaneous papers and documents in packets everywhere. The only thing he didn't have with him was a jackknife.

"Well," said Mr. Humphrey, going cheerfully on his way, "that would make my pockets stick out, wouldn't it?"

THE BOSTON HERALD
THURSDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1953

Cir. (D 46,023) (S 174,898)

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 30 1953

Cir. (S 142,658)

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

DEC [illegible] 1953

Music

Nicole Henriot, Pianist, Is Soloist at Concert By Boston Symphony

By WILLIAM DINNEEN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch directing, presented the second concert of its current Rhode Island series last evening at the Veteran's Memorial Auditorium with Nicole Henriot, pianist, as soloist in a brilliant performence of the Saint-Saens piano Concerto No. 3, Opus 29. The orchestral portions of the evening were equally scintillating and the audience mingled applause with cheers for both Nicole Henriot and Dr. Munch. The program:

Mozart
Divertimento in D major, for strings K. 136
1. Allegro
2. Andante
3. Presto
Brahms
Variations on a Theme of Joseph Haydn Op. 56a
Saint-Saens
Piano Concerto No. 3, in E-flat major Op. 29
1. Moderato assai; Allegro maestoso; Allegro animato
2. Andante
3. Allegro non troppo
INTERMISSION
Debussy
"Iberia" ("Images" for Orchestra, No. 2)
1. Par les rues et par les chemins (In the streets and byways)
2. Les parfums de la nuit (The fragrance of the night)
3. Le matin d'un jour de fete (The morning of a festival day)
Ravel . . "Daphnis et Chloe," Second Suite
Lever du jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale

Dr. Munch's choice of a Mozart work for strings as an opening work proved a very happy one. The famous shimmer of the Boston orchestra strings, together with the perfection of ensemble which makes many instruments sound as one, were abundantly displayed. We were particularly impressed with the interpretation by the director in the first movement, by the muted quality of the Andante, and by the music itself, especially the clever fugato writing, in the final section.

The Brahms Variations which followed are a great favorite with most audiences. The rather unusual statement of the theme in semi-detached style proved very effective and many of the variations were beautifully proportioned. One minor item—from where we were, though, there were also occasions when both blend and balance seemed not entirely satisfying — the strings especially seemed covered by other orchestral sound from time to time.

From a sampling of audience reaction during intermission and after the concert, it appears that St. Saens ranked below Nicole Henriot in the general estimation. We had the good fortune recently to be with a group which was attempting to decide what place St. Saens would fill in the history of music as time goes on. There were about as many opinions as there were people to express opinions, from which it appears that we should hear more of St. Saens if only to settle the matter. One thing should be said, however, and that concerns a concerto, no matter who writes it. If it creates excitement and provides a vehicle for virtuosic displays, it must be considered successful whether one likes the melodies or not!

Nicole Henriot provided as brilliant a display of true virtuosity as anyone could truly desire. Her playing was flawless, it had spirit, it created and sustained a variety of moods, and it was magnificently brilliant. The St. Saens may be whatever it is, but it was an ideal vehicle for her particular talent.

The Debussy "Iberia" and Ravel "Daphnis and Chole" were as excellently done as the French music always is by Dr. Munch.

This concert was practically a perfect way to end the year. If one may be permitted the liberty of adding a general comment to a review, this has been the best year for music in Providence in many a year. We have had a great many concerts, almost all of them very well attended, and they have been exciting almost without exception. Our audiences have become sophisticated in an adult way, so that visiting artists mention it as a reason for wishing to return here. (The silence of com-

6

Cir. (D 214,889) (S 252,207)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

DEC 27 1953

"L'Enfance"

Munch at His Best in Berlioz Work

By TUCKER KEISER

The performance last week end of Berlioz' sacred trilogy, "L'Enfance du Christ," evoked those qualities in Charles Munch which make him, if not a conductor of the first magnitude in the musical firmament, a brilliant though variable star. For his genius shines most brightly when several of the following factors are in conjunction: when the style of composition is French generally; when the composer is Berlioz particularly; when the score employs a chorus prominently; when the mood is religious profoundly.

"L'Enfance" is characteristically French in delicacy of sound and orderliness of development. It employs [illegible] 17th century French declamatory recitative of Rameau and Lully and utilizes modal scales with typical Gallic love for and knowledge of traditional forms. The naive text, the very essence og Gallicism, molds every melodic inflection. Had the score not [illegible] saturated in the French [illegible], had it been Russian, [illegible] English, Mr. Munch [illegible] have been nearly so effective.

That the conductor is in complete sympathy with the composer of "L'Enfance" has been demonstrated again and again. He has conducted here with great success Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique," "Romeo and Juliet," the "Requiem," and various concert overtures and excerpts. The temperamental variety of Berlioz is reflected in the personality of Mr. Munch.

Choristers who sing under his direction agree that he has an ear very finely attuned to choral timbres, a steadying solidity in indicating entrances, and a wonderfully expressive countenance to suggest the emotional nuances required for particular passages. So preoccupied is he with effects he draws from the singers that he has little time to worry the orchestra; the result is that the orchestral tone is often better in choral works than in purely instrumental works.

Both Berlioz and Munch love orchestral and choral effects, and while emphasis on this element in a composition may lead to the theatrical, there was nothing stagy about the beautifully ethereal offstage chorus of Les' Anges last week. Artistic genius involves, it has been said, both great emotional sensitivity and great intellectual control; neither is lacking when Mr. Munch is dealing with a religious theme.

The restraint with which the conductor handles such moving material is perhaps imposed upon him by the nature of the material. When such restraint is not imposed, Mr. Munch sometimes allows his emotions to dominate him so that his reading, for example, of a Tchaikovsky or a Wagner score is likely to be painfully passionate.

When under no necessity to control the orchestral accompaniment of a soloist, or to follow a choral text, or to maintain a tone of piety, the conductor frequently overdramatizes flamboyant transitional passages and purple harmonies. The results in most cases are striking and even momentarily stunning, but the overall consequence is a lack of focus and a warping of the formal design.

Since in "L'Enfance du Christ" the short sections require only a steady movement from one to another, the subdued mood permits few dynamic outbursts, the conventional harmonies need no underlining, and attention to a text keeps the proportions in balance, we had Mr. Munch's finest performance to date. He conducted with genuine inspiration, blending his large forces with exquisite taste to give us the most beautiful tone he has so far produced.

"The Damnation of Faust," by Berlioz, promised for performance in February, should, by every logical line of reasoning, be an exceptionally fine production. It is a very French choral work by a composer with whom the conductor is in complete sympathy, and it has religious overtones, if not a strictly religious content.

Although, like Saint-Saens, this reviewer has certain reservations about this score, it is not, like the piano concerto, entirely Saint-Saens. Mr. Munch and the orchestra gave a vigorous performance and made the piece sound at least like first-rate Saint-Saens.

---

plete approval after the first movement of the Concerto last evening comes to mind as an immediate example of this). And we continue to be grateful to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to Dr. Munch for their visits here and for their part in these developments.

This was the 302nd concert in Providence by the Boston Symphony and it was completely sold out well before curtain time. It was a high point in the 1953 musical year.

Cir. (D 159,679)

This Clipping From
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS

JAN 1 - 1954

'Big 3' of Symphonies Too Good to Compare

By DELOS SMITH,
UP Reporter

NEW YORK—New York audiences now have heard the country's "big three" among symphony orchestras — their own, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, and the Boston and the Philadelphia.

Thus it can be reported that the states of their health are excellent. Only an incautious person would venture a detailed comparison.

But it can be said the Philadelphia's strings are even more incredibly beautiful and Conductor Eugene Ormandy's skill in capitalizing on this asset becomes more impressive with each new season.

The Boston is the minutely disciplined instrument it always has been. Discipline is particularly evident with the conductorial style of Charles Munch, who is less a rhythm-drive man than a manipulator of chords, standing them on end and every which way.

His way of unreeling Beethoven's "Eroica" with the dramatic consistently understated and the shifting components of the chordial layer cake perhaps as consistently overstated, was novel.

Being the regular tenant of Carnegie Hall, the Philharmonic-Symphony has more jaundiced ears in the house, but there have been few complaints since George Szell began his term with the baton and Dmitri Mitropoulos, the music director, began his midseason rest.

Some of the customers have been "getting on" Mitropoulos for some alleged eccentricities of tempi and his programming. Szell has a faculty of pleasing everyone, even members of the orchestra. Yet he's a tight-rein man, a precise, just-so man.

SPRINGFIELD UNION, SPRINGFIELD, MASS., DECEMBER 31,

BERLIOZ WORKS TO BE PLAYED

Composer's 150th Year to Be Honored at Tanglewood

Boston, Dec. 30—The sesquicentennial season of Berlioz will be observed by Charles Munch at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, next summer with a performance of a number of the great works of this composer.

"The Damnation of Faust" will be performed with the choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe, "Harold in Italy" with William Primrose as viola soloist, the "Fantastic Symphony," and the song cycle, "Summer Nights." The festival chorus of the Berkshire Music Center, will appear with the orchestra in "Romeo and Juliet" in its complete form and in the famous "Requiem," which will conclude the festival. The festival will extend from the first week of July through Aug. 15.

Since the birth of Hector Berlioz one hundred and fifty years ago (Dec. 11, 1803) his artistic stature has risen increasingly in general estimation, notably in recent years.

Full programs will be available shortly on application to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Symphony Hall, [illegible].

---

ant works of Hector Berlioz will be performed during the Berkshire Symphonic festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, next summer in recognition of the 150th anniversary of the composer's birth, Charles Munch, music director of the festival and of the Boston Symphony orchestra announced today.

Choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe will do "The Damnation of Faust" with the orchestra, the Music Center chorus will perform "Romeo and Juliet" and the "Requiem" with the orchestra, and "Harold in Italy," the "Fantastic" symphony, and the song cycle, "Summer Nights," also will be on the program.

Berlioz was born Dec. 11, 1803.

Her. Dec 31

THE ROVING EYE

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Laning Humphrey's 'Cargo' Is Revealed

The mystery is solved at last. Now I know what Laning Humphrey carries around in that battered, that zipperless, that forlorn and that weary briefcase of his, and why all his pockets bulge out to make him look twice as big as he is.

As all editors and music writers around town know, Laning is the liaison man between The Boston Symphony orchestra and the press and as such he comes around with news of programs, guest conductors, and various other events transpiring around Symphony Hall about once a week.

He's been coming around for 18 or so years, too, filled with cheerful anecdotes, pleasantries and, most of all, the wildest assortment of miscellaneous information on everything. If any of us receives a letter in Portuguese or Finnish or Arabic or anything else we wait until Laning comes around for a translation. If any of us need to know what day it will be on August [illegible], 1976, we wait until Laning comes around. He'll have the dope. If any of us needs a letter weighed to see if it will go for three cents, we wait until Laning comes around. He'll have scales with him.

Air of Mystery

It was the fact that he did have some scales with him the other day that started the train of events that solved the mystery of his briefcase. For Laning, who is a lean, spare, busy sort of a man who can't make anyone believe he's well over 50, since he looks to be well under 40, has been coming around with a load of cargo that would stagger a dromedary which from the bulges in his pockets, he often resembles.

He frequently appears, indeed, not only with briefcase (the zipper burst a decade ago but he sticks one handle through the other which, he says, exerts more pressure on the contents so nothing falls out) and bulging pockets, but with four or five dusty tomes picked up in some second hand shop on the way or, perhaps, a large pen and ink sketch drawn by his artist wife, Martha Burnham. Moreover, he has always managed to preserve an air of mystery about all the things he's loaded down with. Up to the other day, that is, when he produced the scales.

"Laning," I said, "I have got to know what you are carrying around and that is all there is to it."

There followed, to my astonishment, a complete inventory of Laning Humphrey, inside pockets and all. "I never really thought about it before," he said, "but I guess I have got quite a lot of stuff with me. Let's see now," he added, undoing the interlocked leather handles.

"First of all," he began, "there is stationery, carbons, flimsies, string, labels and various size envelopes for mailing anything. You never know when you're going to need those.

There followed a recitation of contents by Mr. Humphrey who, as "Delver Forfax," contributes a bright page of musical anecdotes to the Symphony program for the Employer's Group Insurance Company, that left me breathless.

He had an inch-thick folio of biographies of most of the musicians and personalities of the Boston Symphony;

An inch-thick folio on Arthur Fiedler and matters related to the Pops and the Esplanade, complete with photos;

A folio on every aspect of the regular Symphony season complete with all dates past and present, as well as similar information on every aspect of the Tanglewood season;

Nine monographs on the lives of the composers;

A thick dictionary of dates;

'You Never Know'

A large volume entitled "Le Violon et la Lutherie," by Francis Cabos ("You never know when somebody is going to ask you about violins");

Another large volume, "Greatness in Music," by Alfred Einstein;

A folio containing data, with pictures, photos and souvenirs of the great Peace Jubilee of 1872 when 1000 firemen beat anvils during a performance (by an orchestra of 2000) of the Anvil Chorus;

A complete list of all Penguin books;

A full stock of photos and biographies of Charles Munch, with a press-book containing the story of the conductor's life and career;

A copy of Lyall's "Languages of Europe";

A small book of reproductions of French Impressionist paintings ("just to look at once in a while");

A portable pencil sharpener;

A catalogue of gadgets torn from the New York Times two years ago;

[illegible] postcards, as well as three dozen or more [illegible] clippings and items taken from every newspaper from the Manchester Guardian to the Mid Town Journal;

A copy of "Anedotas Fais," a Portuguese reading book; and

The Gospel According to St. Luke in Russian.

Cir. (D 46,023) (S 174,[illegible])

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 30 1953

Cir. (D 142,658)

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

DEC [illegible] 1953

Music

Nicole Henriot, Pianist, Is Soloist at Concert By Boston Symphony

By WILLIAM DINNEEN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch directing, presented the second concert of its current Rhode Island series last evening at the Veteran's Memorial Auditorium with Nicole Henriot, pianist, as soloist in a brilliant performence of the Saint-Saens piano Concerto No. 3, Opus 29. The orchestral portions of the evening were equally scintillating and the audience mingled applause with cheers for both Nicole Henriot and Dr. Munch. The program:

Mozart
Divertimento in D major, for strings K.
1. Allegro
2. Andante
3. Presto
Brahms
Variations on a Theme of Joseph Haydn, Op. 56a
Saint-Saens
Piano Concerto No. 3, in E-flat major, Op. 29
1. Moderato assai; Allegro maestoso; Allegro animato
2. Andante
3. Allegro non troppo
INTERMISSION
Debussy
"Iberia" ("Images" for Orchestra, No. 2)
1. Par les rues et par les chemins (In the streets and byways)
2. Les parfums de la nuit (The fragrance of the night)
3. Le matin d'un jour de fete (The morning of a festival day)
Ravel .. "Daphnis et Chloe," Second Suite
Lever du jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale

Dr. Munch's choice of a Mozart work for strings as an opening work proved a very happy one. The famous shimmer of the Boston orchestra strings, together with the perfection of ensemble which makes many instruments sound as one, were abundantly displayed. We were particularly impressed with the interpretation by the director in the first movement, by the muted quality of the Andante, and by the music itself, especially the clever fugato writing, in the final section.

The Brahms Variations which followed are a great favorite with most audiences. The rather usual statement of the theme semi-detached style proved effective and many of the variations were beautifully proportioned. One minor item where we were, though, there also occasions when both balance seemed not entirely fying — the strings seemed covered by other sound from time to time.

From a sampling of audience action during intermission after the concert, it appears St. Saens ranked below Henriot in the general estimation. We had the good fortune to be with a group which tempting to decide what Saens would fill in the music as time goes on, were about as many there were people to express ions, from which it appears we should hear more of St. if only to settle the matter. thing should be said, and that concerns a concerto matter who writes it. If it excitement and provides for virtuosic displays, it considered successful whether likes the melodies or not.

Nicole Henriot provided liant a display of true as anyone could truly desire. playing was flawless, it has it created and sustained of moods, and it was brilliant. The St. Saens whatever it is, but it was vehicle for her particular

The Debussy "Iberia" and "Daphnis and Chole" were lently done as the French always is by Dr. Munch.

This concert was practically perfect way to end the year, one may be permitted the of adding a general comment review, this has been the for music in Providence a year. We have had many concerts, almost all very well attended, and they been exciting almost without ception. Our audiences come sophisticated in way, so that visiting tion it as a reason for return here. (The silence

Dec. 31, 1953

61 65

Art—Music—Theater THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, THURSDAY

Preview of New Fantasy by Walter Piston—

Composer Describes Piece For English Horn and Harp

By Klaus George Roy

An oboe has been defined as "an ill wind that nobody blows good." If that were so, an English horn would be something like a hurricane. Actually, it is neither English, nor is it a horn. It is nothing more than an overgrown oboe, with a range a fifth lower and a tone much heavier and penetrating in timbre.

In Boston nobody has been a more effective refutation of that popular definition than Louis Speyer, who has played English horn and occasional oboe with the Boston Symphony since 1919. He is now in his thirty-fourth year with the orchestra.

One outstanding American composer who has contributed to the scanty literature for the instrument is Walter Piston, whose Fantasy for English Horn Solo with Strings and Harp will have its first performance at the week-end concerts, directed by Charles Munch. The work was composed during 1952 in Belmont, Mass., and is dedicated to Mr. Speyer. Bernard Zighera will play the important supporting harp part.

About ten minutes in length, the Fantasy is in one extended movement in three sections, centering around the tonality of A. The music begins with a Lento of quiet, meditative quality. A faster section follows, in scherzando character, and concludes with a highly ornamented cadenza for the soloist, accompanied by the harp.

The lyrical and expansive music of the beginning then returns, differently worked out. Most of the harmonic and melodic building material of the Fantasy can be traced to the first page of the score. Mr. Piston is an acknowledged master of polyphony.

To the question what relation this work bears to any of his earlier ones, the composer replied, "Well now, it is a bit contaminated by the Fourth Symphony, in the vicinity of which it was written!"

More important, however, was the question of why such a piece as this gets composed and sounds the way it does. First of all, Mr. Speyer had been promised this music for some time.

"You see," Mr. Piston added, "I believe very much in the inspiration of instruments themselves, in the effect that a fine player has on a composer. One doesn't write melodies in the abstract and then 'orchestrate' them. One conceives and feels them with a specific instrument in mind, then works them out to fit its special technical possibilities and tone-colors. And if a composer knows the performer who will do his work, so much the better; he will be familiar with the musical nature of the executant, and virtually hear him play the piece while it is being written!"

Lyman W. Fisher, Staff Photographer

Louis Speyer (left) will be the soloist in the première of a Fantasy for English Horn Solo with Strings and Harp by Walter Piston (center) at the week-end Boston Symphony concerts. Bernard Zighera (right) will perform the important part for the harp.

BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—

THE

MUSIC

Speyer Symphony Soloist in New Work by Piston

Eleventh pair of concerts in the Friday afternoon—Saturday evening series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conductor. At Symphony Hall. The program: Bach: Chorale Prelude and Chorale, "The Old Year Is Past," arranged for orchestra by Munch; Haydn: "Military" Symphony in G major, No. 100; Walter Piston: Fantasy for Solo English Horn, Strings and Harp (first performance; English Horn soloist, Louis Speyer; harp Bernard Zighera); Saint-Saens: Third Symphony (E. Power Biggs, organist).

By CYRUS DURGIN

The first Boston Symphony concerts of 1954 are designed for comfort and pleasure, a wise and creditable procedure in view of the fact that the first of the two fell upon New Year's Day. But it is nonetheless a substantial program, and that fact should make everybody happy. Munch's deft setting of the Bach Chorale Prelude and Chorale appropriate to the season was a perfect way to begin; Haydn's "Military" Symphony had been absent from these concerts since 1921, and the music of Walter Piston served well a double purpose.

Half that purpose was to display the magnificent playing of the English horn by Louis Speyer, whose mastery, as the composer says, truly inspired the Fantasy. I suppose that instrument is limited to — or at least is heard at its best in — music rather slow, and of sustained melody. Here the rich and passionate woodwind voice appears in long and elegant phrases over a scintillant foundation of [illegible] dissonant string accompaniment, with the crisp but [illegible] blending color of the harp superbly done by Bernard Zighera affording both [illegible] punctuation and a sort of complementary melody. The [illegible] and the structure [illegible] so beautifully conceived [illegible] half of the double [illegible] of adding to the [illegible] literature, is com[illegible].

[illegible] any other musician [illegible] Speyer who plays the [illegible] with such gorgeous [illegible] penetrating eloquence of expression, I do not [illegible]. We have been much blessed in Boston, these many years, by Speyer's presence in the Boston Symphony, and his art has given us uncounted moments of the greatest beauty. Today, at the height of his powers, I doubt that he has an equal and certainly there is none to exceed him. He richly deserved the cordial reception which was his.

Munch, too, was at the peak of his interpretive gifts, from beginning to end of this program. The Haydn Symphony, so-called the "Military" because of the added percussion of cymbals, bass drum and triangle, and the long trumpet call of the second movement, is first-rate Haydn and a little different from his usual manner. Munch read it beautifully, with zest and a trifle expansively. The tone was warm, bright and clear, not in the least dry, and the rhythmic flow, as well as the melodic contours, was in just the right, unforced, style.

As for Saint-Saens' wonderful old "Organ" Symphony, that brought applause, stamping and cheers almost before the final C major chord of the rousing finale was ended. It was good to hear this cleverly-wrought piece and on just such an occasion and program. Of course it is old-fashioned, heavily oiled and perfumed in the slow section, rhythmically prancing in the scherzo, and unashamedly ostentatious and whoop-'er-up in the finale. It was fine to sit there and listen to the pompous proclamations of organ at full blast, the answering string prouncements, the wham of cymbals and the clangorous brass; to realize that a New Year had begun, we were still alive and capable of enjoying good, plain, animal high spirits.

Cir. (D 12,338)

This Clipping From
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
DEC 31 1953

Berkshire Festival To Feature Berlioz

The Sesquicentennial season of Berlioz will be observed by Charles Munch at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Massachusetts, next summer with a performance of a number of the great works of this composer.

"The Damnation of Faust" will be performed with the Choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe, "Harold in Italy" with William Primrose as viola soloist, the "Fantastic Symphony," and the song cycle "Summer Nights." The Festival Chorus of the Berkshire Music Center will appear with the Orchestra in "Romeo and Juliet" in its complete form and in the famous "Requiem," which will conclude the Festival. The Festival will extend from the first week of July through August 15th.

Since the birth of Hector Berlioz one hundred and fifty years ago (December 11, 1803) his artistic stature has risen increasingly in general estimation, notably in recent years.

Full program plans will be available shortly on application to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be addressed at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

1/2/54 BOST

Music in Review

By TUCKER KEISER

Symphony Concert

For the New Year's Day program yesterday, Charles Munch opened the symphony concert with his orchestral transcription of Bach's Chorale Prelude and Chorale, "The Old Year is Past." Scored for seven woodwinds, four brass and strings, Mr. Munch's orchestration, tasteful and subdued as it is, nevertheless is surprisingly colorful. Stokowski and Ormandy in Philadelphia and Mitropolous in New York have long enjoyed a great measure of success with such transcriptions of Bach; so evident is Mr. Munch's flair for this sort of thing that it is to be hoped that he will give us more of the vast Bach repertoire in orchestral garb.

Jovial Haydn at his playful best was represented by Symphony No. 100, commonly called the "Military," played yesterday for the first time in 33 years. Mr. Munch's predilection for overpowering brass and tympani was given a legitimate opportunity for expression in the "Turkish music" of the Allegretto and Finale. Revivals of works by such musicianly composers as Bach, Mozart, and Haydn are, apparently, invariably rewarding; the music is delectable, the maestro and the musicians play with verve, and the audience is, in consequence, delighted.

Walter Piston acknowledged the considerable applause which greeted his Fantasy for Solo English Horn with Strings and Harp, given its first performance yesterday by Louis Speyer, soloist, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Bernard Zighera, harpist. The score, dedicated to Mr. Speyer, demonstrates the masterly craftsmanship of Mr. Piston and is pleasant to listen to, although it reveals no new facets in the composer's style. Its appeal is as much to the analytical mind as it is to the sensitive ear, although the composer's intelligent choice of instrumental coloring reveals a lively musical imagination as well as academic erudition.

It is not in deference to Christopher Fry's remarks about ill-tempered critics, printed in the program notes, that this commentator admits that the Saint-Saens Symphony No. 3 in C Minor was not nearly as trashy as the Saint-Saens Piano Concerto we heard a week ago. Saint-Saens is certainly not at his worst in the Third Symphony; the score is more than a trifle bombastic, to be sure, but even the most violent tutti fortissimi hold the kitchen sink in reserve.

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, JANUARY 2, 19

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 11th program of the 73d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Louis Speyer, English horn, was the soloist. The program:

"The Old Year Is Past"....Bach-Munch
Symphony in G "Military".....Haydn
Fantasy for English Horn, Harp and Strings ....Piston
Symphony No. 3 in C minor with organ, Op. 78.............Saint Saens

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Charles Munch began the New Year at Symphony Hall yesterday in a way that might serve as the model for the year to come; his program was perfect.

It was perfect for the fact that it mingled the new with the old, the classic with the romantic, the tumultuous with the refined, and, culminating as it did in Saint Saens' monumental proclamation, it sent us all reeling out into the snow with ringing ears, and warm hearts.

Looking back through recent seasons it is evident that Mr. Munch has not been as kindly disposed to new American music as his predecessor, whose role as champion of American composers was of the greatest significance. It is true that Mr. Munch has brought out some: the name of Foss, Piston, Barber, Thompson and Harris are among the few that appear on programs of the last three seasons in first performances. But it seems certain that, since Koussevitzky's time, such men as Copland, Diamond, Schuman, Shapero, Sessions, Dello Joio, Read, Creston and many others have been active, and I think we might legitimately inquire why they have not been given a hearing from time to time.

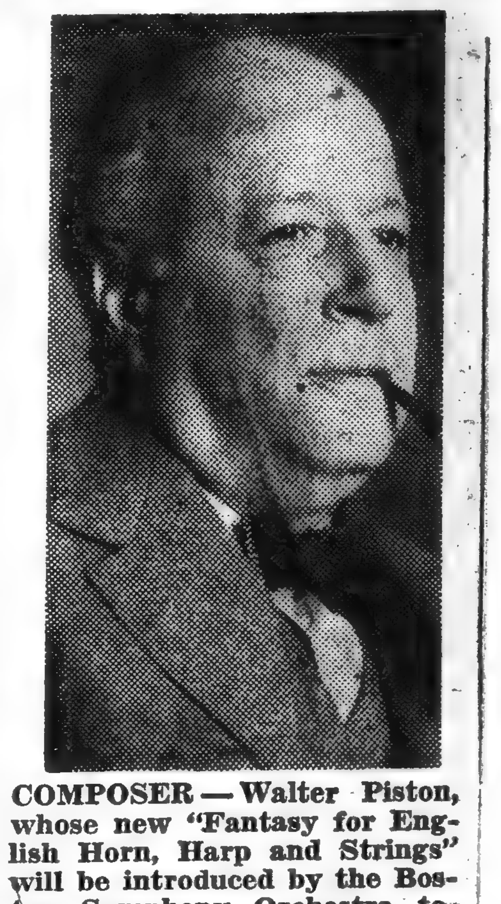
I see no reason why we have to like what they are doing and I am sure, so far as the audience is concerned that, as Koko put it, they'll none of them be missed. Nonetheless, there would seem to be some responsibility on the part of a great American orchestra to look into the works of contemporary American musicians and present a fair sampling of them for the benefit of composers and audiences alike.

In any case, the appearance of a new work by Walter Piston on the program yesterday was the occasion of the greatest pleasure for all. A Fantasy for English horn with harp and strings, it was a piece of the most beautiful character, the work of an undisputed master. Mr. Piston, who was in the audience, was inspired to this work by the superb English horn playing of Louis Speyer and dedicated this serenly noble idyll to him. It couldn't have been more discerning tribute to that matchless performer.

The mood throughout is one of a gently flowing meditation, interrupted only momentarily by a brief cadenza. Nowhere does the composer exploit instrumental virtuosity for its own sake; the melodic line is ever sustained and ever warm and rich and of such suitability to the curiously reflective qualities of the instrument that it somehow suggests that it is the instrument itself creating the music as it goes along. The background provided by the harp and strings is of an impressionistic nature though the language and the style is Mr. Piston's own, at once distinguished and expressive, at once harmonically advanced but never aggressive or harsh. Indeed, there is a breadth and spaciousness to this work that gives it a romantic as well as an impressionistic quality.

Mr. Speyer's playing was not less than incredible both as to tonal qualities and technical achievement. He is, perhaps, one of the few men in the world who can take a breath while producing a tone on the instrument (and to this I can testify as one who has seen him do it), and the composer evidently took advantage of it, for there are phrases of such length that they would seem to be playable in no other way than in taking a breath during them. In any case, it was a remarkable performance and one that gave the English horn one of its finest hours.

It seems hard to believe that 33 years have elapsed since Haydn's Military Symphony was given at these concerts, but such is the case. It is a sheer joy from beginning to end and conductor and orchestra did it delightfully throughout. Saint Saens' Third, a work Mr. Munch first stunned us with three years ago, like the piano concerto heard at these concerts last week, is a huge affair of more theatrical than musical value, but it is nonetheless great fun to hear and great fun to watch as well. It culminates at length in a finale whose final chord and thunderous motto on the timpani lifts the hair, resulting in an equally thunderous ovation from the audience. A very happy greeting for the New Year it is, too, if it may be assumed the timpani didn't frighten that tender child to death. Next week's program includes works of Mendelssohn, Ravel, Dutilleux and Ibert, with Doriot Anthony as flute soloist.



COMPOSER — Walter Piston, whose new "Fantasy for English Horn, Harp and Strings" will be introduced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight.

62

HARTFORD TIMES, SATURDAY, JANUARY 2, 1954

Boston Symphony Needs Told to Its Community

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

AN ITEM which might have been disturbing appeared on the news wires a week or so ago. It reported that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was "broke." That sounds worse than the fact. Every symphony orchestra is always broke. Somebody always has to pick up some part of the tab—usually the public.

That has always been true of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as well as any other. The only difference—and it is an important one—is that the Boston deficit has been so small relatively, and the organization has had so many well-wishing friends, that it has never had to make a public appeal to the civic conscience.

In round numbers BSO has been on a million dollar budget. The receipts and investment income have come so near to meeting the difference that about $50,000 has been needed each year to make ends meet. There have always been enough people willing to sit down and write checks, without being asked, to cover this deficit handily. They still do so, but the news is that inflation has just about doubled the gap between income and expenses. The management, moreover, is not dependent solely on gifts, but this year has raised season ticket prices from 10 to 20 per cent in Boston and there are signs that an expanded Berkshire season is in the works. Income for the season 1952-53, including concert receipts record royalties, broadcasting and pops tour, was $1,027,824.

Expenses totaled $1,288,645. Leaving a deficit before the transcontinental tour of $260,821. The transcontinental tour set the orchestra back an additional $37,994.

Contributions and investments brought in $225,988, leaving a net deficit of $72,827.

* * *

THOSE, who after having seen the throngs on Tanglewood lawns and in the shed, figure that Festival and Music Center make money will probably be surprised to learn that the Berkshire deficit is actually $21,097. Ticket sales and tuition yield $339,107. Expenses or salaries of players and faculty members, administrative and property maintenance cost $360,204.

Contributions from Friends of the Berkshire Music Center yielded $25,180, bringing the Berkshire surplus to $4,083, thus reducing the general deficit to $68,744.

* * *

THERE ARE endowment and other trust fund assets totaling in the neighborhood of a million dollars. Presumably it is the yield from such funds and current receipts into which management has had to dip in order to make ends meet currently.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra isn't going out of business by any means. It is just that, of necessity, it has been necessary to bring the needs of this world-famous institution to the attention of its community.

* * *

THE BOSTON Symphony's community is a large one. We are a part of it.

The Orchestra has been giving concerts in Hartford since 1885. The date was Oct. 20 and Carl Faelton was soloist in the Schumann Piano Concerto at Roberts Opera House.

The Connecticut Teachers Guild carried on these Boston concerts for years, according to Frances Hall Johnson's indispensable "Musical Memories of Hartford." She adds that the Guild often had "three and sometimes four concerts a season. As far back as 1916 the 48th concert of the Boston Symphony had been given in Hartford."

There were no Boston Symphony concerts here during the season 1918-19. From 1920-23 Monteaux conducted five concerts here. There was no concert in 1924, but the following year Koussevitsky made his first appearance here. The following four years Koussevitsky played four times. Then in 1930 he conducted the first concert of the Boston Symphony in Bushnell Hall.

So the Boston Orchestra played 58 concerts in Hartford before Bushnell Hall was dedicated. This makes a grand total of 85 concerts played in Hartford by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This is a larger number of symphony concerts than all those played in Hartford by the old Philharmonic, the WPA Orchestra and the Hartford Symphony in its first and second regime.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is going to get along all right anyway, but if anybody in Hartford is disposed to make any gifts toward the present need, it will be a recognition of services already rendered.

When one stops to consider that this fine organization has been providing us with symphonic music for the past 78 years, it is only fair to conclude that Hartford cultural life would not be the same without it.

CONDUCTOR SUES

Wilhelm Furtwaengler has introduced a new aspect to the evaluation of performance when he sued a record company in Paris to stop the sale of a version of Beethoven's "Eroica" credited to him (it was supposedly taken from a radio broadcast in 1944). It was Furtwaengler's contention that he could not recognize his conducting in the product offered for sale.

Cir. (D 74,847) (S 117,225)

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 3 - 1954

Works of Berlioz To Be Played at Berkshire Event

The Sesquicentennial season of Berlioz will be observed by Charles Munch at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., next summer with a performance of a number of the great works of this composer.

"The Damnation of Faust" will be performed with the Choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe, "Harold in Italy" with William Primrose as viola soloist, the "Fantastic Symphony," and the song cycle, "Summer Nights." The Festival Chorus of the Berkshire Music Center will appear with the Orchestra in "Romeo and Juliet" in its complete form and in the famous "Requiem," which will conclude the Festival. The Festival will extend from the first week of July through August 15th.

Since the birth of Hector Berlioz one hundred and fifty years ago (December 11, 1803) his artistic stature has risen increasingly in general estimation, notably in recent years.

Full program plans will be available shortly on application to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be addressed at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts.

Berlioz Slated At Tanglewood

The sesquicentennial of Berlioz' birth will be observed by Charles Munch at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., next summer with performances of many of the composer's works.

"The Damnation of Faust," with the choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe; "Harold in Italy," with William Primrose as viola soloist; the "Fantastic Symphony," and the song cycle, "Summer Nights," will be performed. The festival chorus of the Berkshire Music Center will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in "Romeo and Juliet" in its complete form and in the famous "Requiem," which will conclude the festival. The festival will extend from the first week of July through Aug. 15.

Cir. (D 131,670) (S 258,520)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
JAN 3 - 1954

Munch to Observe Berlioz Anniversary

The Sesquicentennial season of Berlioz will be observed by Charles Munch at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Massachusetts next summer it was announced last week.

"The Damnation of Faust" will be performed with the Choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe, "Harold in Italy" with William Primrose as viola soloist, the "Fantastic Symphony," and the song cycle, "Summer Nights." The Festival Chorus of the Bershire Music Center will appear with the Orchestra in "Romeo and Juliet" in its complete form and in the famous "Requiem," which will conclude the Festival. The Festival will extend from the first week of July through August 15th.

Full program plans will be available shortly on application to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be addressed at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts.

Cir. (S 676,066)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
ADVERTISER
JAN 3 1954

Symphony Rehearsal

The third Open Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will take place next Wednesday evening. It will enable the audience to hear the program of the week in advance of the regular performances.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 5, 1954
THE TULSA TRIBUNE, TULSA, OKLAHO

Berloiz to Be Feature [illegible] Summer Concerts [illegible] Massachusetts

[illegible] Sesquicentennial season of Berlioz will be observed by Charles Munch at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., next summer with a performance of a number of the great works of this composer.

"The Damnation of Faust" will be performed with the choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe; "Harold in Italy" with William Primrose as viola soloist, the "Fantastic Symphony," and the song cycle, "Summer Nights." The Festival Chorus of the Berkshire Music Center will appear with the orchestra in "Romeo and Juliet" in its complete form and in the famous "Requiem," which will conclude the festival. The festival will ex

---

U. S. Music's Quality Now Tops Europe

By IRVING KOLODIN

New York—The travelers to Europe who have been coming back to report that, musically, we are much better off than most Europeans, have been greeted with polite indulgence, or at best, aquizzical if unexpressed look spelling chauvinism. But, in the light of recent events at Milan's La Scala, perhaps the unmistakable facts will now be recognized.

* * *

THE PERSON involved were the two Leonards—Bernstein and Warren—making their debuts in the historic theater barely days apart. Both are as strongly individual musicians as we have produced and their backgrounds could hardly have been more different. Bernstein is a Harvard graduate who went on to Curtis and Tanglewood before bursting into prominence (in 1943) as an emergency substitute in a Philharmonic - Symphony broadcast for Bruno Walter. Warren is a product of the New York school system who was singing in the Radio City Glee Club for pocket money when a friend persuaded him to enter the Metropolitan Opera Auditions of the Air.

LEONARD BERNSTEIN

And what does the Italian press say of them? One authority proclaimed Bernstein's direction of Cherubini's "Medea" the work of a man "absolutely predestined to music." In the midst of a column and a half review, the Corriere della Sera termed his work "indisputably brilliant." This for a man who has never conducted opera in a major theater before and nothing of the Cherubini sort anywhere!

* * *

WARREN'S TASK, if anything, was an even more ticklish one in "Rigoletto," in which he made his debut just a few days ago. Not only the first American to sing such a part at La Scala, but the first non-Italian baritone to atempt it there in years, Warren need but have muffed one note to call down the jeers that were waiting.

Well' those who came to jeer stayed to cheer, and the press lavished enthusiasm in such terms as "perfect Italian diction, profoundly intelligent musical accents, beautiful warm, touching voice"; "follows in the tradition of de Luca, Titta Ruffo and Pasquale Amato"; and "a true artist, capable of using with great intelligence his magnificent and most pure Italian diction and his warm baritone voice."

* * *

THE PLAIN FACTS are that with such talents as Bernstein's but approaching maturity and Warren's right in his prime, the prospects for the future of each are decidedly bright. Now if they could be brought together at the Metropolitan . . . But let us not expect too much, too soon.

On the other hand, let it be realized that the decades of preparation in such schools as the Curtis, Juilliard and Eastman are beginning to pay unmistakable dividends, not to mention the money that has gone into them and into the promotion of such ventures as Tanglewood and the Auditions of the Air. It's all part of the reason why, to revert to the opening, musical life in this country, for all its struggles, is at a higher level, qualitatively, than it is most places in Europe.

(copyright SR)

Cir. (D 287,116)

This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
JAN 2 - 1954

Ballet Theater

By THEODOLINDA C. BORIS

II) and Bil

Berkshire Festival to Mark Berlioz Sesquicentennial

THE ARTISTIC STATURE of Hector Berlioz, born 150 years ago, has grown steadily, particularly in recent years. It comes as no surprise, therefore, that his sesquicentennial will be observed by Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. next Summer.

Among the works to be heard will be the "Damnation of Faust" with the assistance of choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe; "Harold in Italy," with the noted William Primrose as viola soloist; the Fantastic Symphony; the song cycle, "Summer Nights," and the complete "Romeo and Juliet" by the orchestra and Festuval Chorus. The famous Berlioz "Requiem" will conclude the festival, the full programs for which will be announced shortly.

The festival will extend from the first week of July through Aug. 15.

York Opera Company

Cir. (D 55,839)

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS
JAN 2 -

Tanglewood To Honor Berlioz

The sesquicentennial [illegible] of Hector Berlioz will [illegible] served at the Berks[illegible] Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., next summer, Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced. The composer was born Dec. 11, 1803.

The Berkshire Festival will present "The Fanastic Symphony;" the song cycle, "Summer Nights;" "The Damnation of Faust," to be performed with choruses from Harvard University and Radcliffe College, and "Harold in Italy," with William Primrose as viola soloist.

The festival will extend from the first week in July through Aug. 15.

63 65

This Clipping From
BOSTON MASS.
GLOBE

JAN 3 - 1954

Music of Berlioz to Be Featured at Berkshire Festival Next Summer

The sesquicentennial season of [illegible] will be observed by [illegible] Munch at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, next summer with a performance of a number of the great works of this composer.

"The Damnation of Faust" will be performed with the Choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe, "Harold in Italy" with William Primrose as viola soloist, the "Fantastic Symphony," and the song cycle, "Summer Nights." The Festival Chorus of the Berkshire Music Center will appear with the Orchestra in "Romeo and Juliet" in its complete form and in the famous "Requiem," which will conclude the Festival. The Festival will extend from the first week of July through Aug. 15.

Since the birth of Hector Berlioz 150 years ago (Dec. 11, 1803) his artistic stature has risen increasingly in general estimation, notably in recent years.

Full program plans will be available shortly on application to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

Duo Di Roma

The Fanny Peabody Mason Foundation will present the Duo Di Roma in its first Boston concert in Jordan Hall Thursday and Friday evenings, Jan. 21 and 22 at 8:30. Members of the Duo are, Ornella Santoliquido, piano, Massimo Amfitheatrof, cello, who will perform a program of classic and romantic sonatas. The concert will be free.

Framingham Chorus

The Community Chorus of Framingham will hold its first rehearsal of 1954 tomorrow evening at 8 in Dwight Hall at the State Teachers' College under the direction of Edward F. Gilday. Additional members are welcome to join the chorus which is composed of singers from some 26 Greater Boston communities.

Cir. (D 103,308)
This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 4 - 1954

Milhaud Suite Concertante Has U.S. Premiere

By FEROL AUSTEN
Special to The Hartford Times

Boston — Another American premiere at Symphony last week—Milhaud's Suite Concertante, with Nicole Henriot as piano soloist. In a removed sense, it isn't strictly a premiere, since the St. Louis Symphony, under Golschman played the work in 1949 with Jack Connor.

However, at that time it was a Concerto for Marimba (Opus 278) and the composer doubtless saw in it limited possibilities for performnace. So he rewrote the solo part of the Concerto from marimba to piano, using, however, the same orchestral score. The result is Suite Concertante (Opus 278a). So much for putting round pegs into round holes.

* * *

THIS ISN'T THE FIRST performance for Miss Henriot—nor Mr. Munch. They played it together ~~in~~ Paris last Summer with the Orchestre de la Radiodiffusion. The soloist's explosive style is just right for the work which, incidentally, has three sections—Animé, Lent, and Vif. Her playing is somewhat nervous, crisp, precise—often it is cold. She has an enviable keyboard technique but I find her playing overly dramatic and lacking in emotional depth.

There were times when Miss Henriot showed a willingness to communicate from within—especially in the Saint-Saens Third Piano Concerto (E-flat. Op. 29) which she also played—but these were only fleeting glimpses of repressed nymphs which blushed at their embarrassment and quickly hid again from sight.

This was the first Boston performance of the Saint-Saens Concerto. It is a mass of runs, scales, bunches of notes, glissandos, and is in general, a good thing for all pianists to stay away from.

* * *

MR. MUNCH'S CHRISTMAS gift to Boston was a performance of Berlioz's "L'Enfance du Christ"—a triology which depicts various events at the time of the infant Christ. In many ways, this seems to me to be Berlioz at his best, because it is, among other things, a dynamic master of imagination and orchestration in the actual process of disciplining his natural genius for pyrotechniques.

Berlioz is said to have scorned this work as commonplace, as a resignation to the temper of his day, but the listener is not convinced of conventionalism in this music. In spite of himself, Berlioz liked this work, for in it is devotion, originality, and restraint—restraint of the mature artist, instead of the rowdiness of cleverness running wild.

* * *

THE SOLOISTS were Jennie Tourel who sang the role of Mary, Mac Morgan as Joseph, Lee Cass as Herod, and James McCollum as the Narrator. Their enunciation was clear, the timbre of the voices was exceedingly well matched, the singing itself was collectively magnificent. The New England Conservatory Chorus, trained expertly by Lorna Cooke deVaron, was particularly brilliant in Part II—the "Flight into Egypt."

Cir. (D 643,985) (S 1,124,787)
This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
JAN 3 - 1954

Samuel Mayes Soloist With Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Charles Munch, will give its only Philadelphia concert of the season at the Academy of Music, Jan. 12.

Soloist will be Samuel Mayes, former first cellist with the Philadelphia Orchestra, who will be heard in the first local performance of Dmitri Kabalevsky's Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra.

Cir. (D 39,275)
This Clipping From
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE
JAN 5 - 1954

Music Notes

By D. E. RITZ

THE SESQUICENTENNIAL season of Hector Berlioz will be marked at Tanglewood this summer by the performance of a number of his major works by the Boston Symphony under Charles Munch.

Works to be performed include "The Damnation of Faust" with choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe; "Harold in Italy" with William Primrose as viola soloist; the "Fantastic Symphony" and the song cycle, "Summer Nights." The Festival Chorus of the Berkshire Music Center will appear with the orchestra in "Romeo and Juliet" in its complete form and the famous "Requiem" will conclude the festival. The festival has been scheduled from the first week of July through Aug. 15.

THE OCTAVO SINGERS are in the midst of their first "music festival" which they are presenting in observation of their 20th birthday. Portions of the Bach "Christmas Oratorio" were presented last evening at the college chapel and tonight the affair will conclude with the 20th performance of Handel's "Messiah" under the direction of Gordon Mason.

* * *

MRS. OSMON TILTON of 2029 Regent street and Frank O. Sharp of 726 Cramer avenue participated in the Fred Waring Choral Workshop held at Delaware Water Gap this past summer. They are among the approximately 4,500 persons who have attended the summer school conducted by the professional entertainer during the seven seasons of its operation.

Cir. (D 541,485) (Sat. 274,941)
This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM & SUN
JAN 5 - 1954

RUTH POSSELT, violinist, will appear in Carnegie Hall, Jan. 13, as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Cir. (D 215,218)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
JAN 5 - 1954

Berkshire Plans Berlioz Program

The 150th anniversary of the birth of Hector Berlioz will be observed by Charles Munch at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, next summer, with a performance of a number of the composer's great works.

"The Damnation of Faust" will be performed with the choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe, "Harold in Italy" with William Primrose as viola soloist, the "Fantastic Symphony," and the song cycle, "Summer Nights."

The Festival Chorus of the Berkshire Music Center will appear with the orchestra in "Romeo and Juliet" in its complete form and in the famous "Requiem," which will conclude the festival, extending from the first week in July through Aug. 15.

Cir. (D 215,218)
This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER
JAN 5 - 1954

OPEN REHEARSAL

The third Open Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will be tomorrow night at 7:30. Seats are available, and are reserved for the rehearsal which enables the audience to hear the program of the week in advance of the regular performances.

Cir. (D 66,985)
This Clipping From
TULSA, OKLA:
TRIBUNE
JAN 5 1954

Berloiz to Be Feature of Summer Concerts in Massachusetts

The Sesquicentennial season of Berlioz will be observed by Charles Munch at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., next summer with a performance of a number of the great works of this composer.

"The Damnation of Faust" will be performed with the choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe; "Harold in Italy" with William Primrose as viola soloist, the "Fantastic Symphony," and the song cycle, "Summer Nights." The Festival Chorus of the Berkshire Music Center will appear with the orchestra in "Romeo and Juliet" in its complete form and in the famous "Requiem," which will conclude the festival. The festival will extend from the first week of July through August 15.

Since the birth of Hector Berlioz 150 years ago (Dec. 11, 1803), his artistic stature has risen increasingly in general estimation, notably in recent years.

Full program plans will be available shortly on application to the Boston Symphony, to be addressed at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts.

* * *

JANUARY 5, 1954 PAGE NINE

You Have a Rare, Old Violin?

Don't Make Expert Laugh

By HENRY MINOTT

(UP)—What are your chances of discovering a rare old violin in your attic?

Every week or so, a stranger with a fiddle case under his arm appears at Symphony Hall, firmly convinced he's about to strike it rich. While rummaging through his garret he's found an ancient violin.

Often, the magic name of Antonius Stradivarius can be read clearly through the sound holes. Maybe the man has heard that Mischa Elman's Strad has been valued at $100,000.

Inevitably, the stranger winds up at the desk of Leslie J. Rogers, longtime librarian of the Boston Symphony who joined the orchestra as a viola player 41 years ago. He's an authority on violin values.

By phone, letter and personal visit, Rogers has been deluged through the years with requests for appraisals of "rare" old fiddles.

"I have yet to run across a really valuable violin whose value wasn't already known," he said today. "In other words, none of these attic discoveries has ever proved to be anything but old."

One Sunday, a member of the Symphony executive staff attended services at a Cape Cod church. Afterward, a man in the choir asked him to take an old violin back to Boston for appraisal.

"This has lain in our attic for years," the man explained. "You can read the name 'Stradivarius' through the sound holes."

Next morning the Symphony man visited Librarian Rogers' office.

Rogers glanced up and, with genial ferocity, cried: "Halt! I see you have a rare old violin that has lain in somebody's attic. . . ."

Urged by his astonished colleague to inspect the fiddle, Rogers said: "I will view it at 20 paces. Turn it so I can see all sides."

This was done.

"Humph," snorted Rogers. "You have there a cigar box—fourth class!"

A good-natured bassoonist entering just then offered to show the fiddle to some of the orchestra's violinists who might want it for a pupil. He returned with this report:

"For the fiddle, the case and the two bows I am offered $1.25."

Rogers said people shouldn't be misled by such "Stradivarius" labels. "These," he said, "are modern printshop jobs."

64

Music in Review

Jan 6

By TUCK[illegible]

Paul Tortel[illegible] member of th[illegible] Symphony, returned last night as guest artist in the fourth concert in the Tuesday evening series. The cellist was warmly greeted as an old friend as well as for his musicianly playing of the Haydn Cello Concerto.

Mr. Tortelier is an amazing virtuoso on his instrument, and Haydn demands every bit of virtuosity at the command of the soloist. While I did not particularly like the frequently thin-textured tone of the soloist, I was indeed dazzled by the feats of fingers and bow.

A somewhat deliberate tempo in the first movement handicapped the cellist in getting the music off the ground, but Mr. Munch's subdued accompaniment in the slow movement provided a proper setting for the expressive solo. A lilting rhythm and accelerated tempo gave the rondo-like finale much spirit. However, a tentative accompaniment in the first movement and parts of the finale hinted that more time should have been spent in rehearsal.

Mr. Munch, as a B.S.O. extra, added as an opening selection on the program his splendid arrangement of the Bach Chorale Prelude and Chorale, "The Old Year Is Past." The Brahms variations on a theme of Haydn sounded more Brahm[illegible] than it did when played earlier this season. Mr. Munch's administration of adrenalin to the Saint-Saens Symphony, the cl[illegible] brought it momentarily to life.

Heig[illegible]s Women Promote Boston Symphony

[illegible]YN HEIGHTS,

1/7/54

Mrs. Haughton Bell

Will Address Civic Groups To Urge Concert Support

MRS. BELL IS CHAIRMAN

Active workers for the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn were invited to tea at the home of Mrs. Irving J. Sands, 202 New York Avenue, today (Thursday) to discuss ways and means of extending interest in the famous orchestra's series of concerts here. The next concert at the Academy of Music, on Friday evening, Jan. 15, is the deadline for subscriptions on a pro-rated basis.

The symphony workers are calling attention of various civic, educational, religious and business groups to the value of the Symphony's [illegible] in the Borough, and urging continued support for it. Mrs. [illegible] Bell is chairman of the Brooklyn Committee for the Bos[illegible] Symphony, which sponsors the orchestra's concerts here, together with the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Phil[illegible]onic Soc[illegible] B[illegible]lyn.

Invite[illegible] the tea[illegible]

Mrs. [illegible] J. Au[illegible] Mr[illegible] R. Bart[illegible], Mrs. H[illegible], Mrs. Donald M. C[illegible], Frederick Daniels, M[illegible] H[illegible] Davenport, Mrs. Carroll [illegible] Mrs. Renick C. Eckardt, Mr[illegible] Edwin L. Garvin, Mrs. Harrison R Glennon, Jr., Mrs. Andrew L. Gonory, Mrs. William H. Good, Mr[illegible] Percy R. Gray, Mrs. Irving G. Idler, Mrs. Miles Kastendieck, Mrs. James Vincent Keogh, Mrs. John Bailey King, Mrs. MacDonald Mayer, Mrs. Eugene R. Marzullo Mrs. Carleton Mason, Mrs. William B. Parker, Mrs. Valentine K. Raymond, Mrs. Frederick H. Rohlfs, Mrs. Oscar P. Schoenemann, Mrs. Eliot H. Sharp, Mrs. Franklin B. Tuttle, Mrs. Thomas K. Ware, Mrs. Carl T. Washburn, Mrs. Harold E. Weeks.

MUSIC

Jan 6

Tortelier and Symphony in Haydn Cello Concerto

Fourth program in the Tuesday evening concert series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, conductor. At Symphony Hall. The program: Bach: Chorale Prelude and Chorale, "The Old Year Is Past" (transcribed for orchestra by Charles Munch); Brahms: Variations on a Theme; Haydn: Cello Concerto (Paul Tortelier, soloist); Saint-Saens: Symphony No. 3, in C minor (E. Power Biggs, organ.)

By CYRUS DURGIN

It seemed like old times to see Paul Tortelier back on the stage of Symphony Hall, last night, where he had not been since the Spring of 1939. Then he was a member of the cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night he returned as soloist in the Haydn Concerto. This lovely standby of the repertory, lyrical, tender and rollicking by turn, Mr. Tortelier played with the utmost simplicity, which was just the way to [illegible]s a good musician and a[illegible] of his instrument, produc[illegible]t, silken tone, bowing wit[illegible] grace. The Tuesday audien[illegible]ved Mr. Tortelier most [illegible], and several times called [illegible] back for applause.

All went well through the evening which found Mr. Munch and the Boston Symphony in usual form. The Bach Chorale Prelude and Chorale, in the Munch transcription, must have been added as an after-thought, for it did not appear on the printed program. The Brahms Variations went their skilled, [illegible] way in a notably polished performance, and the Saint-Saens Symphony, E. Power Biggs again setting forth the organ part most capably, provided a fireworks wind-up.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

THURSDAY, JANUARY 7, 1954 Art—Music—Theater 7

Dutilleux Symphony in Preview

Munch to Give U.S. Première Of Work by French Composer

By Klaus George Roy

Whatever troubles France may have, she continues to produce creative artists of consequence. Charles Munch, understandably, is doing his share to bring the younger as well as the established composers of France to the attention of American music lovers—with the help of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the Friday-Saturday concerts, audiences will hear the first symphony by Henri Dutilleux, a French composer 38 years old, a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire. The symphony was written during 1950-51, given its première under Roger Desormière two years ago, and heard with much acclaim at the Cologne Festival last May, Ferenc Fricsay conducting. The week-end performances will be the first in this country.

Most hearers will be confronted with a sound they have not experienced quite that way before, and a formal design in which their familiarity with Beethoven and Tchaikovsky will be of little help. The symphony is quite tonal—moving from and to recognizable key-centers; but the effect of polyphonic lines and harmonies progressing simultaneously in many directions often produces the kind of effect considered "dissonant," a very misleading label.

* * *

The composer purposely eschews the conventional sonata form, with its clear thematic and tonal contrasts developed and recapitulated. He prefers to work with a method of perpetual variation by which ever-new facets of a basic idea are brought forth through the changes in rhythm and texture.

The first mov[illegible] a Passacaglia, in itsel[illegible] variations on a [illegible] recurs in the bass. The [illegible]emonstrates the kind of cumulative energy peculiar to this composer's music, a driving rhythm carried by sonorities, at times grotesque.

Another kind of ostinato device pervades the slow third movement, Intermezzo, with a lyrical theme audible through a rhythmic and coloristic embroidery of the other instruments. The Finale is a set of variations on a theme apparently related to the one of the slow movement.

Here again, Dutilleux's contrapuntal skill is much brought into play. The symphony ends as softly as it began, perhaps unexpectedly so. Quite disavowing any programmatic ideas, the composer writes that the music "emerges from the shadows in the first measures, only to return from whence it came in the last ones. . . . It is a little like the inception and unfolding of a dream."

* * *

There is nothing dreamlike, to be sure, about the lavish use of instrumental possibilities. In addition to the augmented woodwind, string, and brass groups, the composer asks for timpani, xylophone, glockenspiel, vibraphone, harp, piano, celesta, bass drum, snare drum, gong, cymbals, antique cymbals (crotales), and triangle.

As one writer puts it, "Dutilleux is more a tapestry-weaver than a painter, more an architect than a spontaneous music-maker." Thus he uses his enormous percussion group with considerable economy, never obscuring the clarity of lines and motives.

On the same program Mr. Munch will introduce to Boston another French work by a modern composer of recognized international stature: the Concerto for Flute and Orchestra by Jacques Ibert. Dated 1934, the concerto is designed to exhibit the skill of a flutist in the framework of a small orchestra.

The three movements are scored with the composer's fastidious attention to lucidity of detail and incisiveness of rhythm. The solo part seems to spare no difficulty whatsoever. Doriot Anthony, first flutist of the orchestra, will be the soloist.

64

Music in Review

Jan 5

By TUCKE[illegible]

Paul Tortel[illegible] member of the [illegible] Symphony, returned last night as guest artist in the fourth concert in the Tuesday evening series. The cellist was warmly greeted as an old friend as well as for his musicianly playing of the Haydn Cello Concerto.

Mr. Tortelier is an amazing virtuoso on his instrument, and Haydn demands every bit of virtuosity at the command of the soloist. While I did not particularly like the frequently thin-textured tone of the soloist, I was indeed dazzled by the feats of fingers and bow.

A somewhat deliberate tempo in the first movement handicapped the cellist in getting the music off the ground, but Mr. Munch's subdued accompaniment in the slow movement provided a proper setting for the expressive solo. A lilting rhythm and accelerated tempo gave the rondo-like finale much spirit. However, a tentative accompaniment in the first movement and parts of the finale hinted that more time should have been spent in rehearsal.

Mr. Munch, as a B.S.O. extra, added as an opening selection on the program his splendid arrangement of the Bach Chorale Prelude and Chorale, "The Old Year is Past." The Brahms Variations on a theme of [illegible] sounded more Brahms[illegible] than it did when played earlier this season. Mr. Munch's administration of adrenalin to the Saint-[illegible] Symphony, the [illegible] brought it momentarily to life.

MUSIC

6

Tortelier [illegible] Symphony in Haydn Cello Concerto

Fourth program in the Tuesday evening concert series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles [illegible], conductor. At Symphony Hall. The program: Bach: Chorale Prelude and Chorale, "The Old Year Is Past" (transcribed for orchestra by Charles Munch); Brahms: Variations on a Theme; Haydn: Cello Concerto (Paul Tortelier, soloist); Saint-Saens: Symphony No. 3, in C minor (E. Power Biggs, organ.)

By CYRUS DURGIN

It seemed like old times to see Paul Tortelier back on the stage of Symphony Hall, last night, where he had not been since the Spring of 1939. Then he was a member of the cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night he returned as soloist in the Haydn Concerto. This lovely standby of the repertory, lyrical, tender and rollicking by turn, Mr. Tortelier played with the utmost simplicity, which was just the way [illegible] a good musician and a [illegible] of his instrument, produci[illegible], silken tone, bowing with [illegible] grace. The Tuesday audience [illegible]ved Mr. Tortelier most [illegible], and several times called [illegible] back for applause.

All went well through the evening, which found Mr. Munch and the Boston Symphony in usual form. The Bach Chorale Prelude and Chorale, in the Munch transcription, must have been added as an after-thought, for it did not appear on [illegible] program. The Brahms [illegible] went their skilled, [illegible] way in a notably [illegible] performance, and the Saint-Saens Symphony, E. Power Biggs again setting forth the organ part most capably, provided a fireworks wind-up.

H[illegible] Women

BROO[illegible]YN HEIGHTS,
N.Y.
PRESS
1/7/54

Promote Boston Symphony

Mrs. Haughton Bell

Will Address Civic Groups To Urge Concert Support

MRS. BELL IS CHAIRMAN

Active workers for the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn were invited to tea at the home of Mrs. Irving J. Sands, 202 New York Avenue, today (Thursday) to discuss ways and means of extending interest in the famous orchestra's series of concerts here. The next concert at the Academy of Music, on Friday evening, Jan. 15, is the deadline for subscriptions on a pro-rated basis.

The symphony workers are calling attention [illegible] various civic, educational, [illegible] and business groups to [illegible] of the Symphony's [illegible] borough, and [illegible] continued support for it. M[illegible] Bell is chairman of [illegible] Committee for the Bo[illegible] Symphony, which sponsors the orchestra's concerts here, together with the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

Invited to the tea were:

Mrs. Elias J. Audi, Mrs. John R. Bartels, Mrs. Haughton Bell, Mrs. Donald M. Crawford, Mrs. Frederick Daniels, Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, Mrs. Carroll J. Dickson, Mrs. Remick C. Eckardt, Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Mrs. Harrison R. Glennon, Jr., Mrs. Andrew L. Gomory, Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. Percy R. Gray, Mrs. [illegible] G. Idler, Mrs. Miles Kaste[illegible], Mrs. James Vincent Keog[illegible], [illegible] John Bailey King, Mrs. [illegible] Mayer, Mrs. [illegible] Carleton Mason, [illegible] Parker, Mrs. Valentine K. Raymond, Mrs. Frederick H. Rohlfs, Mrs. Oscar P. Schoenemann, Mrs. Eliot H. Sharp, Mrs. Franklin B. Tuttle, Mrs. Thomas K. Ware, Mrs. Carl T. Washburn, Mrs. Harold E. Weeks.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

THURSDAY, JANUARY 7, 1954 Art—Music—Theater 7

Dutilleux Symphony in Preview

Munch to Give U.S. Première Of Work by French Composer

By Klaus George Roy

Whatever troubles France may have, she continues to produce creative artists of consequence. Charles Munch, understandably, is doing his share to bring the younger as well as the established composers of France to the attention of American music lovers—with the help of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the Friday-Saturday concerts, audiences will hear the first symphony by Henri Dutilleux, a French composer 38 years old, a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire. The symphony was written during 1950-51, given its première under Roger Desormière two years ago, and heard with much acclaim at the Cologne Festival last May, Ferenc Fricsay conducting. The week-end performances will be the first in this country.

Most hearers will be confronted with a sound they have not experienced quite that way before, and a formal design in which their familiarity with Beethoven and Tchaikovsky will be of little help. The symphony is quite tonal—moving from and to recognizable key-centers; but the effect of polyphonic lines and harmonies progressing simultaneously in many directions often produces the kind of effect considered "dissonant," a very misleading label.

* * *

The composer purposely eschews the conventional sonata form, with its clear thematic and tonal contrasts developed and recapitulated. He prefers to work with a method of perpetual variation by which ever-new facets of a basic idea are brought [illegible] through the changes in [illegible] and texture.

The first mov[illegible] a Passacaglia, in itself [illegible] of variations on a [illegible] recurs in the bass. The S[illegible] demonstrates the kind of cumulative energy peculiar to this composer's music, a driving rhythm carried by sonorities, at times grotesque.

Another kind of ostinato device pervades the slow third movement, Intermezzo, with a lyrical theme audible through a rhythmic and coloristic embroidery of the other instruments. The Finale is a set of variations on a theme apparently related to the one of the slow movement.

Here again, Dutilleux's contrapuntal skill is much brought into play. The symphony ends as softly as it began, perhaps unexpectedly so. Quite disavowing any programmatic ideas, the composer writes that the music "emerges from the shadows in the first measures, only to return from whence it came in the last ones. . . . It is a little like the inception and unfolding of a dream."

* * *

There is nothing dreamlike, to be sure, about the lavish use of instrumental possibilities. In addition to the augmented woodwind, string, and brass groups, the composer asks for timpani, xylophone, glockenspiel, vibraphone, harp, piano, celesta, bass drum, snare drum, gong, cymbals, antique cymbals (crotales), and triangle.

As one writer puts it, "Dutilleux is more a tapestry-weaver than a painter, more an architect than a spontaneous music-maker." Thus he uses his enormous percussion group with considerable economy, never obscuring the clarity of lines and motives.

On the same program Mr. Munch will introduce to Boston another French work by a modern composer of recognized international stature: the Concerto for Flute and Orchestra by Jacques Ibert. Dated 1934, the concerto is designed to exhibit the skill of a flutist in the framework of a small orchestra.

The three movements are scored with the composer's fastidious attention to lucidity of detail and incisiveness of rhythm. The solo part seems to spare no difficulty whatsoever. Doriot Anthony, first flutist of the orchestra, will be the soloist.

FESTIVAL - ESPLANADE

65

This Clipping From
[illegible] TRIBUNE N.Y.
[illegible]8 - 1954

Longer Boston Season

Special to the Herald Tribune

BOSTON, Jan. 7.—A longer season was announced yesterday for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's free Esplanade outdoor series under Arthur Fiedler's direction which, previously limited to July, will run from July 5 to Aug. 10 this summer. Concerts will be held Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, and children's programs on Tuesday mornings. The 1954 total will be twenty-six concerts, as compared with twenty-one last summer. During the second half of each week during this period, the musicians will go to Lenox, Mass., to play in the Berkshire Festival concerts under Charles Munch.

Cir. (D 29,806)

This Clipping From
PEORIA, ILL.
STAR
JAN [illegible] 1954

PARADE OF

★ ★ ★

TANGLEWOOD TIME

Plans are already shaping up for America's leading summer music event, the annual Berkshire Music Festival in Lenox, Mass., which several Peorians usually manage to attend.

Held at the beautiful Tanglewood estate high in the Berkshire Hills (where Nathaniel Hawthorne lived in a guest house in 1850-51 and wrote "The House of the Seven Gables" and his "Tanglewood Tales"), the festival will last from July 5 to Aug. 15.

★ ★ ★

Conductor Charles Munch of the Boston Symphony Orchestra plans a schedule full enough to satisfy the ever-increasing audiences, which last year totaled 118,000.

Each of the six weeks will include: opera scenes, Tuesday evening; chamber music, Wednesday evening; student orchestra concert, Thursday evening; Bach-Mozart concert, Friday evening; Boston Orchestra concert, Saturday evening; student chamber concert, Sunday morning; Boston Orchestra concert, Sunday afternoon.

★ ★ ★

Because this is the sesquicentennial season for Hector Berlioz (born Dec. 11, 1803), many of this French composer's works will be performed at Tanglewood under the direction of Munch, his countryman.

Choruses from Harvard and Rad-

PAGE FORTY-TWO

Herald J. 8

Extension of Esplanade Concerts Set for Next Summer

By ELINOR HUGHES

APPARENTLY THERE is nothing that Arthur Fiedler enjoys so much as work, for he has been hard at it to arrange a lot more for himself next August, a time of year when most people are cutting down on their activities rather than adding to them. In other words, Mr. Fiedler announces that the Esplanade Concerts, which he organized and has been directing since 1929, will now be expanded in scope and instead of being given, as hitherto, only in July, will continue through Aug. 10.

The weekly performance schedule has been radically changed, moreover, due to a rearrangement of the Shed concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood. The Esplanade Concerts will be played on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings and the Children's Series on Tuesday mornings. This will mean an increase of from 21 to 23 evening concerts and six morning concerts in place of three. This arrangement will free the Boston Symphony musicians to travel to Tanglewood to play in the Berkshire Festival under Charles Munch.

AS MR. FIEDLER puts it: "By this new plan, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be presenting a Town Series and a Country Series concurrently; each series will have its individual musical character and surroundings. Bostonians and visitors will have a wide range of programs to chose from, and ambitious vacationists may enjoy starting their concert week in Boston beside the Charles River and finishing it in the Berkshire Hills."

The Sunday edition of The Herald will carry the story of the new plans recently formulated by Charles Munch for the Berkshire Festival in Tanglewood which called for a rearrangement of the Esplanade Concerts in Boston.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK TIMES
JAN 8 - 1954

FIEDLER EXTENDS SERIES

Boston Symphony's Esplanade Season to End Aug. 10

An expansion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season of Esplanade Concerts for next summer has been announced by Arthur Fiedler, founder-conductor of the annual series of free outdoor performances.

The Esplanade series, which begins on July 5, will not end in July as heretofore but will continue through Aug. 10. Concerts will be played on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, with a series of children's concerts on Tuesday mornings.

During the second half of each week, the Boston Symphony musicians will commute to Lenox, Mass., to play at the Berkshire Festival, which will be held concurrently with the Esplanade series. Programs of thte Festival will take place on Thursdays, Fridays, Saturdays and Sundays.

Cir. (D 141,947) (S 141,383)

This Clipping From
DALLAS, TEX.
TIMES HERALD
[illegible] 1954

Berkshire Festival To Salute Berlioz

Special to The Times Herald

Boston, Jan. 8.—The Sesquicentennial season of Berlioz will be observed by Charles Munch at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., next summer with a performance of a number of the great works of this composer.

"The Damnation of Faust" will be performed with the choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe; "Harold in Italy," with William Primrose as viola soloist, the "Fantastic Symphony," and the song cycle, "Summer Nights." The festival chorus of the Berkshire Music Center will appear with the orchestra in "Romeo and Juliet" in its complete form and in the famous "Requiem," which will conclude the festival.

The festival will extend from the first week of July through Aug. 15th.

NY Trib

Longer Boston Season

Special to the Herald Tribune

BOSTON, Jan. 7.—A longer season was announced yesterday for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's free Esplanade outdoor series under Arthur Fiedler's direction which, previously limited to July, will run from July 5 [illegible] Aug. 10 [illegible] summer. Conc[illegible] Monday, Tue[illegible] evenings[illegible]ildren's programs on T[illegible]nings. The 1954 tota[illegible]nty-six concerts, as [illegible] twenty-one last [illegible] the second hal[illegible] during this peri[illegible] will go to Lenox, [illegible] to play in the Berkshire Festival concerts under Charles Munch.

Post 8

Three-Day Week For Concerts

Conductor Arthur Fiedler announced yesterday that next summer's Esplanade concert season will be extended to cover six weeks. However, the playing week will be shortened to three days, Monday through Wednesday.

The season will open July 5 and continue until Aug. 10. In order to make this possible, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have to travel from Boston to the Berkshires in midweek during the Berkshire Festival.

The new schedule was arranged to accommodate music lovers who have favored the concerts of the early part of the week, Mr. Fiedler said.

Globe Jan. 5

Esplanade Music Season to Be Extended This Year

An expansion of the Esplanade concerts next Summer is announced by Arthur Fiedler, founder and conductor of these popular annual free outdoor concerts by Boston Symphony players, which since 1929 have helped to bring added fame to this city and state.

The season will not end in July, as before, but will extend into August. Under the plan, the season will begin on the evening of July 5 and continue through Aug. 10. Concerts will be played on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, and the children's series on Tuesday mornings. This will increase the total number of concerts from 21 to 23, and expand the morning events from three to six.

During the second half of each week within the Esplanade season, the Boston Symphony musicians will commute to play in the Berkshire Festival under Charles Munch.

Monitor Jan 8

Fiedler Concerts Extended

The Esplanade Concerts are expanding! The twenty-sixth season of the popular free outdoor concerts by Boston Symphony players will not end in July but will extend into August.

Arthur Fiedler, founder and conductor of the Esplanade concerts, announces that the season will begin on Monday evening, July 5, and continue through Aug. 10. Concerts will be given on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday evenings, and the children's series on Tuesday mornings. This will increase the total number of concerts from 21 to 23. The morning events will be expanded from three to six.

This new plan has been evolved to enable the Boston Symphony players to commute to the Berkshires during the latter part of each week to participate in the Tanglewood concerts. The Berkshire Music Festival is also being reorganized on an expanded basis, the details of which will soon be announced.

"By this new plan," Mr. Fiedler says, "the Boston Symphony will be presenting a town series and a country series concurrently. Each will have its individual musical character and surroundings. Bostonians and visitors will have a wide range of programs to choose from. Some music-minded vacationers may enjoy starting a concert week in Boston beside the

Charl[illegible] it at Tangle[illegible] Berkshire Hills[illegible]

Mozart Requiem Soloists

Soloists for the Mozart Requiem Mass in D minor, to be presented at the Esquire Theater Friday evening, Jan. 15, have been selected by Allen Lannom, director of the Boston University Choral Art Society.

The quartet, to be featured with the 80-voice Choral Art Society, will include Frances Marsh, soprano; Gwendolyn Belle, alto; John Morabito, tenor, and John Colleary, bass. Tickets may be reserved by calling COmmonwealth 6-6230.

Symphony Deficit Lifting

More than half of the $250,000 required to keep the Boston Symphony Orchestra solvent for the remainder of the season has been subscribed, according to George E. Judd, manager. A call for funds was made a month ago to Boston businessmen and to the Friends of the Boston Symphony by Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's trustees.

Mr. Judd, who made the announcement at a press luncheon yesterday, pointed out that while the prospects for lifting the deficit are encouraging, the financial pressures are still considerable and require a continuing effort.

Times Jan 8

LONGER CONCERT SEASON

Boston Symphony's Esplanade Series Extended to Aug. 10

An expansion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season of Esplanade Concerts for next summer has been announced by Arthur Fiedler, founder-conductor of the annual series of free outdoor performances.

The Esplanade series, which begins on July 5, will not end in July as heretofore but will continue through Aug. 10. Concerts will be played on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, with a series of children's concerts on Tuesday morning.

Twenty-three evening concerts will be presented, and six morning children's events .

During the second half of each week, the Boston Symphony musicians will commute to Lenox, Mass., to play at the Berkshire Festival, which will be held concurrently with the Esplanade series. Programs of thte Festival will take place on Thursdays, Fridays, Saturdays and Sundays.

6

Jan 9, 1954

TON POST, SATU

Music in Review

By TUCKER KEISER

Boston Symphony

After two weeks of programs which for the most part were hardly worth the trouble of preparing or hearing, for that matter, Mr. Munch brought himself and the Boston Symphony out of the holiday doldrums with a surefire program yesterday afternoon.

The opening and closing works were familiar: Mendelssohn's Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" Ballet, Suite No. 2; the two inside works were new to these concerts: Ibert's Concerto for Flute and Orchestra with Doriot Anthony, the first flutist of the orchestra, as soloist, and Dutilleux' Symphony, given its first American performance yesterday.

In place of the announced Mendelssohn work, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," Mr. Munch substituted "A Midsummer Night's Dream" overture. There have been more evocative readings of the score than we had yesterday, but, except for a rather square-cut phrasing, the performance on the whole was acceptable.

Dutilleux, an unknown name hereabouts, is a composer of considerable ability if we can take the Symphony as a representative work. He is a clever orchestrator who devises arresting sonorities. He is economical in his use of musical materials. His grasp of formal schemes depends on linear movement or generative power. His spirit is one of rugged independence.

The four-movement symphony begins and ends quietly, a practice not widely popular with young composers who feel they must make a dramatic impact at the outset and knock 'em cold at the conclusion. The composer has stated that his work "emerges from the shadows . . . only to return whence it came. . . ."

Making no pretense at following the traditional sonata in the first movement, Mr. Dutilleux builds his initial section over a reiterated melody. The Scherzo is constructed from a swirling, rapid tune tossed back and forth among the various instruments. The Lento gives the violins a questioning, mysterious tune which is never solved by the other instruments with their subdued interjections. The finale, the least interesting movement, is a Stravinskiesque study in rhythmic dissonance. While not in any sense a great work, it would bear hearing again.

Doriot Anthony scored a personal triumph in the Ibert Flute Concerto. Mr. Ibert has exploited the possibilities of the unemotional instrument, giving the soloist a display piece in the Allegro, a pastorale in the Andante, and a good—if slightly corny—tune in the Scherzando. Miss Anthony's flute fireworks in the first movement, her tone in the second, and her playfulness in the finale won for the attractive artist a rousing ovation which brought her back to the stage many times for bows.

Whenever Mr. Munch is in doubt about making up a program, let him always schedule Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite No. 2. In this he can produce an electrifying excitement unequalled by any other conductor today. He can wield a vigorous tonal brush, demand a precision from his players which he seldom secures, and bring his listeners breathlessly to the edge of their seats.

However, it must be added for the record that in yesterday's performance a prolonged fourth beat in the Lever du jour gave his strings a moment's uneasiness.

Jan 9 1954

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY,

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 12th program of the 73rd season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Doriot Anthony, flutist, was the soloist. The program:

Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .... Mendelssohn
Symphony .... Dutilleux
Concerto for Flute .... Ibert
"Daphnis and Chloe" No. 2 .... Ravel

By RUDOLPH ELIE

IT IS EVIDENT that Henri Dutilleux's Symphony is a work informed with creative ingenuity on its fiercest level.

Given its first American performance yesterday afternoon, it provided 35 minutes of some of the most striking and original sounds we have heard since the performance of Messaien's "Turangalila" Symphony some half dozen years ago even though it was clear from the outset that Dutilleux's work is an extension of the French impressionist school.

It was, indeed, as unmistakably French as the Ibert Flute Concerto and the Ravel "Dapnis and Chloe" Suite that brought the concert to a close, but with something new added, that something new is contrapuntal ruthlessness, discordance and tempestuous violence of spirit.

That it is all resolved at the end, as if the dreamer had at last fallen off to sleep is true enough, but the body of the work displays an approach as relentlessly hard and cynical as a play by Sartre, a novel by Andre Simon or a painting by Leger.

CALMER LINES

Excepting only the slow movement, whose calmer and more extended lines still remain anything but untroubled, you are aware always of the excitement, the tension, even the overwhelming forward movement from beginning to end. You are also aware, however, all the way, of the means employed to accomplish this end: the orchestral devices of the flutter tongue in the high woodwinds, the intricate harmonics in the strings, the playing on the fingerboard, the contrasting timbres of xylophone and vibraphone, and all the coloristic tricks and gimmicks of the modern orchestrator. They all contribute to the new sound, it is true, but they somewhat diminish the confidence that we are in the presence of great music.

However, as in the case of the mechanistic paintings of Lege, which have no little decorative value, Dutilleux's symphony has decorative value too. It certainly arrests attention and holds it and, if the slow movement goes on a little too long to keep the mind from losing its place, it makes a deep impression as the work of a brilliant and purposeful artist.

Mr. Munch ended the concert with one of his inimitable performances of Ravel's perennial "Daphnis and Chloe" No. 2; a performance, however, quite different from the usual. He took the Pantomine slower than I ever heard it before, but it proved most becoming to this inimitable passage. And, of course, he brought the work to an end in an explosion of sound. The concert began, incidentally, with the Overture to Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" that didn't, it seemed to me, go any too well. The orchestra is out of town next week, returning on Jan. 22 with Pierre Fournier as soloist in Dvorak's Cello Concerto.

Clr. (D 26,991)
This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
JAN 9 - 1954

FESTIVAL OFFICIALS attending the Tanglewood Advisory Committee meeting at the Hotel Sheraton here yesterday, when plans for the 1954 extended season were announced, were Henry W. Dwight, left, of Stockbridge; George E. Judd, center, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Robert K. Wheeler of Great Barrington. Mr. Dwight and Mr. Wheeler were original members of the board of directors of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival Inc., which inaugurated the Berkshire music festivals in 1934 at the Hanna estate in Interlaken, now the Stockbridge School.

Conference Director Hails Plan To Enlarge Tanglewood Season

John F. Downing, director of the Berkshire Hills Conference, today hailed the expanded season of the Berkshire Festival as a great boom to the tourist business in the area this summer.

"Not only is this great news for the music lovers," said Mr. Downing, "but it will help to level off the peaks for businesses and result in a more orderly flow of traffic through the Berkshires."

In past years, said the Conference director, hotels, inns, resorts and tourist homes have enjoyed booming business on the three major Tanglewood weekends but they have had comparatively lean picking during the opening weeks of the Festival.

Now that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give performances each weekend for six consecutive weeks, rather than just the last three weekends of the Festival, Mr. Downing looks for a record tourist trade in the Berkshires during the summer.

---

scribed as simple, it is anything but that to me after listening to the Symphony at the Thursday rehearsal and yesterday afternoon. All this interplay of rhythm and counterpoint results in a texture often bristling with dissonance, though the finale is an extended and almost too quiet flow of song. (Following the intermezzo with the finale, both much alike, unfortunately gives a lop-sided contour to the piece).

In general the style is original, but there are echoes of other composers such as Honegger and Milhaud, perhaps even Roussel. But there is no doubt that Dutilleux is a remarkable talent. More than this, I simply could not say on the basis of so slight an acquaintance with the Symphony. But now that Mr. Munch has introduced it, he must play it again, and I hope before this season is out.

Miss Anthony captivated, I am sure, every listener in Symphony Hall by her brilliant and musical performance of Ibert's charming little Flute Concerto. It is a slight work (new to these concerts, incidentally), but wonderfully displayful of the wind instrument, and altogether likable. The black-gowned Miss Anthony also received more than musical compliments, for I heard many remarks like "So sweet, and such a nice person, and she does a marvelous job," ". . . what a cute figure," and ". . . she's so nice-looking." What more could any lady want?

Mr. Munch and the orchestra were truly on their mettle through the afternoon. Mendelssohn's gossamer Overture boasted some of the most delicate wind playing I ever hope to hear. As for "Daphnis and Chloe," it was both a rainbow of color and a voluptuous revel. Took me a while to fasten on "voluptuous revel" for the exact shadc of meaning, but that's what it was!

6

Jan. 9, 1954

TON POST, SATU

Music in Review

By TUCKER KEISER

Boston Symphony

After two weeks of programs which for the most part were hardly worth the trouble of preparing or hearing, for that matter, Mr. Munch brought himself and the Boston Symphony out of the holiday doldrums with a surefire program yesterday afternoon.

The opening and closing works were familiar: Mendelssohn's Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" Ballet, Suite No. 2; the two inside works were new to these concerts: Ibert's Concerto for Flute and Orchestra with Doriot Anthony, the first flutist of the orchestra, as soloist, and Dutilleux' Symphony, given its first American performance yesterday.

In place of the announced Mendelssohn work, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," Mr. Munch substituted "A Midsummer Night's Dream" overture. There have been more evocative readings of the score than we had yesterday, but, except for a rather square-cut phrasing, the performance on the whole was acceptable.

Dutilleux, an unknown name hereabouts, is a composer of considerable ability if we can take the Symphony as a representative work. He is a clever orchestrator who devises arresting sonorities. He is economical in his use of musical materials. His grasp of formal schemes depends on linear movement or generative power. His spirit is one of rugged independence.

The four-movement symphony begins and ends quietly, a practice not widely popular with young composers who feel they must make a dramatic impact at the outset and knock 'em cold at the conclusion. The composer has stated that his work "emerges from the shadows . . . only to return whence it came. . . ."

Making no pretense at following the traditional sonata in the first movement, Mr. Dutilleux builds his initial section over a reiterated melody. The Scherzo is constructed from a swirling, rapid tune tossed back and forth among the various instruments. The Lento gives the violins a questioning, mysterious tune which is never solved by the other instruments with their subdued interjections. The finale, the least interesting movement, is a Stravinskiesque study in rhythmic dissonance. While not in any sense a great work, it would bear hearing again.

Doriot Anthony scored a personal triumph in the Ibert Flute Concerto. Mr. Ibert has exploited the possibilities of the unemotional instrument, giving the soloist a display piece in the Allegro, a pastorale in the Andante, and a good—if slightly corny—tune in the Scherzando. Miss Anthony's flute fireworks in the first mo[illegible] her tone in the second, [illegible] playfulness in the finale [illegible] the attractive artist [illegible] ovation which brought [illegible] back to the stage many times for bows.

Whenever Mr. Munch is in doubt about making up a program, let him always schedule Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite No. 2. In this he can produce an [illegible] excitement unequalled by any other conductor today. He can wield a vigorous tonal brush, demand a precision from his players which he seldom secures, and bring his listeners breathlessly to the edge of their seats.

However, it must be added for the record that in yesterday's performance a prolonged fourth beat in the Lever du jour gave his strings a moment's uneasiness.

Jan. 9, 1954

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY,

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 12th program of the 73rd season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Doriot Anthony, flutist, was the soloist. The program:

Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .... Mendelssohn
Symphony .... Dutilleux
Concerto for Flute .... Ibert
"Daphnis and Chloe" No. 2 .... Ravel

By RUDOLPH ELIE

IT IS EVIDENT that Henri Dutilleux's Symphony is a work informed with creative ingenuity on its fiercest level.

Given its first American performance yesterday afternoon, it provided 35 minutes of some of the most striking and original sounds we have heard since the performance of Messaien's "Turangalila" Symphony some half dozen years ago even though it was clear from the outset that Dutilleux's work is an extension of the French Impressionist school.

It was, indeed, as unmistakably French as the Ibert Flute Concerto and the Ravel "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite that brought the concert to a close, but with something new added, a that something new is contrapuntal ruthlessness, discordance and tempestuous violence of spirit.

That it is all resolved at the end, as if the dreamer had at last fallen off to sleep is true enough, but the body of the work displays an approach as relentlessly hard and cynical as a play by Sartre, a novel by Andre Simon or a painting by Leger.

CALMER LINES

Excepting only the slow movement, whose calmer and more extended lines still remain anything but untroubled, you are aware always of the excitement, the tension, even the overwhelming forward movement from beginning to end. You are also aware, however, all the way, of the means employed to accomplish this end: the orchestral devices of the flutter tongue in the high woodwinds, the intricate harmonics in the strings, the playing on the fingerboard, the contrasting timbres of xylophone and vibraphone, and all the coloristic tricks and gimmicks of the modern orchestrator. They all contribute to the new sound, it is true, but they somewhat diminish the confidence that we are in the presence of great music.

However, as in the case of the mechanistic paintings of Lege, which have no little decorative value, Dutilleux's symphony has decorative value too. It certainly arrests attention and holds it and, if the slow movement goes on a little too long to keep the mind from losing its place, it makes a deep impression as the work of a brilliant and purposeful artist.

LANGUAGE BOLD

Curiously enough, although the composer's language is as bold and original as any living musician's he has all but abandoned the disjointed and ever-varying rhythmical values to convey a sense of uninterrupted flow, a sense of trajectory. Flowing motion is of course Impressionistic, too, but it is all too seldom encountered nowadays. Had the second two movements sustained the level of the first two, the work would have been more favorably received than it was, but there was no doubt that the Symphony made a deep impression as one of the best new works in a large form we have heard in some time.

Doriot Anthony, whose flute playing has long since captivated the city, stepped forward in the second half to play Ibert's Flute Concerto in a stunning fashion. Her tone is of a rich and glowing quality, at once firm and expressive, and she displayed an exceptional technique in the fast passages in an instrument where lightning technique is commonplace, negotiating runs and ascending octaves at breathtaking speed while achieving perfect articulation. Present always—though most impressively in the long flute solo of "Daphnis"—was her remarkable feeling for the musicality of a phrase and for the ability to dimish and swell the volume of tone so exquisitely.

The work itself is of secondary interest musically as it is designed to display that instrument and little else, but the instrument is such a treat in itself it hardly matters. Mr. Munch ended the concert with one of his inimitable performances of Ravel's perennial "Daphnis and Chloe" No. 2; a performance, however, quite different from the usual. He took the Pantomine slower than I ever heard it before, but it proved most becoming to this inimitable passage. And, of course, he brought the work to an end in an explosion of sound. The concert began, incidentally, with the Overture to Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" that didn't, it seemed to me, go any too well. The orchestra is out of town next week, returning on Jan. 22 with Pierre Fournier as soloist in Dvorak's Cello Concerto.

Jan. [illegible]

MUSIC

Sym[illegible] Dutilleux Gi[illegible] Premiere

The [illegible] of concerts in the Friday aft[illegible] evening series by the [illegible] Symphony Orchestra, Cha[illegible] conductor. [illegible] Sym-pho[illegible] program: Mendelssohn[illegible] to "A Midsummer Night[illegible] Henri Dutilleux: Symphony [illegible] performances in the United States[illegible] Flute Concerto [illegible] Doriot Anthony [illegible] soloist); Ravel: "Daphnis and Chloe[illegible] Suite No. 2.

[illegible] YRUS DU[illegible]

Ch[illegible] Munch yesterday introduced [illegible], in the form [illegible] big and [illegible] Symphony, [illegible] French compo[illegible] who must be virtually unkn[illegible] hereabouts and perhaps in th[illegible] country. His name [illegible] Henri Dutil[illegible] (pronounced approximately [illegible]-tee-yer, with the stress on [illegible] syllable) [illegible] he will no[illegible] until the 22 [illegible] of this mo[illegible] is a product of the Paris Conservatoire [illegible] winner of th[illegible] Prix de Rome.

Hi[illegible] Symphony [illegible] unusual, and [illegible] prove to be of considerable stature, though only time can [illegible] for the music is of such complexity that you can get to know it only by repeated hearings and [illegible] or it might prove [illegible] other musicians and not for the general public. It [illegible] in the sense of moving individual voices and also o[illegible] very independent use of instruments. It is full of small details of color and rhythmic experimentation.

In [illegible] passacaille (which serves as a [illegible] for variations) and the scher[illegible] both movements linked toget[illegible] Dutilleux shows a predilection for writing for small groups of instruments, often starting a phrase in one group and finishing it in anothe . The intermezzo, which makes a slow third movement, and the slow, songful finale, also a set of variations, concentrate upon more massive orchestration and a notably more melodic texture. Here there are fewer of the darting, fragmentary rhythmic figures of the passacaille and scherzo.

The form is not at all the traditional sonata-allegro form of the classical symphony, and though Dutilleux's form has been described as simple, it is anything but that to me after listening to the Symphony at the Thursday rehearsal and yesterday afternoon. All this interplay of rhythm and counterpoint results in a texture often bristling with dissonance, though the finale is an extended and almost too quiet flow of song. (Following the intermezzo with the finale, both much alike, unfortunately gives a lop-sided contour to the piece).

In general the style is original, but there are echoes of other composers. such as Hone[illegible] Milhaud, perhaps even Roussel. But there is no doubt that [illegible] is a remarkable talent. More than this, I simply could not say on the basis of so slight an acquaintance with the Symphony, but now that Mr. Munch has introduced it, he must play it again, [illegible] I hope before [illegible] is [illegible].

Miss Anthony captivated, I am sure, [illegible] in Symphony Hall by her brilliant and musical performance [illegible] charming little Flute Concerto. It is a slight work (n[illegible] concerts, incidentally) [illegible] wonderfully displayful of the wind instrument, and altogether [illegible]. The black-gowned Miss Anthony also received more than musical compliments, for I heard many remarks like "So sweet, and such a nice person, and she does a marvelous job," ". . . what a cute figure," and ". . . she's so nice-looking." What more could any lady want?

Mr. Munch and the orchestra were truly on their mettle through the afternoon. Mendelssohn's gossamer Overture boasted some of the most delicate wind playing I ever hope to hear. As for "Daphnis and Chloe," it was both a rainbow of color and a voluptuous revel. Took me a while to fasten on "voluptuous revel" for the exact shade of meaning, but that's what it was!

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JAN 10 1954

Music Notes

Next Summer's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood will have concerts by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra for six weekends instead of three, as in former years. It will run from July 5 through Aug. 15. The Bach-Mozart concerts, formerly played by a chamber orchestra of Boston Symphony musicians in the Theater-Concert Hall for three weeks preceding the three big Festival weekends, will henceforth be given on six consecutive Friday evenings, while the full orchestra will perform in the shed on six Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons.

Other musical activities, many by students and faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, will keep visitors occupied during the remaining four days of each week. Charles Munch, musical director of the orchestra and the Festival, announces that most of the principal orchestral and choral works by Hector Berlioz will be offered at this year's Festival as a tribute to the composer on the 150th anniversary of his birth.

The New York premiere of the "Wedding Suite" from the late Sergei Prokofieff's ballet, "The Stone Flower," will be a feature of the first of three special popular concerts that Andre Kostelanetz will conduct with the New York Philharmonic this Saturday night at Carnegie Hall. The concerts have been designed to gain a new, wider audience for the Philharmonic, which has never before presented programs of the lighter variety under its own banner.

George Balanchine announces the principal dancers who will take part in the premiere of his new version of the full-length "Nutcracker" Feb. 2. They include Maria Tallchief, Andre Eglevsky, Tanaquil LeClercq, Yvonne Mounsey, Francisco Moncion, Roy Tobias and Edward Bigelow. The large company required for this work will also comprise 35 children, students at the School of American Ballet.

MUSIC CALENDAR

Brooklyn Museum Trio. Brooklyn Museum, today, 2 p.m.

"Panegyris," Royal Greek Festival Company, Academy of Music, Tuesday, 8:30 p.m.

Boston Symphony Orchestra; Charles Munch, conductor. Academy of Music, Friday, 8:30 p.m. Soloist: Paul Tortelier, 'cello.

Chorale-Prelude and Chorale,
"The Old Year Is Past"——Bach-Munch
Variations on a Theme by Haydn—Brahms
'Cello Concerto in D Major——Haydn
Symphony No. 3 in C Minor
(with organ)——Saint-Saens

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
JAN 10 1954

Additions to Symphony Patrons Listed; New Committee Members

Additions to the list of Brooklyn Patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been announced by Mrs. William B. Parker, chairman of the new group, which is making a special effort to ensure the continued support of the famous orchestra. The next concert, second in a series of five, will be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, with Charles Munch conducting and Paul Tortelier, cellist, as soloist.

New names in the patrons group include Mrs. Elias J. Audi, Mrs. Daniel Bojalad, Mrs. William T. Daily, Mrs. C. Boxter Gano, Mrs. Andrew L. Gomory, Mrs. Philip Hathaway, Comm. Carl R. Hirschberger, Mrs. Lewis A. Koch, Mrs. William T. Madden, Mrs. Eugene R. Marzullo, Mrs. Carleton D. Mason, Dr. and Mrs. Harvey Merk, Mr. and Mrs. Michael Mikla, Dr. and Mrs. Milton Plotz, Dr. and Mrs. A. D. Rizutto, Miss Clarita Stubenbord, Mrs. Jack I. Wallace and Mrs. Harold Weeks.

Four new members have been added to the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Sympony, of which Mrs. Haughton Bell is chairman. They are Mrs. Donald M. Crawford, Mrs. James Vincent Keogh Jr., Mrs. Harrison R. Glennon Jr. and Mrs. Harold Weeks. The committee, together with the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, sponsors the appearance of the orchestra here.

At the Jan. 15 concert, Box 1 will be occupied by Mrs. Robert E. Blum and her guests. Friends School guests will be in Box 2. and Box 3 will be occupied by representatives of Berkeley Institute, Mrs. Darwin R. James Jr. and her guests will be in Box 4. Mrs. William B Parker and Miss Emma Jessie Ogg will share Box 5, and seated in Box 7 will be officers from the United States Army Station at Fort Hamilton as guests of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. Disabled veterans will occupy Box 8 at the invitation of the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony, and representatives of Packer Collegiate Institute will be in Box 9.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Dutilleux Symphony Debut

Miss Anthony Soloist in Ibert Concerto

By Harold Rogers

Charles Munch has chalked up another première—this time the first performance in the United States of Henri Dutilleux's Symphony, composed in 1950-51.

In the preparation of this difficult work Mr. Munch resorted to a novel rehearsal technique. After he had rehearsed the Boston Symphony Orchestra in sections, he called for loud speakers to be placed on the Symphony Hall stage. The musicians were then asked to listen to a tape recording of a European performance. Thus they were able to hear how the symphony sounded before they were asked to play it together for the first time.

This aid, plus five rehearsals, produced a remarkably polished performance for the concert yesterday afternoon. The work reveals Dutilleux as a young composer of talent and originality. Now 37, he is a staff composer of the French Radiodiffusion, a fortunate circumstance that gives him a salary while he composes. There is no question that he is to be reckoned, together with Messiaen and Jolivet, as a leading figure among the younger French composers.

But there is nothing in this symphony to indicate, by way of an exalting or ennobling effect on the listener, that it is an inspired work. It is essentially tragic. There is much that recalls the anguished outbursts heard in Honegger's Fifth Symphony—in sound, if not in genius. Honegger's Fifth, however, gives the listener a clear sense of purification through suffering. Something great and good emerges from the trial.

Dutilleux has given us suffering without purification. The symphony appears to be written by a clever materialist, rather than by a composer divinely inspired. He calls to mind the verse by Tennyson— "An infant crying in the night, An infant crying for the light." But the concluding line—"And with no language but a cry"—does not apply, for Dutilleux has found a keenly expressive musical language, one that keeps the ear in constant fascination. He simply uses this language to cry for light that never comes.

* * *

The opening Passacaille is infused with an air of mystery and suspense which builds up into great brass outbursts, as if the composer were crying havoc. There is then a falling off into an otherworldly nocturnal effect, ending quietly. The Scherzo is like a toccata, employing machine-gun barrages of rhythm. It has a general feeling of unrest and disillusionment, though technically it is put together with excellent craftsmanship.

The Intermezzo is a Lento that is lyrical and sad. It has a lonely and melancholy melody that sings like someone alone under the stars on a moonless night. The Finale—con variazioni—opens with strong, substantial chords, but develops in a rather disparate, jerky fashion. It is difficult to extract any meaning from the expostulatory treatment. A mysterious tension builds up, after which the music falls away into a quiet, lyrical passage, and then arrives at a serene ending.

* * *

Perhaps Dutilleux has subconsciously responded to the mental atmosphere of postwar disillusionment that prevails in France. Yet with all of France's problems as a country, her young composers are nevertheless producing music that is more significant than that written in almost any other country—with the possible exception of the United States.

Another first performance was heard yesterday—the first performance by the Boston Symphony of Jacques Ibert's Concerto for Flute and Orchestra. Doriot Anthony, now in her second season as first flutist of the orchestra, scored an exciting triumph as the soloist. The attractive young lady, much admired by her colleagues for her musicianship and her winning personality, appeared in a black, floor-length gown.

* * *

To the accompaniment of a small orchestra she played the three-movement work in a way that was astonishing for prodigious technique and fullness of beautiful tone. She reminded one of the central figure in Walter Piston's ballet, "The Incredible Flutist"!

This facile, entertaining little concerto was turned out by Ibert in 1934 for Marcel Moyse, to whom it is dedicated and who first played it. It is saucy, often syncopated after the manner of symphonic jazz, and the middle movement recalls a lazy afternoon amid Greek columns in a Maxfield Parish painting. Miss Anthony was called four or five times to the stage to accept her bravas.

Mr. Munch opened with an indifferent reading of Mendelssohn's Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and he closed with an electric performance of Ravel's "Daphnis et Cloé" Suite No. 2. Every time Mr. Munch plays this work it becomes more refined, more intense, more delightful.

New Tanglewood Plans

A new plan has been devised by Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to extend the scope of the Berkshire Festival next summer at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. The plan has been prompted by the record attendance in 1953—118,000, and the desire of many to hear the full orchestra in the first three weeks of the festival as well as in the last three.

According to this plan, the concerts by the full orchestra in the Music Shed will be given each Saturday evening and each Sunday afternoon through the six weeks from July 5 to Aug. 15.

* * *

The concerts by the orchestra of chamber proportions in the Theater-Concert Hall, devoted mostly to the music of Bach and Mozart, which formerly occupied the first three weeks of the Festival, will now be given each Friday evening preceding the week-end Shed concerts. Together with the performances by the students of the Berkshire Music Center, this will result in six weeks of daily performances on an identical rotation through each week.

The Munch plan will thus provide 12 Festival concerts in the Shed instead of nine as before, and six Bach-Mozart concerts in the Theater as before, but now on a once-a-week basis.

* * *

In the course of the 12 Shed concerts Mr. Munch will honor the Sesquicentennial season of the birth of Hector Berlioz. There will be performances of choral works, including "The Damnation of Faust," "Romeo and Juliet," and the Requiem, as well as the song cycle, "Summer Nights," and instrumental works.

Throughout the six weeks of the Berkshire Festival the Esplanade concerts will continue on the Charles River Embankment in Boston under the direction of Arthur Fiedler. Previously given through the first three weeks of the Festival period, these free outdoor concerts will now take place during the first part of each of six weeks, making a total number of 23 instead of 21 as before.

↑
FESTIVAL
↓

Herald Jan 10

1954 Berkshire Festival To Double Orchestra Concerts

A new plan has been devised by Charles Munch, the Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to extend the scope of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Massachusetts, next summer. The plan has been prompted by the record attendance in 1953—118,000, and the obvious desire of many thousands to hear the full Orchestra in the first three weeks of the Festival as well as the last three.

According to this plan, the concerts by the full Orchestra in the Music Shed will be given each Saturday evening and each Sunday afternoon through the six weeks from July 5 to August 15. The concerts by the orchestra of chamber proportions in the Theatre-Concert Hall, devoted mostly to the music of Bach and Mozart, which formerly occupied the first three weeks of the Festival, will now be given each Friday evening preceding the weekend Shed concerts. Together wtih the performances by the students of the Berkshire Music Center, this will result in six weeks of daily performances on an identical rotation through each week.

The Munch plan will thus provide twelve Festival concerts in the Shed instead of nine as before, and six "Bach-Mozart" concerts in the Theatre as before, but now on a once a week basis.

In the course of the twelve Shed concerts Mr. Munch will honor the Sesquicentennial season of the birth of Hector Berlioz. There will be performances of choral works, including "The Damnation of Faust," "Romeo and Juliet," and the "Requiem," as well as the song cycle. "Summer Nights" and instrumental works.

In addition to the Berkshire Festival performances, a series of chamber music concerts at moderate prices will be given by different ensembles in the Theatre on the six Wednesday evenings.

The 1954 Berkshire Festival will therefore consist of four concerts a week (Wednesday, Friday, Saturday, Sunday) for six weeks, or twenty-four concerts in all. The various departments of the Berkshire Music Center, which, directed by Charles Munch, will have its twelfth session, will give further performances, continuing the custom of opera scenes on Tuesdays, orchestral concerts on Thursdays and Chamber concerts on Sunday mornings.

The plan of subscription sale for the Boston Symphony concerts will now be divided by pairs of Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon concerts, and subscribers who retain their present locations will have the privilege of seats at a reduced rate for the "Bach-Mozart" concerts on each previous Friday and for the chamber series each Wednesday.

Full program plans will be available shortly on application to the Boston Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts.

68

FESTIVAL – ESPLANADE

BOSTON GLOBE

Berkshire, Esplanade Changes

Ne[illegible] of Concerts Announced for This Summer's Berkshire Festival

A new plan has been devised by Charles Munch, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to extend the scope of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., next Summer. The plan has been prompted by the record attendance in 1953—118,000, and the obvious desire of many thousands to hear the full orchestra in the first three weeks of the festival as well as the last three.

According to this plan, the concerts by the full orchestra in the Music Shed will be given each Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon through the six weeks from July 5 to Aug. 15. The concerts by the orchestra of chamber proportions in the Theatre-Concert Hall, devoted mostly to the music of Bach and Mozart, which formerly occupied the first three weeks of the festival, will now be given each Friday evening preceding the week-end Shed concerts. Together with the performances by tne students of the Berkshire Music Center, this will result in six weeks of daily performances on an identical rotation through each week.

Berlioz Anniversary

The Munch plan will thus provide 12 Festival concerts in the Shed instead of nine as before, and six "Bach-Mozart" concerts in the Theatre as before, but now on a once a week basis.

In the course of the 12 Shed concerts Mr. Munch will honor the Sesquicentennial season of the birth of Hector Berlioz. There will be performances of choral works, including "The Damnation of Faust," "Romeo and Juliet," and the "Requiem," as well as the song cycle, "Summer Nights" and instrumental works.

In addition to the Berkshire Festival performances, a series of chamber music concerts at moderate prices will be given by different ensembles in the Theatre on the six Wednesday evenings.

The 1954 Berkshire Festival will therefore consist of four concerts a week (Wednesday, Friday, Saturday, Sunday), for six weeks, or 24 concerts in all. The various departments of the Berkshire Music Center, which, directed by Charles Munch, will have its 12th session, will give further performances, continuing the custom of opera scenes on Tuesdays, orchestral concerts on Thursdays, and chamber concerts on Sunday mornings.

Subscription Sale

The plan of subscription sale for the Boston Symphony concerts will now be divided by pairs of Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon concerts, and subscribers who retain their present locations will have the privilege of seats at a reduced rate for the "Bach-Mozart" concerts on each previous Friday and for the chamber series each Wednesday.

Throughout the six weeks of the Berkshire Festival, the Esplanade concerts will continue to be given on the Charles River Embankment in Boston under the direction of Arthur Fiedler. Previously given through the first three weeks of the Festival period, these free outdoor concerts will be given in the first part of each of six weeks, making a total number of 23 instead of 21 as before. They will consequently become available to Boston visitors during the greater part of the Summer.

Full program plans will be available shortly on application to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be addressed at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

Each of the six weeks will therefore provide music on the following basic scheme: Tuesday evening (theatre), Opera Scenes; Wednesday evening (theatre), Chamber Music; Thursday evening (shed), Student Orchestra Concert; Friday evening (theatre), Bach-Mozart Concert; Saturday evening (shed), Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert; Sunday morning (Chamber Hall), Student Chamber Concert; Sunday afternoon (shed), Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Cir. (D 22,220) (S 69,720)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER
JAN 5 - 1954

Boston Symphony To Honor Berlioz

The 150th anniversary of Hector Berlioz will be observed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood next summer with performances of the composer's major works The composition to performed will include The Damnation of Faust; Harold in Italy with William Primrose as viola soloist; the Fantastic Symphony; the song-cycle Summer Nights; Romeo and Juliet; and the Requiem. The last-named work will conclude the 1954 Berkshire Festival which will run from the first week in July to Aug. 15.

Cir. (D 98,860)

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
JAN [illegible] 1954

To Honor Berlioz At Tanglewood

Boston, Jan. 2—The sesquicentennial season of Berlioz will be observed by Charles Munch at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox next summer with a performance of a number of the great works of this composer.

"The Damnation of Faust" will be performed with the choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe, "Harold in Italy" with William Primrose as viola soloist, the "Fantastic Symphony," and the song cycle, "Summer Night." The Festival Chorus of the Berkshire Music Center will appear with the orchestra in "Romeo and Juliet" in its complete form and in the famous "Requiem," which will conclude the festival. The festival will extend from the first week of July through Aug. 15.

Since the birth of Hector Berlioz 150 years ago (Dec. 11, 1803) his artistic stature has risen increasingly in general [illegible], notably in recent years.

Full program plans will be available shortly on application to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be addressed at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

This Clipping From
HERALD TRIBUNE N.Y.
JAN 10 1954

Music: Tanglewood Change; Gluck Premiere on Friday

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

Charles Munch has prepared a new schedule for the 1954 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., from July 5 through Aug. 15. The complete Boston Symphony Orchestra will give twelve concerts, three more than in previous summers, in the Music Shed; these will be held on Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons throughout the six weeks. The small orchestra concerts, to be devoted mainly to Bach and Mozart, will be held on the six Friday evenings (July 9 through Aug. 13), in the Theater-Concert Hall. Formerly the full orchestra's concerts were grouped in the last three week ends of the festival, and the small orchestra concerts in the first three.

As already announced, the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of Berlioz's birth will be honored in the twelve Shed programs. There will also be chamber music concerts in the Theater-Concert Hall on the six Wednesday nights. Subscriptions will be sold for pairs of Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons; subscribers retaining their present locations will be entitled to reduced rates for the Wednesday and Friday concerts.

Berkshire Music Center students will provide opera scenes on Tuesday nights, orchestral concerts Thursday nights and chamber music on Sunday mornings. These will be open to contributing friends of the Center In all, the new schedule provides public activities every day, except Mondays. One can also expect one or more full-scale productions by the Center's opera department, presumably of unfamiliar works.

Gluck Premiere

Gluck's opera "Paride ed Elena" will have its first American hearing Friday night in the first of three concerts to be given by the enterprising American Chamber Opera Society in Town Hall. According to notes supplied by the company's director, Allen Sven Oxenburg, the work was first performed in Vienna on Dec. 30, 1770, and was well received; it has been seldom heard since owing to the lack of a performable score. Both the originally published full score and the piano and vocal score published by Peters in 1867 are full of errors; the new edition used by the company was made possible through the generosity of Mrs. W. Murray Crane.

Hans von Buelow conducted the Berlin premiere on Nov. 28, 1863; Cosima (then Buelow's wife) and Richard Wagner were in the audience. In "Mein Leben," Wagner describes this day as the one in which he and Cosima "mutely declared to each other their love." The action, based on the familiar classic legend, takes place in or near Sparta.

On the Radio

Arturo Toscanini will present Verdi's opera "Un Ballo in Maschera" in two parts in the NBC Symphony's program for the next two Sundays, from 6:30 to 7:30 p. m., Jan. 17, and 6 to 7:30 Jan. 24. A recent attack of bronchitis, from which he has recovered, did not interrupt the Maestro's rehearsals for this production. Guido Cantelli conducts Beethoven's First Symphony, Casella's "Paganiniana" and dances from Falla's "Three Cornered Hat" in today's NBC Symphony broadcast.

Cir. (M 30,400) (E 12,706) (S 33,873)

This Clipping From BOISE, IDAHO
IDAHO STATESMAN
JAN 2 1954

Symphony to Laud Composer Berlioz

NEW YORK (NYHT)—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston symphony, announced Friday the sesquicentennial of the birth on Dec. 11, 1803, of Hector Berlioz, the composer, will be observed at the Berkshire festival next summer at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., with performances of a number of the larger works by that composer.

The choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe will perform the damnation scene from "Faust." William [illegible] will be soloist [illegible] of "Harold in Italy." [illegible] works to be performed [illegible] the "Fantastic [illegible] the song cycle, "Summer [illegible]," the complete "Romeo and Juliet," and the "Requiem." The festival will be held during July and August.

Cir. (D 26,042)

This Clipping From
HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
JAN 4 - 1954

It is legitimate to look forward to summer, once the Christmas holidays are over, and so we welcome the news that the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood next season will pay special attention to the works of Berloiz because of his sesquicentennial. Choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe will sing "The Damnation of Faust." William Primrose will do the viola solo of "Harold in Italy." The "Fantastic Symphony" and the song cycle "Summer Nights" will also be presented. The Festival Chorus will appear with the Boston Symphony orchestra in "Romeo and Juliet" and in the Berloiz "Requiem."

☆ ☆

Cir. (D 149,902) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
DEC 16 1953

Chorus Leader Lorna de Varon Rising Star in Hub Music Worl

By CYRUS DURGIN

One of the rising stars of music in Boston is a slim, dark-haired, dark-eyed lady who conducts the New England Conservatory Chorus. Her name is Lorna Cooke de Varon, and in five years she has held the post she has brought the Conservatory Chorus to new distinction and excellence. Her most recent contribution to music in this city is the preparation of the choral part of Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ," which Charles Munch will present at the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Although she is all vivacity and authority when on the conductor's stand, it was plain to see, one day in the trustees' room at the New England Conservatory last week, that Mrs. de Varon does not especially enjoy talking about herself. The basic facts came easily enough: that she was born Lorna Cooke in Chicago, moved with her family when she was 15 to Rhode Island, went to Wellesley, and took graduate study at Radcliffe.

But there were just modest and pleasant "Thank you's" when it was mentioned that only this Fall, starting with 50 percent new members, she had accomplished a notable feat in so admirably drilling the Conservatory Chorus for its recent Jordan Hall concert. Nor was there forthcoming any quick or voluble listing of what she has done. Mrs. de Varon is the modest sort, quiet but thoroughly knowing of her business.

A Good Pinch-Hitter

The usual early studies in piano were amplified by voice training and organ lessons by the time she was a Wellesley undergraduate. Then she got a chance to work with G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, and that started the de Varon career in choral conducting. For two years she studied with the widely esteemed Mr. Woodworth, and became his assistant. Then came two Summers as a pupil of Robert Shaw, founder of the famed Robert Shaw Chorale, at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood. There was, too, study of theory with Nadia Boulanger, composition with Walter Piston and choral composition with Dr. Archibald T. Davison.

Then one mid-season, Mrs. de Varon received a summons from Bryn Mawr College to replace the chorus leader, who had resigned. A stint of pinch-hitting lengthened into a stay of nearly four years as assistant professor of music. That, as she says, "was very fortunate in all respects, musical and personal, because at that time my husband returned from military service." He is Jose de Varon, a Boston lawyer. Last Summer Mrs. de Varon was on the staff of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood as assistant to Hugh Ross in the choral department. She will resume the post again next Summer.

Music is in the family. Mrs. de Varon's mother, Hazel Watts Cooke, was a professional and wrote several operettas for children. Mrs. de Varon obviously has in her veins what theatre people would call "trouping blood." Just a few weeks ago she got a call asking that she prepare the singing parts in the Polovetsian Dances of Borodin, which were t be presented by the Boston Symphony. It was the Thanksgivin week-end, but she got on th telephone, rounded up as many a she could of the Conservator Alumni Chorus, and had prepare them in four days. I for one, ca testify they sang very nicely.

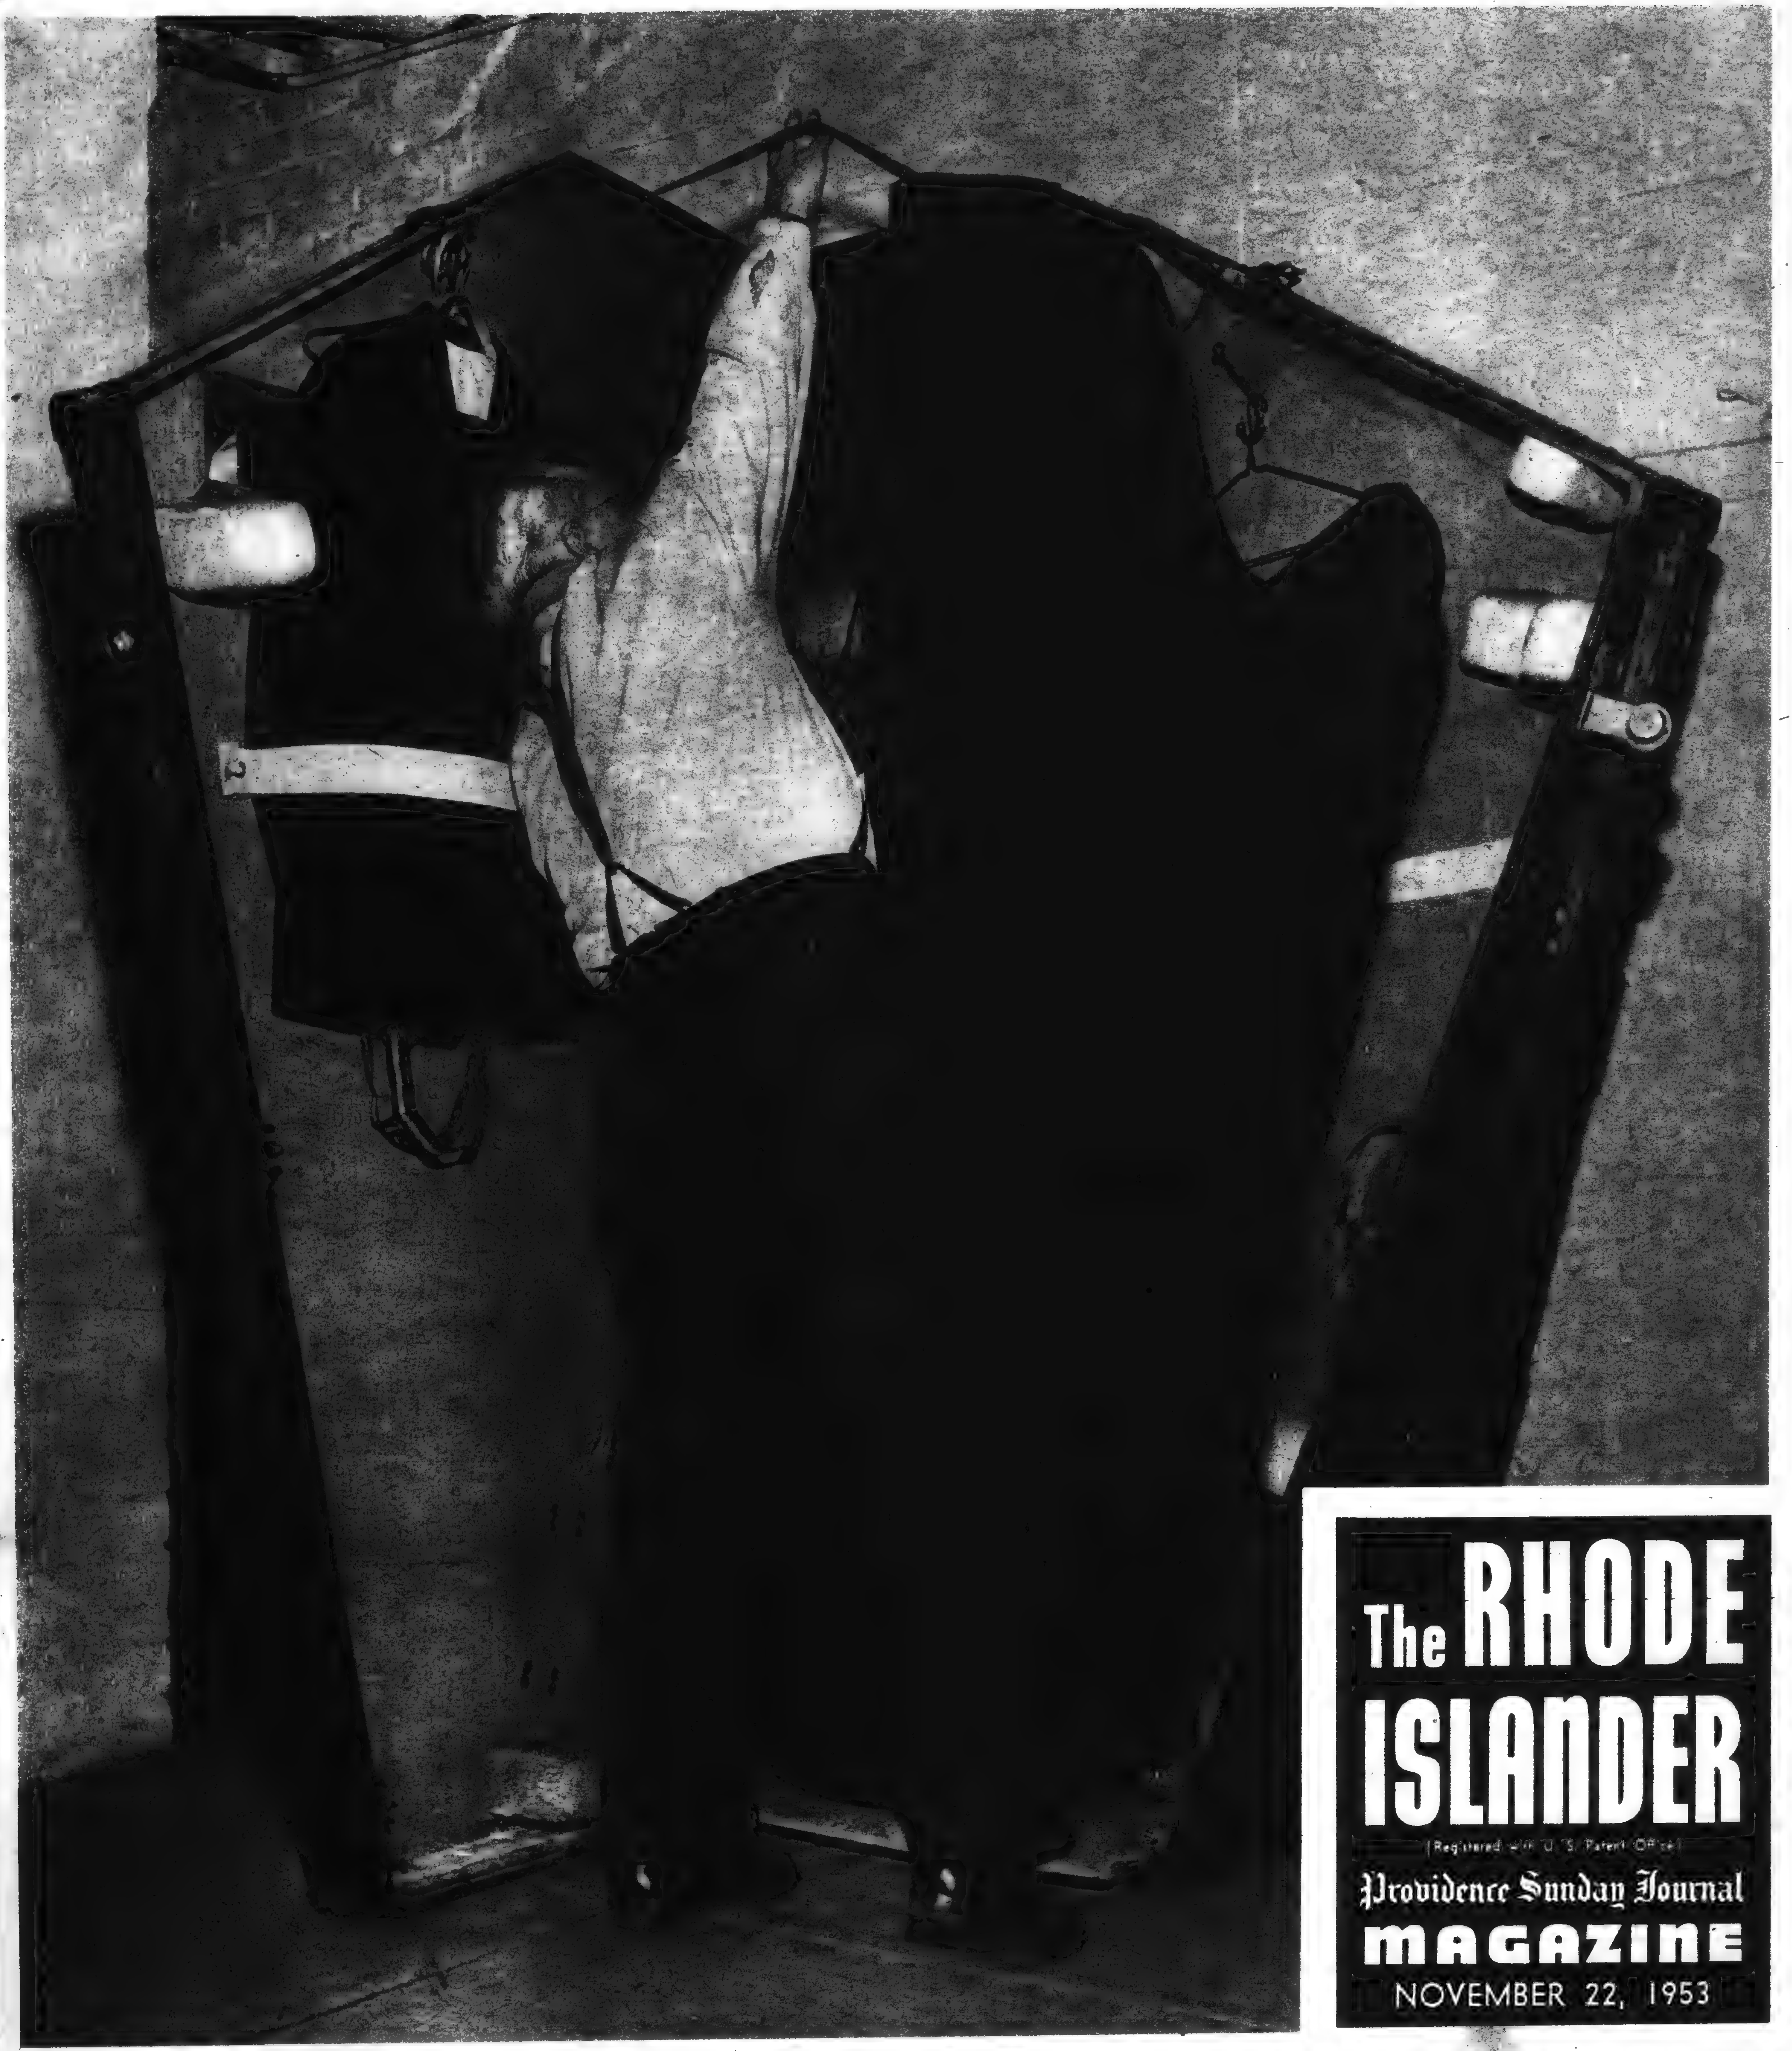
What, in Mrs. de Varon's belief is required for choral conducting in addition to musical competence? "You have to know people," she smiles.

LORNA COOKE de VARON

Monitor
12/9/5

The flute section of the Boston Symphony—(Standing) George Madsen and Philip Kaplan, and (seated) James Pappoutsakis and Doriot Anthony—will be featured in works for four flutes at the concert tonight in Sanders Theater by the Cambridge Society for Early Music.

Cir. (D 46,023) (S 174,898)
This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 22 1953

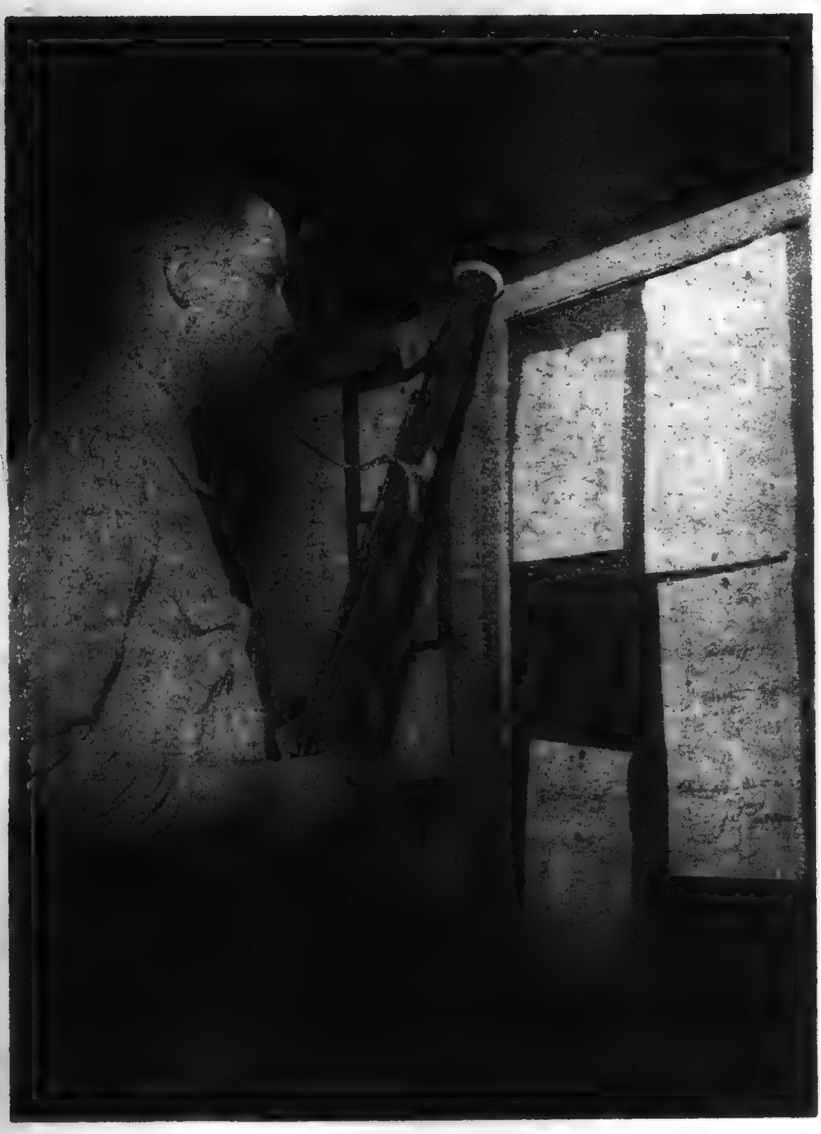


The RHODE ISLANDER
(Registered with U. S. Patent Office)
Providence Sunday Journal
MAGAZINE
NOVEMBER 22, 1953

Boston Symphony Moves to Providence

56 FHX

CONDUCTOR CHARLES MUNCH, left, at his home, hands a few batons to his valet, Roger Toureau, to pack for a trip to Providence, with his conductor's uniform. Mme. Toureau helps. M. Toureau asked particular attention to the spelling of his name, so it wouldn't come out 'cow's husband' (i.e., 'taureau', the French for 'bull') and we have done our best to take care of this little detail.



BASSOONIST Richard Plaster consults Symphony Hall bulletin board for times and places of trips the orchestra is going to take.

Musical Moving Day

It's quite a trick to pack the orchestra for its Tuesday journey to Providence

STORY BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE — PICTURES BY EDWARD C. HANSON

MANY of the problems that bedevil a symphony orchestra have little to dc with aesthetics. For instance, moving. It does involve an interplay of forms and spaces, but for utilitarian rather than artistic ends, and a strong back is more to the purpose than a supple wrist.

Even the short journey from its home to Providence entails a workaday and rather strenuous non-musical performance in behalf of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A hundred men and a woman on the stage of Veterans Memorial Auditorium would avail little if the bass fiddles had somehow got to Dorchester or the kettledrums were still in Symphony Hall. When it is a question of a transcontinental or European tour, the hazards and details are multiplied.

For short trips, such as the orchestra will be making from Boston to Providence on Tuesday night, the players who use instruments easily portable—strings smaller than cellos; and trumpets, flutes and such—will carry their own. The bulkier instruments will come by truck.

Harvey Genereux, the orchestra's baggagemaster and baton maker, has refined the process of moving over so many years (he evades a direct statement of the number) that there is seldom a contretemps. It is reasonable to expect that what happens Tuesday will be what happened on the five

4
3 12
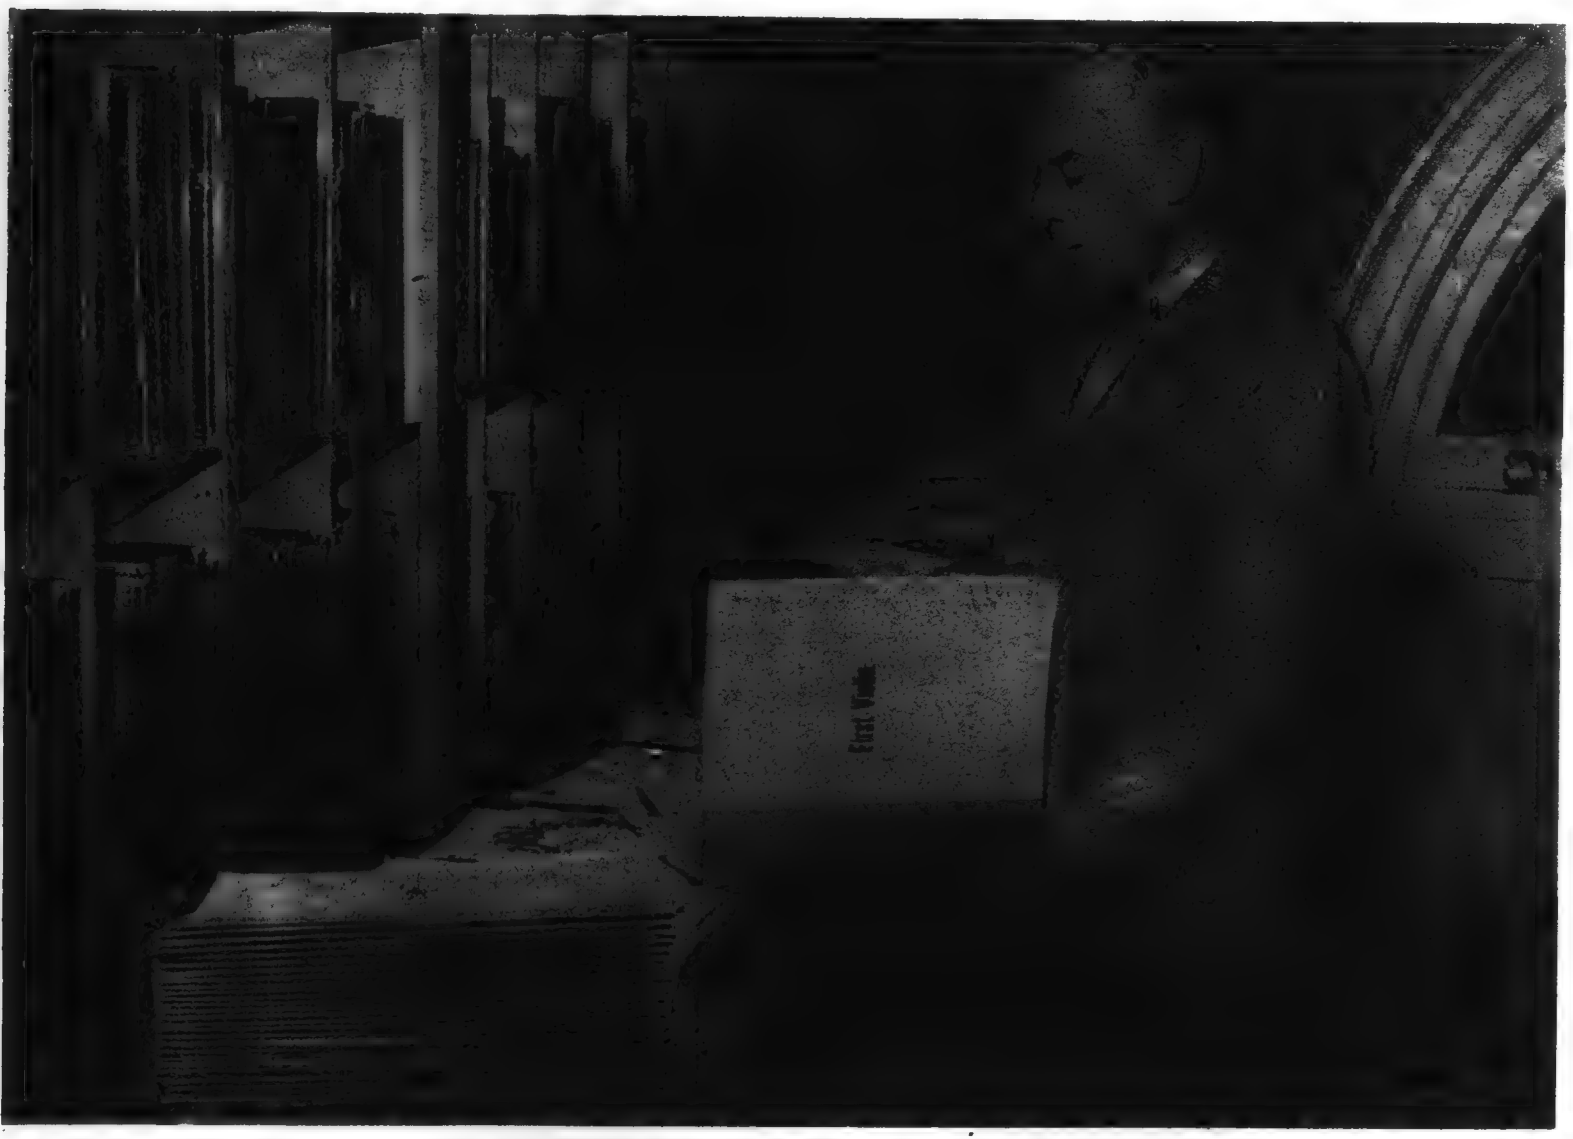
SYMPHONY HALL
BOSTON MASS
SYMPHONY HALL
BOSTON MASS

IN BASEMENT of Symphony Hall, trunks for double basses, or bull fiddles, stand at attention awaiting journey.



LIBRARIAN Leslie J. Rogers gets out scores for Providence concert.

Symphony moves continued

Not always smooth

Boston Symphony Tuesdays last season and will happen again next season. Mr. Genereux and his assistant, Bert Martin, will see to it that the basses and harps are in their trunks, the drums in their boxes, and every other necessary large instrument is ready. A truck will back up to the stage entrance of Symphony Hall and Clarence H. Davidson will fit everything into approximately 850 cubic feet of space, as he has done for 28 years already. He will drive to Providence and, with his helpers, unload in plenty of time for the concert.

About 6 o'clock, two busses will stop in back of the hall. Musicians who want to smoke will get into one bus, the "smoker," and musicians who don't want to smoke or be bothered by smoking colleagues will get into the other bus, the "hospital" car. The busses will make a stop or two en route to pick up assorted fiddlers and other instrumentalists on street corners. The rest of the orchestra will come to Providence in private cars.

It doesn't always work smoothly. About 10 years ago, when th orchestra's equipment came to Providence in a freight car, the indispensable car got lost somewhere in the Providence yards and th

continued on page

56 8th

SYMPHONY HALL

TRUCKERS John C. Bailey and Martin S. DiStefano load a double bass onto the moving van at the back door of Symphony Hall.

WITH A HAND TRUCK, Harvey Genereux, orchestra's baggagemaster, trundles a kettledrum to the elevator, to lower it to street floor.

ENTR
33
BOSTON'S SYMPHONY BOSTON
ORCH

FOR ALMOST 30 YEARS, Clarence Davidson has moved orchestra.

HARPS GO ABOARD in large and sturdy trunks such as these.

56 5HX

HADDON HALL
"BANKER"
2 for 35¢

An Old Favorite in New England

Rich Havana aroma in a mild, modern cigar. That's the unique character of Haddon Hall, a cigar to light up and enjoy! Try one today

Other Sizes 2 for 27¢ to 26¢ each

Haddon Hall CIGARS

MORSE TOBACCO CO., DISTRIBUTORS
83 Atwells Ave., Providence

CHRISTMAS PORTRAITS NOW

Taken In Your Home
Large Selection of Proofs

Gabermann Studio
SPECIALISTS IN CHILDREN'S PORTRAITS
169 Weybosset St., Prov.
DExter 1-5946

MANY of the symphony players travel to Providence by bus.

UNPACKING, dressing in Veterans Memorial.

OFTEN there's time to take a nap before the concert. Irving Frankel, a bass player, relaxes.

Symphony moves continued from page 4

Behind the bicycles

search for it took so long that the concert had to begin late. That was when the orchestra changed from rail to truck.

"And not too long ago," said Mr. Genereux, "we gave a concert in Springfield, Mass., and had another the next evening in New York. Instead of shipping our baggage car, the railroad sent an empty scenery car. When I got to Grand Central Terminal that morning, I found an empty car. They had to take a switcher to bring the right car to New York in time.

"Last year, when we were on our European tour, one of our trucks on the way from Bordeaux to Paris got behind a bicycle race and couldn't pass it. It had all the musicians' concert clothes in it."

The orchestra was going to London and reached that city without its tails. A serious international incident seemed likely if the boys performed in street clothes. Everything was nip and tuck. But the clothes finally did arrive in time, so we are still on good terms with Great Britain.

The Cover Picture shows Harvey Genereux, the baggagemaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, putting a wrapper on a harp before installing the harp in its trunk for a journey to Providence. And plenty of room left for performer's evening clothes. Mr. Genereux also makes the batons for the conductor. Photograph by Edward C. Hanson of Journal-Bulletin.

56 ~~5XX~~

FESTIVAL - ESPLANADE

This Clipping From
NEW YORK TIMES
JAN 10 1954

THE WORLD OF MUSIC: LINING UP THE FESTIVA

By ROSS PARMENTER

CHRISTMAS being out of the way, many persons' holiday thoughts are now reaching tentatively forward to summer vacations. Counting on this, the organizers of musical festivals are beginning to dangle their programs before exploratory eyes. As will be seen by the paragraphs below, the basic plans for most of the festivals of Western Europe have been made. Meanwhile, there is news of a major reorganization of one of the chief United States festivals.

The Berkshire Festival pattern at Tanglewood in the post-war years has consisted of a three-week "little" festival in the Theatre-Concert Hall, followed by three whopping week-ends of concerts by the full Boston Symphony in the Shed. The new scheme that Charles Munch has evolved will merge the "little" and the "big" festivals into a scheme that should result in six whopping week-ends. Under the Munch plan the full orchestra will give concerts in the Shed on each of the week-ends of the festival period, which this year will run from July 5 to Aug. 15.

The full orchestra concerts, though, will be limited to two each week-end. They will be given on Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons. Friday evenings will be reserved for the Bach-Mozart program in the Theatre-Concert Hall, and these little orchestra concerts, instead of being bunched into the first three weeks, will be spread out through the whole festival. And a new series of programs is being added to the festival—chamber music concerts on the six Wednesday evenings of the period.

Berkshire Fete Expanded and Enlarged —Plans Made for European Events

Gounod's "Mireille" will be the operas at Aix-en-Provence.

ISRAEL: The twenty-eighth festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music will be held in Jerusalem from May 30 to June 9.

Cir. (D 26,042)

This Clipping From
HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
JAN 9 - 1954

Music Festival To Be Lengthened

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced today the scope of the Berkshire festival at Tanglewood will be extended next summer from 4 to 6 weeks. Concerts will be given from July 5 to Aug. 15.

Cir. (D 26,991)

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
JAN 9 - 1954

In Brief . . .

We're glad to see the Berkshires will be well represented again this year in the state's annual Student Government Day program, which has taken on added significance since President Eisenhower and Governor Herter both endorsed the idea of votes for 18-year-olds . . . Councilman Lake's suggestion for redrawing ward lines on the basis of current population figures should prove popular with voters who have had to wait in line for a chance at the machines in the more populous wards . . . It seems likely that most citizens will agree with the City Council that a $2,300 raise for Public Works Commissioner Morris E. Lundberg is not too high a price to pay for the service the city has been getting since he took office . . .

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's decision to extend the Festival concerts from three weeks to six is wonderful news both for music lovers and for inn keepers who have been trying to figure out ways to spread their summer business over a longer period . . .

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 9 - 1954

BSO to Have Larger Program At Tanglewood

A greater scope for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's talents is in the works for the coming Summer season at Tanglewood, according to a Boston announcement out of headquarters.

Prompted by last Summer's attendance of 118,000 persons, the large Music Shed concerts this year will be given every weekend of the six-week session. Previously the season had been divided between three week ends of Bach-Mozart festivals, and three or four of the large Shed concerts.

The smaller Bach, Mozart and other classical composer concerts will not be discontinued. Rather they will be given each Friday night of each weekend.

* * *

THUS MUSIC LOVERS will be able to attend a smaller concert and the larger concerts all in the same weekend.

This also means there will be 12 Shed performances instead of the usual nine, and the weekends will be "better balanced." The number of Bach-Mozart concerts, however, will remain at six.

Also in the course of the 12 Shed concerts, the orchestra and its conductor, Charles Munch, will honor the sesquicentennial of the birth of the French composer Hector Berlioz.

* * *

THE BERLIOZ WORKS to be performed will include "The Damnation of Faust,' "Romeo and Juliet," and the Requiem as well as the song cycle "Summer Nights," and many instrumental works.

In addition to the regular concerts, there will be a variety of other performances. A series of chamber music concerts will be heard on Wednesday evenings, a program of opera scenes on Tuesday evenings and the usual two opera productions during the season.

Cir. (D 39,146) (S 21,101)

This Clipping From
LOWELL, MASS.
SUN
JAN 7 - 1954

MUSIC

Festival Program

The sesquicentennial season Berlioz will be observed Charles Munch at the Berkshi Festival at Tanglewood in Leno next summer with a performanc of a number of the great work of this composer.

"The Damnation be performed with the choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe, "Harold in Italy" with William Primrose as viola soloist, the "Fantastic Symphony", and the song cycle, "Summer Nights". The Festival Chorus of the Berkshire Music Center will appear with the orchestra in "Romeo and Juliet" in its complete form and in the famous "Requiem", which will conclude the festival. The festival will extend from the first week of July through August 15.

Since the birth of Hector Berlioz one hundred and fifty years ago (December 11, 1803) his artistic stature has risen increasingly in general estimation, notably in recent years.

Cir. (D 39,532)

This Clipping From
BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE & TIMES
JAN 9 - 1954

LENOX. — (AP) — Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced today the scope of the Berkshire festival at Tanglewood will be extended next summer from four to six weeks. Concerts will be given from July 5 to Aug. 15.

Cir. (D 12,338)

This Clipping From
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
JAN 8 - 1954

Tanglewood To Hold More Shed Events

A new plan has been devised by Charles Munch, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to extend the scope of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox next summer. The plan has been prompted by the record attendance in 1953—118,000, and the obvious desire of many thousands to hear the full orchestra in the first three weeks of the festival as well as the last three.

According to this plan, the concerts by the full orchestra in the music shed will be given each Saturday evening and each Sunday afternoon through the six weeks from July 5 to Aug. 15. The concerts by the orchestra of chamber proportions in the Theatre-Concert Hall, devoted mostly to the music of Bach and Mozart, which formerly occupied the first three weeks of the festival, will now be given each Friday evening preceding the weekend shed concerts. Together with the performances by the students of the Berkshire Music Center, this will result in six weeks of daily performances on an identical rotation through each week.

The Munch plan will thus provide twelve festival concerts in the shed instead of nine as before, and six "Bach-Mozart" concerts in the theatre as before, but now on a once-a-week basis.

In the course of the twelve shed concerts Mr. Munch will honor the sesquicentennial season of the birth of Hector Berlioz. There will be performances of choral works, including "The Damnation of Faust," "Romeo and Juliet," and the "Requiem," as well as the song cycle, "Summer Nights" and instrumental works.

In addition to the Berkshire Festival performances, a series of chamber music concerts at moderate prices will be given by different ensembles in the theatre on the six Wednesday evenings.

Cir. (D 31,687)

This Clipping From PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
JAN 9 - 1954

Music Festival To Be Extended

LENOX, Mass. (AP)—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced today the scope of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood will be extended next Summer from four to six weeks. Concerts will be given from July 5 to Aug. 15.

Cir. (D 26,991)

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
JAN 7 - 1954

Tanglewood Season To Be Discussed

Berkshire Hills Conference Director John F. Downing is meeting today in Boston with George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to discuss plans for the 1954 Tanglewood season.

Mr. Downing will remain in Boston tomorrow for a meeting of the state Commerce Department subcommittee on vacataion travel. The whole committee will meet tomorrow afternoon.

The Berkshire Hills Conference official also will meet with America Barone Jr. of the Pioneer Valley Assn. to plan the two organizations' joint display in the Hartford Times travel show later this month.

Cir. (D 131,670) (S 258,529)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
JAN 8 - 1954

Extension of Esplanade Concerts Set for Next Summer

By ELINOR HUGHES

APPARENTLY THERE is nothing that Arthur Fiedler enjoys so much as work, for he has been hard at it to arrange a lot more for himself next August, a time of year when most people are cutting down on their activities rather than adding to them. In other words, Mr. Fiedler announces that the Esplanade Concerts, which he organized and has been directing since 1929, will now be expanded in scope and instead of being given, as hitherto, only in July, will continue through Aug. 10.

The weekly performance schedule has been radically changed, moreover, due to a rearrangement of the Shed concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood. The Esplanade Concerts will be played on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings and the Children's Series on Tuesday mornings. This will mean an increase of from 21 to 23 evening concerts and six morning concerts in place of three. This arrangement will free the Boston Symphony musicians to travel to Tanglewood to play in the Berkshire Festival under Charles Munch.

AS MR. FIEDLER puts it: "By this new plan, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be presenting a Town Series and a Country Series concurrently; each series will have its individual musical character and surroundings. Bostonians and visitors will have a wide range of programs to chose from, and ambitious vacationists may enjoy starting their concert week in Boston beside the Charles River and finishing it in the Berkshire Hills."

The Sunday edition of The Herald will carry the story of the new plans recently formulated by Charles Munch for the Berkshire Festival in Tanglewood which called for a rearrangement of the Esplanade Concerts in Boston.

Charles Munch in action. The director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, caught by the candid camera as he puts his musicians through their paces at Symphony Hall prior to a concert. Notice the intense concentration.

Symphony Orchestra

Survey of First Half of the Season, Considering Problems and Policies

By TUCKER KEISER

The 73rd season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is half over. Once admittedly the finest symphony orchestra in the world, this musical organization has passed through a phase of "tired perfection."

During its three-score years and 13, under 10 conductors, the orchestra grew steadily in prestige and power. During the quarter century of Koussevitzky's leadership, the organization developed a glorious tone, especially in the string section, encouraged young composers by playing their new works, trained youthful musicians in its school at Tanglewood, and educated audiences in 20th century idioms.

Bridged Gap

Any one of these achievements would have entitled the Russian-born conductor to a place in musical history, but Koussevitzky's greatest service was the last, the bridging of the gap between composers and listeners.

Four and a half years ago all of this was handed over to Charles Munch—a taut musical organization trained within an inch of its life, with a beauty of tone probably unmatched; a host of able and ardent composers willing to write new works for little more than the pleasure of having them performed by such an orchestra; a school with unparalleled facilities for nurturing musical talent and an audience educated to sympathy with a dynamic and developing art.

The orchestra is still capable of precision and unity. This is demonstrated every time we have a guest conductor. Ferenc Fricsay controlled, if he did not inspire the orchestra which responded sensitively to his direction. If the total effect was not very moving, the conductor's insight and not the orchestra's efficiency was at fault. Mr. Burgin's performances have never had much communicative vitality, but the orchestra is at concert pitch while he is on the podium.

Unstable Element

The orchestra is unstable under the baton of Mr. Munch. When he demands perfection, as in his reading of Berlioz, the orchestra reminds the listener of its great days. But the conductor trusts too much to the inspiration of the moment; inspiration failing, he falls back on the old technique of whooping it up. The string section, the dethroned queen of the orchestra, rarely has more than a thin, overly-bright tone now; the brass, particularly the trumpets, mercilessly assaults the eardrums; at times the timpani is overwhelming.

Without orchestral discipline, there is no tone. The laissez-faire policy between conductor and orchestra could eventually reduce the Boston Symphony to a scrabble of 100 instrumentalists bowing, blowing, or beating in any manner that pleases them.

Under Koussevitzky

A whole generation of composers reached their musical maturity under Koussevitzky; they looked forward to a Boston premiere because they knew that their music would be heard under the very best conditions—an orchestra which could give everything in the score and a conductor who was in sympathy with contemporary idioms.

Not many years ago, a season half over would have listed at least six first performances by American composers whose styles were as different as their names. This season, we have had only two short pieces by native composers in their first performances. The Leo Smit Overture and Walter Piston's Fantasy for English horn, harp and strings were both conservative compositions, not shocking enough to raise eyebrows nor stirring enough to keep some eyelids from falling.

Mr. Munch has inherited from his predecessor a tradition; the conductor of the Boston Symphony has an obligation to the American composer. If he does not accept it, it may be assumed that he holds our composers in low esteem.

With one or two notable exceptions, what we have now, aside from standard symphonic repertory, are novelties, French confections or warhorses that any half-trained orchestra could play without the aid of a conductor.

Most conductors would give their right arm for an audience trained in the ways of 20th century music. The very reason for the so-called standard repertory is an inability on the part of the listener to follow contemporary idioms.

Koussevitzky's great missionary work narrowed the expected 50-year gap between composer and listener. An enlightened audience can march forward, many times not understanding completely, but at least actively participating in the thrilling experience of new music.

What New Works?

What new works have we had this season? Bloch's tame Concerto Grosso No. 2, Dutilleux' Symphony, a rash of old-fashioned Saint-Saens, Kabalevsky's Cello Concerto (which Samuel Mayes' wonderful playing made sound more important than it is), and Ibert's Flute Concerto. On the credit side must be added Nielsen's Symphony No. 5, although even this was actually composed in 1922.

No one will deny that Mr. Munch has a flair, indeed, a set of flairs. Berlioz, for example, can never hope for a more sympathetic interpreter. His romantic nineteeth century compositions have been given with great effect; his "L'Enfance du Christ," heard just before Christmas, was in many ways the peak of Mr. Munch's career in Boston. But even Berlioz cannot make a Boston Symphony season unaided.. The repertory is still emaciated even when padded out with Debussy and Ravel, other Munch specialties.

Liking for Bach, Mozart

It is true that Mr. Munch's readings of Bach and Mozart demonstrate a liking for and understanding of these composers which results in performances of considerable musical, integrity and validity. The music, less emotional and structurally more balanced, imposes its own symmetry and decorum, proportion and restraint, on the conductor.

He chooses his soloists with care and does his best work when it is necessary to co-ordinate the solo and the tutti.

He has had marvelous results with his choral works; his restrained platform manner and conducting technique in such works inspires creative performances of impressive quality.

It is not enough, however that our orchestra should be spottily superior; it is a superlative instrument which cannot be maintained when its energies are expended on outdated and unchallenging second-rate scores, and when it is allowed to perform at less than its best. It is time for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to begin making history again.

Berkshire Festival to Be Longer

Director Charles Munch has announced plans to increase by three the number of performances to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood next summer.

The full orchestra will play in the shed on six successive week ends from July 5 through Aug. 15, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons.

The small, chamber size orchestra, will give concerts for six successive Friday evenings during the same period, playing mostly Bach and Mozart.

Last year the chamber orchestra held the stage alone on the first three week ends, and the complete orchestra appeared during the last three, playing nine concerts in that period. Under the new schedule there will be 12 concerts by the larger group.

Dr. Munch announces he will perform several works by Berlioz during the season, to honor the sesqui-centennial of his birth. No dates have been fixed yet, but there will be performances of such choral works as "The Damnation of Faust," the "Requiem," the song cycle, "Summer Nights," "Romeo and Juliet," and various instrumental works.

Student musical groups of the festival will play instrumental or operatic works on those days when the orchestra is not present.

During part of this period, the symphony orchestra will be playing also at the Esplanade Concerts in Boston on a new schedule. The Esplanade season was previously limited to three weeks of the summer just prior to the Berkshire Festival. Under the new schedule the two events will go on simultaneously, the Esplanade the first three days of the week, Monday through Wednesday, following which the orchestra will travel up to the Berkshires for three days.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 1[illegible] St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 8-8860
Cir. (4,000)
This Clipping From
RECO[illegible]TAILING
NEW [illegible] N.Y.
JAN [illegible] 1954

ABOVE: Boston Symphony Orchestra members brought their own recordings to play on Philco's high fidelity "Phonorama" radio phonograph. Shown here are James Stagliano, french born player, and Raymond Voisin, trumpet player.

HELP SUPPORT THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WHILE LISTENING TO THEIR
RCA VICTOR RECORDINGS!

. . for one week (Dec. 14 - Dec. 20)

the J. G. KAUFMAN CO.

will donate their entire profits from the sale of RCA Victor Boston Symphony Orchestra recordings . . .

We are pleased to offer the services of our record department in helping to secure funds for the maintenance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. We will donate the entire profits from the sale of every RCA Victor Boston Symphony Orchestra Recording sold in our store during the week of December 14th. A check for the entire profits on all RCA Victor Boston Symphony Orchestra Recordings will be presented to the Board of Trustees after the close of our one-week campaign. MAIL ORDERS ACCEPTED. Add 65c for postage and handling charges. We urge your immediate support.

NUMBER	DESCRIPTION	PRICE
LM-1078	Stravinsky: Histoire du Soldat; Octet for Wind Instruments, 12"	$5.72
LM-1063	Bach: Brandenburg Concerti 1, 6, 12"	$5.72
LM-1145	Beethoven: Symphony 3, 12"	$5.72
LM-1021	Beethoven: Symphony 5, 12"	$5.72
LM-6001	Beethoven: Symphony 9 (Shaw Chorale); Egmont Overture, 2-12"	$11.44
LCT-1043	Brahms: Violin Concerto (Heifetz), 12"	$5.72
LM-1025	Brahms: Symphony 3, 12"	$5.72
LM-1102	Haydn: Symphony 92; Mozart: Serenade "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," 12"	$5.72
LM-20	Mendelssohn: Symphony 4, 10"	$4.67
LM-1141	Mozart: Symphonies 36, 39, 12"	$5.72
LM-1215	Prokofiev: Classical Symphony; Rachmaninoff: Isle of the Dead, 12"	$5.72
LM-45	Prokofiev: Peter and the Wolf (Roosevelt), 10"	$4.67
LM-1045	Prokofiev: Symphony 5, 12"	$5.72
LM-1012	Ravel: Bolero; Ma Mere L'Oye, 12"	$5.72
LM-7	Schubert: Symphony 8, 10"	$4.67
LM-1172	Sibelius: Symphony 2, 12"	$5.72
LM-1177	R. Strauss: Don Juan; Wagner: Seigfried Idyll, 12"	$5.72
LM-1008	Tchaikovsky: Symphony 4, 12"	$5.72
LM-1047	Tchaikovsky: Symphony 5, 12"	$5.72
LM-1149	Stravinsky: Sacre du Printemps, 12"	$5.72
LM-1200	Beethoven: Symphony 1; Hayden: Symphony 103, 12"	$5.72
LM-1034	Beethoven: Symphony 7, 12"	$5.72
LM-1086	Brahms: Symphony 4, 12"	$5.72
LM-1728	Brahms: Piano Concerto 2 (Rubinstein), 12"	$5.72
LM-1700	Lalo, Ravel, Berlioz, Saint-Saens, 12"	$5.72
LM-1190	Schumann: Symphony 1, 12"	$5.72
LM-1775	Scriabin: Poem de Ecstasy, Liszt: Les Preludes, 12"	$5.72
LM-9034	Haydn: Symphony 94, 104, 12"	$5.72

BOSTON HEADQUARTERS FOR RCA VICTOR RECORDINGS

PHONE ORDERS
CA
7-7650

J. G. KAUFMAN CO.

26 PROVINCE ST. Between School and Bromfield Sts.

FINAL

PROOF SLIP
FROM Boston Globe
DECEMBER 12, 1953

FESTIVAL.

MIRACLE MAN
'Approval of City Council
'A Tribute to Lundberg
(Linscott)—Page 14

The Berkshire Evening Eagle

State Edition
Entered as second class matter, Post Office, Pittsfield, Mass.

Volume 62—No. 203 Pittsfield, Massachusetts, Saturday, January 9, 1954. 18 Pages—Five Cents

Berkshire Festival Extends 1954 Season

* * * * * * * * * * * * * * * * * *

Red China Urges Peace Parley

Berkshire Evening Eagle

Pittsfield, Massachusetts, Saturday, January 9, 1954.

FESTIVAL OFFICIALS attending the Tanglewood Advisory Committee meeting at the Hotel Sheraton here yesterday, when plans for the 1954 extended season were announced, were Henry W. Dwight, left, of Stockbridge; George E. Judd, center, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Robert K. Wheeler of Great Barrington. Mr. Dwight and Mr. Wheeler were original members of the board of directors of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival Inc., which inaugurated the Berkshire music festivals in 1934 at the Hanna estate in Interlaken, now the Stockbridge School.

Conference Director Hails Plan To Enlarge Tanglewood Season

John F. Downing, director of the Berkshire Hills Conference, today hailed the expanded season of the Berkshire Festival as a great boom to the tourist business in the area this summer.

"Not only is this great news for the music lovers," said Mr. Downing, "but it will help to level off the peaks for businesses and result in a more orderly flow of traffic through the Berkshires."

In past years, said the Conference director, hotels, inns, resorts and tourist [illegible] have enjoyed booming business on the three major Tanglewood weekends but they have had comparatively lean picking during the opening weeks of the Festival.

Now that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give performances each weekend for six consecutive weeks, rather than just the last three weekends of the Festival, Mr. Downing looks for a record tourist trade in the Berkshires during the summer.

Obituary

BSO Plans Concerts Over Six Weekends

The 1954 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood will include Music Shed concerts by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra over a period of six weeks instead of the usual three weekends.

Announcement of the new plan, prompted by the record attendance of 118,000 people last summer, was made today following a meeting of the Tanglewood Advisory Committee at the Hotel Sheraton in this city yesterday.

12 Shed Concerts

George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, explained at yesterday's luncheon meeting here that the new plan to extend the scope of the Festival at Tanglewood was devised by Charles Munch, the BSO conductor. Mr. Munch plans during the course of the 12 Shed concerts next summer to honor the sesquicentennial season of the birth of Hector Berlioz.

According to the Munch plan, the concerts by the full orchestra in the Shed will be given each Saturday evening and Sunday afternoons through the six weeks from July 5 to Aug. 15.

Friday Nights in Theater

Mr. Judd informed the Berkshire advisory group that the concerts by the orchestra of chamber proportions in the Theater-Concert Hall, devoted mostly to the music of Bach and Mozart, will now be given each Friday evening preceding the weekend Shed concerts. Heretofore the Bach-Mozart series, so-called, occupied the first three weeks of the Festival.

Together with the performance by the students of the Berkshire Music Center, this will result in six weeks of daily performances on an identical rotation through each week.

The Munch plan will thus provide 12 Berkshire Festival concerts in the Shed instead of nine as before, and six "Bach-Mozart" concerts in the theater as before, but now on a once-a-week basis.

In addition to the Berkshire Festival performances, a series of chamber music concerts at moderate prices will be given by different ensembles in the theater on the six Wednesday evenings, Mr. Judd announced.

Four Concerts a Week

The 1954 Festival therefore will consist of four concerts a week—Wednesday, Friday, Saturday, Sunday—for six weeks, or 24 concerts in all.

The various departments of the Berkshire Music Center will give further performances, continuing the custom of opera scenes on Tuesdays, orchestral concerts on Thursdays and chamber concerts on Sunday mornings.

Mr. Munch is "extremely enthusiastic" about the school, Mr. Judd declared, "and he is looking forward to directing the Music Center again this summer." The school will open for its 12th season in July.

Bernstein Abroad

Leonard Bernstein, head of the conducting department at Tanglewood and a guest conductor for many seasons, will not be at Tanglewood next summer, Mr. Judd announced. Mr. Bernstein is currently abroad and "by his own election" will not be on hand for the 1954 season.

However, Pierre Monteux will return to be guest conductor at two of the Festival concerts this summer. Another guest conductor and guest soloists will be announced soon.

A high light of the 1954 season will be the performances of choral works by Berlioz, including "The Damnation of Faust," "Romeo and Juliet," and the "Requiem," as well as the song cycle, "Summer Nights" and instrumental works.

Harvard, Radcliffe Chorus Coming

Because the Berkshire Music Center chorus will not be organized for the first performance of Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust," Mr. Judd announced the BSO has engaged the Harvard and Radcliffe chorus to appear at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphnoy to sing the choral work next summer. He expressed the hope that many Berkshire friends of the Harvard and Radcliffe Glee Club members would open their homes to the chorus while they are in the county for the performance.

Prior to coming to Tanglewood the Harvard and Radcliffe chorus will be on an extended tour throughout the country, winding up their trip at the Berkshire Festival.

Mr. Judd informed the Tanglewood Advisory Committee that the BSO couldn't possibly do three choral works in a three week program. With the enlarged season next summer he expressed the feeling that the new feature of the Berlioz portion of the Festival will be popular with music lovers.

Beethoven Festival in '55

In 1955, he revealed, Mr. Munch is considering a Beethoven festival, but definite plans will not be announced until the close of the 1954 summer season.

In addition to the 24 concerts planned during the summer Festival, Tanglewood on Parade will be scheduled as usual in the final week for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center.

Up until now, the Berkshire Festivals have been planned with two patterns — one, the Bach-Mozart series or small concerts; two, the major performances or big concerts in the Music Shed. Now the season has been planned to follow one pattern, with the programming extended over a full six week season.

Out of Red in '53

Despite record breaking crowds in recent years, the Tanglewood operation has been a "red ink proposition," Mr. Judd told the Berkshire group yesterday, but, he "happily" reported a $4,000 net gain was shown at Tanglewood last year, marking the first time in many, many years that the Berkshire Festival ended up in the black.

"If this coming summer goes well," added Mr. Judd, "we should show a better cash net gain." The

Festival
Continued on Second Page

FESTIVAL

Cir. (D 26,991)

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
JAN 9 - 1954

BSO Plans Concerts Over Six Weekends

The 1954 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood will include Music Shed concerts by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra over a period of six weeks instead of the usual three weekends.

Announcement of the new plan, prompted by the record attendance of 118,000 people last summer, was made today following a meeting of the Tanglewood Advisory Committee at the Hotel Sheraton in this city yesterday.

12 Shed Concerts

George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, ex~~plained at yesterday~~'s luncheon meeting here that the new plan to extend the scope of the Festival at Tanglewood was devised by Charles Munch, the BSO conductor. Mr. Munch plans during the course of the 12 Shed concerts next summer to honor the sesquicentennial season of the birth of Hector Berlioz.

According to the Munch plan, the concerts by the full orchestra in the Shed will be given each Saturday evening and Sunday afternoons through the six weeks from July 5 to Aug. 15.

Friday Nights in Theater

Mr. Judd informed the Berkshire advisory group that the concerts by the orchestra of chamber proportions in the Theater-Concert Hall, devoted mostly to the music of Bach and Mozart, will now be given each Friday evening preceding the weekend Shed concerts. Heretofore the Bach-Mozart series, so-called, occupied the first three weeks of the Festival.

Together with the performance by the students of the Berkshire Music Center, this will result in six weeks of daily performances on an identical rotation through each week.

The Munch plan will thus provide 12 Berkshire Festival concerts in the Shed instead of nine as before, and six "Bach-Mozart" concerts in the theater as before, but now on a once-a-week basis.

In addition to the Berkshire Festival performances, a series of chamber music concerts at moderate prices will be given by different ensembles in the theater on the six Wednesday evenings, Mr. Judd announced.

Four Concerts a Week

The 1954 Festival therefore will consist of four concerts a week—Wednesday, Friday, Saturday, Sunday—for six weeks, or 24 concerts in all.

The various departments of the Berkshire Music Center will give further performances, continuing the custom of opera scenes on Tuesdays, orchestral concerts on Thursdays and chamber concerts on Sunday mornings.

Mr. Munch is "extremely enthusiastic" about the school, Mr. Judd declared, "and he is looking forward to directing the Music Center again this summer." The school will open for its 12th season in July.

Bernstein Abroad

Leonard Bernstein, head of the conducting department at Tanglewood and a guest conductor for many seasons, will not be at Tanglewood next summer, Mr. Judd announced. Mr. Bernstein is currently abroad and "by his own election" will not be on hand for the 1954 season.

However, Pierre Monteux will return to be guest conductor at two of the Festival concerts this summer. Another guest conductor and guest soloists will be announced soon.

A high light of the 1954 season will be the performances of choral works by Berlioz, including "The Damnation of Faust," "Romeo and Juliet," and the "Requiem," as well as the song cycle, "Summer Nights" and instrumental works.

Harvard, Radcliffe Chorus Coming

Because the Berkshire Music Center chorus will not be organized for the first performance of Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust," Mr. Judd announced the BSO has engaged the Harvard and Radcliffe chorus to appear at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphnoy to sing the choral work next summer. He expressed the hope that many Berkshire friends of the Harvard and Radcliffe Glee Club members would open their homes to the chorus while they are in the county for the performance.

Prior to coming to Tanglewood the Harvard and Radcliffe chorus will be on an extended tour throughout the country, winding up their trip at the Berkshire Festival.

Mr. Judd informed the Tanglewood Advisory Committee that the BSO couldn't possibly do three choral works in a three week program. With the enlarged season next summer he expressed the feeling that the [illegible] feature of the Berlioz portion of the Festival will be popular with music lovers.

Beethoven Festival in '55

In 1955, he revealed, Mr. Munch is considering a Beethoven festival, but definite plans will not be announced until the close of the 1954 summer season.

In addition to the 24 concerts planned during the summer Festival, Tanglewood on Parade will be [illegible] in the final week [illegible] the Berkshire Music [illegible].

Up until now, the Berkshire Festivals have been planned with two patterns — one, the Bach-Mozart series or small concerts; two, the major performances or big concerts in the Music Shed. Now the season has been planned to follow one pattern, with the programming extended over a full six week season.

Cir. (D 20,402) (S 41,868)

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN
[illegible] 1954

FESTIVAL TO BE EXTENDED

Lenox, Mass., Jan. 9 —(AP)— Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced today the scope of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood will be extended next summer from four to six weeks. Concerts will be given from July 5 to Aug. 15.

Cir. (D 91,577)

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. NEWS
JAN 9 - 1954

MORE CONCERTS ON THE AGENDA AT TANGLEWOOD

Record Attendance Last Year Prompts Devising of New '54 Program

Boston, Jan. 9—A new plan has been devised by Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to extend the scope of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox next summer. The plan has been prompted by the record attendance in 1953—118,000—and the obvious desire of many thousands to hear the full orchestra in the first three weeks of the festival as well as the last three.

According to this plan, the concerts by the full orchestra in the Music Shed will be given each Saturday evening and each Sunday afternoon through the six weeks from July 5 to Aug. 15. The concerts by the orchestra of chamber proportions in the Theater-Concert Hall, devoted mostly to the music of Bach and Mozart, which formerly occupied the first three weeks of the festival, will now be given each Friday evening preceding the week-end Shed concerts. Together with the performances by the students of the Berkshire Music Center, this will result in six weeks of daily performances on an identical rotation through each week.

More Concerts

The Munch plan will thus provide 12 Festival concerts in the

CHARLES MUNCH

Shed instead of nine as before, and six "Bach-Mozart" concerts in the Theater as before, but now on a once a week basis.

In the course of the 12 Shed concerts Mr. Munch will honor the sesquicentennial season of the birth of Hector Berlioz. There will be performances of choral works, including "The Damnation of Faust," "Romeo and Juliet," and the "Requiem," as well as the song cycle, "Summer Nights" and instrumental works.

In addition to the Berkshire Festival performances, a series of chamber music concerts at moderate prices will be given by different ensembles in the Theater on the six Wednesday evenings.

The 1954 Berkshire Festival will therefore consist of four concerts a week (Wednesday, Friday, Saturday, Sunday) for six weeks, or 24 concerts in all. The various departments of the Berkshire Music Center, which, directed by Charles Munch, will have its 12th session, will give further performances, continuing the custom of opera scenes on Tuesdays, orchestral concerts on Thursdays, and chamber concerts on Sunday mornings.

The plan of subscription sale for the Boston Symphony concerts will now be divided by pairs of Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon concerts, and subscribers who retain their present locations will have the privilege of seats at a reduced rate for the "Bach-Mozart" concerts on each previous Friday and for the chamber series each Wednesday.

Esplanade Series

Throughout the six weeks of the Berkshire Festival, the Esplanade concerts will continue to be given on the Charles River Embankment in Boston under the direction of Arthur Fiedler. Previously given through the first three weeks of the Festival period, these free outdoor concerts will be given in the first part of each of six weeks, making a total number of 23 instead of 21 as before. They will consequently become available to Boston visitors during the greater part of the [illegible].

Full program plans will be available shortly on application to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be addressed at Symphony Hall, Boston, 15.

Each of the six weeks will therefore provide music on the following basic scheme:

Tuesday evening (Theater)—Opera Scenes*
Wednesday evening [illegible]—Chamber Music
Thursday evening [illegible]—Student Orchestra Concert*
Friday evening [illegible]—Bach-Mozart Concert
Saturday evening [illegible]—Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert [illegible]
Sunday morning [illegible] Hall)—Student Chamber Concert
Sunday afternoon (Shed)—Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert

*Open by invitation to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

Cir. (D 46,023) (S 174,898)

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 10 1954

LONGER MUSIC FESTIVAL

Lenox, Mass. —(AP)— Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced yesterday the scope of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood will be extended next summer from four to six weeks. Concerts will be given from July 5 to Aug. 15.

Cir. (D 287,116)

This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
JAN 9 - 1954

Stravinsky

By THEODOLINDA C. BORIS

Berkshire Music Festival Doubles Week-end Concerts

PROMPTED BY THE RECORD attendance of 118,000 at the 1953 Berkshire Festival, Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which gives the festival concerts, has extended the festival for 1954 so that there will be six weeks of concerts by the full orchestra in the Music Shed instead of three, as before.

According to Mr. Munch's plan, the concerts will be given each Saturday evening and each Sunday afternoon from July 5 to Aug. 15. The concerts by the chamber orchestra in the Theater Concert Hall, devoted principally to the music of Bach and Mozart, formerly heard during the first three weeks of the festival, will now be given each Friday evening preceding the six week-end concerts.

Together with the performances by the students of the Berkshire Music Center, this will result in six weeks of daily performances.

In addition, there will be a series of chamber-music concerts in the theater on the six Wednesday evenings. The various departments of the music center will continue to give opera scenes on Tuesdays, orchestral concerts on Thursdays and chamber concerts on Sunday mornings.

Cir. (D 13,153)

This Clipping From
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
JAN 9 - 1954

Tanglewood Extends Concert Scope to 12 on Six Week-Ends

Through a new program pattern, the Berkshire Music Festival will offer more concerts this summer in the music shed at Tanglewood by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Six Week-Ends

Last season's record-breaking attendance of 118,000 prompted a decision by Charles Munch, conductor, to extend the scope of the Festival to include concerts by the full orchestra each Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon for the six weeks from July 5 to Aug. 15, instead of three concerts a week-end for three weeks, as have been given previously. This means there will be 12 instead of the former nine major festival concerts.

In addition, six Bach-Mozart concerts will be given, one each Friday night during the season, by the orchestra of chamber proportions.

Conference Sees Boom

Berkshire Hills Conference Director John F. Downing hailed the expanded season as a program that should be welcomed not only by music lovers, but also by this area's tourist businesses.

In past years, Mr. Downing said the hotels, inns, resorts and tourist homes have enjoyed booming business on the three major Tanglewood week-ends, but have had comparatively lean picking during the rest of the Festival.

Expanding the concert program this year so there will be major events each of six week-ends will do much to improve the overall summer tourist trade, said Mr. Downing.

Downing and other Conference officials have been trying to get the expanded schedule approved for some time.

Student Concerts

Besides the Festival performances, a series of chamber music concerts at moderate prices will be given by different ensembles in the theater at Tanglewood on the six Wednesday evenings of the season.

Students of the Berkshire Music Center will give a program of opera scenes each Tuesday night, chamber music concerts Sunday mornings and orchestra concerts on Thursday evenings.

During the six weeks of the Festival, Boston Symphony members will continue to give its Esplanade concerts on the Charles river embankment in Boston, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler. Previously given during the first three weeks of the Festival, when the full orchestra was not at Tanglewood, these outdoor concerts this year will be given during the first part of each week, with a total of 23 concerts instead of 21 as before.

In the course of the 12 main concerts in the music shed, Mr. Munch will honor the sesquicentennial season of the birth of Hector Berlioz. There will be performances of his choral works, including "The Damnation of Faust," "Romeo and Juliet," and the "Requiem," as well as the song cycle, "Summer Nights," and instrumental works.

BLANK PAGE

75

This Clipping From
ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST-DISPATCH 2
JAN 18 1954

POST-DISPATCH

Boston Symphony Facing Need For Annual Campaign for Funds

Orchestra Considers Ways to Meet New Problem—Corporate Sponsorship Successful in Pittsburgh.

Rising costs of operation together with the virtual disappearance of large individual gifts have produced a continuing crisis for American symphony orchestras. The St. Louis Symphony Society is now engaged in its annual maintenance fund drive and in order to furnish a comparison between the St. Louis situation and that of other cities the music editor of the Post-Dispatch recently visited Detroit, Boston, Pittsburgh and Cincinnati. This is the second in a series of reports.

By THOMAS B. SHERMAN

BOSTON, Jan. 18—Recent reports from Boston which said that the venerable Boston Symphony Orchestra was in trouble were disturbing news indeed to men and women in other cities who were struggling to keep their own orchestras intact.

Trouble, in this connection, could only mean money trouble since any other could be easily managed. If the Boston Symphony, with its enduring tradition and high prestige, was not being adequately supported, then the climate for music everywhere was changing, and for the worse.

The basis of the reports was a series of advertisements which stated, in effect, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra needed $250,000 to finish its season. On closer examination, the situation was much less alarming than it seemed at a distance even though the facts were as stated.

The orchestra did need $250,000 and would need such a sum every year from now on. Rising costs of operation on the one hand and on the other, an exhaustion of endowment funds, never very large, and a decline in revenue from recordings were the main causes. So the management decided to serve notice on the public that the citizens and business interests of Boston would be asked for larger sums than had ever before been solicited.

No Alarm Among Officials.

Even so, there was—and is—no evidence of alarm among the officials, trustees and close friends of the orchestra. As of a week ago, about half of the needed $250,000 had been pledged, and Michael Kelleher, a prominent insurance executive and a trustee of the orchestra who has been directing the drive for funds, was confident that the goal would be reached. A systematic scheme for enlisting corporate support has not yet been worked out, but the trustees are thinking along that line. The Detroit example in working out this method has had its effect here as elsewhere.

The high morale shown by the supporters of the orchestra is justified by all the particulars of the situation. The orchestra has consistently maintained the best artistic standards, in the quality of its personnel and in performance ever since it was founded in 1881 by Major Henry Lee Higginson. Its conductor, Charles Munch lacks the glamor of his predecessor, Serge Koussevitzky, but he is still a first rank conductor. The orchestra can command the best talent in the world because its minimum pay is high and its season is the longest in the country and it guarantees 45 weeks of employment to every player. Its concerts reach more people in its metropolitan area than those of any other.

Concert Schedule.

In all, it plays 109 winter concerts, including the series in the Sanders Theater of Harvard University, 60 "pops" where refreshments are served, 21 Esplanade concerts—a summer season on the Charles river where admission is free and the audiences reach many thousands—15 concerts at the Berkshire Festival, and 30 concerts on tour. In addition, a touring Boston "pops" orchestra, with a separate personnel, plays concerts throughout the country under Arthur Fiedler.

All the winter concerts at Symphony Hall, with a capacity of 2600 seats, are sold out or nearly so. The orchestra has 10,000 season subscribers, the largest in the country and it could undoubtedly sell more, but in recognition of the fact that many students and other patrons cannot afford to commit themselves to regular attendance 500 "rush" seats are withheld for box office sale at the Friday afternoon series.

The demands for the "rush" seats are usually so great that a line begins to form as early as 10:30 o'clock in the morning for a performance that begins at 2:15 p.m. When the box office opens at 1:30 p.m., each of these avid patrons buys a ticket, goes into the hall and stakes his claim on seat by leaving his hat or overcoat and then hurries to the lunch room in the hall for a sandwich. If he leaves the premises, he forfeits his seat.

All this means that anyone who would avail himself of a "rush" seat must spend the best part of a day in Symphony Hall, but the line still forms and in most Fridays there are more takers than seats.

Wide Base of Support.

The orchestra also broadcasts its weekend pair of concerts over a FM radio station. So all in all the Boston Orchestra comes as close as possible to saturating the community. No more, in fact, could be undertaken without risk of impairing the artistic quality of the concerts. As a result of these extensive services, the orchestra has a wider base of actual and potential support and of effective good will than any other can claim.

Its present problem is a problem largely because it is a new one and the technique for solving it has not yet been clearly formulated. Major Higginson supported the orchestra out of his own pocket during his lifetime and Ernest Dane did the same while he was alive. Between 1940 and 1950, the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra raised the small amount needed to clear the deficit without resorting to a widely publicized drive. Now the orchestra is faced with the necessity of staging an annual drive.

The estimated $250,000 that will be required annually is still little more than 15 per cent of its annual budget of $1,600,000. The remainder is earned income from all sources. In respect to its financial position, then its position is still so strong than any possibility of a curtailed program is remote.

Pittsburgh Situation.

In Pittsburgh, the directors and supporters of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra reacted strongly and effectively to the Corporate Sponsorship Plan, initiated in Detroit. During the present season, as in 1952-53, the orchestra is playing 20 pairs (Friday evenings and Sunday afternoons) to a total audience of about 4000 to the pair in the Syria Mosque. Of this number, 2600 are season subscribers and the remainder are single seat buyers. The number of subscribers has fallen off, but the increase in single seats since William Steinberg became conductor in the 1952-53 season, has resulted in a small net gain in the sizes of audiences.

In addition, the orchestra plays four young people's concerts in Pittsburgh and 10 concerts for workers in the steel towns nearby, such as North Braddock, McKeesport and Johnstown. The steeltown concerts are sponsored by local committees which have strong union representatives.

Thus far the percentage of steel workers in the audiences has amounted to about 20 per cent of the total. The response of those who did attend has encouraged the management into believing their numbers will increase. In any case the "workers concerts" are one of the means whereby the orchestra hopes to reach a wider circle of listeners; and they represent an activity which gives a strengthened claim to corporate support.

Amount of Support.

The amount of this support was $170,000 for the season of 1952-53. That sum together with $30,000 from individual contributions and $61,000 from recording and broadcasting revenue—Steinberg's records have been very lucrative—more than offset the deficit of $317,000. For the current season subscriptions from corporations have reached about $150,000 in pledges that extend from $10,000 to $250 and less; and this is not the final figure for the year.

What success the Corporate Sponsorship Plan has enjoyed in Pittsburgh may be attributed primarily to the fact that the "big names" of the city were associated with the appeal to the corporations. Ernest Weir of National Steel undertook to carry the word to his fellow industrialists. John B. Ford Jr. of Detroit came to Pittsburgh and addressed a small meeting of corporation heads. Weir suggested that the Detroit plan was worthy of emulation and he was supported by such figures as Benjamin Fairless of United States Steel, Gwilym Price of Westinghouse and John Heinz Jr. of Heinz Products.

Industrial Leaders Interest.

That many of these industrial leaders have only a negligible interest of music is possible, but many of them do attend the concerts and Charles Denby Jr., president of the Pittsburgh Symphony Society, cites evidence of a growth of interest on their part.

Certainly they are convinced that the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra performs a civic service of prime importance. As already pointed out, they have a direct interest in the workers concerts. As a matter of long-range policy, they want the workers in their plants to have the same time they want to avoid any appearance of paternalism.

Hence it is the Pittsburgh Symphony Society that brings concerts to the steel towns on the assumption that if live symphonic music accessible to groups that have never known it, they will sooner or later attend the concerts in increasing numbers.

Denby is not yet convinced that corporate sponsorship will become a permanent feature of symphony financing in Pittsburgh. He is hopeful, however, and thinks it possible that corporate heads will find more reasons for supporting the orchestra as they become more closely identified with its operation.

76

FESTIVAL

Cir. (D 11,500)

This Clipping From
TAUNTON, [illegible]
GAZETTE

JAN 9 1954

Symphony Orchestra Boss Slates Festival Extension

(Special to The Gazette)

BOSTON—A new plan has been devised by Charles Munch, the Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to extend the scope of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox next summer, it was disclosed today.

The plan has been prompted by the record attendance in 1953—118,000, and the obvious desire of many thousands to hear the full orchestra in the first three weeks of the festival as well as the last three.

According to this plan, the concerts by the full orchestra in the Music Shed will be given each Saturday evening and each Sunday afternoon through the six weeks from July 5 to August 15. The concerts by the orchestra of chamber proportions in the Theater-Concert Hall, devoted mostly to the music of Bach and Mozart, which formerly occupied the first three weeks of the festival, will now be given each Friday evening preceding the weekend Shed concerts. Together with the performances by the students of the Berkshire Music Center, this will result in six weeks of daily performances on an identical rotation through each week.

The Munch plan will thus provide twelve festival concerts in the Shed instead of nine as before, and six "Bach-Mozart" concerts in the Theater as before, but now on a once a week basis.

In the course of the twelve Shed concerts Munch will honor the Sesquicentennial season of the birth of Hector Berlioz. There will be performances of choral works, including "The Damnation of Faust", "Romeo and Juliet", and the "Requiem", as well as the song cycle, "Summer Nights" and instrumental works.

In addition to the Berkshire Festival performances, a series of chamber music concerts at moderate prices will be given by different ensembles in the theater on the six Wednesday evenings.

The 1954 Berkshire Festival will therefore consist of four concerts a week (Wednesday, Friday, Saturday, Sunday) for six weeks, or twenty-four concerts in all. The various departments of the Berkshire Music Center, which, directed by Charles Munch, will have its twelfth session, will give further performances, continuing the custom of opera scenes on Tuesdays, orchestral concerts on Thursdays, and chamber concerts on Sunday mornings.

The plan of subscription sale for the Boston Symphony concerts will now be divided by pairs of Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon concerts, and subscribers who retain their present locations will have the privilege of seats at a reduced rate for the "Bach-Mozart" concerts on each previous Friday and for the chamber series each Wednesday.

Throughout the six weeks of the Berkshire Festival, the Esplanade concerts will continue to be given on the Charles River Embankment in Boston under the direction of Arthur Fiedler. Previously given through the first three weeks of the Festival period, these free outdoor concerts will be given in the first part of each of six weeks, making a total number of twenty-three instead of twenty-one as before. They will consequently become available to Boston visitors during the greater part of the summer.

Full program plans will be available shortly on application to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be addressed at Symphony Hall, Boston 15.

Cir. (D 46,023) (S 174,898)

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 10 1954

To Honor Berlioz at Tanglewood

In observance of the sesquicentennial season of the birth of Hector Berlioz, several of the great works by that composer will be conducted by Charles Munch at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., next summer. The festival will run from the first week of July through Aug. 15 and the orchestra promises that full program plans will be available shortly.

Among the Berlioz compositions to be performed are "The Damnation of Faust," in which the choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe will take part; "Harold in Italy," with William Primrose as viola soloist, and the song cycle, "Summer Nights."

The Festival Chorus of the Berkshire Music Center will join the orchestra in Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" in its complete form and in the famous "Requiem," which will conclude the festival.

Cir. (D 186,970) (S 150,268)

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE

JAN 10 1954

Sesquicentennial Of Berlioz Birth To Be Observed

NEW YORK, Jan. 9 (HTNS) Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced that the sesquicentennial of the birth Dec. 11, 1803, of Hector Berlioz, the composer, will be observed at the Berkshire Festival next summer at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., with performances of a number of his larger works.

The choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe will perform the Damnation Scene from "Faust." William Primrose, violist, will be soloist in a performance of "Harold in Italy." Other works to be performed will include the "Fantastic Symphony," the song cycle, "Summer Nights," the complete "Romeo and Juliet," and the "Requiem." The festival will be held during July and August.

This Clipping From
BOSTON MASS.
GLOBE

JAN 10 1954

Berkshire, Esplanade Ch

New Schedule of Concerts Announced for This Summer's Berkshire Festival

A new plan has been devised by Charles Munch, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to extend the scope of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., next summer. The plan has been prompted by the record attendance in 1953—118,000, and the obvious desire of many thousands to hear the full orchestra in the first three weeks of the festival as well as the last three.

According to this plan, the concerts by the full orchestra in the Music Shed will be given each Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon through the six weeks from July 5 to Aug. 15. The concerts by the orchestra of chamber proportions in the Theatre-Concert Hall, devoted mostly to the music of Bach and Mozart, which formerly occupied the first three weeks of the festival, will now be given each Friday evening preceding the week-end Shed concerts. Together with the performances by the students of the Berkshire Music Center, this will result in six weeks of daily performances on an identical rotation through each week.

Berlioz Anniversary

The Munch plan will thus provide 12 Festival concerts in the Shed instead of nine as before, and six "Bach-Mozart" concerts in the Theatre as before, but now on a once a week basis.

In the course of the 12 Shed concerts Mr. Munch will honor the Sesquicentennial season of the birth of Hector Berlioz. There will be performances of choral works, including "The Damnation of Faust," "Romeo and Juliet," and the "Requiem," as well as the song cycle, "Summer Nights" and instrumental works.

In addition to the Berkshire Festival performances, a series of chamber music concerts at moderate prices will be given by different ensembles in the Theatre on the six Wednesday evenings.

The 1954 Berkshire Festival will therefore consist of four concerts a week (Wednesday, Friday, Saturday, Sunday) for six weeks, or 24 concerts in all. The various departments of the Berkshire Music Center, which, directed by Charles Munch, will have its 12th session, will give further performances, continuing the custom of opera scenes on Tuesdays, orchestral concerts on Thursdays, and chamber concerts on Sunday mornings.

Subscription Sale

The plan of subscription sale for the Boston Symphony concerts will now be divided by pairs of Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon concerts, and subscribers who retain their present locations will have the privilege of seats at a reduced rate for the "Bach-Mozart" concerts on each previous Friday and for the chamber series each Wednesday.

Throughout the six weeks of the Berkshire Festival, the Esplanade concerts will continue to be given on the Charles River Embankment in Boston under the direction of Arthur Fiedler. Previously given through the first three weeks of the Festival period, these free outdoor concerts will be given in the first part of each of six weeks, making a total number of 23 instead of 21 as before. They will consequently become available to Boston visitors during the greater part of the Summer.

Full program plans will be available shortly on application to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be addressed at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

Each of the six weeks will [illegible] provide music on the following basic scheme: Tuesday evening (theatre), Opera Scenes; Wednesday evening (theatre), Chamber Music; Thursday evening ([illegible]), Student Orchestra Concert; Friday evening (theatre), Bach-Mozart Concert; Saturday evening (shed), Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert; Sunday morning (Chamber Hall), Student Chamber Concert; Sunday afternoon (shed), Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Cir. (S 223,266)

This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-AMERICAN

JAN 10 1954

6 Weeks of Shed Concerts In Tanglewood Festival; Note Civic M. M. Events

This date in music: [illegible], Dvorak, in Iowa during an American visit, begins work on his "New World Symphony," performed the following December by the New York Philharmonic in New York City, Anton Seidl conducting. The composer was in the audience.

By E. V. W.

Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has devised a plan to extend the scope of the Berkshire Festival in Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., during the 1954 season. From July 5 to Aug. 15 concerts by the full orchestra will be presented in The Shed each Saturday night and Sunday afternoon six weeks instead of the customary three weeks.

THE PLAN was prompted by the record attendance at concerts last year, some 118,000, and the obvious desire of many thousands to hear the full orchestra in the first three weeks of the Festival, as well as the last three. Weekly concerts by the orchestra of chamber proportions will take place in the Theater-Concert Hall, devoted mostly to Bach and Mozart. In the course of the twelve concerts in The Shed, there will be performances of choral works including "The Damnation of Faust," "Romeo and Juliet" and the "Requiem" by Hector Berlioz, the great French composer.

* * *

Cir. (D 433,624) (S 455,132)

This Clipping From
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

JAN 10 1954

Festival To Honor Berlioz

BOSTON—The sesquicentennial season of Hector Berlioz will be observed by Charles Munch at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., next summer, extending from the first week in July to August 15.

"The Damnation of Faust" will be performed with the Choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe, "Harold in Italy" with William Primrose as viola soloist, the "Fantastic Symphony," and the song cycle, "Summer Nights."

The Festival Chorus of the Berkshire Music Center will appear with the Orchestra in "Romeo and Juliet" in its complete form and in the famous "Requiem," which will conclude the Festival.

* * *

SINCE THE birth of Hector Berlioz December 11, 1803, his artistic stature has risen increasingly in general estimation, notably in recent years.

Full program plans will be available shortly on application to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be addressed at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts.

Cir. (D 299,461) (S 516,478)

This Clipping From
CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAIN DEALER

JAN 10 1954

The sesquicentennial season of Hector Berlioz, born 150 years ago, will be observed at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., next summer with a performance of a number of the great works of this great romantic composer, including Symphonie Fantastique, "The Damnation of Faust," "Harold in Italy" with William Primrose as viola soloist, and of course, "Requiem," which will end the festival. Barbara C. Perelman, [illegible] Road, Cleveland Heights, will play the oboe with 120 students of the University of Michigan symphony band this season.

* * *

Cir. (D 74,995) (S 59,910)

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

JAN 10 1954

FESTIVAL EXTENDED

LENOX, Mass., Jan. 9—(AP) Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, announced today the scope of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood will be extended next summer from four to six weeks. Concerts will be given from July 5 to Aug. 15.

FESTIVAL

11

NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

Cir. (D 81,951) (S 101,368)

This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD
JAN 10 1954

Berkshire Festival Scope Widened

A new plan has been devised by Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to extend the scope of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., next summer.

Concerts by the full orchestra in the music shed will be given each Saturday evening and each Sunday afternoon through the six weeks from July 5 to Aug. 15.

UNDAY, JANUARY 10, 1954

Memorials: Two Artists

YLE BURROWS

ylor Arms and rgast were egrity

Music: Tanglewood Change; Gluck Premiere on Friday

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

Charles Munch has prepared a new schedule for the 1954 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., from July 5 through Aug. 15. The complete Boston Symphony Orchestra will give twelve concerts, three more than in previous summers, in the Music Shed; these will be held on Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons throughout the six weeks. The small orchestra concerts, to be devoted mainly to Bach and Mozart, will be held on the six Friday evenings (July 9 through Aug. 13), in the Theater-Concert Hall. Formerly the full orchestra's concerts were grouped in the last three week ends of the festival, and the small orchestra concerts in the first three.

As already announced, the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of Berlioz's birth will be honored in the twelve Shed programs. There will also be chamber music concerts in the Theater-Concert Hall on the six Wednesday nights. Subscriptions will be sold for pairs of Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons; subscribers retaining their present locations will be entitled to reduced rates for the Wednesday and Friday concerts.

Berkshire Music Center students will provide opera scenes on Tuesday nights, orchestral concerts Thursday nights and chamber music on Sunday mornings. These will be open to contributing friends of the Center In all, the new schedule provides public activities every day, except Mondays. One can also expect one or more full-scale productions by the Center's opera department, presumably of unfamiliar works.

Gluck Premiere

Gluck's opera "Paride ed Elena" will ha

MRS. LEANDER MARX
2201 JEFFERSON AVENUE
NEW ORLEANS 15, LOUISIANA

THE TIMES-PICAYUNE NEW ORLEANS STATES, SUNDAY, JANUARY 10, 195

THE COLUMN

On the Square

By Ed Brooks

Practically in answer to Olin Downes' recent article in the New York Times wondering why there has been no Hector Berlioz festival in this sesquicentennial year of his birth comes the announcement that Charles Munch will observe the anniversary next summer at Tanglewood.

CHARLES MUNCH

Downes had singled out Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony, in his article, saying "when a conductor like Charles Munch brings these works (Berlioz's) to life, they are again puissant, even overwhelming."

So Munch will honor the sesquicentennial season of the birth of Berlioz at the Berkshire Festival in Lenox, Mass., with a performance of a number of the great works of this composer. Included will be "Damnation of Faust," "Harold in Italy," "Symphonie Fantastique," "Romeo and Juliet," "Requiem" and the song cycle "Summer Nights." What a program!

Congratulations
&
Regards
Florence
&
Leander
Marx

Cir. (D 58,486) (S 120,102)

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION
JAN 10 1954

Music:

Scope of Festival Extended

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

A new plan has been devised by Charles Munch, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to extend the scope of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., next Summer. The plan has been prompted by the record attendance in 1953 — 118,000, and the obvious desire of many thousands to hear the full orchestra in the first three weeks of the Festival as well as the last three.

According to this plan, the concerts by the full orchestra in the Music Shed will be given each Saturday evening and each Sunday afternoon through the six weeks from July 5 to Aug. 15. The concerts by the orchestra of chamber proportions in the Theatre-Concert Hall, devoted mostly to the music of Bach and Mozart, which formerly occupied the first three weeks of the Festival, will now be given each Friday evening, preceding the weekend Shed concerts.

The Munch plan will thus provide twelve Festival concerts in the Shed instead of nine as before, and six "Bach-Mozart" concerts in the Theatre as before, but now on a once a week basis.

The 1954 Berkshire Festival will therefore consist of four concerts a week (Wednesday, Friday, Saturday, Sunday) for six weeks, or twenty-four concerts in all. The various departments of the Berkshire Music Center which, directed by Charles Munch, will have its twelfth session, will give further performances, continuing the custom of opera scenes on Tuesday, orchestral concerts on Thursdays, and chamber concerts on Sunday mornings.

Cir. (D 175,944)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN
JAN 11 1954

More Berkshire Concerts

Prompted by the record '53 attendance of 118,000, Charles Munch, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, has devised a new plan to extend the scope of the Berkshire Festival at aTnglewood in Lenox next summer.

He proposes to give concerts by the full orchestra in the Music Shed each Saturday evening and each Sunday afternoon through the six weeks from July 5 to Aug. 15. The concerts by the orchestra of chamber proportions in the Theater-Concert Hall, devoted mostly to the music of Bach and Mozart, which formerly occupied the first three weeks of the Festival, will now be given each Friday evening preceding the weekend Shed concerts. Together with the performances by the students of the Berkshire Music Center, this will result in six weeks of daily performances on an identical rotation through each week.

The Munch plan will thus provide 12 Festival concerts in the Shed instead of nine as before, and six Bach-Mozart concerts in the theater as before, but now on a once-a-week basis.

In the course of the 12 Shed concerts, Mr. Munch will honor the Sesquicentennial season of the birth of Hector Berlioz. There will be performances of choral works, including "The Damnation of Faust," "Romeo and Juliet" and the "Requiem," as well as the song cycle, "Summer Nights," and instrumental works.

Cir. (D 131,670) (S 258,529)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
JAN 10 1954

1954 Berkshire Festival To Double Orchestra Concerts

A new plan has been devised by Charles Munch, the Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to extend the scope of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Massachusetts, next summer. The plan has been prompted by the record attendance in 1953 —118,000, and the obvious desire of many thousands to hear the full Orchestra in the first three weeks of the Festival as well as the last three.

According to this plan, the concerts by the full Orchestra in the Music Shed will be given each Saturday evening and each Sunday afternoon through the six weeks from July 5 to August 15. The concerts by the orchestra of chamber proportions in the Theatre-Concert Hall, devoted mostly to the music of Bach and Mozart, which formerly occupied the first three weeks of the Festival, will now be given each Friday evening preceding the weekend Shed concerts. Together wtih the performances by the students of the Berkshire Music Center, this will result in six weeks of daily performances on an identical rotation through each week.

The Munch plan will thus provide twelve Festival concerts in the Shed instead of nine as before, and six "Bach-Mozart" concerts in the Theatre as before, but now on a once a week basis.

In the course of the twelve Shed concerts Mr. Munch will honor the Sesquicentennial season of the birth of Hector Berlioz. There will be performances of choral works, including "The Damnation of Faust," "Romeo and Juliet," and the "Requiem," as well as the song cycle, "Summer Nights" and instrumental works.

In addition to the Berkshire Festival performances, a series of chamber music concerts at moderate prices will be given by different [illegible] in the Theatre on [illegible] evenings.

The [illegible] Festival will therefore consist of four concerts a week (Wednesday, Friday, Saturday, Sunday) for six weeks, or twenty-four concerts in all. The various departments of the Berkshire Music Center, which, directed by Charles Munch, will have its twelfth session, will give further performances, continuing the custom of opera scenes on Tuesdays, orchestral concerts on Thursdays and Chamber concerts on Sunday mornings.

The plan of subscription sale for the Boston Symphony concerts will now be divided by pairs of Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon concerts, and subscribers who retain their present locations will have the privilege of seats at a reduced rate for the "Bach-Mozart" concerts on each previous Friday and for the chamber series each Wednesday.

Full program plans will be available shortly on application to the Boston Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts.

FESTIVAL

Cir. (D 81,951) (S 101,368)

This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD
JAN 10 1954

Berkshire Festival Scope Widened

A new plan has been devised by Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to extend the scope of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., next summer.

Concerts by the full orchestra in the music shed will be given each Saturday evening and each Sunday afternoon through the six weeks from July 5 to Aug. 15.

NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

UNDAY, JANUARY 10, 1954

Memorials: Two Artists

YLE BURROWS

ler Arms and st were tegrity

Music: Tanglewood Change; Gluck Premiere on Friday

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

Charles Munch has prepared a new schedule for the 1954 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., from July 5 through Aug. 15. The complete Boston Symphony Orchestra will give twelve concerts, three more than in previous summers, in the Music Shed; these will be held on Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons throughout the six weeks. The small orchestra concerts, to be devoted mainly to Bach and Mozart, will be held on the six Friday evenings (July 9 through Aug. 13), in the Theater-Concert Hall. Formerly the full orchestra's concerts were grouped in the last three week ends of the festival, and the small orchestra concerts in the first three.

As already announced, the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of Berlioz's birth will be honored in the twelve Shed programs. There will also be chamber music concerts in the Theater-Concert Hall on the six Wednesday nights. Subscriptions will be sold for pairs of Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons; subscribers retaining their present locations will be entitled to reduced rates for the Wednesday and Friday concerts.

Berkshire Music Center students will provide opera scenes on Tuesday nights, orchestral concerts Thursday nights and chamber music on Sunday mornings. These will be open to contributing friends of the Center. In all, the new schedule provides public activities every day, except Mondays. One can also expect one or more full-scale productions by the Center's opera department, presumably of unfamiliar works.

Gluck Premiere

Gluck's opera "Paride ed

Elena" will ha

MRS. LEANDER MARX
2201 JEFFERSON AVENUE
NEW ORLEANS 15, LOUISIANA

THE TIMES-PICAYUNE NEW ORLEANS STATES, SUNDAY, JANUARY 10, 195

THE COLUMN

On the Square

By Ed Brooks

Practically in answer to Olin Downes' recent article in the New York Times wondering why there has been no Hector Berlioz festival in this sesquicentennial year of his birth comes the announcement that Charles Munch will observe the anniversary next summer at Tanglewood.

CHARLES MUNCH

Downes had singled out Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony, in his article, saying "when a conductor like Charles Munch brings these works (Berlioz's) to life, they are again puissant, even overwhelming."

So Munch will honor the sesquicentennial season of the birth of Berlioz at the Berkshire Festival in Lenox, Mass., with a performance of a number of the great [illegible] composer. Included [illegible] the "Damnation of Faust," "Harold in Italy," "Symphonie Fantastique," "Romeo and Juliet," "Requiem" and the song cycle "Summer Nights." What a program!

Congratulations
&
Regards
Florence
&
Leander
Marx

Cir. (D 58,486) (S 120,102)

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION
JAN 10 1954

Music:

Scope of Festival Extended

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

A new plan has been devised by Charles Munch, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to extend the scope of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., next Summer. The plan has been prompted by the record attendance in 1953 — 118,000, and the obvious desire of many thousands to hear the full orchestra in the first three weeks of the Festival as well as the last three.

According to this plan, the concerts by the full orchestra in the Music Shed will be given each Saturday evening and each Sunday afternoon through the six weeks from July 5 to Aug. 15. The concerts by the orchestra of chamber propostions in the Theatre-Concert Hall, devoted mostly to the music of Bach and Mozart, which formerly occupied the first three weeks of the Festival, will now be given each Friday evening preceding the weekend Shed concerts.

The Munch plan will thus provide twelve Festival concerts in the Shed instead of nine as before, and six "Bach-Mozart" concerts in the Theatre as before, but now on a once a week basis.

The 1954 Berkshire Festival will therefore consist of four concerts a week (Wednesday, Friday, Saturday, Sunday) for six weeks, or twenty-four concerts in all. The various departments of the Berkshire Music Center, which, directed by Charles Munch, will have its twelfth session, will give further performances, continuing the custom of opera scenes on Tuesday, orchestral concerts on Thursdays, and chamber concerts on Sunday mornings.

Cir. (D 175,944)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN
JAN 11 1954

More Berkshire Concerts

Prompted by the record '53 attendance of 118,000, Charles Munch, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, has devised a new plan to extend the scope of the Berkshire Festival at aTnglewood in Lenox next summer.

He proposes to give concerts by the full orchestra in the Music Shed each Saturday evening and each Sunday afternoon through the six weeks from July 5 to Aug. 15. The concerts by the orchestra of chamber proportions in the Theater-Concert Hall, devoted mostly to the music of Bach and Mozart, which formerly occupied the first three weeks of the Festival, will now be given each Friday evening preceding the weekend concerts. Together with performances by the students of the Berkshire Music Center, this will result in six weeks of daily performances on an identical rotation through each week.

The Munch plan will thus provide 12 Festival concerts in the Shed instead of nine as before, and six Bach-Mozart concerts in the theater as before, but now on a once-a-week basis.

In the course of the 12 Shed concerts, Mr. Munch will honor the Sesquicentennial season of the birth of Hector Berlioz. There will be performances of choral works, including "The Damnation of [illegible] "Romeo and Juliet" and the "Requiem," as well as the song cycle, "Summer Nights," and instrumental works.

Cir. (D 131,670) (S 258,529)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
JAN 10 1954

1954 Berkshire Festival To Double Orchestra Concerts

A new plan has been devised by Charles Munch, the Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to extend the scope of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Massachusetts, next summer. The plan has been prompted by the record attendance in 1953 —118,000, and the obvious desire of many thousands to hear the full Orchestra in the first three weeks of the Festival as well as the last three.

According to this plan, the concerts by the full Orchestra in the Music Shed will be given each Saturday evening and each Sunday afternoon through the six weeks from July 5 to August 15. The concerts by the orchestra of chamber proportions in the Theatre-Concert Hall, devoted mostly to the music of Bach and Mozart, which formerly occupied the first three weeks of the Festival, will now be given each Friday evening preceding the weekend Shed concerts. Together wtih the performances by the students of the Berkshire Music Center, this will result in six weeks of daily performances on an identical rotation through each week.

The Munch plan will thus provide twelve Festival concerts in the Shed instead of nine as before, and six "Bach-Mozart" concerts in the Theatre as before, but now on a once a week basis.

In the course of the twelve Shed concerts Mr. Munch will honor the Sesquicentennial season of the birth of Hector Berlioz. There will be performances of choral works, including "The Damnation of Faust," "Romeo and Juliet," and the "Requiem," as well as the song cycle, "Summer Nights" and instrumental works.

In addition to the Berkshire Festival performances, a series of chamber music concerts at moderate prices will be given by different [illegible] in the Theatre on [illegible] evenings. [illegible] Festival will therefore [illegible] four concerts a week (Wednesday, Friday, Saturday, Sunday) for six weeks, or twenty-four concerts in all. The various departments of the Berkshire Music Center, which, directed by Charles Munch, will have its twelfth session, will give further performances, continuing the custom of opera scenes on Tuesdays, orchestral concerts on Thursdays and Chamber concerts on Sunday mornings.

The plan of subscription sale for the Boston Symphony concerts will now be divided by pairs of Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon concerts, and subscribers who retain their present locations will have the privilege of seats at a reduced rate for the "Bach-Mozart" concerts on each previous Friday and for the chamber series each Wednesday.

Full program plans will be available shortly on application to the Boston Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts.

78

FESTIVAL

Cir. (D 146,820) (S 298,053)

This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS
JAN 1

In the Realm of Music, by Kenneth Gill

Berkshire Festival Has Plans for Expanding Its Use of Symphony

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are up with a new plan for the expansion of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood next summer.

C. Munch

With 1953 bringing a record attendance of 118,000, notice has been taken of those in the majority wishing for the full orchestra in the first three weeks of the Festival, as well as the last three.

By this plan, concerts by the full orchestra in the Music Shed will be given each Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon through the six weeks from July 5 to Aug. 15. Chamber orchestra appearances in the Theater-Concert Hall on the music of Bach and Mozart will now be given each Friday evening preceding the Saturday concerts. Formerly, they occupied only the first three weeks of the Festival.

Adding in performances by the students of the Berkshire Center, this will allow six weeks of daily performances on a proper rotation through each week.

Twelve Festival concerts in the Shed replace a listing of nine as before, with the "Bach-Mozart" concerts in the Theater remaining at a total of six, but now on a weekly basis.

Berlioz Honored

Conductor Munch will honor the Sesquicentennial season of the birth of Hector Berlioz in the course of the 12 Shed concerts, with a performance of choral works including Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," "Romeo and Juliet," and the "Requiem."

He also programs the song cycle, "Summer Nights," and instrumental works.

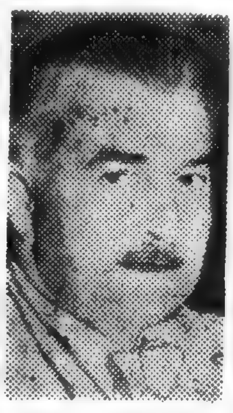
A series of chamber music concerts at moderate prices is planned for various ensembles in the Theater on the six Wednesday evenings. This all adds up to four concerts a week for six weeks or 24 concerts in all.

Berkshire Music Center will also draw on its various departments for further performances, continuing the opera scenes on Tuesdays, orchestral concerts on Thursdays, and chamber concerts on Sunday mornings.

Under the new plan, the subscription sale for the Boston Symphony concerts will be divided by pairs of Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon events, and subscribers who retain their present locations will be privileged by reduced rates for the "Bach-Mozart" concerts on each previous Friday and for the chamber series each Wednesday.

Boston Pops

Esplanade concerts on the Charles River Embankment in Boston will run throughout the six weeks of the Berkshire Festival under the direction of Arthur Fiedler.



Arthur Fiedler

Previously they have been open to the public free of charge in the first three weeks of the Festival period. Now they are to be presented in the first part of each of the six weeks, raising their total from 21 to 23.

Full program plans of the Boston Symphony will soon be released and may be obtained by writing directly to the orchestra at Symphony Hall in Boston.

Cir. (D 158,150) (S 222,354)

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
JAN 11 1954

Berkshire Festival Enlarged To Six Weeks of Concerts

BOSTON—A new plan has been devised by Charles Munch, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to extend the scope of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., next summer. The plan has been prompted by the record attendance in 1953—118,000, and the obvious desire of many thousands to hear the full orchestra in the first three weeks of the Festival as well as the last three.

According to this plan, the concerts by the full orchestra in the Music Shed will be given each Saturday evening and each Sunday afternoon through the six weeks from July 5 to Aug. 15. The concerts by the orchestra of chamber proportions in the Theater-Concert Hall, devoted mostly to the music of Bach and Mozart, which formerly occupied the first three weeks of the Festival, will now be given each Friday evening preceding the week-end Shed concerts. Together with the performance by the students of the Birkshire Music Center, this will result in six weeks of daily performances on an identical rotation through each week.

THE MUNCH PLAN will thus provide 12 Festival concerts in the Shed instead of nine as before, and six "Bach-Mozart" concerts in the theater as before, but now on a once a week basis.

In the course of the 12 Shed concerts, Mr. Munch will honor the Sesquicentennial season of the birth of Hector Berelioz. There will be performances of choral works, including "The Damnation of Faust," "Romeo and Juliet," and the "Requiem," as well as the song cycle, "Summer Nights," and instrumental works.

In addition to the Berkshire Festival performances, a series of chamber music concerts at moderate prices will be given by different ensembles in the theater on the six Wednesday evenings.

THE 1954 BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL will therefore consist of four concerts a week (Wednesday, Friday, Saturday, Sunday) for six weeks, or 24 concerts in all. The various departments of the Berkshire Music Center, which, directed by Charles Munch, will have its 12th session, will give further performances, continuing the custom of opera scenes on Tuesdays, orchestral concerts on Thursday, and chamber concerts on Sunday mornings.

The plan of subscription sale for the Boston Symphony concerts will now be divided by pairs of Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon concerts, and subscribers who retain their present locations will have the privilege of seats at a reduced rate for the "Bach-Mozart" concerts on each previous Friday and for the chamber series each Wedneesday.

Cir. (D 55,839)

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS
JAN 11 1954

Tanglewood Revises Slate

Under a plan devised for the 1954 Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood by Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the full orchestra will give concerts in each of the six weeks of the festival.

Heretofore, the full orchestra has performed only in the last three weeks of the festival program.

With the new season's schedule, 12 concerts will be given in the Shed instead of nine. The full orchestra will perform each Saturday night and Sunday afternoon of the festival period of July 5 to Aug. 15.

As before, six [illegible]-Mozart concerts will be [illegible] the chamber or[illegible] theater-concert [illegible]. However, [illegible] concerts, which formerly occupied the first three weekends of the festival, will be given weekly on Friday nights.

Cir. (D 175,149) (S 182,397)

This Clipping From DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
1954

Series Expanded

Special to The News

BOSTON, Mass.—Arthur Fiedler, founder-conductor, will expand the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season of Esplanade Concerts next summer. The series of free outdoor performances will run from July 5 to Aug. 10, rather than ending in July as before.

Cir. (D 548,362)

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS
JAN 11 1954

CONCERT PIANIST

Gina Bach Strives for

BY IRVING S

* * *

NOTES: The 150th anniversary of Hector Berlioz' birth will be cause for celebration at the Berkshire Festival this summer.

Charles Munch will conduct the Boston Symphony (and singers) in "The Damnation of Faust," the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony-drama, the giant "Requiem," "Harold in Italy," the "Fantastic Symphony" and the song-cycle "Summer Nights."

Munch has a new plan for the festival concerts, whereby the full orchestra will be heard every Saturday and Sunday from July 5 to Aug. 15. A series of Bach-Mozart concerts in the smaller theater will take place on Fridays during those six weeks.

Cir. (D 36,455)

This Clipping From
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR
JAN 11 1954

Tanglewood Festival Extended

LENOX, Mass., Jan. [illegible]—The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood near here will be extended next summer to include 12 concerts in the Music Shed over a six-week period from July 5 through Aug. 15.

These programs by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be presented Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons.

In addition the orchestra, reduced to chamber proportions for music of Bach and Mozart, will give Friday night concerts through the festival period in the Theater-Concert Hall. These concerts formerly occupied the first three weeks of the festival.

Commemorating the sesquicentennial of the birth of Hector Berlioz, Charles Munch, conductor, will include several of Berlioz' works on next season's Music Shed programs.

Also to be heard will be chamber music concerts by different ensembles on Wednesday nights during the festival season. In addition the various departments of the Berkshire Music Center will continue the custom of opera scenes Tuesday nights, student orchestra concerts Thursday nights and student chamber concerts Sunday mornings. The latter programs will be open by invitation to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

Cir. (D 57,751) (S 49,376)

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
JAN 10 1954

New Plan Set For Tanglewood

Music Festival Scope Will Be Expanded

Special to The Standard-Times

BOSTON, Jan. 9—A new plan has been devised by Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to extend the scope of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox next Summer.

The plan has been prompted by the record attendance in 1953—118,000—and the obvious desire of many thousands to hear the full orchestra in the first three weeks of the festival as well as the last three.

Under the new plan, the concerts in the Music Shed by the full orchestra will be given each Saturday night and each Sunday afternoon through the six weeks, from July 5 to Aug. 15.

Bach on Fridays

The concerts by the orchestra of chamber proportions in the Theater-Concert Hall, devoted mostly to the music of Bach and Mozart, which formerly occupied the first three weeks of the festival, will now be given each Friday night preceding the weekend Shed concerts. Together with the performances by the students of the Berkshire Music Center, this will result in six weeks of daily performances on an identical rotation through each week.

The Munch plan will thus provide 12 festival concerts in the Music Shed instead of nine as before, and six Bach-Mozart concerts in the theater as before, but now on a once-a-week basis.

In the course of the 12 Shed concerts Mr. Munch will honor the sesquicentennial season of the birth of Hector Berlioz. There will be performances of choral works, including "The Damnation of Faust," "Romeo and Juliet" and the "Requiem," as well as the song cycle, "Summer Nights," and instrumental works.

In addition to the Berkshire Festival performances, a series of chamber music concerts at moderate prices will be given by different ensembles in the theater on the six Wednesday nights.

Plan Announced

The various departments of the Berkshire Music Center directed by Mr. Munch, which will have its 12th session, will give further performances, continuing the custom of opera scenes on Tuesdays, orchestral concerts on Thursdays and chamber concerts on Sunday mornings.

The plan of subscription sale for the Boston Symphony concerts will now be divided by pairs of Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon concerts, and subscribers who retain their present locations will have privilege of seats at a reduced rate for the Bach-Mozart concerts on each previous Friday and for the chamber series each Wednesday.

FESTIVAL

Cir. (D 14,656)

This Clipping From
NORWALK, CONN.
HOUR

JAN 12 1954

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL TO BE EXTENDED

Lenox, Mass. (P) — Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced today the scope of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood will be extended next summer from four to six weeks. Concerts will be given from July 5 to Aug. 15.

Cir. (D 26,042)

This Clipping From
HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM

JAN 12 1954

Pretty soon the summer will not be long enough for the Berkshire festival at Tanglewood. It used to be a few week-end concerts in August. It has been gradually expanded over the years, with chamber music concerts and a variety of programs by the students at the Berkshire Music center added. Now Director Charles Munch says that this coming season will boast 12 concerts by the whole Boston Symphony orchestra and six concerts by the small chamber size orchestra. This is not only an expansion of the Shed concerts, but a rearrangement of program. The chamber music concerts were previously concentrated in the first three weeks of the season, and the big concerts in the last three weeks. Now the whole orchestra will be heard six week ends, on Saturday and Sunday, from July 5 thru Aug. 15, and the chamber orchestra will play on Friday nights during the same period, concentrating on Bach and Mozart. These chamber concerts have been so popular that they have earned a place in the center of the festival stage, and now will have it.

Cir. (D 13,274)

This Clipping From
KINGSTON, N. Y.
FREEMAN

JAN 13 1954

Berkshire Festival To Have Additional Concerts for Season

A new plan has been devised by Charles Munch, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to extend the scope of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., next summer.

According to his plan, the concerts by the full orchestra in the Music Shed will be given each Saturday evening and each Sunday afternoon through the six weeks from July 5 to August 15. The concerts by the orchestra of chamber proportions in the Theatre-Concert Hall will now be given each Friday evening preceding the weekend Shed concerts. Together with the performances by the students of the Berkshire Music Center, this will result in six weeks of daily performances on an identical rotation through each week.

The Munch plan will thus provide 12 Festival concerts in the Shed instead of nine as before, and six Bach-Mozart concerts in the Theatre as before, but now on a once a week basis. In addition to the Berkshire Festival performances, a series of chamber music concerts at moderate prices will be given by different ensembles in the Theatre on the six Wednesday evenings.

The 1954 Berkshire Festival will therefore consist of four concerts a week (Wednesday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday) for six weeks, or 24 concerts in all.

Cir. (D 3,230)

This Clipping From
WINSTED, CONN.
CITIZEN

JAN 14 1954

Lenox, Mass.—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has announced the scope of the Berkshire festival at Tanglewood will be extended next summer from four to six weeks.

Concerts will be given from July 5 to Aug. 15.

MILLERTON, N.Y
NEWS
1/[illegible]/54

Berkshire Festival In Tanglewood To Feature Berlioz

The Sesquicentennial season of Berlioz will be observed by Charles Munch at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Massachusetts, next summer with a performance of a number of the great works of this composer.

"The Damnation of Faust" will be performed with the Choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe, "Harold in Italy" with William Primrose as viola soloist, the "Fantastic Symphony", and the song cycle, "Summer Nights". The Festival Chorus of the Berkshire Music Center will appear with the Orchestra in "Romeo and Juliet" in its complete form and in the famous "Requiem", which will conclude the Festival. The Festival will extend from the first week of July through August 15th.

Since the birth of Hector Berlioz one hundred and fifty years ago (December 11, 1803) his artistic stature has risen increasingly in general estimation, notably in recent years.

Cir. (D 74,995) (S 59,910)

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

JAN 17 1954

A new plan has been designed by Charles Munch, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to extend the scope of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., next summer.....The plan has been prompted by the record attendance last summer—118,000, and the obvious desire of many thousands to hear the full orchestra in the first three weeks of the Festival as well -- the last three.....According to this plan, the concerts by the full orchestra in the Music Shed will be given each Saturday evening and each Sunday afternoon through the six weeks from July 5 to Aug. 15. ....The concerts by the orchestra of chamber proportions in the Theater-Concert Hall, devoted mostly to the music of Bach and Mozart, which formerly occupied the first three weeks of the Festival, will now be given each Friday evening preceding the weekend Shed concerts....Together with performances by the students of the Berkshire Music Center, this will result in six weeks of daily performances on an identical rotation through each week....The Munch plan will thus provide 12 Festival concerts in the Shed instead of nine as before, and six "Bach-Mozart" concerts in the Theater as before, but now on a once-a-week basis....In addition to the Berkshire Festival performances, a series of chamber music concerts at moderate prices will be given by different ensembles in the Theater on six Wednesday evenings.

Cir. (D 215,218)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER

JAN 1[illegible] 1954

Tanglewood Plan Shift

The record attendance of 118,000 at the Berkshire Festival in Tanglewood last summer and the wish of many to hear the full Boston Symphony Orchestra during the first three weeks as well as the last three of the festival has resulted in Charles Munch extending the season there.

His new plan is to have concerts by the full orchestra in the Music Shed each Saturday night and each Sunday afternoon through the six weeks from July 5 to Aug. 15.

The chamber music concerts, which have been during the first three weeks, will now be given each Friday night preceding the week-end shed concerts.

Together with the performances by the students of the Berkshire Music Center, this will result in six weeks of daily performances on an identical rotation through each week, and will mean 12 shed concerts instead of nine.

In addition to four concerts a week for the six weeks, the festival will continue the custom of opera scenes on Tuesdays, orchestral concerts Thursdays and chamber concerts Sunday mornings.

Subscriptions will be sold by pairs of Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon concerts, with subscribers having the privilege of seats at a reduced rate for the "Bach-Mozart" concerts on Friday and for the chamber series on Wednesday.

Throughout the six weeks of the 1954 Berkshire Festival, the Esplanade concerts will continue to be given on the Charles River embankment in Boston under the direction of Arthur Fiedler.

Previously given through the first three weeks of the Festival period, these free outdoor concerts will this summer be given in the first part of each of the six weeks, a total of 23, making them available to Bostonians during the greater part of the summer.

Cir. (D 893,121) (S 1,422,118)

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

JAN 17 1954

Berkshire Music Shed Concerts to Continue 6 Weeks

The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., bows to increasing attendance figures by increasing to six weeks the Music Shed concerts by the Boston orchestra, which will play a total of 12 festival concerts Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons, July 5 thru Aug. 15. Six Bach-Mozart concerts will be given in the theater, this time on Friday evenings. Chamber music concerts will be presented in the theater on six Wednesday evenings.

Charles Munch, the director, will honor the sesquicentennial season of the birth of Berlioz during the Shed concert series, presenting "The Damnation of Faust," "Romeo and Juliet," and the Requiem, as well as the song cycle, "Summer Nights," and instrumental works. Full programs will be available soon on application to the Boston Symphony orchestra, Symphony hall, Boston 15, Mass.

Cir. (D 166,970) (S 150,268) 79

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE

JAN 17 1954

Orchestra Adds Some Concerts

Special to The Blade

BOSTON, Jan. 16—A new plan devised by Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will extend the scope of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood next summer.

A record attendance of 118,000 persons last summer and the desire of thousands to hear the full orchestra in the first as well as the last three weeks of the festival prompted the new plan.

* * *

THE FULL orchestra will play each Saturday and Sunday afternoon in the Music Shed from July 5 to Aug. 15.

A chamber group from the full orchestra will present instrumental works by Bach and Mozart each Friday evening in the Theater-Concert Hall.

The new plan will provide 12 festival concerts in the Shed instead of nine and the same six "Bach-Mozart" concerts in the theater, but now once a week.

* * *

THIS YEAR Mr. Munch and the orchestra will honor the Berlioz sesquicentennial. Performances are announced of "The Damnation of Faust," "Romeo et Juliette," and the "Grand Mass for the Dead" (Requiem); also, the song cycle, "Summer Nights," besides the larger instrumental works.

Chamber-music concerts by different ensembles will be given in the Theater on six Wednesday evenings. The present arrangement calls for 24 concerts in all, four a week on Wednesday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday. Students will present opera scenes on Tuesdays, orchestra concerts Thursdays and chamber concerts Sunday mornings.

Cir. (D 46,023) (S 174,898)

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 17 1954

New Schedule at Tanglewood Is Announced

According to a new plan devised by Charles Munch for the Berkshire Music Festival next summer, the chamber music concerts and the series by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra will run on a joint weekly basis through the season from July 5 to Aug. 15.

In past summers the chamber series in the Theater-Concert Hall has occupied the first three weeks of the festival, the big Music Shed concerts taking over the last three. Under the new Munch plan the chamber programs will be given each Friday night, preceding Saturday night and Sunday afternoon concerts in the Shed. Together with the performances by Berkshire Music Center students this will result in six weeks of daily events on an identical rotation.

The new plan is said to have been prompted by the record attendance of 118,000 last summer and the desire of many thousands to hear the full orchestra during the first three weeks as well as the last three. It will provide 12 concerts in the Shed instead of nine as before. The schedule will also include opera scenes on Tuesdays, chamber ensembles Wednesday, student orchestra concerts Thursdays, and student chamber concerts Sunday mornings.

A change has also been made in the running of the symphony's Esplanade concerts in Boston under the direction of Arthur Fiedler. Previously given through the first three weeks of the Berkshire Festival period, these free outdoor concerts will be played during the first part of each six weeks, making a total of 23 instead of 21.

80

FESTIVAL

Cir. (D 81,951) (S 101,368)

This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST-STANDARD

JAN 17 1954

Overtones

Berlioz to Be Featured At Berkshire Festival

BY WILLIAM FLEMING

The sesquicentenial season of Berlioz will be observed by Charles Munch at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., next summer with a performance of a number of great works by this composer.

William Fleming

The "Damnation of Faust" will be heard with the combined choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe; "Harold in Italy" with William Primrose as viola soloist; and the song cycle "Summer Nights," with a singer yet to be announced. The Festival chorus of the Berkshire Music Center will appear with the orchestra in "Romeo and Juliet" in its complete form and in the famous "Requiem," which will conclude the festival.

Since the birth of Hector Berlioz 150 years ago on Dec. 11, 1803, his artistic stature has risen increasingly. The staggering difficulties of assembling the massive choral and orchestral forces demanded by his complex scores have limited the performances of his works to an occasional single work here and there. The complete "Romeo and Juliet," for instance, has yet to be recorded in its entirety.

The composer himself was sometimes chided for these colossal tendencies, and his sense of humor often had to come to his rescue. After one performance, a lady, in the audience, who had been somewhat overwhelmed by the army of musicians onstage, summoned up her courage to approach the composer. "Is it true, Mr. Berlioz," she asked, "that you always write for orchestras of 500 players?" Whereupon the unpredictable Hector replied, "On the contrary, madame, I sometimes compose for orchestras of only 450."

Debussy and some other French composers always considered their predecessor as something of a musical monster. None have found a more apt way of describing the effect of Berlioz' music than Heinrich Heine, who wrote: "Here is the wingbeat that reveals no ordinary songbird. It is that of a colossal nightingale, a lark the size of an eagle, such as must have existed in the primeval world.

NEW OPERA

Cir. (S 19,794)

This Clipping From
WILMINGTON, DEL.
STAR

JAN 17 1954

Shed Concerts At Tanglewood Cover 6 Weeks

A new plan has been devised by Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to extend the scope of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., next summer.

The plan has been prompted by the record attendance in 1953 (118,000) and the obvious desire of many thousands to hear the full orchestra in the first three weeks of the Festival as well as the last three.

Concerts by the full orchestra in the Music Shed will be given each Saturday evening and each Sunday afternoon through the six weeks from July 5 to Aug. 15.

Concerts by the orchestra of chamber proportions in the Theatre-Concert Hall, devoted mostly to the music of Bach and Mozart, which formerly occupied the first three weeks of the Festival, will now be given each Friday evening preceding the week-end Shed concerts.

Together with performances by students of the Berkshire Music Center, this will result in six weeks of daily performances on an identical rotation through each week.

Jan 16, 1954

South Berkshire Weekly

Music Hath Charm$ . . .

By A. G. Rud

LENOX—The Boston Symphony Orchestra's decision to extend the Berkshire Festival season is considered one of the biggest things that's happened to the tourist trade since Henry Hadley led his charges through Beethoven's Fifth in Dan Hanna's riding ring back in 1934.

The plan is hailed as the key to a bang-up summer in which more people will visit the Berkshires, a greater gross vacation business will be recorded, more music will be enjoyed—and overcrowding will be held to a minimum. Remarkable, but the addition of just three major concerts and a little shuffling of the schedule may accomplish exactly that.

* * *

WITH THE full orchestra playing in the big Shed six weekends instead of only three, there will be a more even distribution of visitors through the summer. For the past several years the schedule has called for three weekends of small concerts by the chamber-sized BSO in the theater-concert hall, followed by three weekends of full BSO concerts in the Shed.

The original idea was to offer to small audiences some lesser known music by early masters like Bach and Mozart, without bringing in the full orchestra from Boston until the last half of the season. This worked out splendidly—so splendidly, in fact, that the theater-concert hall was packed for each performance and as many as 4,000 were seated and sprawled on the lawn. What to do with all these music-lovers? The Bach-Mozart concerts couldn't be moved into the big Shed without losing the intimate atmosphere the music was intended for.

The new plan presumably will solve that problem. Now, during the July 4-Aug. 15 season, there will be Bach-Mozart concerts Friday evenings and Shed concerts Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons. Thus each weekend will have something for every concertgoer, the Bach aficionado as well as the guy who just goes to stamp his feet during Ravel's "Bolero."

* * *

ONE OF THE conveniences of the new plan is that it will facilitate figuring out what is going on at Tanglewood any particular night. The pattern has been so irregular in the past that a detailed, well-asterisked program has been basic equipment for anyone wishing to keep posted on the 50-odd events presented during the season. Now at least the main patterns will be the same for every one of the six weeks: Opera Tuesday, chamber music Wednesday, student orchestra Thursday, Bach-Mozart Friday, BSO Saturday, student chamber music Sunday morning and BSO Sunday afternoon. That is a good deal easier to keep in mind than a schedule that changes every day.

Even without including the other events presented throughout the season, it is obvious that there is almost a full week of music there, with Monday for catching your breath. Local enterpreneurs hope it will be sufficiently attractive to induce visitors to come here for a week at a time, rather than a night or two.

Of course, to hear anything at Tanglewood besides the BSO, one must join the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center by making a donation, modest or otherwise. This policy will be continued but it is expected that the "Friends Concerts" will be more heavily promoted than in former years, so that the public will become fully aware of the week-long attractions as well as the big weekend jobs. The Berkshire Hills Conference is already working on plans to put this idea across.

* * *

WHAT EFFECT the new program will have upon Jacob's Pillow and the Berkshire Playhouse is uncertain now, but there is no doubt it will be a tremendous boost for South Berkshire guest house operators, a somewhat disillusioned lot. Despite a steady increase in Tanglewood attendance each year, the lodging house trade has languished. The phenomenon is attributed to the appearance of half a dozen motels, which are preferred by the majority of travelers, and in Lenox particularly, to the new by-pass that shunts east-west transients north of town on Route 20.

The crowning blow to the guest houses came last summer, when the customary Thursday evening festival concert was shifted to Friday night. This aggravated an already uncomfortable situation on the big weekends, while simultaneously reducing the number of nights visitors stayed. Repercussions were felt even in Pittsfield stores, which formerly had drawn a number of Friday shoppers, but the worst effect was felt in the guest houses. Everywhere, from the small cottage with one room for rent to the large place like Garden Gables or Stonewall House in Lenox, the condensed weekend of music was deplored. Until the recent announcement, in fact, it looked as though guest houses would have to turn themselves into "sports centers" or ease out of the tourist picture. There was less and less profit in running a large house just for the sake of six busy nights in the middle of summer.

* * *

THE EXTENDED festival season has changed all that, though, to the delight of the innkeepers as well as guest house proprietors. The inn and hotel owners now look forward to six weeks of 90 to 100 per cent occupancy rather than 60 per cent on weekdays and 110 per cent on Festival weekends.

Things are looking up on the tourist front for 1954, in other words. Now all that's needed is an attraction for the doldrum period between Aug. 15, when the BSO pulls out, and Labor Day. With that, plus a few more snowy winter weekends like the present, the Berkshire tourist business will begin to realize its enormous potentialities.

* * *

WHEN THE LENOX bylaw committee recently abandoned its plan for financing water main extensions, it was acceding to legal advice as well as to some irate residents. The proposed bylaw, now discarded, specified that when 60 per cent of the residents of any street asked the town for a water main extension, a lien for half the cost of the work would be placed against all property abutting the new main.

The reasoning behind this was that householders whose property increased in value because of the new main should pay more than other residents, many of whom had in effect paid for their own water lines through charges when Lenox water was supplied by a private company.

Yet the plan drew a steady fire of criticism, especially from some East Street residents who had recently sunk deep and expensive wells of their own and didn't relish the idea of liens being slapped on their property. That snag might have been cleared by the committee's proposal to assess each house according to the use it made of the water main—but the coup de grace came from another quarter. Queried about the legality of its plan, the state Attorney General's office had its doubts. Better finance water main extensions through appropriations at the annual town meeting, it advised; and that ended the controversy for good.

Cir. (D 39,275)

This Clipping From
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

JAN 12 1954

Music Notes

By D. E. RITZ

CHARLES MUNCH has devised a concert schedule for the Tanglewood season, July 5 through Aug. 15, which will keep Boston Symphony very busy this summer.

The new plan calls for full orchestra concerts in the Shed each Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon for the full six weeks and six chamber orchestra programs in the Theatre-Concert hall each Friday evening. In addition the Esplanade concerts will be presented on the Charles River embankment in Boston during the first part of each of the six weeks and will be available during the greater part of the summer.

During the course of the 12 Shed concerts Mr. Munch will honor the sesquicentennial season of the birth of Hector Berlioz.

* * *

SHARON, CONN

1/14/54

Berkshire Festival In Tanglewood To Feature Berlioz

The Sesquicentennial season of Berlioz will be observed by Charles Munch at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Massachusetts, next summer with a performance of a number of the great works of this composer.

"The Damnation of Faust" will be performed with the Choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe, "Harold in Italy" with William Primrose as viola soloist, the "Fantastic Symphony", and the song cycle, "Summer Nights". The Festival Chorus of the Berkshire Music Center will appear with the Orchestra in "Romeo and Juliet" in its complete form and in the famous "Requiem", which will conclude the Festival. The Festival will extend from the first week of July through August 15th.

Since the birth of Hector Berlioz one hundred and fifty years ago (December 11, 1803) his artistic stature has risen increasingly in general estimation, notably in recent years.

Cir. (D 90,143) (S 90,143)

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

JAN 17 1954

MUSIC

Popular Music Finding Way Into Symphonic Programs

By GORDON E. ARMSTRONG

Boston Symphony Extends 1954 Berkshire Schedule

The Boston Symphony has just announced an extension of its schedule of concerts for this year's Berkshire Music Festival. Prompted by the record attendance of 118,000 at the 1953 programs in the Berkshires, several more concerts by the full Boston Orchestra will be added to the number given in previous years. Formerly the entire ensemble was heard only during the last three weeks of the Festival but present plans make provision for concerts by the full orchestra during the entire six weeks of coming activities there.

Incidentally, the orchestra will make a belated appearance here on February 9. In past years, the Boston musicians performed here early in the season but their first concert here was purposely delayed by the management of the Woolsey Hall concerts in the current series. This was done in order that the local audience might have the opportunity of hearing the orchestra under Pierre Monteaux, the celebrated conductor who is making a number of guest appearances with the Boston Orchestra this season. Charles Munch, the orchestra's regular conductor, will be here for the orchestra's second concert on April 6.

Boston Symphony Appeals To Public about Deficit

By Jules Wolffers

BOSTON. — Faced with an accumulated five-year deficit of $363,758, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has placed its financial problems on record with a frank statement which took up the better part of a page advertisement in most of the Hub's newspapers.

The figures show that Boston has lagged behind other cities in the support given major symphony orchestras. For example, in the 1951-52 season funds raised totalled $166,578 as compared to $400,230 in Detroit, $311,441 in Chicago and $265,381 in New York. Funds in Minneapolis, Cincinnati, Los Angeles, Pittsburgh and Houston all exceeded the Boston total.

Few persons outside the Metropolitan Boston area realize the full scope of the orchestra's public service, which includes three weeks of free Esplanade Pops concerts under Arthur Fiedler and regular non-commercial FM broadcasts of all its Friday and Saturday concerts. The orchestra actually pays several thousand dollars yearly through its membership in one of the Hub's educational radio stations and also contributes its concerts free of charge.

At Tanglewood the orchestra would show a substantial profit instead of just about breaking even were it not for the heavy deficit which results from operating the Berkshire Music Center.

Up to now the orchestra has been overly-modest about its services and about its financial needs. Nor was the orchestra much encouraged by its efforts last season to seek support from business organizations which resulted in a total of $13,450.

It is hoped that the present policy will awaken Bostonians to the uniqueness of the orchestra and ot its pressing needs, needs which have exhausted all available funds together with all unrestricted legacies.

These financial details have affected neither the morale nor the quality of the orchestra. Recent programs have been rich in interesting material with performance standards of unfailingly high quality.

Piston Fantasy Introduced

The premiere of an engaging new work by Walter Piston, Fantasy for Solo English Horn, with Harp and Strings, was very well received. The composer himself called the performance by Louis Speyer and the assisting forces under Charles Munch "A composer's dream," so well was it played. The work is pleasing and pleasant with fine melodic content and with well-proportioned accompaniment in which the harp plays an important role. Other works on this New Year's day program included Munch's arrangement of Bach's Choral Prelude and Chorale, "The Old Year is Past," the Haydn "Military" Symphony and the exciting Saint-Saens Symphony No. 3, all of which made first class fare to usher in 1954.

Nicole Henriot was soloist the previous week in two works—the first American performance of Milhaud's Suite Concertante and the first hearing at BSO concerts of the Saint-Saens Piano Concerto No. 3. The pianist played capably but not enough so to rescue the Saint-Saens from dullness. The Milhaud is a perky and amusing trifle of no great significance but of considerable rhythmic ingenuity. Auber's Overture to La Muette de Portici opened, and a deeply moving rendition of the Brahms Fourth closed the program.

Another local "first" was the Berlioz L'Enfance du Christ, done in fine style under Munch with soloists Jennie Tourel, Mac Morgan, Lee Cass, and John McCollum assisted by the New England Conservatory Chorus.

Richard Burgin also contributed his share of novelties with the first Boston hearing of the Adagio from Mahler's Tenth Symphony, and the first BSO performance of the Stravinsky Danses Concertantes. Charles Munch took over the baton from Burgin for a performance of the Lalo Symphonie Espagnole in memory of Jacques Thibaud. Both the soloist, Ruth Posselt, and Munch himself had close associations with the late French violinist which gave added poignancy to a rendition marked by poise and finesse.

Burgin was responsible for introducing to Boston Symphony hearers the venerable Piano Concerto No. 2 by Beethoven (actually the first in order of composition). Although it was interesting to hear the Mozart-influenced work it left one with no particular desire to hear it again. But one would like to hear more from the soloist, Grant Johannesen, particularly in a program which will give greater scope for appraisal.

Recitals and Such

Among other events, Smeterlin won acclaim with an all-Chopin program at Jordan Hall. The same auditorium housed the Boston debut of Jean Graham, pianist, who showed good taste and musicianly qualities. At Symphony Hall the Guard Republican Band of Paris provided an exhilarating evening with Charles Munch and newly-named Chevalier of the Legion of Honor Arthur Fiedler relieving conductor Francois-Julien Brun for a portion of the program which benefitted the BSO pension fund. . . . The tradition-laden Handel and Haydn Society presented the 197th performance of Handel's Messiah, and the not-so-tradition-laden New England Opera Theater tried its hand with Debussy's Pelleas and Melisande at the Boston Opera House—a gallant attempt that did not quite come off. At Symphony Hall, Casadesus played with power and skill before a Boston University Celebrity Series audience. . . . Gina Bachauer impressed with her technical endowments but left a Morning Musicale audience at the Statler wondering a little regarding her sense of style. . . . At Jordan Hall, the Zimbler Sinfonietta opened its season with a well-played, absorbing program of Hindemith, Mozart and Handel. Alexander Tcherepnine was soloist in his own colorful and exotic Georgian Suite for a markedly cordial reception.

This Clipping From
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE
JAN 19 1954

Music Notes

By D. E. BITZ

THE BOSTON POPS ORCHESTRA will open its second national tour with a program at RPI Field House in Troy on Feb. 2. The tour will include more than 60 concerts. Arthur Fiedler will conduct the program of light classics and the latest hit songs.

The Pops Orchestra was the most popular concert on the Field House schedule last year. The orchestra dates to the day when its parent, the Boston Symphony, was only four years old. The concerts were started as an experiment in the European tradition of the old German Bilse concerts, where it was popular to combine a program of light classics with food and drink.

By the time of prohibition the orchestra had become so popular that even that experiment failed to diminish the crowds that turned out for the weekly concerts.

* * *

MISS ELIZABETH KINGDON, lyric soprano, will present a recital Feb. 5 at the Schenectady Museum, 37 Steuben street under the sponsorship of the Museum music committee. Miss Kingdon won the committee's annual auditions in 1950 and opened its recital season that year.

She also appeared as soloist with the Schenectady Symphony in 1949, has sung with the Chatauqua Opera Company and with the Amato School of Opera in New York. Since her earlier programs here Miss Kingdon has continued her study with the late Evan Evans of the Juilliard School of Music.

Tickets for the program are obtainable at the local music stores, at the Museum and from members of the Museum music committee.

* * *

AN ARRANGEMENT of Stanley E. Saxton's Concerto in A minor for organ and second piano had its first complete performance Sunday evening at Skidmore College hall. Mr. Saxton was at the organ and Hoyt L. Irwin, chairman of the college music department, played the piano part. The concerto was written in 1942 for piano and orchestra.

* * *

THE FIFTH FREDERIC Chopin International competition, open to young pianists of all nationalities, will be held at Warsaw Feb. 22 through March 21, 1955.

The competition, originated in 1927, was last held in 1949 in Warsaw. Two first prizes were awarded then, one to Halnia Czerny-Stefanska of Poland and the other to Bella Davidovich of the Soviet Union.

Contestants should be between 16 and 32 years of age as of Feb. 22, 1955. The competition will be held in three stages. At the first contestants will be required to play one Chopin nocturne, two of his etudes, a polonaise and one other short work by Chopin. Second stage requirements include one of the preludes, two of the etudes, three mazurkas and a longer Chopin work such as one of the sonatas. Finalists entering the third stage will play a Chopin concerto with orchestral accompaniment.

Ten prizes will be awarded, the first being 30,000 zlotys or $7,500 at the official rate of exchange.

82

ZIMBLER SINFONIETTA

Cellist Joseph Zimbler, director of the Sinfonietta, confers with towering Composer-pianist Alexander Tcherepnin as they rehearse the latter's Suite Georgienne.

Lest Music Be Forgotten

It can't succeed, by box-office standards, but Zimbler's little symphony blithely plays what it likes, seeks only perfection and now commands world-wide attention

By ANNE THOMAS

SYMPHONY HALL was a gloomy sea of empty seats. On the lighted shore of the stage was clustered a handful of rapt musicians. There was no podium, no leader with baton. The music, rich and exultant, soared into life almost of its own accord.

The pianist raised a hand; the music died. "No, no—faster here." He played a bar or two. "So!" Then he began again, bows rose and fell in unison and melody glowed almost visibly through the darkness of the hall.

This was the Zimbler String Sinfonietta in rehearsal. The man at the piano was Alexander Tcherepnin, composer of the Suite Georgienne which this symphony in miniature was playing.

The music director and cellist was Josef Zimbler, a sensitive Czech who organized the group in 1945 to play the chamber music of composers such as Mozart and Bach and who now attracts contemporary music from all the civilized world. Music, Zimbler believes, is no good in a library. He wants to have it heard.

Sinfonietta has 17 regular players, all of them members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—three cellists, 10 violinists, three players of the viola and one of the double bass. Whenever a particular composition demands it, other instruments may be added, a harpsichord, a piano, a French horn.

Whenever the group plays a contemporary work, it prefers to rehearse the score with the composer. That is why Alexander Tcherepnin left his Chicago home and his work at DePauw University a few days before Sinfonietta's Jordan Hall concert of his Suite Georgienne.

Josef Zimbler had a twofold purpose in forming his chamber music group. First, he wanted to tear the shroud of neglect from a wealth of rare and beautiful chamber music of a bygone day when every European prince took pride in his own string orchestra and a composer at his command. And second, he wanted to provide an outlet for the creativeness of young, modern musicians.

Chamber music was so-called because it was performed for small, intimate groups (Bach was cautioned that it mustn't be too loud, so as not to disturb royalty's conversation during the concert!) The harpsichord player usually led the group. Music composed under such circumstances today may seem a bit too mannered and subdued. But it displays amazing mastery of form and a jewel-like quality never afterward surpassed.

When kings were no longer the fashion, small string orchestras gave way to tremendous symphony groups with a new type of music for volume consumption. Chamber music had been pretty well forgotten in America when Zimbler resurrected it with his Sinfonietta. Bigger than a string quartet, it still preserves the quartet's artistic precision; smaller than a full-scale symphony orchestra, still it has its full tonal beauty.

Sinfonietta doesn't go on tour and performs only close to its Boston home. It turns down invitations to appear in Europe or South by the government, the discrimination of music lovers is so sharp that politics hasn't ruined music. There are scarcely any cases of government officials trying to force third-rate bassoonist nephews down some orchestra's throat.

After Zimbler finishes 40 hours of performing, practicing, or teaching music each week, he goes home to study old scores, plan new concerts, or listen to other musical artists.

He's of the old world—music is his life.

Sunday Post staff photos by Alfred H. Hammond

73

This Clipping From
BOSTON MASS.
POST

JAN 17 1954

"Not da-da but DA-DA—so!" Each musician here is [illegible]'s keeper and all speak up in critiques.

Rehearsal at first is halting, for the Sinfonietta won't compromise, seeks constantly for perfection.

Dress can be casual; performance must be flawless. Albert Bernard concentrates on his viola passage.

Now it's smoothing out! George Zazofsky, at left, leads the violin section in vibrant, soaring unison.

With details worked out, Tcherepnin plays enrapt, confident now the group will follow him perfectly.

Zimbler, here at home with his wife, rarely stops thinking music, always is questing something new.

America, for its concertizing is done only when it does not interfere with the major work of its members in the Boston Symphony.

Every spare moment Zimbler has from playing and practicing with the Boston Symphony on tour, he spends in libraries collecting rare scores no longer printed. From them he often gets concert pieces.

And from contemporary musicians in his native Czechoslovakia, from Poland, Yugoslavia, England, France, Switzerland, Italy, the Nordic countries and America come compositions written especially for Sinfonietta.

Zimbler, who comes from a long line of musicians in Czechoslovakia, sees a growing thirst for good music in America.

"There is a need for more chamber music groups in the land," he says. "I observe the craving of the people for good music when the Boston Symphony goes on tour. We play to packed houses and long lines of ticket seekers have to be turned away."

The problem of how to hire halls, keep musicians fed and hold ticket prices down to everyman's pocketbook is still a headache, more in America than in Europe, the cellist says.

The standard of living for the old-world musicians is not as high as in America, as a whole. Though much of Europe's music is subsidized by the government, the discrimination of music lovers is so sharp that politics hasn't ruined music. There are scarcely any cases of government officials trying to force third-rate bassoonist nephews down some orchestra's throat.

"That is the fear musicians have in America when they consider the possibility of government aid to bring more music to more people," sadly observes Zimbler. "They fear that subsidies might bring a dictation that would reduce the quality of musicians."

Zimbler regrets that it is necessary to commercialize music as much as many American musicians do.

"In the old days in Europe, musicians wouldn't think of doing anything that interfered with their music or hardened their hands for playing," he says.

"After a musician performed, he practiced, he taught, he went to hear fellow artists concertize, and he played music at home with friends for relaxation.

"Musicians here have a different outlook. Some of the men I work with like to cook, especially the French and Italian. In old-time Europe, women never let men get into their domain in the kitchen.

"A fellow goes home at night here and helps his wife with the children, mows the lawn, does all sorts of rough chores and never worries that it will make his hands insensitive to his instrument."

Zimbler is married to an American girl from Ohio whom he met at the Conservatory of Music. She plays the double bass and sings. After Zimbler finishes 40 hours of performing, practicing, or teaching music each week, he goes home to study old scores, plan new concerts, or listen to other musical artists.

He's of the old world—music is his life.

Sunday Post staff photos by Alfred H. Hammond

The 17 stringed instruments achieve the precision of a quartet, the tonal beauty of a full symphony.

73

This Clipping From
BOSTON MASS.
POST

JAN 17 1954

ZIMBLER SINFONIETTA

CIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1954

Zimbler String Sinfonietta in Rehearsal . . . Photo by Gordon N. Converse, Staff Photographer

Balcony Bravos

Symphony Group Swells Appreciation of Music

By Mary Handy

Staff Writer of The Christian Science Monitor

In a corridor of Boston's Symphony Hall three high-school students waited anxiously for a cellist.

When he walked out of the stage door, mopping his face after the orchestra performance, they rushed up to him.

"Oh, sir," said the girl, "we wanted to thank you. The orchestra was wonderful.

"We came because we'd heard you and the Sinfonietta players in our high school," chimed in the boy.

The cellist a warm, charming man with continental manner, who heads one of the nation's leading chamber-music groups, smiled.

That night when Josef Zimbler reached home he told his wife about these young enthusiasts.

Results Seen

"It's a tremendous satisfaction to see young people excited about good music," he said. "I'm so pleased that our concerts in the schools are inspiring teenagers to become regular concertgoers."

Coming from a Czechoslovakian home where music lessons began as a matter of course at the age of five, Mr. Zimbler is dedicated to building up similar musical and cultural traditions in America.

A "musical missionary" is what some people call him.

His enthusiasm is the moving force behind the Zimbler String Sinfonietta. Rightly enough the group's first concert was given to raise money for education. It was a benefit performance in 1944 to finance performances by smaller string groups in the Brookline public schools.

Performance Hailed

During five busy years since the Sinfonietta organized formally it has inspired audiences in Boston and at schools and universities up and down the East Coast.

Performances by these 17 accomplished musicians have repeatedly been hailed as some of the best in chamber music. Their recordings have gone all over the world. They were recently invited to represent the United States at a music festival in Germany.

And it has all been done in their spare time!

Each member of the Sinfonietta, from Mr. Zimber to Henry Portnoi, double bass player, is a regular member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That means they already are involved in one of the busiest concert schedules of any orchestra in the country.

It also means they bring much richness of background and experience to the chamber orchestra. The instruments, most of them old and of Italian make, are insured for $75,000. Their quality is one reason for the Sinfonietta's remarkable richness of tone.

Nationalities Blend

And the musicians, many of them brought up and trained in Europe, bring many styles. The French born give ideas for interpreting French music, the German born on German music. The 17 men come from seven different countries—and one is half American Indian.

At a Sinfonietta rehearsal recently on Beacon Hill, chords from the many strings filled the high ceilinged music room of the Harvard Music Association.

In plaid shirts, sweaters, and business coats the musicians were deep in Stravinsky. Even the flash of a news camera scarcely interrupted their concentration. They were working with unflustered persistence.

Before them stood no conductor. This chamber group has no conductor. Mr. Zimbler, as music director, sits at his cello.

Traditional Organization

Being conductorless makes the group unusual, if not unique, today.

It goes back to the traditions of 18th century chamber orchestras of Mozart's time.

In the Sinfonietta whoever plays the principle voice is "boss." At rehearsals, George Zazofsky, concertmaster, sets the interpretation of a violin melody, Joseph de Pasquale, violist, leads the violas' entrance. And everyone [illegible] say. It is more [illegible]

Each musician is responsible for the total effect as well as his own part. Rehearsals recess into heated [illegible] fine points; but the [illegible] music — music of which Boston is proud.

Attention to Details

At the rehearsal the melodies resounded against the walled bookcases, out to the sunlit snow on the narrow street. Then the concertmaster tapped his bow against his music rack.

"We must get the 16ths right, here" he called out. "One — two — three — FOUR. Let's do it slowly now."

The Stravinsky theme swelled out. "That's it. Sta-ki-ti, ta-tee-tee—umph."

Suddenly the double bass stopped. "Henry, what do you play?" asked the first violist.

"I've got nothing for three bars before measure 72." They repeated the passage, the violas soaring.

"Eddy, what do you play after you turn the page?" asked the concertmaster.

"E natural."

"O K; let's go. At 73."

And the rehearsal went on—each man constantly looking and listening for the others—caring about the melody the other fellow had as well as the one he played.

Work Becomes Fun

When noon came and the musicians got up from their chairs, packed their instruments into cases, they looked exhilarated. Working together this way was fun.

That's one of the main reasons these busy musicians want to "spread the gospel of chamber music."

"Our daily routine was music," reminisces Mr. Zimbler about his early childhood. "We always had trios and quartets at home. My father was a conductor and played the violin, my brother was a violinist, my sister a pianist."

When he first moved to the United States and became a cellist in the Boston Symphony in 1932 he was surprised at "how little chamber music was going on." When a wealthy music enthusiast asked him how many musicians he had in his quartet, his suspicions were confirmed. Chamber music needed to be better understood in his new country. Public school concerts were soon arranged.

The String Sinfonietta is also devoted to playing modern and early music that isn't often heard. Amateur and professional composers in India, Yugoslavia, many parts of Europe, and America have written for it.

At tomorrow's concert in Jordan Hall they will perform one of Igor Stravinsky's little-heard masterpieces, "Apollon Musagète." A Canadian cellist, one of many soloists to appear at Sinfonietta concerts, will play a Kodaly sonata for cello alone.

Repeatedly they have tried new works that less courageous friends have warned would never bring box office success. Audiences have loved them. The first Boston performance of Stravinsky's "L'Histoire du Soldat" brought crowds that had to be turned away.

"Good music needs support," says Mr. Zimbler. "We need to build up traditions in America. Playing fine music is a little like spreading the gospel. You bring music to people just as you do religion."

And it is primarily the educational job that interests Zimbler String Sinfonietta.

Says cellist Zimbler: "It's the young people shouting bravo from the balcony that really encourages us."

Sinfonietta Rehearsal

Eight members of the 17-piece Zimbler String Sinfonietta shown in the adjoining picture during rehearsal [illegible]

Top row from left: Vladimir Resnikoff, violinist; [illegible] Dickson, violinist; Norbert Lauga, violinist; Leonard [illegible] violinist; Joseph de Pasquale, first violist.

Center: George Zazofsky, concert master [illegible]

Bottom row from left: Herman Silber[illegible]; Josef Zimbler, music director and founder.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONIT
An International Daily Newspaper
FOUNDED 1908 BY MARY BAKER ED
THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE PUBLISHI SOCIETY

Entered as second class matter at Post Office at Boston, Massachusetts.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE

Payable in advance, postpaid to countries: One year $15.00, six mo $7.50, three months $3.75, single c 5 cents.

The Christian Science Monitor is sale in Christian Science Reading R throughout the world, and is obtain at newsstands.

Cost of Remailing Monitors

United States: 2 cents for first ounces and 1 cent for each additiona ounces or fraction thereof.

Foreign, including Canada and Pa American countries: 2 cents first ounces; 1½ cents each additional ounces or fraction.

Advertising rates given on application While endeavoring to accept only reliabl advertisements, The Christian Scienc Publishing Society will not be responsible to the public for advertisements, and the right to decline or discontinue any advertisement is reserved.

Member of the Associated Press

The Associated Press is entitled exclusively to the use for republication of all the local news printed in this newspaper as well as all AP news dispatches.

Republication rights of special dispatches are reserved to The Christian Science Publishing Society.

Articles and illustrations for publication should be addressed to Editorial Department, The Christian Science Monitor, One, Norway Street, Boston 15, Mass.

BRANCH OFFICES

New York (36) .... 588 Fifth Avenue
Washington (4)
[illegible] National Press Building
Chicago (1) ...... 333 N. Michigan Avenue
Los Angeles (17) .. 650 S. Grand Avenue
London, W.C. 2
Connaught House 163/4 Strand
Paris .... 20 Place Vendôme
Sydney .... 46 Pitt Street

Name and address of the News, Circulation or Advertising Representative located in your community will be sent promptly on request.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE PUBLISHING SOCIETY
One, Norway Street
Boston 15, Mass., U.S.A.
Publishers of The Christian Science Journal, Christian Science Sentinel, The Herald of Christian Science (German, French, Scandinavian, Dutch, Spanish-Portuguese-Italian, and Braille Editions), Christian Science Quarterly.

8-1

Cir. (D 227,789) (S 543,674)

This Clipping From
DES MOINES, IOWA
REGISTER

JAN 1 0 1954

The New Records

Berlioz 'Romeo'

IT IS A very great pleasure to recommend unreservedly a complete recording of Hector Berlioz's great dramatic symphony, "Romeo and Juliet."

BERLIOZ.

Recorded by RCA Victor with its "New Orthophonic" (AES curve) technique, the part-vocal romantic tour de force is performed on two 12-inch LP's by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, assisted by Contralto Margaret Roggero and Tenor Leslie Chabay as narrators, Basso Yi-kwei Sze as Friar Laurence, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society under the direction of G. Wallace Woodworth.

The part the orchestra plays in this work, with its moments of tense drama and equally frequent passages of great beauty, is superb. For although "Romeo and Juliet," with its French text by Emile Deschamps, paraphrases Shakespeare's immortal play, it is the orchestra which carries the mail—and the music.

It is symphonic in construction, and although the soloists and chorus narrate parts of the action, the key episodes (with the exception of Friar Laurence's dramatic reconciliation scene with the Montagu and Capulet familes) are told by the orchestra in sections which are unabashedly programmatic. (If any listener disparages or objects to "program music," i.e., music which tells a story, this isn't for him.)

Balanced Performance

What emerges is a finely-balanced combination of words and music. In this performance, the singers are sensitively attuned to their roles and responsibilities. Miss Roggero (Bronx-born of Italian parents; Juilliard student and Metropolitan principal), who expounds much of the love story, has a dark, rich voice, contrasting vividly with the clear tones of San Francisco Opera and "Met" Tenor Chabay.

Sze, the basso who sings the role of the pious monk who aided the star-crossed lovers, is a kind of phenomenon. He is a Chinese, and his robust voice belies his slight but dignified stature. He can sing in English, Russian, German, Italian, and in this case, French.

The recording was made in Boston's Symphony Hall last Feb. 22 and 23. The album bears a sticker reading, "For [illegible] fans." It certainly is, for it contains heights and depths of sound rarely achieved on records.

—Ogden G. Dwight.

* * *

This Clipping From
HERALD TRIBUNE N.Y.

JAN 19 1954

Kurtz to Quit Houston Podium

Special to the Herald Tribune

HOUSTON, Tex., Jan. 18.—Efrem Kurtz has resigned as conductor and music director of the Houston Symphony Orchestra, which he will leave at the end of this season.

Ferenc Fricsay, thirty-nine, Hungarian conductor of the RIAS (Radio in the American Sector) Symphony of Berlin, will be the principal conductor next season, directing sixteen of the Houston orchestra's twenty subscription concerts, as well as several Pop concerts and special events. His engagement follows his success as guest conductor in Houston last November. He will conduct next fall until Christmas and, after filling European engagements, return in February, 1955, for the remainder of the season. He made his American debut with the Boston Symphony last fall, and has also appeared with the San Francisco Symphony and other orchestras.

Mr. Kurtz, who is well known in New York as guest conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony and of the Stadium Concerts, has not announced his plans, but it is believed he will devote next season mainly to guest conducting in this country and in Europe. The present season is his sixth in Houston.

Cir. (D 131,670) (S 258,829)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

JAN 10 1954

Boston Symphony Program on WHDH

Beginning today and continuing for the next three Sundays at 3 p.m. WHDH will broadcast a half hour of recorded music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And on Sunday, Jan. 31 from 3 to 5 p.m., WHDH will feature a two hour broadcast of the orchestra directly from Symphony Hall.

On today's recorded program, the music will be the First Movement of Haydn's London Symphony, the Finale to Serenade for String Orchestra by Tschaikovsky, and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms.

(NO MENTION IN
JAN. 31st SUNDAY
HERALD OF BROADCAST!)

Cir. (D 175,944)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
AMERICAN

JAN 4 - 1954

Boston Symphony In Open Rehearsal

The third open rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will take place Wednesday evening at 7:30.

It will enable the audience to hear the program of the week in advance of the regular performances. Seats are available for this rehearsal, at which none are reserved.

Cir. (D 57,751) (S 49,376)

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

JAN 3 - 1954

THE RECORD SHOP

Sounding Like Al J Brings Complaint F

cumbent bru[illegible] ightly veiled, fea[illegible] seecake envelope [illegible]-Victor wraps its [illegible] pressing of Scriabin's Poem of Ecstasy. She wears little more than a deep pink light. Papa Monteux led the Boston (!!!) Symphony through this one — blindfolded, we trust. Columbia's only hope of recouping is to bring out the Liebestodt with Marilyn Monroe.

Cir. (D 34,774)

This Clipping From
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

DEC 15 1953

RESCUE WILL COME — The Boston Symphony is almost broke, but business men and music lovers in Boston will not allow this famous musical organization to die. — Brockton Enterprise.

Cir. (D 643,985) (S 1,124,787)

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

JAN 10 1954

PHILLY

SAMUEL MAYES
Plays new 'cello concerto with Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tuesday at the Academy.

Bostonians Star Mayes

SAMUEL MAYES, former first 'cellist with the Philadelphia Orchestra, will be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tuesday evening in the Academy of Music.

Mayes will be heard in the Philadelphia premiere of Dmitri Kabalevsky's Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra. The 'cellist introduced Kabalevsky's work to the United States through performances in Boston, New York and other cities.

Munch, now in his fifth yea as the Boston Symphony's con ductor, will open the program wit Mozart's Divertimento in D fo Strings (K. 136) and Debussy "Iberia." The Brahms Secon Symphony will comprise the se ond half of the program.

This Clipping From
BOSTON MASS.
POST

JAN [illegible]

Matter of Tone

Does Our Symphony Orchestra Sound as Well as It Once Did?

By TUCKER KEISER

In preserving the actual sound of famous interpretations and immortal performances the phonograph has performed a signal service for the critic. He can now analyze and compare performances to discover the indefinable quality which gives vitality to a particular musical organization or distinction to a particular conductor's reading.

Over the holiday season I replayed many of the Boston Symphony recordings made when the orchestra played with a tone of unrivalled magnificence under the late Serge Koussevitzky. I also played more recent recordings conducted by Charles Munch. Not even the engineering skill now employed in making records can conceal the thinness of tone and lack of precision of our orchestra today. The older 78rpm discs with their restricted range cannot compare to the high fidelity LPs, yet these earlier records delight the ear with an opulence of sound that present day Boston Symphony recordings do not possess.

Comparing these recordings, one feels rather puzzled, somewhat frustrated, and even a little sad.

The String Section

The decline in quality of tone and tautness of ensemble can be partly explained by what I have seen and heard in Symphony Hall. From my seat, front and centre, I see at very close range the heart of the orchestra, the famous Boston Symphony string section; in action.

Individually the string players are peerless. There are many among the 65 members of this orchestral choir who, if they wanted to, could embark on successful careers as concert artists. Some have. These violinists, violists, cellists and double-bass players bring to our orchestra unmatched technical facility.

Yet, I have seen unison passages played with bows going up and down simultaneously, bows drawn diagonally across the strings, accented pizzicati plucked with bows on music stands, instruments drooping at tired 45-degree angles, bows playing virtually on the bridge or over the fingerboard where raspy tone is assured. I have seen and heard false entries which amused or dismayed the players themselves.

Long Process

Building rich, responsive orchestral tone is a long and hard process. Players must not only have excellent command of their instruments, but they must play together for years under stable leadership. They must rely on the conductor to give them attacks, releases, and tempi which they can see and understand.

The conductor needs an ear so acutely sensitive that he can detect the slightest flaw in a given orchestral choir. He must be a teacher with not a little of the martinet in his make-up. He must demand harmonious unity in the various parts, allowing no instrument more prominence than is consistent with the score.

Lack of Discipline?

The present quality of tone is hard to excuse, although it can be explained.

The most obvious explanation is lack of discipline. Koussevitzky ruled the orchestra with an iron baton, and while this firmness did not endear him to the players, it engendered respect. There was never any doubt as to who was boss.

Orchestral musicians, by nature tempermental, resent the iron fist. Nevertheless, if the orchestra is to play well, it cannot be composed of a hundred prima donnas.

A conductor who maintains absolute control no matter how moving the score can control the effects and balance the various parts. It is he who underlines the melody, focuses the harmonic and contrapuntal elements, and leads the musical development. He must indicate the rhythm, the dynamics, and the expressive qualities. The conductor must constantly be occupied with getting the composer's thoughts and emotions across to the audience.

No one can fail to see that music moves Mr. Munch deeply; but it is his action as a conductor rather than his reaction as a music lover which counts.

Spur-of-the-moment sensitivity on the part of the conductor leaves the orchestra in some doubt as to what may happen in the fever of performance. If a composition is prepared in one way at rehearsal then abruptly changed in performance, the players are forced to get through the work in as professional a manner as possible, whatever may be the quality of the tone.

PROV - PHILLY

85

Cir. (D 46,023) (S 174,898)

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 10 1954

Husband-Wife Team Coming With Symphony

A HUSBAND - AND - WIFE team, Richard Burgin and Ruth Posselt, will appear respectively, as conductor and soloist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra: third Providence concert of the season, Tuesday night, Jan. 19, in Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

It is an "act" which Burgin, the orchestra's associate conductor and concertmaster, and Miss Posselt, violinist, have made unique in the concert world. Besides conducting the orchestra many times, Burgin has often been its violin soloist, too.

Miss Posselt's contribution to the program will be as solo violinist in Lalo's colorful "Symphonie Espagnole." Burgin will introduce to local concert goers the Adagio from the posthumous Tenth Symphony by Gustav Mahler. The movement was restored from sketches preserved by the composer's widow and was recently played in Boston for the first time under Burgin's direction. Other works on the program are Weber's "Oberon" overture and Tschaikowski's "Italian Caprice."

Tribute to Jacques Thibaud

The Lalo work will begin tribute to the late great French violinist, Jacques Thibaud, who played it on his last appearance with the Boston orchestra. He coached Miss Posselt in the piece and in other ways had an influential part in her career.

"When Jacques Thibaud heard me play in Boston, in 1932, he urged me to come to Europe and offered to arrange my debut in Paris and other major music capitals," Miss Posselt says.

A few months later she had her Paris debut with L'Orchestre Symphonique de Paris under Pierre Monteux, playing the Paganini Violin Concerto. This led to further recitals in Paris and debuts in London, Amsterdam, The Hague, Vienna, Berlin and Milan. Thibaud introduced her to Pablo Casals who arranged a tour of Spain for her.

"One of the experiences I most enjoyed with Thibaud," Miss Posselt recalls, "was my participation in the Bach Double Violin Concerto and other works for two violins in concerts throughout Europe, and I spent two summers with him and Mme. Thibaud at St. Jean-de-Luz where I concentrated on French repertoire."

Miss Posselt, who has risen to the front rank of American violinists, was born in Medford, Mass., and launched her career as a child prodigy in Boston and New York. Since 1929, when she appeared as soloist with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, she has made many tours in recitals and as orchestral soloist.

First Public Appearance

Burgin likewise began his musical career as a child. He made his first public appearance at the age of 11 years with the Warsaw Philharmonic Society. He studied with Joachim in Berlin and with Auer in Leningrad, becoming the latter's assistant teacher some years later in Stockholm and Christiania.

He has been concertmaster and soloist with the Christiania (now Oslo) Philharmonic Society and orchestras in Russia, Finland and Sweden. Before becoming concertmaster of the Boston Symphony in the fall of 1920 he served abroad under Nikisch, Strauss, Schneevoigt and Sibelius. In addition to his orchestral and solo chores he has been active in chamber music in Norway and Sweden. He organized the Burgin String Quartet in Boston in 1921.

Philadelphia Inquirer

Boston Symphony Hailed At Annual Concert Here

By MARION KELLEY

The Boston Symphony paid its annual visit to Philadelphia last night and entertained a large group of enthusiasts with a program both interesting and diversified. Conductor Charles Munch was on the podium at the Academy of Music directing with his usual exuberance and breath-taking energy.

It has been customary for the Bostonians to introduce a new work on their visits here. Last evening's selection had a twofold interest. Samuel Mayes, former first cellist with the Philadelphia Orchestra, now in the same capacity with the Boston Symphony, was soloist in Dmitri Kabalevsky's "Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra."

ADDS TO STATURE

The work of this contemporary composer had much to recommend it and Mayes played with style, musicianship and artistry. He has added immeasurably to his musical stature in the past few years and was recalled several times to acknowledge applause. Kabalevsky's composition builds musically and dramatically and it received a rich and imaginative reading at the hands of director and musicians.

Mozart's "Divertimento for Strings" opened the program, a wistfully melodic piece with overtones of driving energy and tender warmth, it was an apt selection to highlight the beauty and coordination of this orchestra's string section. Debussy's "Iberia" was played with all the vibrant energy that marks the individual musical structure of this composer's work.

Brahms Symphony No. 2 was, perhaps, the choice of the audience. From an atmosphere of gentle contemplation in the opening bars, to the carefree good humored exhilaration of its final notes, it provided a lovely musical experience.

PROLONGED APPLAUSE

If Conductor Munch did not always strive for precision of detail, the over-all picture was an enchantingly transparent one musically and never lost its hold on the audience. His dynamic personality was graphically reflected in his direction and his musicians responded handsomely, which added up to an evening of exciting musical entertainment.

Prolonged applause recalled Conductor Munch for repeated acknowledgement, which he shared with his musicians.

Cir. (D 693, 104) (S 680,530)

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN

JAN 13 1954

Samuel Mayes, 'cellist soloist at Boston Symphony concert.

Munch Leads Boston Orch. At Academy

By MAX de SCHAUENSEE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished conductor, Charles Munch, put in one of its rare and welcome appearances at the Academy of Music last night.

People are not as tough and rugged as they were some years ago, consequently only a moderate sized audience faced the bitter winter weather that stalked the streets, but what was lacking in actual numbers was made up for by a heartwarming enthusiasm.

Mr. Munch opened his program with an another lovely reading of Mozart's Divertimento in D Major. Munch is an arresting musical personality; everything he does cannot fail but interest. His Mozart was serene and distinguished indeed.

The Bostonians' performance of Debussy's "Iberia" was also deserving of the highest praise. Such clarity of texture, such delicacy of phrasing were altogether exceptional.

Soloist last night was an old Philadelphia favorite, 'cellist Samuel Mayes. Mr. Mayes was affectionately greeted by the audience as he launched himself into the Philadelphia premiere of Kabalevsky's Concerto for Violincello and Orchestra. The 'cellist has matured since he was here. He played with a breadth and a mastery of his instrument only at the command of a very few players. Particularly fine were his hushed decrescendos.

The Kabalevsky's piece is pure papier-mache. It is best in its rather appealing largo, but on the whole this is a musical paste-pot job.

The concert concluded with an exciting but uneven playing of the Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D Major. Mr. Munch achieved some beautifully fashioned passages, but there were other moments open to question, and some of the final movement was driven beyond the point of orchestral beauty.

The audience tendered the distingushed visitors an ovation after the final cumulative mass of sound.

Cir. (D 34,774)

This Clipping From
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

DEC 17 1953

TODAY'S BIRTHDAYS

By AP Newsfeatures

ARTHUR FIEDLER

ARTHUR FIEDLER, born Dec. 17, 1894, in Boston. Conductor of the famed "Pops" concerts which play everything from Bach to boogie-woogie, he has been called by his first name by his "Pops" audiences since he started the concerts in 1930. He studied in Vienna and Berlin, but returned home at the age of 19 to play second violin in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He served in the U. S. Army in World War. I.

Cir. (D 643,985) (S 1,124,787)

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

JAN 13 1954

WEDNESDAY MORNING, JAN

Hear Boston Symphony

By MARION KELLEY

The Boston Symphony paid its annual visit to Philadelphia last night and entertained a large group of enthusiasts with a program both interesting and diversified. Conductor Charles Munch was on the podium directing with his usual exuberance and breath-taking energy.

It has been customary for the Bostonians to introduce a new work on their visits here. Last evening's selection had a twofold interest. Samuel Mayes, former first cellist with the Philadelphia Orchestra, now in the same capacity with the Boston Symphony, was soloist in Dmitri Kabalevsky's "Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra."

ADDS TO STATURE

The work of this contemporary composer had much to recommend it and Mayes played with style, musicianship and artistry. He has added immeasurably to his musical stature in the past few years and was recalled several times to acknowledge applause. Kabalevsky's composition builds musically and dramatically and it received a rich and imaginative reading at the hands of director and musicians.

Mozart's "Divertimento for Strings" opened the program, a wistfully melodic piece with overtones of driving energy and tender warmth, it was an apt selection to highlight the beauty and coordination of this orchestra's string section. Debussy's "Iberia" was played with all the vibrant energy that marks the individual musical structure of this composer's work.

Brahms Symphony No. 2 was, perhaps, the choice of the audience. From an atmosphere of gentle contemplation in the opening bars, to the carefree good humored exhilaration of its final notes, it provided a lovely musical experience.

PROLONGED APPLAUSE

If Conductor Munch did not always strive for precision of detail, the over-all picture was an enchantingly transparent one musically and never lost its hold on the audience. His dynamic personality was graphically reflected in his direction and his musicians responded handsomely, which added up to an evening of exciting musical entertainment.

Prolonged applause recalled Conductor Munch for repeated acknowledgement, which he shared with his musicians.

86

NYC TRIP

Cir. (D 389,011) (S 258,546)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

JAN 1 4 1954

WORDS and MUSIC

By Harriett Johnson

Boston Symphony: Met's "Lucia"

Whatever excitement was generated by the Boston Symphony's concert last night in Carnegie Hall and the Metropolit[illegible] Opera's return to "Lucia di Lammermoor" [illegible]'s absence was tempered by the sudden news [illegible] the opera after tonight's

Posselt [illegible] Bostonians

With Charles Munch conducting, the Boston Symphony returned to Carnegie Hall last night for the first of three concerts hereabouts. Munch began with a spirited performance of a delightful Mozart [illegible] in D Major for Strings [illegible] continued with the picturesque "Symphonie Espagnole" for Violin and Orchestra with Ruth Posselt as soloist. The music was played in memory of Jacques Thibaud, the veteran violinist, who was killed some months ago in a plane accident in Europe.

Possibly because of the circumstances, Miss Posselt's performance, though highly skilled technically and musically, and distinguished by a beautiful tone, lacked something in fire, abandon and Spanish flair.

This Clipping From
HERALD TRIBUNE N.Y.

JAN 1 4 1954

CONCERT AND RECITAL

By Jay S. Harrison

BOSTON SYMPHONY
CARNEGIE HALL
Orchestral concert last night. Conductor: Charles Munch. Soloist: Ruth Posselt, violinist. The program:
Divertimento in D major for strings, K. 136 .... Mozart
Symphonie Espagnole for violin and orchestra .... Lalo
Miss Posselt
Symphony .... Dutilleux
(New York premiere)
"Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2 .... Ravel

The Bostonians

The Boston Symphony Orchestral returning to Carnegie Hall last night under its director Charles Munch brought with it a new symphony by the French composer Henri Dutilleux, a lady violinist, and works by Mozart and Ravel. All of them had their engaging aspects, though none save possibly the Ravel, which I did not hear, could be counted an unqualified success. At almost every point, in fact, limiting factors arose to obscure what might have been an event for connoisseurs to note in their diaries.

Mr. Dutilleux' Symphony, a local premiere, is openly the work of an extraordinarily gifted young [illegible] is a strong piece—[illegible] bold in design and skillfully made. There is nothing silly about it, nothing vapid or weak. But for all its ringing moments it does not quite come off. The fault, I imagine, rests with Mr. Dutilleux' almost inordinate passion for orchestral color and his huge talent for dispensing it liberally. As a result, his preoccupation leads him to dwell endlessly on sonority effects that are not only means but ends as well.

One finds, consequently, a passacaglia that is a mosaic of color tiles rather than a firmly woven fabric of contrapuntal lines. And it is followed by a scherzo that marks time fatally when it begins to examine, in detail, sounds produceable by strings playing a fugato based on rapid repeated notes. So it is with the iridescent and elegiac slow movement and the pulsing finale. All of them are bogged down by Mr. Dutilleux's lavishness and his reckless prodigality with vibraphones, harps, celestas, pianos and the whole complement of symphonic hues.

For her part, Miss Posselt, the evening's soloist, chose to present a piece for which she is not temperamentally equipped. The "Symphonie Espagnole" needs for its performance a brand of pseudo-Gypsy fire, in a massive tone and considerable sauciness of expression. What it does not need is timidity, calculated elegance and rhythmic reticence. These, unfortunately, were what Miss Posselt provided. Indeed, the rendition had its charms, was secure in pitch and phrase; but it simply did not sail. And a non-sailing "Symphonie" is no "Symphonie" at all.

The evening [illegible] with a rather graceless [illegible] weighty Mozart whose [illegible]bility was mainly derived [illegible] succession of over accented [illegible]eats. The piece, however, [illegible] one of Mozart's best. [illegible]earing it played even listlessly was a reminder once again that the weakest of Mozart is incomparably more regal than most of the drivel produced in his time.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 1 6 1954

MUSIC

Munch Leads Boston In Academy Concert

By PAUL AFFELDER

That Charles Munich has a particular way with French music was demonstrated once again last evening, when he brought his Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Academy of Music for its second concert of the season.

The principal work on the diversified program was Saint-Saens' Symphony No. 3 in C Minor, with Organ. This is a fairly massive symphony, requiring a large orchestra. It is not performed too frequently nowadays, which is probably just as well, for one wonders how well it would hold up if heard too often. Once in a while, however, it makes a refreshing change from the standard fare—refreshing, that is, if its interpretation is in capable hands.

Fortunately, such was the case last night. Though he got off to a rather slow-paced start, allowing some of the seams to show in the opening section, the conductor drew a wonderfully rich, singing tone from his strings in the slow movement. The Scherzo had spirit and brilliance, while the finale had a triumphant grandeur to it, even though there was an occasional lack of proper balance between the various choirs, with the brasses sticking out quite blatantly.

Edouard Nies-Berger, who played the important organ part, deserves credit for the finely controlled manner in which he handled the electronic instrument assigned to him. Only in the few very heavy chords at the opening of the finale was one conscious that this was an ersatz organ, a necessary substitute for the Academy's wheezy, out-of-tune instrume[illegible] Haydn '[illegible]

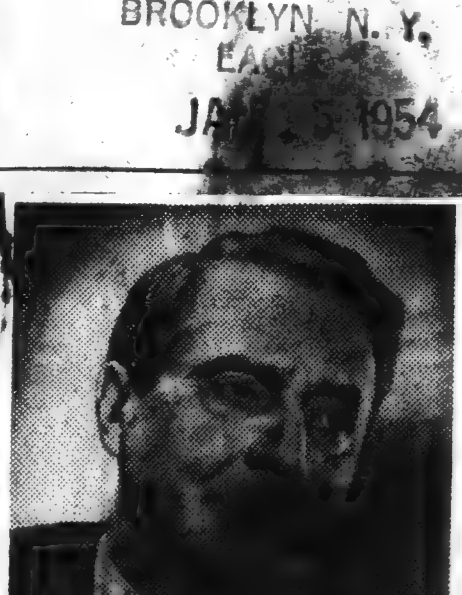
Principal soloist of the evening was the French 'cellist, Paul Tortelier, who was a member of the Boston orchestra just prior to World War II. His delivery of the Haydn Concerto in D Major showed him to be the possessor of steely fingers, but also a steely, wiry, often scratchy tone. He had a fair stylistic grasp of this difficult score, though the cadenzas he employed — could they have been his own?—were rather too modern in harmonic structure for this 18th century work. Nor was his intonation always flawless. Altogether, it was not too impressive a performance.

This same composer was also represented indirectly in another composition, Brahms' magnificent Variations on a Theme by Haydn, which Mr. Munch and his musicians delivered in a stately, unhurried fashion. There were moments when we would have liked a warmer, more evenly rounded tone, button the whole, it was an eminently satisfying interpretation.

Mr. Munch opened the program with his own tastefully subdued transcription of Bach's Chorale-Prelude and Chorale, "Das Alte Jahr Vergangen ist" ("The Old Year Is Past") sandwiching the simple Chorale between repeated statements of the composer's more intricate elaborations on the melody.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EA[illegible]

JA[illegible] 5 1954



CHARLES MUNCH conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening at the Academy of Music in its second program of the season.

Cir. (D 145,658)

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

JAN 15 1954

The Audience Almost Swept Munch Off His Feet

It seemed as tho Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony were out to reward those hardy music lovers who turned up for the second concert of the season last night despite snow, sleet, rain and slush. For the orchestra gave such an inspired performance of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2 that the audience burst into shouts of "hurrah" and "bravo." The[illegible] applauded and cheered for almost [illegible] minutes.

It was by far [illegible] demonstrative audience [illegible] Hall has housed in so[illegible].

There was plenty [illegible]eason for it. From the opening "Daybreak," which glowed with color, to the closing "General Dance," in which the orchestra gives a sort of impressionistic [illegible] session, the suite built up to the point where the audience was just about sitting on the edge of the seats. The solo work of Doriot Anthony, first desk flute, and other first desk players was of the highest caliber.

THE WASHINGTON DAILY

The opening works—Mozart Divertimento in D major for strings and Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" Suite—also received fine performances. Tho [illegible] century apart, they had much in [illegible] and contrasted effectively [illegible] the "Daphnis and Chloe." Br[illegible] Symphony No. 2 closed the program.

MILTON BERLINER

NYC TRIP

Cir. (D 226,101) (S 261,386)

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

JAN 15 1954

News of Music

Boston Symphony Is Delight In Little-Known Mozart Work

By Day Thorpe

[illegible] Symphony Orchestra, Charles [illegible] at Constitution [illegible] Divertimento for [illegible] D Major, K. 136, Mozart; [illegible] de Couperin, Daphnis [illegible] Suite No. 2, Ravel; Sym-[illegible] 2 in D Major, Opus 73.

[illegible] large American orchestras [illegible] confine their repertoire [illegible] Mozart to a few overtures, a half dozen symphonies and a like [illegible] of concertos. It is a [illegible] for thus one hears only a small section of Mozart's very [illegible] for orchestra; it is also [illegible] for at the other extreme from the divertimento heard last night, there are serenades calling for a larger orchestra than any of the symphonies. These imposing and suitable works are never heard.

An excellent sample of this seldom-heard Mozart opened last night's concert of the Boston Symphony under Charles Munch in Constitution Hall. The "Divertimento, K 136," whether it was originally intended for four solo strings or for large string band—as, of course, it was played by the orchestra—is a piece of the most immediate and ravishing beauty.

Its simplicity should not be attributed to the fact that Mozart was only 16 when he wrote it. Earlier pieces are much more imposing and intricate, but it was one of Mozart's proudest boasts that he could write in any style, could imitate any music whatever. Here he was writing an Italian serenade.

Dr. Munch led the unexcelled string section of the Boston Orchestra in a performance that was a delight in every way.

Ravel could well have been pleased with Dr. Munch's reading of "Le Tombeau de Couperin." It was an interpretation that seemed to point out that Ravel's homage to Couperin is not a reference to or imitation of the music of the earlier French master. Ravel's music and even the names of the movements are not at all characteristic of Couperin. What is characteristic is the exquisitely idiomatic writing for orchestra as Couperin's suites are the perfection of idiomatic harpsichord writing.

After a colorful and dazzling "Daphnis and Chloe" that showed off the brilliance of the orchestra more effectively than any other piece of the evening, Dr. Munch turned to Brahms. The second symphony was played with a clarity and easy grace that would be the envy of many conductors but which would hardly be even desired by others. Dr. Munch's Brahms is less weighty and deliberate than the Brahms one often hears. Perhaps this lightness of touch is a needed corrective. The romantic and passionate slow movement was particularly appealing.

The Sadler's Wells Ballet and the weather apparently took a toll of the normal large house the Boston Symphony can draw. The loyal audience, however, showed its approval of the concert by an ovation unusually vociferous and prolonged.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK TIMES
JAN 17 1954

TORTELIER OFFERS HAYDN CONCERTO

French 'Cellist Is Heard With Boston Symphony Conducted by Munch—Organist Plays

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Charles Munch, conductor. Paul Tortelier, 'cellist. Edouard Nies-Berger, organist. At Carnegie Hall.
Chorale Prelude and Chorale....Bach-Munch
Variations on a Theme of Haydn....Brahms
Concerto for 'Cello in D major........Haydn
Symphony No. 3 in C minor, with organ, ...Saint-Saens

Paul Tortelier, French 'cellist who was heard here nine days ago in recital, was the soloist yesterday afternoon with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall. He played the Haydn 'Cello Concerto in D major and earned a big hand, with the members of the orchestra applauding as heartily as any.

One could understand his fellow musicians' praise. His tone is not as velvety as that of some other 'cellists, but in the clearness with which he articulates each note, even the very fast ones that come close together in a trill, he is an exceptional performer.

Then, too, he plays with the sort of authority that has a two-fold effect. It enables him to be a sufficiently dominant figure to balance a full orchestra, and it fixes the listener's attention. Thus his performance was an engrossing experience, even though on other occasions the work has been played with greater warmth and a more spontaneous lyricism.

The program was conducted by Charles Munch and, although it contained largely familiar works, it was exceptionally well constructed. This fact became especially apparent at the end, when the chorale-like finale of the Saint-Saëns Symphony in C minor with Organ recalled the Bach chorale that had opened the program.

The Bach work, "The Old Year Is Past," transcribed by Mr. Munch, was quiet and contemplative; it provided a restrained and reverent basis on which Mr. Munch was constantly able to build. Thus he could move to Brahms Variations on a Theme of Haydn (played with great variety of effect from variation to variation), to the Haydn Concerto and finally to the rather orotund Saint-Saëns, where one was ready for the impact of all the resources of the huge [illegible]tra, the kettle drums, the [illegible]pets, etc., all joining with [illegible] organ in the big finale.

The orchestra played beautifully all afternoon and the audience listened with the deepest sort of appreciation.

R. P.

Jan 17 Trib 54

City Opera to Do Copland Work

Aaron Copland's opera, "The Tender Land," commissioned through the League of Composers by Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein 2d, will have its world premiere in the New York City Opera's 1954 spring season. Music now being composed on commissions given through the league includes a major work by Henry Cowell for chorus, orchestra and soloists; a violin sonata by Peter Mennin; works for chamber orchestra by Elliott Carter and Leo Smit, and a work for string orchestra by Irving Fine.

by Alessandro Scarlatti, Templeton

This Clipping From
HERALD TRIBUNE N.Y.

JAN 15 1954

CONCERT AND RECITAL

By Jay S. Harrison

BOSTON SYMPHONY

CARNEGIE HALL
Orchestral concert Wednesday night. Conductor: Charles Munch. Soloist: Ruth Posselt, violinist. The program:
Divertimento in D major for strings, K. 136 ....Mozart
Symphonie Espagnole for violin and orchestra ....Lalo
Miss Posselt
Symphony ....Dutilleux
(New York premiere)
"Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2....Ravel

The Bostonians

The Boston Symphony Orchestral returning to Carnegie Hall Wednesday under its director Charles Munch brought with it a new symphony by the French composer Henri Dutilleux, a lady violinist, and works by Mozart and Ravel. All of them had their engaging aspects, though none save possibly the Ravel, which I did not hear, could be counted an unqualified success. At almost every point, [illegible], limiting factors arose [illegible] obscure what might have [illegible] event for connoisseurs [illegible] note in their diaries.

Mr. Dutilleux's symphony, a local premiere, [illegible] openly the work of an extraordinarily gifted young man. [illegible] is a strong piece—assertive, bold in design and skillfully made. There is nothing silly about it, nothing vapid or weak. But for all its ringing moments it does not quite come off. The fault, I imagine, rests with Mr. Dutilleux' almost inordinate passion for orchestral color and his huge talent for dispensing it liberally. As a [illegible] pre-occupation leads him to dwell endlessly on sonority effects that are not only means but ends as well.

One finds, consequently, a passacaglia that is a mosaic of color tiles rather than a firmly woven fabric of contrapuntal lines. And it is followed by a scherzo that marks time fatally when it begins to examine, in detail, sounds producible by strings playing a fugato based on rapid repeated notes. So it is with the iridescent and elegiac slow movement and the pulsing finale. All of them are bogged down by Mr. Dutilleux's lavishness and his reckless prodigality with vibraphones, harps, celestas, pianos and the whole complement of symphonic hues.

For her part, Miss Posselt, the evening's soloist, chose to present a piece for which she is not temperamentally equipped. The "Symphonie Espagnole" needs for its performance a brand of pseudo-Gypsy fire, a massive tone and considerable sauciness of expression. What it does not need is timidity, calculated elegance and rhythmic reticence. These, unfortunately, were what Miss Posselt provided. Indeed, the rendition had its charms, was secure in pitch and phrase; but it simply did not sail. And a non-sailing "Symphonie" is no "Symphonie" at all.

The evening began with a rather graceless and weighty Mozart whose inflexibility was mainly derived from a succession of over accented downbeats. The piece, however, is not one of Mozart's best, but hearing it played even listlessly was a reminder once again that the weakest of Mozart is incomparably more regal than most of the drivel produced in his time.

This Clipping From
HERALD TRIBUNE N.Y.

JAN 17 1954

CONCERT AND RECITAL

Boston Orchestra

Charles Munch conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second matinee concert at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, presenting a program that included the Haydn-Brahms Variations, Haydn's D major Cello Concerto, and Saint-Saens' C minor Symphony No. 3.

Paul Tortelier was soloist in the Haydn concerto and he gave a most authoritative performance. His opening and closing allegro movements had a certain thin, shallow tone and some of the scrathiness that seems inevitable in a cello performance at high speeds, where the instrument's slow-geared vibrations don't have time to level out and sing. The slow adagio section was quite lovely, dark and rich of tone, full of beautifully turned phrases and subtlety of detail and nuance.

Mr. Munch [illegible] a fine reading of the [illegible] Haydn Variations, emph[illegible]terity of expressio[illegible] the peculiarly B[illegible] and sweetness [illegible] in the heart of this work. But every architectural feature was in place and highly illumined, as in a perfect draughtsman's rendering.

The Saint-Saens 3rd Symphony with organ played by E. Nies-Berger was quite splendidly given, and certainly the particular blend and austerity of tone that the Boston Orchestra brings—not to mention the disciplined esthetic viewpoint of Munch himself—does much to counterbalance the rather cloying esthetic of this work. Yet it seems a work far removed from today's taste and the increasingly classic trend of that taste toward 17th, 18th, and 20th century music, where selectivity and restriction are part of style and structure than these "sky's-the-limit" orchestrations where esthetics disappear altogether.

P. G-H

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 142,658)
This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN-Journal
JAN 20 1954

Music

Burgin Leads Boston Symphony; Violinist Ruth Posselt Soloist

By RUTH TRIPP

Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted the third concert of the orchestra's Providence series last evening at Veterans' Memorial Auditorium. Ruth Posselt, violinist, was the guest soloist and the occasion was a delightful evening of melodious, understandable music.

The program opened with Weber's overture to "Oberon" and the musicians played the familiar music with an elegance and formality which made it typically early 19th century. The horns were especially eloquent and Mr. Burgin's interpretation was followed meticulously by the musicians. There was a freshness about the piece that was good to hear.

Major Achievement

Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole for violin and orchestra was the main offering and here a major achievement can be credited to the Burgin family. Ruth Posselt played brilliantly, with absolute clarity of technique. She accomplished the difficulties of the writing with incredible ease and as far as the Lalo score permits, she made it a very impressive listening experience. One of the most fascinating parts of the performance was the perfect rhythmic balance between soloist and orchestra. This could be explained partly by Mr. Burgin's special feeling for the playing of a violin soloist and partly by the devotion of the musicians to Ruth Posselt's artistry. I have heard her play many times with the group and she never fails to receive an accompaniment which has a decided "plus" quality about it. She and her husband were recalled several times after the fine performance.

Balanced Discords

Mahler's "Adagio" from the Tenth Symphony was the work which reached the deepest into one's musical awareness. The writing, extremely complex, was made to seem credible and its discords were so skillfully balanced by the conductor that the effect was thrilling. The dark colors in the instrumentation were wonderfully contrasted with the light, high tones and one special chord in the climax of the piece seemed to include the complete spectrum of tone color. This conducting is one of the finest readings I have ever heard Mr. Burgin give and his players were highly sensitive to his direction.

The final number, Tchaikovsky's "Italian Caprice," was as warm and colorful as the landscape of the country it sang about. Here outstanding work was done by both the brass and the percussion sections. The audience left in a gay mood and one could hardly imagine a more stirring and enjoyable program for the mid-winter visit of the Boston Symphony here.

TIMES-HERALD—WASHINGTON, D. C.— FRIDAY, JANUARY 15, 1954

Boston Symphony Cheered

BY GLENN DILLARD GUNN

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony moved the audience gathered in Constitution hall Thursday night to a display of enthusiasm such as has not occurred in many seasons.

After the performance of Ravel's Suite No. 2 from the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe" the public burst into tumultuous shouting that was sustained for many minutes and did not subside until the orchestra had been called upon to acknowledge the applause with the conductor.

If this reaction to the Ravel ballet was the most excited response of the evening, it must be confessed that the grounds for this hysteria were many and ample. This is the score described by the late Walter Damrosch as "bejeweled music." The score glitters with orchestral colors which had not been heard until Ravel appeared upon the symphonic scene.

This music tests all the choirs of the orchestra. The flute must proceed with the speed of thought, to paraphrase Shakespeare. The other wood winds must perform similar feats of agility. The strings at all times are tested for all their tonal and technical responses, and in the climax of the final movement the brasses and the percussions are called upon for strenuous exertion.

It may not be assumed that this famous page of orchestral virtuosity aimed all its expressions at excitement. There were many measures devoted to the utmost subtlety of tone quality and of contrast; but the whole expression brings to the concert stage the urgency and the movement and the drama of the unseen ballet for which it was designed.

There was more Ravel on this remarkable program. The ballet suite was preceded by a series of dances offered to the French public which was quick to understand their nationalistic and racial significance. Under the title, "The Tomb of Couperin," Ravel created modern examples of the eighteenth century dance forms which this classic French master made immortal.

Ravel first wrote these dances for piano solo and originally there were six of them under titles many of which have disappeared from the art. The composer found it convenient to transcribe only four for the orchestra, omitting a somewhat unbrilliant fugue and a toccata. The latter obviously could not be effectively set for any other instrument. It is pure piano music. But the dances that were transcribed make exhaustive exhibition of the art of the oboe and of the flute and the conductor acknowledged the soloist performing on these instruments with a special gesture that invited them to share the applause with him.

The concert opened with orchestral art more ancient, but not less exacting. This was the Mozart Divertimento for strings alone. Munch and his remarkable string players made it a test of delicacy and of imaginative force practiced within the limitations of classic tradition. This prelude found a romantic echo in the program's final number which was the Symphony No. 2 by Johannes Brahams. The contrast between the purely classic, the colorful modern pages and the serene romance of Brahms was less drastic than might be imagined. For Brahms here sang simply and with deep Teutonic sentiment. He remained within the framework of the classic forms, but filled them with warm melody that was peculiarly characteristic.

Tribute must be paid to versatility of Charles Munch, who last year was awarded the highest honor that his nation can bestow upon a musician, a writer, painter or a statesman. He was made commander of the Legion of Honor.

5°

This Clipping From
NEW YORK TIMES
JAN 14 1954

MUNCH CONDUCTS DUTILLEUX WORK

Symphony Has Local Debut at Carnegie Hall—Mozart, Lalo and Ravel Offered

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Charles Munch conducting; Ruth Posselt, violinist. At Carnegie Hall.
Divertimento in D for Strings (K. 136) .... Mozart
Symphonie Espagnole .... Lalo
Symphony (first New York performance), ... Dutilleux
Daphnis et Chloe Suite No. 2 .... Ravel

By OLIN DOWNES

The novelty of the Boston Symphony concert last night in Carnegie Hall was the Symphony of Henri Dutilleux, played for the first time in this city. The symphony was composed in 1950-51 and played for the first time from manuscript the next year by the Orchestre National of Paris. It is a powerful conception, in a highly modern vein, and fortunate in that it does not attempt to ape classic symponic forms.

The old structure of the passacaglia and the theme and variations are used, but in unconventional ways, and with great concentration on an initial idea. The theme of the passacaglia of the first worked out to the last iota of its implications, harmonic, contrapuntal and rythmical, too. The end movement ends in a mysterious pianissimo, as all the movements do.

"The music emerges from the shadow in the first movement," the composer has said, "only to return whence it came in the very last ones. Thus there is established a transition between the real and the imaginary world. It is a little like the inception and unfolding of a dream." This psychological formula, Mr. Dutilleux implies, "results in a sort of involuntary symmetry."

The Symphony has a tragical aspect; fantastical, if not macabre, in the scherzo; of a brooding and introspective nature in the slow section movements. There is a resumption of the music of turmoil and tragedy in the last part, with its highly discordant theme and variations, and there is the tranquil conclusion, on a plain major tread, with the effect of peace and resignation.

There is no need to read a "program" or an inner "story" into this music. Nor is it necessary to try vainly at this movement to decide whether it is music that will live. But one test of a new score is whether the listener would like to hear it again. One would like to hear this symphony again, perhaps at the very beginning of a program when the mind and attention are at their freshest.

VIOLIN SOLOIST: Ruth Posselt, who appeared with Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony last evening.

The Strange Movement

Last night the first two parts of the score made the most immediate and powerful impression. Would the strange movement that follows, and the discordant finale, which at last fades into the silence, prove, with familiarity to be important music in its own right? Or only music that affects us by its dramatic implications? The composer's audacity and honesty of purpose siezed the audience last night, which gave the symphony prolonged applause.

But aside from the interests of the new symphony, the program opened delightfully. Mr. Munch had the enterprise to begin his concert neither with a thrice-familiar masterpiece of orthodox persuasion, nor a Bach Chorale-prelude thundered forth with all the power of the orchestra in a transcription.

The Mozart Divertimento was perfectly beautiful, and was finely played. Unfortunately, one cannot say the same of Ruth Posselt's tame, unimaginative and insensitive performance of the Lalo "Symphonie Espagnole."

The final performance of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" music, as need hardly be said, closed the concert brilliantly and to the pleasure of all concerned.

France Amerique Jan. 31. 1954

89

La musique

Charles Münch et Tortelier

par Edgard [illegible]EDER

HUIT ou dix jours se sont écoulés depuis les concerts de l'orchestre de Boston, mais leurs échos résonnent encore dans notre coeur qui bat un peu plus vite à l'évocation de ces souvenirs émouvants.

L'on sait que les musiciens de Boston constituent la meilleure association symphonique du monde. Tous, ils sont des virtuoses consommés de leurs instruments; l'unité de leur "esprit de corps" engendre une véritable symbiose sonore d'une homogénéité incomparable; et la souplesse avec laquelle ils obéissent aux moindres indications du "patron" leur permet d'épouser étroitement les courbes les plus sinueuses des textes soumis à leur regards scrutateurs.

L'on sait également qu'en la personne de Charles Münch, ces musiciens se sont donné comme chef un capitaine aussi habile que noble, digne de cette troupe d'élite.

Dans une association d'une si haute qualité, la solution des détails d'interprétation, quelle qu'en soit l'importance ou la complexité, est presqu'automatique. Pas plus qu'un aigle ne se soucie de prendre des mouches, Charles Münch n'a guère besoin de leur accorder son attention. Il dispose donc de suffisamment de liberté d'action et de pensée pour être stratège plutôt que tacticien, puisque la tactique prend soin d'elle-même! Ainsi, nous ne nous trouvons que rarement en présence de conceptions interprétatives d'une aussi vaste envergure ou d'une pareille solidité architecturale.

Le principal centre d'intérêt des deux programmes présenté par M. Münch était constitué par la Symphonie d'Henri Dutilleux, écrite en 1951 et donnée en première audition à New-York.

Dutilleux est un jeune compositeur français, gagnant du Grand Prix de Rome en 1938. Elève de Jean et Henri Gallon, ainsi que d'Henri Busser dont [illegible] de métier est aisément reconnaissable dans le travail de son disciple, Dutilleux est un grand maître du vocabulaire orchestral, harmonique et contrapuntique [illegible]. En fait, chacun des quatre mouvements de la Symphonie—Passacaille, Scherzo, Intermezzo, Variations—est un chef d'oeuvre de concentration, dans la pensée aussi bien que dans sa charpente. Dutilleux ne badine pas avec la musique; il prend son rôle de compositeur très au sérieux et il a ainsi réussi à écrire un ouvrage qui pourrait bien être une des pièces musicales importantes de ces dernières années. L'exécution dramatique et éloquente due à M. Münch fut en grande partie responsable du succès remporté par cette symphonie—succès inattendu, considérant qu'au premier abord l'accès de l'ouvrage n'est pas à la portée du grand public.

M. Münch nous fit entendre une exécution magistrale de la Symphonie en Ut mineur, avec orgue, de Saint-Saëns, dans laquelle nous retrouvâmes avec joie l'admirable organiste et musicien qu'est Edouard Nies-Berger. Il paraît que le "bon ton" (alias snobisme) en vigueur de nos jours exige une attitude condescendante vis-à-vis de Saint-Saëns. Trêve de sottises! Ecoutez donc cette symphonie sans parti pris et je parie un coquetier en bois des îles que vous serez em-

(Suite page 18)

Cir. (D 38,155)

This Clipping From
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

JAN 20 1954

Violin Soloist Given Ovation At Boston Symphony Concert

Ruth Posselt, solo violinist, received a boisterous ovation from a capacity audience after her performance of Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole, for Violin and Orchestra" with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Veterans' Memorial Auditorium, Providence.

The orchestra was directed by her husband, Richard Burgin, concert master, in the absence of Dr. Charles Munch, music director.

The first movement of the Symphonie Espagnole, allegro non troppo, was sparkling and the second movement was vivacious, joyous and playful, scherzando, allegro molto. The soloist received perfectly balanced support from the orchestra. But the third movement, andante, was the music that awoke the responses in the listeners. It opened with full chords in all the voices and the swelling brasses heaped tone on tone and then the mass moved away and left the soloist playing a plaintive legato that was almost sad.

Like Human Voice

Miss Posselt produced tones on the low string that were like a human contralto voice, beseeching, almost sobbing, but still holding a promise of future joy. Then the chords crashed and swelled again and the passage ended in a beautifully serene and fading disappearance. The final movement, allegro, built up the theme with an expanding crescendo that suddenly dropped to the single voice of the violin singing in a skipping and chattering staccato in a rollicking rhythm. Then came the finale in a blithesome, dramatic, sustained passage in a racing tempo. And the musicians put down their instruments and applauded the soloist as loudly and as long as did the audience.

The orchestra and Mr. Burgin demonstrated their mastery of dynamics in the beautiful "Oberon" Overture by Von Weber, and the solo horn opening was a masterpiece of articulation and shading. This was the opening work on the program and the orchestra showed by its performance why "Oberon" has been popular for more than 125 years. The opera "Oberon," written by Von Weber when he was dying, has long become discarded and is now little known. But the overture lives forever.

Dislikes 'Adagio'

The opening after-intermission piece was the "Adagio" from Gustav Mahler's "Tenth Symphony," and was published after his death in 1911. Last night's presentation of it was its first in Providence, and I say it should have been left at home. The whole Tenth Symphony was resurrected and the two first movements were adagio and "purgatorio" and this movement, adagio, was written in F-sharp major. From that, I judge, Mahler meant to not only haunt his listeners with the sepulchral music, but, also, he wanted to torture the musicians with all those sharps. The single tones were weird, the harmony was eerie, the theme was spectral and the rhythm, macabre. Requiescat in pace!

Tchaikovsky Work

The final work was Tchaikovsky's "Italian Capriccio," and was filled with the folk songs and street songs of Italy as interpreted for full orchestra by a Russian. Never were trumpets, horns and trombones more resplendent than in the opening which was the bugle call of the Royal Cuirassiers, Italian cavalrymen.

Although, after the introductory theme, the music wandered for a strain or two into the ponderous Slavic despondency inherent in Tchaikovsky, he captured the fire and brilliance of the Italian musical heritage in the following passages and the audience was fully assuaged for the irksomeness of the preceding Mahler work.

The Boston Symphony will play again in Providence Feb. 23.

C. H. L.

Cir. (D 215,218)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER

JAN 22 1954

PIERRE MONTEUX will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during winter vacation this week and next of Director Charles Munch.

Cir. (D 38,382)

This Clipping From
TROY, N. Y.
TIMES RECORD

JAN 23 1954

Boston "Pops" Orchestra To Play Feb. 2

The Boston "Pops" Tour Orchestra will for its second consecutive year open another national tour of more than 60 concerts at the RPI Field House Feb. 2. The orchestra, probably the most famous ensemble dedicated to the lighter symphonic classics in the world, will be under the direction of its regular conductor, Arthur Fiedler, who has guided the group since 1930.

Though its repertory includes the lighter classics, the orchestra has been renowned since its parent organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was only four years old.

The 'Pops' orchestra was started as an experiment in the European tradition where it was popular to combine a program of light music with food and drink.

Under a series of outstanding conductors the Boston 'Pops' Orchestra became such a drawing attraction that even prohibition failed to diminish the crowds that turned out for the weekly concerts.

Now an established tradition in Boston, Symphony Hall there is transformed from the staid, formal concert hall which it is, to a lighter and gayer concert site. Theater chairs are replaced with green tables and gold chairs and the concert hall is repainted accordingly. In such an atmosphere the 'Pops' welcomes in the spring to the tinkle of glasses and the hum of light conversation.

An outstanding program of light music has been planned for the 'Pops' Orchestra's second consecutive concert here in as many years.

Cir. (D 58,486) (S 120,102)

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

JAN 24 1954

Boston Pops Schedules RPI Concert

When a good share of America's symphony orchestras are feeling the press of the tight dollar and the vanishing millionaire, the Boston Pops still continue to be one of the nation's most successful symphonic ventures.

The orchestra, which will play at the RPI Field House in Troy, Feb. 2. has been conveying light music to Bostonians since 1885. In fact, it is part of the tradition of the city.

Oddly enough, the Pops brand of light music has never been successful over a long period of time in other cities for one reason or another.

The Pops has also had its doldrums, but since the coming of Conductor Arthur Fiedler some 24 years ago, there have been few financial worries.

RECORDS "VELVET"

The operating costs of the orchestra are usually satisfied by the nightly concerts during May and June in Boston's Symphony Hall, while the Pops more than 260 recordings are generally considered "velvet."

Cir. (D 132,080) (S 252,411)

This Clipping From
OMAHA, NEBR.
MORNING WORLD-HERALD

JAN 24 1954

Fiedler . . . Sign of spring.

Boston Pops Concert Here

'First-Time' Treat Set for February 15

Omaha and Nebraska music lovers are in for a "first-time" treat next month when the Boston Pops Orchestra comes to town.

Currently on its second national tour, the famed orchestra will play a concert February 15 at Technical High School auditorium. Omaha was not on the 1952-53 itinerary.

90 90

Music in Review

By TUCKER KEISER

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned from a mid-season tour yesterday afternoon for the 13th in their current series of concerts. The first part of the program, the content of which displayed a nice sense of balance and contrast, included Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride" and Dvorak's Cello Concerto, with Pierre Fournier as soloist. The second half juxtaposed a contemporary American score, Berger's "Ideas of Order," and Elgar's "Variations on an Original Theme."

I have recently been lamenting the absence of American composers from our programs, and I am, of course, pleased that Mr. Munch included this brief American composition to bring to a grand total of three the number of such works played during the first 13 concerts of this year. It is significant that all three had much in common: considerable cleverness in scoring, extreme economy in use of materials, and complete aridity in emotional content.

Mr. Berger, who was in the audience and acknowledged the modest applause, develops a three-note motif, which he prefers to call a "guide-post," in a composition with four distinct sections. Like the volume of poetry by Wallace Stevens from which this musical essay takes its name, "Ideas of Order" has much more head than heart. None of the instruments are allowed to dwell on a theme long enough to develop any affection for it, and the result is a tonal austerity so severe and so monotonous that one would welcome an oasis of melody.

It should be remembered that there are more active composers in the United States than in any other country in the world, and Mr. Munch could profitably investigate other styles of American composition.

Whatever its deficiencies, the Berger piece was so different in expressiveness from the Elgar Enigma Variations which followed as to provide an excellent programmatic setting for the latter work.

Except for several passages in which the free-wheeling tympani and brass sections cut loose, this was a remarkably fine performance of a wonderfully varied Victorian work. Two of these musical portraits of Sir Edward Elgar's musical friends, the fifth and the ninth, gave the string section an opportunity to achieve that fine sonority of which they are capable, an opportunity which they seized upon with both hands.

In "The Bartered Bride" Overture, the strings again dug in with such savage energy that it did not seem absolutely necessary to whip up the tempo.

This is an auspicious year for cellists; we have had three so far, playing Haydn, Kabalevsky, and Dvorak concertos. Mr. Fournier is a fine cellist whose performance was greeted with rounds of applause. The Dvorak Concerto, a sentimental and dated composition, owes its existence on our programs to the fact that the cello repertoire is unfortunately limited. 'Comparisons, as Shakespeare did not say, are inevitable, and I must say that, excellent as the two visiting French cellists were, the playing of our own superb Samuel Mayes has yet to be surpassed.

Vets to Address Advertising Club

Stories of life in

SATURDAY, JANUARY 23, 1954 Art—Music—Theater 11

Fournier Soloist at Symphony

Cellist Acclaimed in Concerto by Dvořák

By Harold Rogers

Pierre Fournier has a glowing place in the upper echelons of cello playing. As soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon he gave a superlative performance of one of the warhorse concertos—Dvořák's B minor, Opus 104.

M. Fournier has a supple, liquid tone that flows with warmth and great beauty. It is always gentle but never weak. He stirs the emotions with a myriad of moods. Melodies pour from his instrument effortlessly in flawless intonation. He does not dazzle with a display of technique. His is the perfected technique that subserves the musical meaning. His is the art that conceals art.

* * *

What an eloquent sighing quality M. Fournier elicited from the Adagio! However overblown Dvořák's romantic orchestration may sound today, the fact remains that he composed many gracious melodies for the cello in this concerto. They are so well written that one would have difficulty imagining them for any other instrument.

M. Fournier received masterful support from Charles Munch and the orchestra. Mr. Munch has the sixth-sense kind of sensitivity that is especially needed in the art of accompanying a soloist. M. Fournier was warmly acclaimed and recalled several times to the stage.

Mr. Munch opened with Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride," thus linking the first two pieces (this and the Dvořák concerto) in style and nationality. He took the Smetana at a lively clip, so much so that the doublebasses were slightly muddled at their entrance in the fugato, but the strings played with a feathered, peppery touch that tickled the ear.

The last half of the program opened with the first Boston performance of Arthur Berger's "Ideas of Order." His orderly ideas, ift he title be correctly applied to the music, are perhaps apparent when seen on the score. They are not apparent—at least on first hearing—in the music.

* * *

The piece sounds like a musical pastiche along Stravinskian lines. Mr. Berger parcels out a melody among several instruments, thereby achieving no variety of timbre but a choppy sameness that persists throughout a 12-minute duration. If I had not heard a great deal of contemporary music and were not an ardent supporter of it, I might distrust this negative reaction to Mr. Berger's music. However, the piece appears to be emotionally incommunicative, a labor without much love.

Mr. Munch concluded with a vivid reading—combining fire and moonlight—of Elgar's "Enigma" Variations. He delineated each of the 14 variations with gem-like polish, and several were so deftly handled that the listeners chuckled their approval.

* * *

Pierre Monteux will arrive in Boston next week and appear as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony in six performances. The first will be in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on Tuesday evening. For this concert he will conduct Henry Cowell's Hymn and Fuguing Tune, No. 3 (its first performance); Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; the Suite from Franck's "Psyche," and Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration." Mr. Monteux will also perform this program in Symphony Hall on Tuesday night, Feb. 2.

The next open rehearsal will be held Wednesday night at 7:30 in Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux will prepare the program for Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio," Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 1, Franck's "Psyche," and Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration." Leon Fleisher, who will make his Boston debut at the Friday-Saturday concerts, will also appear at the open rehearsal Wednesday.

On Sunday afternoon, Jan. 31, Mr. Monteux will conduct Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture and Fifth Symphony; also the Brahms' First Piano Concerto with Mr. Fleisher.

MUSIC

Fournier With Symphony; Berger Work Introduced

Thirteenth pair of concerts in the Friday afternoon-Saturday evening series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conductor at Symphony Hall. The program: Smetana: Overture to "The Bartered Bride"; Dvorak: Cello Concerto in B minor (Pierre Fournier, soloist); Arthur Berger: "Ideas of Order" (first performances in Boston); Elgar: "Enigma" Variations.

By CYRUS DURGIN

Cellist Pierre Fournier, as soloist in the Dvorak B minor Concerto, and the first local performances of Arthur Berger's "Ideas of Order," provide most of the news of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts this week. The new work by the composer who was once a reviewing colleague on the Boston Transcript and is now Associate Professor of Music at Brandeis, is, in his own words, something "between variations and the pre-Bach canzona or ricercar." The variation influence on the often-repeated (or suggested) motif of three notes is plain enough. Berger's procedure seems to involve metrical as well as rhythmical changes and those of melody. The music starts like a fragment of a waltz that never comes to blossom, and runs its course of 10 minutes [illegible] in contemporary manner and an idiom whose frequent but not unpleasant dissonance results, in part, from the rhythmic irregularity between the various moving voices.

My hunch is that there is more in this score than emerged yesterday, not necessarily through any fault of Conductor Munch but in good share from the rather chunky orchestration. Unless I am mistaken this faulty scoring conceals a good deal of detail and perhaps also contributes to the general impression of sluggish motion. At any rate, this is obviously music of logic and reasoning, if, on one hearing, not conspicuous for any quality of emotional expression.

Perhaps Mr. Berger will write music of greater tension, propulsion and character than this, and I know we have listened to a good deal of other modern music with less substance than this. To be perfectly candid, call it a minor academic work which probably will turn out to have its place in the composer's creative development. The title (or designation) simply means ideas of ordering tones, and is no reflection of the Wallace Stevens poems from whose title Mr. Berger took the phrase. The composer was present and bowed to applause.

Mr. Fournier gave a superb performance, marvelous in its silken tone, grace of bowing and most delicately articulated detail. Dvorak's Concerto, however, is long for all its beauty of Czech folk tunes, and the 37 minutes that it required didn't seem to be one second less. The soloist was recalled to the stage several times, which [illegible] richly deserved.

M[illegible]nch's conducting [illegible] the orc[illegible] performance [illegible] of the "accompaniment" [illegible] Concerto and [illegible] of Elgar's [illegible] Variations [illegible] absolutely first rate. The [illegible] was tidy, the tone sweet, [illegible] sufficiently rich; the interpretation of each score proper [illegible] and vigorous in character. Smetana's Overture, conversely, was vivaciously but coarsely done. One of the Smetana symphonic poems would have furnished a better Czechish opening-piece.

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, JANUARY 23, 1954

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 13th program of the 73d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Pierre Fournier, cellist. The program:

Overture to "The Bartered Bride"	Smetana
Concerto in B minor for Cello	Dvorak
"Ideals of Order"	Berger
"Enigma" Variations	Elgar

By RUDOLPH ELIE

While this concert did not represent a high point in the season it was notable at least for some very fine cello playing and the revival of as jolly and amusing a piece as there is in the whole repertoire. It also presented a new piece of American music by Arthur Berger but I am afraid it didn't make much of any impression on anyone.

The reason Mr. Berger's "Ideas of Order" didn't get over was not for any lack of melodic feeling but for an almost total lack of motion, of a sense of unfolding and developing and going anywhere. The idiom, which is Stravinskyesque to a degree (if Mr. Berger's name were not attached one might easily guess it to be one of that author's smaller ballet excerpts), is clean and clear and precise. The textures are always lucid and you can hear everything that goes on. The melodic substance, as indicated, is mostly attractive despite its fragmentary character, and it is given over more often than not to the first violins.

Nice Idea of Order

Everything, in fine, presents a nice idea of order. The only thing missing in all this, however, is any sense of continuity whatever. It is as if the composer put in a day's work on his score every other week, neglecting, when resuming his labors, to connect what had gone before. The piece, which seems a little too brief to assemble 104 men for, thus goes in fits and starts. The rhythms are jagged and faltering, the musical periods angular and choppy. You find yourself wanting to listen to it and you would, too, if only the composer didn't keep sticking his foot out and tripping you.

The composer was in the audience, a fact that usually results in a pretty good reception from the audience, but it couldn't quite bluff its way out of this one, and quickly lapsed into silence.

Great Taste

For Pierre Fournier, however, it was a quite different matter. He played Dvorak's weary Cello Concerto very beautifully but on a somewhat smaller scale than he might have, for it takes a lot of tone and bravura to pierce Dvorak's incomprehensibly poor orchestration. This orchestration, indeed, is one of the worst ever written by a major musician. With its noisy tuttis, its inept scoring everywhere, and its all around muddiness, it almost ruins the total effect, as for example at the very close when an orchestral entrance produces a most ugly sound. However, the melodic materials, if pretty obvious, are often very beautiful, and the accompanied soliloquies for the solo cello at the end for the second and third movements are atmospheric in the extreme. Mr. Fournier played with great taste and technical authority throughout and he was accompanied by Mr. Munch and the orchestra with as much help as Dvorak's inferior score allows.

I must say I was not very excited over the prospect of hearing Elgar's Enigma Variations again (it hasn't been done by this orchestra since 1946, but you can't turn on the FM without hearing it), yet it proved to be a most amusing and exhilarating affair. Mr. Munch somehow made each section of the work a tone poem that exactly caught the spirit of the portraits described in the program. So much so, indeed, he elicited chuckles of amusement at the end of several of the variations. And of course he brought the final section to a close with a great effect, organ and all. So the afternoon's conclusion was satisfactory all around even if the program fell into a lesser category as a whole.

Pierre Monteux is to conduct the next two concerts, his first program offering Leon Fleisher in Brahms' D minor Concerto with works of Beethoven, Franck and Strauss.

INTOWN SCREEN TIMETABLE

ASTOR — "Annapurna," 9:30, 11:35,

Cir. (D 74,995) (S 59,910)

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

JAN 25 1954

Defends Symphony

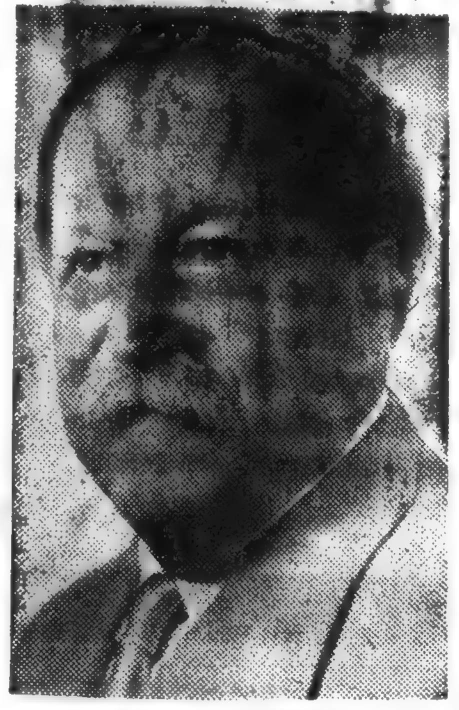
To the Editor of The Post:

Sir—I am sorry to hear that your illustrious critic is sad and frustrated that the tone of the Boston Symphony has declined.

I know personally many violinists in the Symphony who are playing their hearts out. Furthermore, Munch is a great conductor and by this method is getting wonderful results. Naturally his tone differs from Koussevitsky, but nevertheless critics abroad agreed on thesis trip that the orchestra was wonderful especially the string section.

Brockton. H. CASTER.

Pierre Monteux Is Guest Conductor During Munch's Mid-Winter Vacation



PIERRE MONTEUX

Pierre Monteux will be the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the two weeks to come, in which time Charles Munch will take his annual mid-Winter vacation. Mr. Monteux will conduct the concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, next Tuesday evening, the fourth Open Rehearsal on Wednesday evening at 7:30, the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, the Sunday afternoon concert, Jan. 31, and likewise on Tuesday evening, Feb. 2, in Symphony Hall.

His program for Cambridge consists of the Henry Cowell "Hymn and Fuguing Tune, No. 3," which will have its first public performance; Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the Suite from Franck's "Psyche," and Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration." This program will also be performed on Feb. 2.

At the 14th pair of concerts on Jan. 29 and 30 he will present Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio," Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 1 with Leon Fleisher as soloist; Franck's Suite from "Psyche" and Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration." At the Sunday afternoon concert on Jan. 31 he will conduct Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture and Fifth Symphony, and Brahms' First Piano Concerto with Leon Fleisher.

Open Rehearsal

The Boston Symphony will again open its doors to all comers for the fourth Open Rehearsal of the season on Wednesday evening, at 7:30. Pierre Monteux, as the guest conductor, will be preparing the Friday and Saturday program, including Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 1 with Leon Fleisher as soloist.

Mr. Fleisher, who will be making his first appearance in Boston, had an outstanding success recently in New York playing this same concerto. The rehearsal will afford the audience an opportunity to observe a great orchestra in actual preparation of the week's program.

THE CHRISTIAN SC

Fleisher Debut at

Monteux Guest Conductor; Young Pianist Acclaimed

By Harold Rogers

Pierre Monteux has come to Symphony Hall to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during Charles Munch's midwinter vacation. The two men have been closely associated ever since Mr. Munch assumed the directorship of the orchestra in 1949. They shared concerts during the European tour and the United States tour. Mr. Monteux has also made annual visits to Boston as guest conductor. The welcome mat is always out.

After Mr. Monteux opened yesterday's concert with a precise, urgent reading of Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio," Leon Fleisher, the young pianist from San Francisco, came on stage for his Boston debut.

He first played under Mr. Monteux's baton in 1943, when at the age of 15 he made his formal debut with the San Francisco Symphony. Yesterday he aquitted himself with great success in the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 1. The listeners gave him a cheering ovation, a phenomenon that occurs at the Friday afternoon concerts only when the audience is genuinely excited.

* * *

In the opening Maestoso he played with athletic strength, building tremendous crescendos that were always clearly delineated. Though this concerto has been termed "a symphony with piano obbligato," it was not so in Mr. Fleisher's performance. The piano part stood out in grand, sweeping lines while Mr. Monteux reined in the orchestra to a slightly subordinate degree. This teamwork produced a refreshing reading.

Mr. Fleisher gave us a serene legato in the Adagio—calm, controlled, a thoughtful reverie in floating pianissimos, soft as a cumulous cloud. One has heard more emotionally communicative performances—by Myra Hess or Solomon, for instance—but for sheer beauty of sound Mr. Fleisher's playing is already superb.

His virile drive and compelling momentum reappeared in the final Rondo to sweep the listener along on a crest of coruscations. One can readily see why he won the International Musical Competition that was sponsored by Queen Elizabeth of Belgium in 1952.

After the intermission Mr. Monteux, intentionally or otherwise, played two works that include the concept of glorified being in the hereafter. The first — César Franck's "Psyche" — presents the concept on a pagan basis. It is a musical representation of Psyche's love for Eros, the god of love, her disobedience in looking on his face, her punishment through losing him, and then — after she expires — her reunion with him in eternal happiness.

* * *

Though Franck's terms are restrained, compared to the musical tongue that most Frenchmen would use for this subject, the score has a sensuous lushness that is seldom found in his sacred writing, which is as it should be. The last time the Boston Symphony played it in this form—as a symphonic suite without chorus—was in 1922 under Mr. Monteux's direction. His revival of the work yesterday was altogether pleasing and polished.

The second piece — Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration"—presents the concept of glorification that is more in line with orthodox Christian teachings. The tone poem depicts the emotions of a man, who—shortly before his passing—relives in memory many portions of his life. Then the music, employing the otherworldly reverberations of a Chinese gong, depicts his freedom from turmoil and his ascent into more enlightened latitudes.

Mr. Monteux built the work to a glowing climax. Prior to its performance he announced that he was playing it in memory of his close friend, Jacques Thibaud, the violinist.

* * *

For the Tuesday night concert Mr. Monteux will conduct Henry Cowell's Hymn and Fuguing Tune, No. 3; Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; Franck's "Psyche" Suite, and the Strauss "Death and Transfiguration."

Next Friday and Saturday Tossy Spivakovsky will make his first appearance with the orchestra in Bartók's Violin Concerto. Mr. Monteux will open with Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto and will close with the Sibelius Second Symphony.

MUSIC

Jan 30

Monteux Symphony Guest Again; Fleisher Soloist

Fourteenth pair of concerts in the Friday afternoon-Saturday evening series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Symphony Hall. Pierre Monteaux again is guest conductor. The program: Beethoven: "Fidelio" Overture; Brahms: Piano Concerto in D minor (Leon Fleisher, soloist); Franck: Suite from the Symphonic Poem, "Psyche"; Strauss: "Death and Transfiguration."

By CYRUS DURGIN

Pierre Monteux again is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it was a pleasure for the Friday audience to welcome him back yesterday afternoon. One of the elder statesmen among masters of orchestral technic and interpretation, Mr. Monteux may always be counted upon for performances clear and elegantly styled, rich and luminous of tone, and often of high intensity.

Once again his authority made itself evident in a brisk but never over-wrought account of the Beethoven Overture, and in a reading of the granitic Brahms D minor Piano Concerto that made the most of this alternately intractable and beautiful score. No piano soloist could ask for a more sensitive and well-proportioned collaboration than Mr. Monteux supplied.

Leon Fleisher, soloist of the week, is something of a Monteux discovery. A native of San Francisco (where Mr. Monteux was conductor for many years) and now 24, Mr. Fleisher is highly gifted. His technic, though he never employs it to overshadow the music, is prodigious; his musical intelligence is keen, and he possesses the admirable quality of expressive individuality.

It would not be correct, I think, to say that he plays the Brahms Concerto in heroic fashion—that is a feat usually accomplished in middle-age—but he comes close to it. But he does maintain the continuity and the large contours of the music; he plays those famous and exacting trills masterfully, and he catches the mingled high seriousness and lyrical beauty which are in all of the slow movement and form contrasting interludes in the opening maestoso. It was a joy, indeed, to hear his bright, fluent and steady rhythm in the finale.

Mr. Fleisher seemed to be having trouble with his chair, which more than once looked in danger of coming apart, but that did not throw the pianist off his work. When the performance was over he was recalled several times by the applauding, cheering audience.

Mr. Monteux announced, just before "Death and Transfiguration," that he would like to perform the Strauss tone poem in memory of his colleague and friend, violinist Jacques Thibaud. In this grandiloquent but ever vital and moving score, Mr. Monteux reached his peak of eloquence. It was notable that he did not rush or drag this music, but kept faithfully to the indicated tempi. There had been some surprising roughnesses from horns and strings during the afternoon, but here the orchestra played nobly.

As for "Psyche," it is music of refinement and skill, suited to some tastes but not to mine. It is also dull music, and it is a good deal like everything that Franck ever wrote: Spirituality can be overdone in art, and that, I think, is what happened to "Psyche." The great masterpieces of art are produced in this world not by gods or saints, but by humankind.

Jan 30

MUSIC

91

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, gave the 14th program of the 73d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Leon Fleisher, pianist. The program:

Overture to "Fidelio" .... Beethoven
Concerto No. 1 in D minor, Op. 15 Brahms
Suite from "Psyche" .... Franck
"Death and Transfiguration," Op. 24 Strauss

By RUDOLPH ELIE

That indomitable, indefatigable octogenarian Pierre Monteux returned to town yesterday afternoon to offer us the longest and solidest program we have had in some time. The latch string was out, too; he was greeted with special applause for everything he did—and he did everything perfectly.

He brought with him a remarkable 25-year old pianist named Leon Fleisher to play the great D minor Piano Concerto composed by the 25-year old Brahms. (Coincidentally enough, "Death and Transfiguration" was composed by Strauss in his 25th year too).

It was evident from the very outset that Mr. Fleisher is a pianist of the first category. It is of course unsafe to attempt any extended appraisal of his qualities at this time for there are numberless pianists who can make a formidable effect with an orchestra but who, in the recital hall, prove to have no great musical development at all.

Huge Work

Just the same, from his approach to this huge work, the first movement of which is such a gigantic conception it conveys the notion it is ever trying to burst its boundaries, it was clear that the tall young pianist was in possession of a great gift. He has first of all immense power, but the power always in control. His traversal of the thundering unisons and trills of the initial statement, as well as of the full-fingered chords at full volume was exceedingly forceful yet never suggestive of pounding or overtaxing the limits of the instrument.

He had a most advanced sensitivity to the more lyrical qualities of the work, as well, producing a beautiful tone of a sustained but always clear and lucid quality. More than that, he got beneath the surface to evoke an atmosphere of the most radiant character.

It was, in fine, more than apparent that Leon Fleisher is a pianist of broad musical horizons, in every way as suited to the hugeness of Brahms' concept as to the composer's peculiarly difficult keyboard style. He used a trick chair that allowed him play the fast movements at a higher level than the low, which is a new twist to these eyes, and Mr. Monteux conducted the entire work without a score, which is also a new twist to these eyes. (And one, in lesser hands than Monteux's, that could lead to disaster at that). It didn't, however; save for some less than perfect attacks, which seemed to occur from time to time throughout the program, the accompaniment was perfectly integrated to make this reading of the D minor a memorable occasion. The pianist, incidentally, was given a prolonged ovation.

Blind Spot

It is curious that Caesar Franck's "Psyche" has not been performed at these concerts since 1919, considering how attractive it is. Since I have long owned to a singular blind spot for the music of Franck, which to me creeps endlessly through the deep chromatic jungles in search of a new idea (but never finds one), it is something of a revelation to discover a ray of charm in this particular work.

The preoccupation with chromaticism is still there, to be sure, and many of the familiar fragments that appear in all this composer's music are to be heard, too. But, apparently touched by the romance of the Psyche and Eros story (one wonders if the devout Franck ever actually read Apuleius' "The Golden Ass" from which the incident is taken), he here achieves a romantic glow of tenderness and imagery.

With its difficult opening moments and its protracted ending, Strauss "Death and Transfiguration" is one of the more treacherous works to perform, but leave it to the old master, Pierre Monteux. His authority with it was never in doubt, and the result was what might be properly referred to as the definitive performance. He remains with us next week, when he will present Bach's Third Brandenburg, Bartok's Violin Concerto (Tossy Spivakovsky, soloist) and Sibelius' Second.

---

*7

Music in Review

By TUCKER KEISER

When Pierre Monteux walked to the podium yesterday in Symphony Hall to conduct the first selection, Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio," the audience greeted him enthusiastically, some even standing to applaud. Mr. Monteux, who was permanent conductor of our orchestra from 1919 to 1924, has become our favorite guest conductor since his retirement after spending 25 years in San Francisco. His concerts are looked forward to each season now for many reasons; the orchestra never sounds better, his programs always contain interesting pieces, and his podium manner is quiet and restrained, no matter how impassioned the music.

It was evident after the opening bars of the Beethoven that Mr. Monteux had things going his way. Several faulty entrances by the winds did not spoil the overall effect of this overture to Beethoven's only opera. More frequently conductors choose the other two overtures which the composer wrote for the work rather than this particular one for their concert performances.

The soloist, Leon Fleisher, also covered himself with glory yesterday afternoon. He played the Brahms Piano Concert No. 1 in D minor, a work which imposes the most formidable difficulties for soloist and conductor. In perhaps no other piano concerto is the soloist confronted with such pianistic problems while integrating his piano part with the orcestra. Brahms here has used the piano as an orchestral choir in the musical development rather than treating the instrument as a star virtuoso witih orchestral accompaniment. Mr. Fleisher's trills, occurring inside chordal movement, were marvels of clarity; usually they are heard in even excellent readings of the concerto as mere blurs. Mr. Monteux and Mr. Fleisher achieved the most marvelous serenity in the Adagio, and though the conductor elected to take this section very slowly, the music never lost motion. The orchestra's playing here was the most beautiful we have had this season.

Cesar Franck's Suite from "Psyche" has not been heard in Symphony Hall in its entirety since Mr. Menteux conducted it in 1922. I found the four movements played yesterday a most worthwhile revival. Though in places it contains characteristic Franckian keyboard-type ramblings, the music is evocative and colorful in a semi-impressionistic way. In the first two sections, "Sommeil de Psyche" and "Psyche enlevee par les Zephirs," the orchestra gave us a round-toned pianissimo of ethereal loveliness. It would not be amiss if Mr. Monteux considered giving us the whole suite, including the choral portions omitted in yesterday's performance at a future visit.

Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" found the orchestra tonally in its most resplendent form. Mr. Monteux' dignified reading gave the flamboyant score great power and nobility.

92

Cir. (D 215,218)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER

JAN 26 1954

OPEN REHEARSAL

The fourth open rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow at 7:30 P. M. will enable an audience to watch Pierre Monteux, guest conductor, preparing the Friday and Saturday program: Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio," Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 1 with Leon Fleisher as soloist, the Suite from Franck's "Psyche" and Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration."

This Clipping From
BOSTON MASS.
HERALD

JAN 29 1954

Symphony Broadcast to Aid Orchestra

A month-long program of cooperation with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its drive for funds on the part of Radio Station WHDH will be climaxed Sunday, when the station will broadcast the orchestra's two-hour concert of Brahms and Bzethoven from Symphony Hall.

From 3 to 5 P.M., guest conductor Pierre Monteux will direct the orchestra in Beethoven's Fidelio Overture and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 in C Minor.

Following the intermission, pianist Leon Fleisher will be soloist in Brahm's Concerto No. 1 in D Minor.

The sharp change in WHDH's programming is being made to help the orchestra to weather the most severe financial crisis in its history.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.Y
1/30/54

Maître Monteux

SCRIABIN: "Poem of Ecstasy"; LISZT: "Les Préludes." Pierre Monteux conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. (RCA Victor LM 1775, $5.72.)

THE CONCEPT of a man rounding out a cyclical career has rarely been more applicable than in the case of Pierre Monteux, who has been making music-lovers on the Eastern seaboard happy after long, profitable years in San Francisco. The New York public has recently been reminded that Monteux was "returning" to the Metropolitan Opera House after three decades away, but it should be remembered that it was to Boston that he went when he left the Metropolitan, there to develop what was freely characterized as "a perfect instrument" when he turned it over to Serge Koussevitzky in 1923.

All of this is pertinent to this disc, one of the best that the Boston Symphony has produced in months. It wouldn't be diplomatic to make a host unhappy about the accomplishments of a guest, but it may be said that the orchestra plays splendidly for Monteux in his own manner and with a fine sense of willing participation in a mutually agreeable undertaking. I am particularly partial to the free-striding, beautifully balanced presentation of Liszt, to which Monteux has restored a bloom one listener—this one—had never expected to re-experience.

The Scriabin is another, and to my taste, less appealing story. Monteux was long credited with the only recording of it in the catalogue (with the San Francisco Orchestra, RCA Victor set 1270), and this is certainly as authoritative, with some details (especially the superb trumpet playing of Roger Voisin) that make it preferable to the recent excellent Capitol version by Manuel Rosenthal, as well as to the less exceptional Mitropoulos-New York Philharmonic on Columbia.

When Monteux swings into the full fervor of his Liszt (even more so than the Scriabin), the RCA engineers give us back a likeness of the Boston Symphony on a new level of realism. It may be mentioned too that the excellent annotations are the work of John N. Burk (his name was inadvertently omitted).

Cir. (D 9,524)

This Clipping From
N. TONAWONDA, N. Y.
NEWS

JAN 29 1954

Fiedler Will Open 25th Year With Boston Pops on Monday

By HENRY MINOTT

BOSTON (UP)— When Arthur Fiedler starts a 25-state tour with his Boston Pops Orchestra Monday, he will be opening his 25th season as Boston's famed Pop concert conductor.

Founded in 1885, the Boston Pops —short for popular—concerts have become as typical of Boston as baked beans. But it wasn't until 1930, when Fiedler took over the baton, that the concerts achieved their present popularity. Since then they have been almost solid sellouts, season after season.

First native Bostonian to become Pops conductor, Fiedler had a remarkable background of European musical culture. His father, Emanuel, and two uncles were all violinists in the Boston Symphony. One sister was a professional pianist. Another was professional 'cellist. A third was a talented violinist.

In 1915, at the age of 21, Fiedler joined the Boston Symphony as a violinist, becoming the "baby" of the orchestra. Later he studied violin, piano and conducting at the Royal Berlin Academy.

Using an orchestra of Symphony players, Fiedler established the free outdoor Esplanade concerts in 1929. Their huge drawing power led to his appointment as Pops conductor, succeeding Alfredo Casella, whose contract had expired.

More than 3,000,000 persons have attended Fiedler's Pop concerts and an additional 5,000,000 have attended his Esplanade programs.

A strict disciplinarian, the handsome Fiedler is a stickle rfor audience decorum. When a catcall greeted "The Star Spangled Banner" during an Esplanade concert, Fiedler hurried into the audience, upbraided the culprit and made him apologize.

Fiedler's hobby is rummage sales. Once, for 15 cents, he picked up a rare pioneer account of the music of the American Indians. For 20 cents at music markdown he bought a piece titled Gypsy Tango—"Jalousie", by Jacob Gade. Fiedler introduced it at the Pops, later recorded it, and this record's sales soared over the million mark.

Fiedler likes to breeze around in a convertible with the top down. Once as he drew near a garbage truck the driver yelled: "Hi, Arthur!" This pleased Fiedler, who said it proved he had "made the grade" with the Boston public.

Cir. (D 134,403) (S 160,827)

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS

JAN 31 1954

Berlioz Works Are Scheduled For Berkshires

BOSTON, Jan. 30. — The Sesquicentennial season of Berlioz will be observed by Charles Munch at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. next summer with a performance of a number of the great works of this composer.

The Damnation of Faust will be performed with the choruses from Hardvard and Radcliffe; Harold in Italy with William Primrose as viola soloist; the Fantastic Symphony, and the song cycle, Summer Nights. The Festival chorus of the Berkshire Music Center will appear with the orchestra in Romeo and Juliet in its complete form and in the famous Requiem, which will conclude the festival. The festival will extend from the first week of July through Aug. 15.

Since the birth of Hector Berlioz 150 years ago (Dec. 11, 1803), his artistic stature has risen increasingly in general estimation, notably in recent years.

Cir. (D 296,991) (S 352,103)

This Clipping From
ST. LOUIS, MO.
GLOBE-DEMOCRAT

JAN 31 1954

Goldberg as Soloist With Symphony

The scheduled appearances of Arthur Grumiaux as both violin and piano soloist with the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra have been cancelled because of the illness of the Belgian musician, who also has been forced to cancel his entire American tour. In his stead Szymon Goldberg, violinist, will appear with the orchestra Friday afternoon at 2 o'clock and Saturday evening at 8:40 o'clock in the Opera House of Kiel Auditorium.

Goldberg will be featured in Brahms' Violin Concerto in D Major. The program will include the overture to Mozart's "Don Giovanni;" Bizet's Symphony No. 1 in C Major, and Albert Roussel's Second Suite from "Bacchus and Ariane." The Roussel work had previously been scheduled but the other compositions represent changes in the program as originally announced.

Goldberg has made two previous appearances with the orchestra, the first in the 1950-51 season, the other a year later. He was born in a village near Warsaw where a roving cantor heard him playing a mandolin. Upon the cantor's advice, Goldberg acquired a violin and began study under Michalowicz, famed as a teacher of prodigies.

He made his first orchestral appearance at the age of 12 with the Warsaw Philharmonic and, at the age of 14, played three concertos on one program with the Berlin Philharmonic. He became concertmaster of the Dresden Philharmonic at the age of 16 and, at the age of 20, the youngest musician to hold the post with the Berlin Philharmonic.

After making his first tour of the United States in 1934, Goldberg planned to make his home in this country. While he was in Java for a concert, however, World War II came and he and his wife were interned in a Japanese prison camp for three years. After his release and after recuperating, he returned to the United States in 1948 for a concert tour.

Brahms' Violin Concerto was first performed on New Year's Day, 1879, in Leipzig, with the composer conducting. It is said to be evidence of the lifelong relationship between Brahms and the violinist, Joseph Joachim, who helped compose many of the passages and was the original soloist.

The Bizet work, once lost, was discovered by Conductor Felix Weingartner and has been played regularly since. It was written in 1885, when Bizet was 17 years old, and is regarded as remarkable for a boy of that age.

The Roussel suite, drawn from the second act of the ballet, was first presented in 1936 by the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra, under direction of Charles Munch, and in this country in 1946 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Munch again conducting. The complete ballet was created in 1930 and first presented the following year in Paris. It is based on a fantasy dealing with a maiden who first is carted off as a prize by Theseus and then by Bacchus.

Cir. (D 60,097) (S 112,417)

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

JAN 31 1954

Boston Pops Lists RPI Program

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

The Boston Pops Orchestra, under direction of Arthur Fiedler, will present the final major musical attraction of the season at the RPI Field House, Troy, Tuesday night, at 8:45 o'clock.

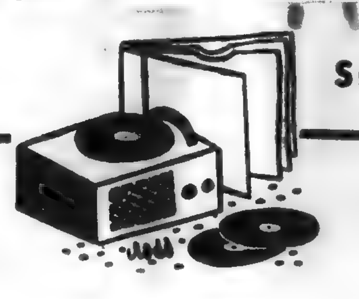
The program will include works by Wagner, Weber Handel, Offenbhch, Sibelius Tchaikowsky, Cole Porter ("Kiss Me Kate"); Gade and Elgar. The guest soloist will be the young piano virtuoso, Ruth Slenczynska born in California, who made her concert debut at the age of six. Her New York recital was given two years later. Miss Slenczynska will be heard with the orchestra in Lizst's Piano Concerto No. 1. Fritz Siegal, violinist and Salvatore De Stefano will be the featured soloists in the Largo from Handel's opera "Xerxes." Choice seats are still available and may be reserved by calling Troy Ashley 4-0900.

The final concert in the 1953-54 series of attractions sponsored by the Albany Civic Music Association will be the first appearance in Albany of the Metropolitan Opera Greek bass-Baritone, Nicola Moscona, at the Grand Theatre, Wednesday night, at 8:30 o'clock. The concert is open only to the regular membership. However, new subscribers for the season of 1954-55 may attend this concert as guests of the association.

Mr. Moscona, who scored a tremendous success last Summer as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Tanglewood Music Festival, also appeared in three scenes with Mario Lanza in the MGM musical, "the Great Caruso."

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.Y
1/30/54

SPOTLIGHT ON THE MODERNS



A Debt to Hanson—and Koussevitzky

THE arrangement that was made not long ago between Howard Hanson and Mercury, culminating in the American Music Festival Series, enables us all to share the benefits, if the spirit so moves us, of the campaign that for many years now has been carried on in Rochester on behalf of American composers. The series crept up on us rather imperceptibly, with an assortment of works of disappointing stature. But now with its Vols. 4 to 6 (each LP is designated a volume) it has provided us with at least one landmark of the American symphony literature (the Roy Harris Third) and a number of other works that bring prestige and interest to the series, including three by Hanson himself, Cowell's Fourth Symphony, Copland's "Quiet City," and Bernard Rogers's "Soliloquy" for flute and strings.

Hanson prepares his recordings remarkably well, and he and his expert orchestra have developed quite a good sense of American composing styles. As a composer he is, perhaps, our most notable conservative and one who, as we may easily gather from his Fourth Symphony (Mercury 40004, $5.45), is thoroughly grounded in the techniques of the grand nineteenth-century symphonic style. (I prefer this symphony to the earlier and more familiar "Romantic" Symphony, and I find its major weakness is the way it heaps on climaxes near the end to make for an "impressive" close.) As a conductor, fortunately, he is less conservative, and though the Harris Third Symphony is not representative of the most advanced music of our time, it represents a considerably more advanced esthetic than Hanson's own.

I was gratified at the capacity of the Harris work, which is on the reverse side of the Hanson, to hold the attention so well after all the performances it has had, and I was surprised, too, at how concise it sounded. Not that it ever struck the listener in the way that the inflated, hour-long, epic type of symphony does, for it is far from this in length and character. But it used to seem drawn out in a few passages—especially in its first days (around 1939) before the composer made a cut in what some of us delighted in calling the "Waldweben" section. Undoubtedly, our present impression of compactness in this one-movement symphony is due in no small part to Hanson's fluent pacing. In Koussevitzky's reading (on the old 78-rpm version)the eloquent opening, with its evocation of the American hymn and its composer's characteristic "false-relations," was played almost twice as slowly as in the present LP version. Presented in straightforward fashion by Hanson it seems less grand in its aspirations and it succeeds nobly in what it sets out to do—namely, to deploy a certain broad, appealing lyricism.

I do not wish to run down the majestic Koussevitzky manner. Indeed, its absence these days is much to be deplored. If at times he laid the atmosphere on too thickly, at other times it was precisely the way in which he projected an atmosphere that enabled him to put over a new American work. His "Appalachian Spring" which has just been reissued (RCA Victor LCT 1134, $5.72) demonstrates this impressively. Three previous LP's of the Copland ballet score, released in the course of the last two years, made it increasingly imperative that Koussevitzky's old 78-rpm version be reissued, and we are glad that RCA has responded to the call. If we were not always sufficiently thankful to Koussevitzky during his life for his service to American music, these three LP's of "Appalachian Spring" would be enough to render us aware of our debt.

The latest of them is by Franz Litschauer, conducting the Vienna State Opera Orchestra (Vanguard 439, $5.95). As a European conductor, faced with the idiomatic problems of an American work, Litschauer has done better than Rother did on the Urania LP issued a few months ago. But he is handicapped by his orchestra, and it does not speak well of him that he should have allowed the record out with such obvious flaws as the inept oboe and the vulgar trombones in the variations on "The Gift to Be Simple." By more than coincidence, I suspect, RCA Victor has given its competing "Appalachian Spring" the same coupling as the Vanguard version "El Salon Mexico." While Bernstein's "Salon Mexico" (Columbia) compares well with Koussevitzky's, the latter's remains the best of the three. The sound of the Boston Symphony, even as it is here transcribed from 78-rpm recordings, is still richer and firmer than that of any of the three European groups which have recorded "Appalachian Spring."

Foreign orchestras do not seem to take to our music readily. Foreign conductors have often presented American works admirably in this country, but usually they have, and quite understandably, been able to lean on the composer at rehearsals. Ideally, it takes our own conductors to do the major promulgating of our own music—conductors with both the interest and, by virtue of their background, the predilection for it. Among them, Hanson is pre-eminent, but before returning to him and his Mercury series, I should like to single out one of the younger men in this class, Izler Solomon, who is responsible for a fine new reading (its first on LP) of Copland's "Music for the Theatre" (MGM E3095, $4.85). Both the reading and the reproduction beautifully preserve the chamber-music quality of this succulent work, which gives a frame of permanence to jazz cliches of the Twenties. It is delightfully coupled with the suite from Kurt Weill's "Dreigroschenoper."

COWELL'S Fourth Symphony, which is the major work of Vol. 6 of the American Festival Series, is one of his most successful and congenial achievements (Mercury LP 40005, $5.45). It contains the evocations of early American music that have become a recognizable trademark of Cowell's style, but never, to my knowledge, has he handled them with more polish. The work is one of the finest examples of the genre that, for want of a better name, we may call "American neo-Gothic."

Riegger's "New Dance" and Hovhaness's Concerto "Arevakal" are coupled with the Cowell. If one is to judge from "New Dance," with its slick orchestration and conga rhythms, Riegger had it in him to map out a popular career for himself comparable to that of Gould. He seems to have chosen the path of austerity instead. I remember this work as being more distinguished in its original version for two pianos and percussion, in which form it was used as dance accompaniment for Humphrey and Weidman. The orchestration is somewhat commercial. As for the Hovhaness, it is more of the same—modal music of Armenian nationalism, which is capable of titillating the listener in very brief movements like the "Estampie" but which palls when carried on for any length of time. All of these works are admirably played under Hanson's baton.

—ARTHUR BERGER.

94

Music in Review

By TUCKER KEISER

Pierre Monteux conducted representative works from three distinct periods of orchestral writing for his Boston Symphony concert yesterday, proving anew that this conductor has an extraordinary command of widely varying styles. In programming Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G Major for strings, adjacent to Bartok's Violin Concerto, he provided a stimulating contrast of 18th century and 20th century musical thought. He concluded with Sibelius' Second Symphony in D Major, composed in the 20th century symphonic practices.

This diversity in musical quality furnished a rewarding afternoon in Symphony Hall, not only because of Mr. Monteux' unerring interpretative insight but also because of the superb response of the musicians to the conductor's assured baton.

If a Bach score is allowed to play itself, the result will invariably be more powerful than any "interpretation" can ever be. Giving the [illegible] Allegro moderato [illegible] bouncing tempo, keep[illegible] light but marked and briefly indicating the various part entrances, he gave one of the most graceful performances one could imagine. He did not fuss with the second Allegro and the music sounded wonderful.

Y, FEBRUARY 6, 1954 Art—Music—Theater 11

ovsky Debut at Symphony

Violinist Plays Bartók With Monteux on Podium

By Harold Rogers

Tossy Spivakovsky made his Boston debut yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, but rumors of his virtuosity and musicianship had preceded him by several seasons. Intriguing reports were made of his individual bowing technique, said to be different from other violinists. The reports were true. His technique is peculiar unto himself.

Mr. Spivakovsky holds the record for the number of times he has played the Bartók Violin Concerto. His performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday was his twenty-fourth. Pierre Monteux holds the conducting record. Yesterday's traversal was his ninth.

"Genius has to find its own way," said a Boston violinist who was in the audience. It was his opinion that Mr. Spivakovsky had to seek out the method of playing that served him best, and having done so, it happened to be extremely different. "When I try it myself," he explained, "I play horribly, but with Spivakovsky it is somehow right!"

The soloist has a heavy shock of hair and looks as Russian as his name would indicate. A rather slight man of medium height, he appears to stand on tiptoe while playing. His bow arm is lifted high and seems to hover over the strings while his wrist operates like a universal joint. Even his left hand does not finger the strings in an ordinary way. The little finger is often extended straight, snapping instantly to the string when needed.

* * *

So much for the visual aspects. They are secondary when music is made, and Spivakovsky makes music. He has a full, smooth, rounded tone and an uncanny accuracy that reminds one of David Oistrakh, an extraordinary Russian violinist known to Americans only by recordings.

Mr. Spivakovsky's technique gives him unusual freedom in performance. He compassed the manifold difficulties of the Bartók without struggle. At the end of the 32-minute piece he looked as fresh as when he began.

The concerto itself is strangely beautiful music—typical of Bartok's later works in that each is infused with his questing and original mentality. One never ceases to marvel at the moods Bartók created with the simplest materials—economical percussive effects, for instance, or a harp and celeste in duet.

The cadenza of the first movement was plainly not for show, even though the violin was given much to do. It was an integral part of the composition and contributed to its drive and emotion. Bartok had a poetic touch that turned dissonance into consonance. His orchestration proceeded with shimmering beauty beneath Mr. Spivakovsky's buoyant fiddling.

* * *

Mr. Monteux, who completes his guest appearances here this week end, opened with a vital reading of Bach's G major Brandenburg Concerto. No. 3. He closed with the Sibelius Second Symphony and won a salvo of bravos for the stirring finale.

It is good to have Sibelius with us again in Symphony Hall. With the exception of Charles Munch's performance this season of "Finlandia,' 'we have had to look to our guest conductors for the symphonies since the days of Koussevitzky.

The Second, however, is a work that holds its own in spite of serious defects. The Andante is so written that it tends to fall apart in big chunks, regardless of what a conductor does for it. In the development sections of the finale I find myself marking time until the good spots arrive—the grandiloquent statements of the two main themes.

Mr. Monteux gave it enough momentum in the final movement to get it off the ground, circle the field several times in glory, and make a successful landing.

THE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1954

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, gave the 15th concert of the 73d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Tossy Spivakovsky, violinist. The program:

Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G .... Bach
Violin Concerto .... Bartok
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43 .... Sibelius

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Tossy Spivakovsky's approach to playing the violin is one of the more curious—and for that matter, more exciting — musical phenomena of the day.

He made his first appearance in Boston yesterday afternoon in Bartok's enigmatic Violin Concerto and it is difficult to imagine that it could ever be exceeded in terms of sheer technical and tonal mastery.

It was not, however, that he did it with such transcendental bravura, for it was played here by Yehudi Menuhin in the December of 1945, and its intricacies are by no means beyond the scope of all the first-level violin virtuosi of the day. It was how he played it, and by how I refer to his technical style, which is not only different from any other style I have ever encountered, but radical in the extreme.

First of all it may be said that Mr. Spivakovsky's stage presence often bears a remarkable resemblance to the famous London concert sketch of Paganini in the confidence and spirit it radiates. Indeed, the resemblance often goes deeper; there is something in the way he stands, the way he holds his violin and the way he looks that suggests the Paganini mantle, and it must be said there does seem to be something of the devil in his playing too, so fantastic is his gift.

If there is a special atmosphere to his presence and his personality, there is certainly something special in his style considered from the point of view of the conventional violin playing. All violinists, by the nature of the instrument, must twist their right arm and wrist into a position so abnormal as to make it a wonder that it can ever be done that way at all . . . and Mr. Spivakovsky even accentuates that to elevate his fingers over the fingerboard much higher than is customary.

But this is nothing to cause astonishment. What does is that he holds the bow in a way entirely unique with him. I was so fascinated by it I went back to the greenroom to see how he does it and found him encircled by the orchestra's violinists watching him give a demonstration with heads awag in disbelief. I won't attempt to describe how he holds the bow in detail; suffice it to say that it is his own development and one few if any other violinists could ever successfully adopt.

But it allows him to accomplish prodigies of bowing subtleties, as well as an infinite number of pressures and attacks on the string. And the Bartok by its very nature encourages such an approach. How that approach would go in the Beethoven or the Brahms or, say, the concertos of Vivaldi or Bach, I do not know, but to judge by the musical stature Mr. Spivakovsky revealed in this, it seems safe to say he is a consummate artist as well as technician.

As it happens, the fascinations of the violinist's style served to root attention on a work that remains a very difficult piece to like, for the Violin Concerto is as relentlessly unyielding of its secrets as it is protracted. When it is beautiful, and it is in many brief passages (the closing moments of the slow movement, for instance) it is very beautiful indeed, and the sound effects throughout are arresting and even fascinating. However, sound effects have not yet replaced the ear's need for some recognizable reappearance of a stated idea, and so this just seems to go on and on while the violinist tears all over the fingerboard as if the orchestra were only occasionally a passing concern. Fortunately, there was Mr. Spivakovsky on hand to watch when the going was rough, and it is perhaps unreasonable to expect to be stirred by this sort of contemporary music.

Stage Plays

95

MUSIC

Globe

Boston Symphony Debut of Violinist Spivakovsky

Fifteenth pair of concerts in the Friday-Saturday series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Symphony Hall, Pierre Monteux guest conductor. The program: Bach: Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, in G major; Bartok: Violin Concerto (soloist Tossy Spivakovsky, who makes his Boston debut); Sibelius: Second Symphony.

By CYRUS DURGIN

The crystal ball is no more reliable in this office than anywhere else, but I am inclined to the view that Bela Bartok's Violin Concerto will prove one of the great works created for that instrument in the first half of the 20th century. Even today, when it is still difficult to hear it in perspective, the work has stature, integrity and enormous skill, and beneath all the vast amount of complex detail there is a definite and powerful sense of musical expression.

This Concerto is not, however, for just any violinist to play. An artist is required of the wholehearted devotion of a Menuhin (who first played it in Boston, or of Tossy Spivakovsky, who introduced it to this country and is here playing it this week. Technical difficulties, formidable as they are, are not the main concern with Bartok. There are plenty of fiddlers who can play all the notes, and in tempo. But there are not too many with the understanding of what Bartok was attempting, or with the mingled emotional drive and intellectual perception essential to a truly musical realization of the work.

It is no exaggeration, I think, to state that Bartok, perhaps more than any other musician of his time, save perhaps the late Arnold Schoenberg, was creating in the future. Bartok's time, in the sense of widespread public acceptance, has yet to come. He was dealing with an idiom all his own, an idiom deceptively brusque for it was based on a conception of harmonic dissonance and rhythmic complexity 'way ahead of most of the music that forms our daily diet.

I would not claim to know the Violin Concerto inside out, or to love every measure of it. But each hearing (mostly on records) increases comprehension and respect, and it also sounds more and more powerful and distinguished. Its one fault, perhaps, is that it is too long.

The basic fact is that the music really sings in its own way. Mr. Spivakovsky, holding his violin higher than any other player I ever have seen (he was practically looking up the finger board) made it sing. He played cleanly, with a total command of rhythm and phrase that was extraordinary. It takes this sort of superlative work to prove that Bartok, far from crabbed angularity, has a grace all his own. Mr. Spivakovsky was most cordially received, and well he deserved it.

Mr. Monteux and the orchestra also shared in the applause, and justly, for they had given a spectacularly fine account of the orchestral part.

Not that age has anything to do with the vitality of art, but I kept pondering during the afternoon that one would never think of Mr. Monteux as well over 70 from listening to his work. Both Bach and Sibelius he reads with freshness and vigor. The Symphony, in fact, was electrifying in many places. This work inevitably recalls the late Serge Koussevitzky, for it was one of his personal show pieces. Comparisons mean nothing except that invariably they are made, and it was fascinating to note how Mr. Monteux conducted it mainly in an almost classical manner of structure and long line. Some of the climax-building details of Koussevitzky naturally were not there, for no two men ever approach a work in just the same way. But I also noticed many details of inner voices and background ryhthm that Koussevitzky never brought out.

Mr. Monteux reduced the orchestra slightly in the upper strings for Bach, and drastically in the lower ones, for there were just three double-basses, placed far apart. The result was a glowing and admirably balanced texture.

Three unusual photographs of Tossy Spivakovsky, who performs Bartok's Violin Concerto at Carnegie Hall Wednesday.

Cir. (D 149,902) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE

FEB 3 - 1954

Monteux Conducts Tuesday Symphony

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, guest conductor. The program: Henry Cowell, Hymn and Fuguing Tune, No. 3 (first performance in Boston); Beethoven, Fifth Symphony; Franck, Suite from "Psyche"; Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration."

Henry Cowell's Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 3 had its first performance anywhere by the Boston Symphony last night with Pierre Monteux conducting. Unlike some of Mr. Cowell's rather shapeless pieces, the Hymn and Fuguing Tune has a strength and profile of its own. In the program notes, Mr. Cowell says he derived his idea for the tune from Southern revival meetings, rather than from New England anthems. Thus, the piece is four-square, dance-like and harks back to classic forms of symphony and sonata which derived from dances.

Mr. Monteux gives a definitive performance of Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration." It is compelling, without seeming to drive. The Franck "Psyche" is rather pale stuff, though welcome for the stronger light in which it shows other music.

It is not hard to recall the connotations attached to Beethoven's Fifth Symphony during the war. Performances then, by most any conductor, had a different style and tension than those today. Mr. Monteaux plays it in the classic style, a pure, restrained one with no special frame of reference. Thus it emerges as a great piece of music, with its own character foremost.

J. W. R.

Cir. (D 20,200)

This Clipping From
NEWBURGH, N. Y.
NEWS

FEB 1 - 1954

Boston Pops Leader Marks 25th Season

By HENRY MINOTT
United Press Staff Correspondent

BOSTON (UP)— When Arthur Fiedler starts a 25-state tour with his Boston Pops Orchestra Monday, he will be opening his 25th season as Boston's famed Pop concert conductor.

Founded in 1885, the Boston Pops—short for popular—concerts have become as typical of Boston as baked beans. But it wasn't until 1930, when Fiedler took over the baton, that the concerts achieved their present popularity. Since then they have been almost solid sell-outs, season after season.

First native Bostonian to become Pops conductor, Fielder had a remarkable background of European musical culture. His father, Emanuel, and two uncles were all violinists in the Boston Symphony. One sister was a professional pianist. Another was a professional 'cellist. A third was a talented violinist.

In 1915, at the age of 21, Fiedler joined the Boston Symphony as a violinist, becoming the "baby" of the orchestra. Later he studied violin, piano and conducting at the Royal Berlin Academy.

Using an orchestra of Symphony players, Fiedler established the free outdoor Esplanade concerts in 1929. Their huge drawing power led to his appointment as Pops conductor, succeeding Alfredo Casella, whose contract had expired.

More than 3,000,000 persons have attended Fiedler's Pop concerts an an additional 5,000,000 have attended his Esplanade programs.

A strict disciplinarian, the handsome Fiedler is a stickler for audience decorum. When a catcall greeted the Star Spangled Banner during an Esplanade concert, Fiedler hurried into the audience, upbraided the culprit and made him apologize.

80

96

Cir. (D 78,153)

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

FEB 1 - 1954

Greeting Tonight's Conductor

Arthur Fiedler was at the Auditorium last night for a rehearsal with the Boston Pops Tour Orchestra to prepare for tonight's concert. With him, from the left: Miss Mary M. McDonough and Miss Kathleen L. O'Leary, cochairmen; Miss Flora V. Millette, president of the Alumnae Association, Our Lady of the Elms College, concert sponsor.

Boston Pops Orchestra Will Launch Tour Here Tonight

Seventy-eight musicians who will spend a lot of time together the next seven weeks sat in orchestral formation on the Auditorium stage last night with Arthur Fiedler, conductor.

Go to Omaha

They are the Boston Pops Tour Orchestra that will play 47 concerts between tonight and March 20, leaving a trail of music between Springfield and Omaha, Neb., with a curve south into Virginia on the way back.

They came 24 hours early for their opening tour date at the Auditorium tonight at 8.30, sponsored by the Alumnae Association of Our Lady of the Elms College, because Boston's Symphony Hall was booked for a Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon and an appearance of the pianist, Malcuzynski, last night.

Choosing the Auditorium as an alternate first rehearsal spot, orchestra members loaded the trailer truck and two busses that will carry them on their journeys and rode to Springfield yesterday afternoon.

Auditioned by Fiedler throughout the nation, the musicians have widely scattered home towns. Seattle, Wash., and San Francisco, Cal., are the farthest from New England. Fiedler conducts pops concerts in San Francisco each year.

Fiedler, just back from a South American vacation, and the orchestra moved comfortably into their first music-making session as a unit. Some of the players were with Fiedler in last year's 10-week tour of the South, but many are newcomers.

Starting with the stately fervence of the tone poem, "Finlandia," by Sibelius, the rehearsal continued with some bouncy musical comedy tunes by Cole Porter from "Kiss Me Kate" and went on to the quiet, solemn tones of Handel's "Largo," with Salvatore DeStefano and Fritz Siegal playing the harp and violin solos.

This gives an idea of the variety the listener to tonight's concert will hear. The program includes Ruth Slenczynska, pianist, in Liszt's Concerto No. 1, Tchaikovsky's "1812 Overture" and music by Wagner, Weber, Offenbach, Gade and Sir Edward Elgar.

Elms alumnae will use concert proceeds for their Scholarship Fund.

FEB 5 1954

Music in Review

By TUCKER KEISER

Pierre Monteux conducted representative works from three distinct periods of orchestral writing for his Boston Symphony concert yesterday, proving anew that this conductor has an extraordinary command of widely varying styles. In programming Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G Major for strings, adjacent to Bartok's Violin Concerto, he provided a stimulating contrast of 18th century and 20th century musical thought. He concluded with Sibelius' Second Symphony in D Major, composed in the 20th century symphonic practices.

This diversity in musical quality furnished a rewarding afternoon in Symphony Hall, not only because of Mr. Monteux' unerring interpretative insight but also because of the superb response of the musicians to the conductor's assured baton.

If a Bach score is allowed to play itself, the result will invariably be more powerful than any "interpretation" can ever be. Giving the opening Allegro moderato a gently bouncing tempo, keeping his accents light but marked, and quietly indicating the various part entrances, he gave one of the most graceful performances one could imagine. He did not fuss with the second Allegro and the music sounded wonderful.

5,400 Persons Attend Pops Concert

By KEITH MARVIN.

Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Tour Orchestra, featuring Ruth Slenczynska as guest pianist, gave a rousing and varied program last night in the RPI Field House before an audience of an estimated 5,400 persons. This turnout was excellent considering the fact that Fiedler and his group played before an audience of about 3,000 last year.

But then the reputation of the Pops was spread around by those who heard it last year. Too, Miss Slenczynska, was no real stranger to Troy. She played before a Troy Chromatics crowd as a child prodigy some 20 years ago.

The program contained a goodly selection of nice old standbys which are always in good taste and many of which can be heard at their best only when played by such an ensemble as the Boston Pops. To illustrate this, let us list such things as the "Entrance of the Guests" from Wagner's "Tannhauser"; the "Overture" from "Oberon" by Weber (and a favorite best-seller on the old Edison cylinder phonograph records); Handel's "Largo" from "Xerxes," number one on the 1738 hit parade or its equivalent; Tschaikowsky's "1812 Overture," which, in its original version called for a particularly large orchestra and loaded cannon, and Sibelius' tone-poem, "Finlandia."

Popular in U. S.

This latter number was very popular with U. S. concert-goers when Finland was being persecuted by the Russians in 1939, then not-so-popular a few years later when Finland lined up with Germany and the Russians became allied to the United States.

But the solo work of the evening, Liszt's "Concerto No. 1 in E-flat for Piano and Orchestra" was among the most interesting. Miss Slenczynska gave a sympathetic rendition of a work which, had it not been by such a one as Liszt, might have gone the way of so many of its type. Not that it doesn't have its fine moments. It does. And the lyric passages, particularly in the slow movement, have moments of real beauty. It is, however, something of a showpiece and never fails to draw applause wherever it is played. The guest artist was admirably supported by the orchestra. Part of this work is similar in melodic structure to the same composer's tone-poem, "Orpheus," which is not so well-known.

Perhaps the most applause was heard following the "Suite" from Offenbach's ballet, "Gaite Parisienne" and Gade's "Jalousie" which has outsold all other classical records for popularity through the years. These numbers are naturals for the Boston Pops and it performed them well.

Excellent Item.

The last section of the program also included a stunning orchestral potpourri of Cole Porter's music to "Kiss Me Kate" including the popular "So in Love." The Pops concluded the evening with Sir Edward Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance March No. 1," which sounds as good today as it did in 1901 when it was written. This work, which is probably the greatest march written (a possible alternative being Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever") is a sort of unofficial national anthem to the British Empire and does musically what Kipling did for British literature, by bringing British imperialism to the fore.

Thee encores concluded the program. The first, Georges Auric's "Song from Moulin Rouge" was a fine choice. The second took the form of a sort of delightful madhouse. Entitled "The Glow Worm Turns," it is in fact Linck's "Glow Worm" with more than a dash of novelty, being scored for the regular orchestra in addition to a fire siren, bell, police whistle and cuckoo clock. And if the Elgar didn't fill the bill for martial music, "The Stars and Stripes Forever" which concluded the concert did so. 5,400 persons came to the Field House, and its within reason to say that the same number went away satisfied.

CONCERT PRINCIPALS — The Boston Pops Tour Orchestra performed for a record crowd last nght at the RPI Field House Principal figures in the program were Arthur Fiedler, the conductor, and Ruth Slenczynska, the pianist.

Cir. (D 38,382)

This Clipping From
TROY, N. Y.
TIMES RECORD

FEB 3 - 1954

Cir. (D 203,001)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER

FEB 4 - 1954

'Perfect' Boston Symphony Orchestra Plan Recalled

By HENRY MINOTT

A "noble experiment" in music, made by the Boston Symphony Orchestra back in 1886 and all but forgotten, was recalled today by the sole survivor of the original orchestra.

Sixteen violins, neatly packed away in four trunks in the attic of Symphony Hall, are the only remaining souvenirs of the extraordinary experiment described to the United Press by 93-year-old Daniel Kuntz.

KUNTZ

As a first violinist in the original Boston Symphony, Kuntz played one of these fiddles during the short-lived test that proved a total failure.

A friendly little man who puffs a pipe with evident relish, he smiled as he reminisced about one of the strangest episodes in the orchestra's long history.

It was in 1886 that Conductor Wilhelm Gericke sprang his big idea. He had been imported from Vienna two years earlier. And after listening briefly to the Boston Symphony, he had told orchestra founder Henry Lee Higginson: "You have not an orchestra here. There are some musicians but it is hardly an orchestra."

To strengthen the orchestra the distinguished Franz Kneisel had been brought here from abroad to be concert master, and several talented musicians also had come along.

So now Conductor Gericke was ready to test his plan, which was this: He reasoned that if all the string instruments in the orchestra were made by the same great European master, the symphonic result would be nothing short of astounding.

Higginson told Gericke to go ahead. And the noted Thomas Zach of Vienna was commissioned to produce a full set of strings—29 violins, nine violas, eight 'cellos and eight double-bases.

To fill this huge order on time the ingenious Zach either used some sort of assembly line or sublet part of the contract. Anyhow, most of the instruments weren't up to his usual standards.

The bull fiddles were best. The 'cellos only so-so. Worst of all were the violas. Some of the violins were good, some only fair.

Kuntz remembers playing one of the violins for awhile, then going back to his own instrument. Most other members of the orchestra followed suit, and the costly experiment was abandoned.

"The new instruments," said Kuntz, "looked better than they played."

Cir. (D 130,147)

This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-JOURNAL

FEB 5 - 1954

—THE CONCERT—

Fiedler Conducts Boston Pops Tour Orchestra

FAMOUS ARTISTS Series pre- [illegible] Boston Pops [illegible] arrangement [illegible] Boston Symphony Or- [illegible] Fiedler conduc- [illegible] audi- [illegible] a sold-out [illegible] an enthusiastic [illegible] program moved [illegible] tempo of [illegible] great pian- [illegible] Slenczynska played with [illegible] clean cut and [illegible] a pops concert [illegible] encore for the [illegible] the agile finger- [illegible] Slenczynska and the earn- [illegible] 75-piece orches- [illegible] which opened [illegible] in Springfield, Mass., [illegible] the group to many state- [illegible] the coming six weeks.

THE PROGRAM was devised [illegible] concert-goers pre- [illegible] numbers, ranging as it did [illegible] to Tschaikowsky [illegible] Wagner to Cole Porter [illegible] was the stately [illegible] the Guests" from [illegible] "Tannhauser"; and the [illegible] Weber's "Oberon" to [illegible] Then came the [illegible] of Fritz Siegal, [illegible] concertmaster, with [illegible] Statano, harpist, with [illegible] in the "Largo" from [illegible] "Xerxes." The lively [illegible] from the Ballet, "Gaite Parisienne" by Offenbach, closed [illegible] group.

THOSE in the audience who [illegible] pianist Slenczynska play- [illegible] age of 11 in the same [illegible] impressed by her vigor- [illegible] playing, a pianistic vitality [illegible] apparently is unlimited. She [illegible] Liszt Piano Concerto [illegible] in E Flat with orchestra [illegible] amazement and delight of [illegible] Intelligent use of [illegible] was noted, with tech- [illegible] command over interpreta- [illegible] this musical picture. [illegible] Solennelle, "1812," [illegible] a stirring com- [illegible] in for a share of SELECTIONS from "Kiss Me, [illegible] gypsy tango, "Jalousie," [illegible] in an incidental solo; [illegible] Pomp and Circumstance" [illegible] final programmed [illegible] encores kept to the [illegible] with a "Little [illegible] "Moulin Rouge" [illegible] an amusing novelty, [illegible] Worm Turns," and [illegible] and Stripes For- [illegible] was played [illegible] afternoon for Syracuse [illegible] students. There [illegible] appreciation for the [illegible] Famous Artists in bring- [illegible] Orchestra.

FRIENDS in music and kin- [illegible] united when [illegible] the group to [illegible] Walter Smo- [illegible] Racine, Wis., was [illegible] aunt, Mrs. Carl M. [illegible] Galimir Hurtig, [illegible] her sister, Ad- [illegible] Krasner (Mrs. [illegible] known [illegible] and piano ac- [illegible] Slenczynska. [illegible] acquaint- [illegible] goers of 1937 [illegible] here, then ac- [illegible] her father [illegible] Slenczynski died [illegible] There was a [illegible] also, when Al- [illegible] the last few [illegible] here, greeted [illegible] in Riga, [illegible] patrons, principal [illegible] home of Mr. [illegible] Love, during [illegible] Fiedler chatted [illegible] Krasner and [illegible] Bernthal, [illegible] Barker, [illegible] Roy O. [illegible] Calagna, bass- [illegible] their son, [illegible] Boston musician [illegible] played [illegible] Boston [illegible] Boston [illegible] per- [illegible]

Cir. (D 149,902) (S 382,056)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE

FEB 6 - 1954

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Debut of Violinist Spivakovsky

Fifteenth pair of concerts in the Friday–Saturday series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Symphony Hall. Pierre Monteux guest conductor. The program: Bach: Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, in G major; Bartok: Violin Concerto (soloist Tossy Spivakovsky, who makes his Boston debut); Sibelius: Second Symphony.

By CYRUS DURGIN

The crystal ball is no more reliable in this office than anywhere else, but I am inclined to the view that Bela Bartok's Violin Concerto will prove one of the great works created for that instrument in the first half of the 20th century. Even today, when it is still difficult to hear it in perspective, the work has stature, integrity and enormous skill, and beneath all the vast amount of complex detail there is a definite and powerful sense of musical expression.

This Concerto is not, however, for just any violinist to play. An artist is required of the wholehearted devotion of a Menuhin (who first played it in Boston, or of Tossy Spivakovsky, who introduced it to this country and is here playing it this week. Technical difficulties, formidable as they are, are not the main concern with Bartok. There are plenty of fiddlers who can play all the notes and in tempo. But there are not too many with the understanding of what Bartok was attempting, or with the mingled emotional drive and intellectual perception essential to a truly musical realization of the work.

It is no exaggeration, I think, to state that Bartok, perhaps more than any other musician of his time, save perhaps the late Arnold Schoenberg, was creating in the future. Bartok's time, in the sense of widespread public acceptance, has yet to come. He was dealing with an idiom all his own, an idiom deceptively brusque for it was based on a conception of harmonic dissonance and rhythmic complexity 'way ahead of most of the music that forms our daily diet.

I would not claim to know the Violin Concerto inside out, or to love every measure of it. But each hearing (mostly on records) increases comprehension and respect, and it also sounds more and more powerful and distinguished. Its one fault, perhaps, is that it is too long.

The basic fact is that the music really sings in its own way. Mr. Spivakovsky, holding his violin higher than any other player I ever have seen (he was practically looking up the finger board) made it sing. He played cleanly, with a total command of rhythm and phrase that was extraordinary. It takes this sort of superlative work to prove that Bartok, far from crabbed angularity, has a grace all his own. Mr. Spivakovsky was most cordially received, and well he deserved it.

Mr. Monteux and the orchestra also shared in the applause, and justly, for they had given a spectacularly fine account of the orchestral part.

Not that age has anything to do with the vitality of art, but I kept pondering during the afternoon that one would never think of Mr. Monteux as well over 70 from listening to his work. Both Bach and Sibelius he reads with freshness and vigor. The Symphony, in fact, was electrifying in many places. This work inevitably recalls the late Serge Koussevitzky, for it was one of his personal show pieces. Comparisons mean nothing except that invariably they are made, and it was fascinating to note how Mr. Monteux conducted it mainly in an almost classical manner of structure and long line. Some of the climax-building details of Koussevitzky naturally were not there, for no two men ever approach a work in just the same way. But I also noticed many details of inner voices and background ryhthm that Koussevitzky never brought out.

Mr. Monteux reduced the orchestra slightly in the upper strings for Bach, and drastically in the lower ones, for there were just three double-basses, placed far apart. The result was a glowing and admirably balanced texture.

This Clipping From
BOSTON MASS.
HERALD

FEB 6 - 1954

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, gave the 15th concert of the 73d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Tossy Spivakovsky, violinist. The program:

Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G .... Bach
Violin Concerto .... Bartok
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43 .... Sibelius

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Tossy Spivakovsky's approach to playing the violin is one of the more curious—and for that matter, more exciting — musical phenomena of the day.

He made his first appearance in Boston yesterday afternoon in Bartok's enigmatic Violin Concerto and it is difficult to imagine that it could ever be exceeded in terms of sheer technical and tonal mastery.

It was not, however, that he did it with such transcendental bravura, for it was played here by Yehudi Menuhin in the December of 1945, and its intricacies are by no means beyond the scope of all the first-level violin virtuosi of the day. It was how he played it, and by how I refer to his technical style, which is not only different from any other style I have ever encountered, but radical in the extreme.

First of all it may be said that Mr. Spivakovsky's stage presence often bears a remarkable resemblance to the famous London concert sketch of Paganini in the confidence and spirit it radiates. Indeed, the resemblance often goes deeper; there is something in the way he stands, the way he holds his violin and the way he looks that suggests the Paganini mantle, and it must be said there does seem to be something of the devil in his playing too, so fantastic is his gift.

If there is a special atmosphere to his presence and his personality, there is certainly something special in his style considered from the point of view of the conventional violin playing. All violinists, by the nature of the instrument, must twist their right arm and wrist into a position so abnormal as to make it a wonder that it can ever be done that way at all . . . and Mr. Spivakovsky even accentuates that to elevate his fingers over the fingerboard much higher than is customary.

But this is nothing to cause astonishment. What does is that he holds the bow in a way entirely unique with him. I was so fascinated by it I went back to the greenroom to see how he does it and found him encircled by the orchestra's violinists watching him give a demonstration with heads awag in disbelief. I won't attempt to describe how he holds the bow in detail; suffice it to say that it is his own development and one few if any other violinists could ever successfully adopt.

But it allows him to accomplish prodigies of bowing subtleties, as well as an infinite number of pressures and attacks on the string. And the Bartok by its very nature encourages such an approach. How that approach would go in the Beethoven or the Brahms or, say, the concertos of Vivaldi or Bach, I do not know, but to judge by the musical stature Mr. Spivakovsky revealed in this, it seems safe to say he is a consummate artist as well as technician.

As it happens, the fascinations of the violinist's style served to root attention on a work that remains a very difficult piece to like, for the Violin Concerto is as relentlessly unyielding of its secrets as it is protracted. When it is beautiful, and it is in many brief passages (the closing moments of the slow movement, for instance) it is very beautiful indeed, and the sound effects throughout are arresting and even fascinating. However, sound effects have not yet replaced the ear's need for some recognizable reappearance of a stated idea, and so this just seems to go on and on while the violinist tears all over the fingerboard as if the orchestra were only occasionally a passing concern. Fortunately, there was Mr. Spivakovsky on hand to watch when the going was rough, and it is perhaps unreasonable to expect to be stirred by this sort of contemporary music.

This Clipping From
BOSTON MASS
GLOBE

FEB 6 - 1954

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Debut of Violinist Spivakovsky

Fifteenth pair of concerts in the Friday–Saturday series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Symphony Hall. Pierre Monteux guest conductor. The program: Bach: Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, in G major; Bartok: Violin Concerto (soloist Tossy Spivakovsky, who makes his Boston debut); Sibelius: Second Symphony.

By CYRUS DURGIN

The crystal ball is no more reliable in this office than anywhere else, but I am inclined to the view that Bela Bartok's Violin Concerto will prove one of the great works created for that instrument in the first half of the 20th century. Even today, when it is still difficult to hear it in perspective, the work has stature, integrity and enormous skill, and beneath all the vast amount of complex detail there is a definite and powerful sense of musical expression.

This Concerto is not, however, for just any violinist to play. An artist is required of the wholehearted devotion of a Menuhin (who first played it in Boston, or of Tossy Spivakovsky, who introduced it to this country and is here playing it this week. Technical difficulties, formidable as they are, are not the main concern with Bartok. There are plenty of fiddlers who can play all the notes, and in tempo. But there are not too many with the understanding of what Bartok was attempting, or with the mingled emotional drive and intellectual perception essential to a truly musical realization of the work.

It is no exaggeration, I think, to state that Bartok, perhaps more than any other musician of his time, save perhaps the late Arnold Schoenberg, was creating in the future. Bartok's time, in the sense of widespread public acceptance, has yet to come. He was dealing with an idiom all his own, an idiom deceptively brusque for it was based on a conception of harmonic dissonance and rhythmic complexity 'way ahead of most of the music that forms our daily diet.

I would not claim to know the Violin Concerto inside out, or to love every measure of it. But each hearing (mostly on records) increases comprehension and respect, and it also sounds more and more powerful and distinguished. Its one fault, perhaps, is that it is too long.

The basic fact is that the music really sings in its own way. Mr. Spivakovsky, holding his violin higher than any other player I ever have seen (he was practically looking up the finger board) made it sing. He played cleanly, with a total command of rhythm and phrase that was extraordinary. It takes this sort of superlative work to prove that Bartok, far from crabbed angularity, has a grace all his own. Mr. Spivakovsky was most cordially received, and well he deserved it.

Mr. Monteux and the orchestra also shared in the applause, and justly, for they had given a spectacularly fine account of the orchestral part.

Not that age has anything to do with the vitality of art, but I kept pondering during the afternoon that one would never think of Mr. Monteux as well over 70 from listening to his work. Both Bach and Sibelius he reads with freshness and vigor. The Symphony, in fact, was electrifying in many places. This work inevitably recalls the late Serge Koussevitzky, for it was one of his personal show pieces. Comparisons mean nothing except that invariably they are made, and it was fascinating to note how Mr. Monteux conducted it mainly in an almost classical manner of structure and long line. Some of the climax-building details of Koussevitzky naturally were not there, for no two men ever approach a work in just the same way. But I also noticed many details of inner voices and background ryhthm that Koussevitzky never brought out.

Mr. Monteux reduced the orchestra slightly in the upper strings for Bach, and drastically in the lower ones, for there were just three double-basses, placed far apart. The result was a glowing and admirably balanced texture.

98

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB 7 - 1954

'PINCH-HITTER' RETURNS

Wields Baton Here After 36-Year Lapse

Pierre Monteux

Pierre Monteux, distinguished Franco-American conductor, will be the guest director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert this season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Friday evening.

Mr. Monteux, who replaces the regular conductor, Charles Munch, is returning to the same Brooklyn podium he first ascended as a "pinch-hitter" in 1918. Thirty-six years ago, he was engaged to assemble and rehearse musicians during the reorganization of the New England aggregation.

When the newly-engaged leader, Henri Rabaud, was unable to reach Brooklyn from France in time for the opening performance, Mr. Monteux accepted the last-minute assignment and directed the orchestra here on Nov. 8, 1918.

67th Year Here

Friday evening's program—the 67th consecutive seasonal appearance of the Boston unit in the borough—includes Henry Cowell's Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 3, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C Minor and the Suite from "Psyche" by Cesar Franck. Death and Transfiguration by Richard Strauss concludes the program.

The Boston Symphony made its first Brooklyn appearance on Dec. 12, 1887, at the old Academy of Music on Montague St. Vienna-born Wilhelm Gericke conducted a program of Bach, Weber, Schubert, Liszt and Beethoven. Gertrude Edmands, a New England soprano, was a featured soloist.

A critical review in the Brooklyn Eagle the following day compared Gericke's ensemble with two Brooklyn orchestras then existing — Theodore Thomas' and Anton Seidl's.

"The only difference is that trumpets are substituted for the cornets in Thomas' orchestra . . . neither Thomas nor Seidl have quite the smoothness of tone and unity of execution (of the Boston strings)," the Eagle said.

"The audience was large, representative of the best taste and enthusiastic to a marked degree . . . we hope for more concerts . . . this city is large and rich enough to support more than a single series of concerts," the Eagle review concluded.

Friday's program at the Academy, 30 Lafayette Ave., is sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Art and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The final two appearances of the orchestra, March 12 and April 9, will be conducted by Mr. Munch.

Cir. (D 90,143) (S 90,143)

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
9 FEB 7 - 1954

PIERRE MONTEUX

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Give Concert Tuesday

By GORDON E. ARMSTRONG

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will put in a belated appearance here in Woolsey Hall on Tuesday evening at 8:30. Ordinarily the world famous orchestra would be making its second seasonal visit about this time but Tuesday's first concert was purposely scheduled at this late date in order that listeners might be privileged to hear a performance under the baton of Pierre Monteux. The great French conductor is currently making guest appearances with the Boston Orchestra while Charles Munch is on vacation.

Monteux, for many years one of the most respected and revered figures among contemporary conductors, has had a long and distinguished career. A native Parisian, he graduated from the Paris Conservatory around the turn of the century. For some years he was a member of the Paris Orchestra and later, in 1911, he was appointed as the principal conductor of Diaghilev's Ballet Russe. With that celebrated group he conducted the premieres of such works as Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," and also the Russian composer's "Fire Bird" and "Petrouchka."

Stravinsky was a young and little known composer when Monteux became his proponent and conducted those first performances, one of which resulted in a riot. This was the historic premiere of "The Rite of Spring," when the performance turned into a near stampede necessitating the calling out of the Parisian gendarmes to restore a semblance of order. This was a far cry from the performance of the work given by the Boston Symphony under Monteux on the orchestra's European tour in 1952. The latter performance, given in the Theatre des Champs Elysees which was the scene of the tempestuous premiere 39 years before, was entirely peaceful. The hysterical shouting which had all but drowned out the music on the earlier occasion now came at the close of the performance, denoting complete audience approval and enjoyment. The composer, who "escaped" from the dissenters through a window at the affair of 1913, was overcome with emotion at the reception accorded the Monteux performance two years ago.

Monteux first came to this country with the Ballet Russe after honorable service with the French army in World War I. He became a regular conductor at the Metropolitan Opera in 1917 and from 1919-24 he headed the Boston Symphony and introduced to Bostonians many of the works which have since become established in the orchestra's repertory. In 1935, he took over as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony and during his 17 years tenure developed this orchestra into one of the country's finest. Resigning this post in 1952, he is now acting as guest conductor with various symphony orchestras. During his long career, he has conducted practically every major symphony throughout the world.

The venerable conductor is now a resident of Maine. For some years he has made his permanent home at Hancock, Me., where he has a 200 acre estate called "Domain of the Great Pine." The estate was owned for many generations by the family of his American wife. Here he maintains Le Domain School of Orchestral Conducting during the Summer months. Embryo conductors are also required to perform as orchestral players in concerts which are given on Sundays in a rustic 300 seat auditorium on the estate. At whatever point in America or Europe that he may be, Monteux always arranges his schedule so that he may spend the Christmas holidays at his beloved home at Hancock in Maine.

Stories of the conductor's career border on the fabulous. Woe to any musician who plays out of tune for the keenness of the Monteux ear can detect the offender even in the most powerful orchestral tutti. And it is said that no other conductor in the world can match the Monteux record of never having missed a single rehearsal or concert!

For Tuesday's Woolsey Hall concert, the conductor has chosen the following program: Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, in G major for Strings, by Bach: "Psyche and Eros," from Franck's Symphonic Poem, "Psyche"; Death and Transfiguration, by Strauss; Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43, by Sibelius.

Yale Choral Society Plans Wednesday Concert

Battell Chapel will be the locale of a concert by the Yale Choral Society Wednesday evening at 8:30. Parke S. Barnard, the regular conductor of the singers, will direct the program which is to be devoted to works of the German Baroque period. An instrumental ensemble will be heard in the concert.

It is believed that all of the music to be sung on Wednesday evening has not previously been performed in New Haven. Since the inception of the Yale Choral Society, it has been its policy to revive works not previously presented here, primarily because of its unavailability in standard editions. The singers feel that their contribution to the musical activities of the community can best be made in this way — through presenting worthwhile works which ordinarily would not find a place in other local programs.

Soloists in the concert are listed as follows: sopranos—Ann Balayan, Virginia de Bonaventura, and Jane Geiger; altos—Rose Lucibelli and Blanche Porto; tenors—Donald Loach and Donovan Wold; bass, Eugene Hartzell.

Music by Bach, Johann Krieger, Johann Kuhnau, Michael Rohde, Matthias Biechteler and Johann Klingenberg will be performed. The event is free to the public.

Martha Jean Hakes, a former student at the Yale Music School and currently with the Primavera Singers of New York, will return here to participate in Wednesday's concert.

Student Recital Scheduled For Friday

The only student recital scheduled for this week is an organ program to be given by James Lincoln Palsgrove in Woolsey Hall Friday evening at 8:30. A candidate for the Bachelor of Music degree, the organist has studied at the Yale Music School with Luther Noss. Palsgrove received a B.A. degree from Wesleyan in 1948.

Works by Mozart, Bach, Mendelssohn, and Dupres will be included in this recital.

Local Briefs Of The Music World

Local briefs . . . Samuel Yaffe will feature Schubert's B flat major Sonata in his studio recital on Wednesday evening. This will be the third recital in the pianist's current series . . . The Cantors Council of Connecticut and the Connecticut Region of the Cantors will give a concert of Jewish music in Temple Keser Israel (Sherman Avenue and Chapel Street) Sunday evening, February 21.

Cir. (D 259,227) (S 304,545)

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES-HERALD

Monteux Due To Conduct 'The Boston'

The Boston Symphony will make its third appearance this year in Constitution hall on Thursday at 8:30 p.m. Pierre Monteux will conduct the orchestra in his only Washington appearance of the season. The program will open with Henry Cowell's "Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 3," and feature the Beethoven Fifth Symphony. Also scheduled are tone poems by Richard Strauss ("Death and Transfiguration") and Cesar Franck ("Psyche").

The Philadelphia orchestra under the direction of Eugene Ormandy will present an all-Beethoven concert in Constitution hall on Tuesday at 8.30 p.m. The Great Fugue, Opus 133, arranged for string orchestra by Ormandy, and the first and third symphonies will comprise the program.

The National Symphony orchestra will present four concerts in Washington this week. On Sunday at 4 p.m. Dr. Mitchell and the orchestra will play a special concert at Trinity college, Brookland.

The regular subscription concert in Constitution hall on Wednesday night will feature violinist Isaac Stern as soloist in the Bach Concerto in A Minor and the Prokofieff First Concerto.

The orchestra will play a concert for young people in Cardozo auditorium on Thursday at 2 p.m.

Leroy Anderson will appear as guest conductor with the orchestra at a special concert on Saturday at 8:30 p.m. in Constitution hall.

The Washington Civic orchestra, under the direction of Hendrik Essers, will present its annual winter concert in Roosevelt auditorium on Tuesday at 8:30 p.m.

The Nicholas Longworth Foundation in the Library of Congress will present a concert by the New Music String Quartet in the Coolidge auditorium on Friday at 8:30 p.m. Featured on the program will be a suite by Deems Taylor drawn from the incidental music he wrote for the Obey drama, "Lucrece." Works by Vitali, Dittersdorf, and Schubert will also be played.

Cir. (D 90,143) (S 90,143)

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRESENTS NOTABLE WOOLSEY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony made its first appearance of the season in Woolsey Hall last evening as the fifth event of the Woolsey series. Ordinarily the orchestra gives the first of its two yearly concerts here early in the season but yesterday's event was purposely delayed in order that the audience might hear the Boston musicians in a program directed by Pierre Monteux. The great French conductor is currently substituting for Charles Munch, who is on vacation.

The "better late than never" aspect of this concert had unusual significance for there is an affinity of long standing between Monteux and the Boston Symphony. He was the regular coductor of this great symphonic organization from 1919-1924, before Koussevitzky took over for his long and illustrious reign. Since he resigned in 1952 from the podium of the San Francisco Symphony, which he headed for 17 years, Monteux has been a favored guest conductor of the Boston Symphony. He went along on both of their recent jaunts — the first European tour of the orchestra and the transcontinental itinerary of American cities.

Despite a conducting career of almost half a century, Monteux has lost none of the podium magic which long ago estaolished him as one of the world's great musical directors. The Boston musicians have rarely played more brilliantly than they did last evening.

Surprisingly enough, the conductor who was an early proponent of some of this century's most controversial music, that of Igor Stravinsky, chose a wholly innocuous program for this Woolsey Hall concert. To be sure, there were two moderns represented, Richard Strauss and Jean Sibelius — the former with his "Death and Transfiguration" and the Finnish composer with his Symphony No. 2. Neither of these works raise any eyebrows at this late date and the program's other two offerings — Cesar Franck's "Psyche and Eros" (from the symphonic poem) and Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 — have been in the standard symphonic repertoire for a long time.

Monteux has always been in his work an outstanding illustration of Gallic clear-headedness in interpretative matters. His tempos last evening were on the conservative side though his love of coloring and dynamics found its fullest outlet in the Strauss and Sibelius works where the brass had something of a field day. The setting up of three string choirs in the opening Bach emphasized the rich sounds of the Boston strings while the contrapuntal lines here were sharply etched and beautifully precisioned. This listener has never been partial to the Sibelius symphony but the way it emerged last evening in a dynamic "attack" that weakened one's defenses, was a revelation.

Boston programs here have provided us with many first hearings in the past. While this novelty was lacking in yesterday's concert, it was truly a memorable evening of sonorous splendors. — G. E. A.

Cir. (D 653,262) (S 982,601)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL-AMERICAN

FEB 11 1954

Boston Symphony Concert:

Spivakovsky Hailed

By MILES KASTENDIECK

PIERRE MONTEUX came with the Boston Symphony to Carnegie Hall last night. The concert they presented stirred the audience noticeably.

There were bravos before the intermission, chiefly for Tossy Spivakovsky the soloist, and cheers at the end for Monteux and the orchestra.

Spivakovsky played the Bartok violin concerto which he had introduced in this country over a decade ago. It is an extraordinary work, full of originality.

As the audience took in its new ideas of melody, rhythm, and tone color, it responded to those intangible values hidden within the score and accepted its strangeness in stride.

Of course Spivakovsky had a great deal to do with making the work sound so convincing. It is in music like this that he rises to peak performance. He played not only as a master fiddler but as a master interpreter of the contemporary idiom.

According to his inimitable fashion, Monteux gave a masterly interpretation of the Sibelius Second Symphony. The way in which this music emerged fresh and compelling, vibrant with emotion, power and virility, reflected the greatness of both the composer and the conductor.

How Monteux drew forth the rich dark colors of the score and highlighted the dramatic statement of its themes is a story in itself.

Of the four movements, the first courted reservations for some over-soft playing and a desire for more bite in the phrasing. The others unfolded with the kind of authoritative direction which proclaims greatness in concept as well as in musicianship.

The program opened with a vigorous, solid, unexciting performance of Bach's Third Brandenburg Concerto.

Cir. (D 541,465) (Sat. 274,941) 99

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM & SUN

FEB 11 1954

Music

Spivakovsky Does Bartok At Carnegie

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI

Two personalities stood out powerfully on last night's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie ~~Hall.~~

The first was that of Pierre Monteux, who conducted with that mastery and zest that are his special secret; the second was that of Tossy Spivakovsky, who communicated his imposing gifts by way of Bartok's Violin Concerto.

Well Balanced.

It was a well-balanced program. There was a Brandenberg concerto by Bach (the Third, in G Major) to provide a solid core of classicism; there was the Bartok Concerto, and there was Sibelius's Second Symphony to reconcile the old world of music and the new.

Mr. Monteux knew how to build the two movements of the Bach Concerto without making them sound like the "frozen music" that someone once called architecture.

If Bach was an architect, Mr. Monteux appeared to be pointing out, he was that in spite of himself. If one thinks of architecture when one hears Bach's music, so much the better for architecture.

Warm and Poetic.

The reading was warm and expressive because Bach was always that and because Mr. Monteux always insists on making an orchestra act in the composer's image.

Mr. Spivakovsky's rendering of the Bartok Concerto was the answer to any composer's prayer. It was not only technically firm and tonally flawless; it had a sense of fiery faith in the composer and all his works.

And that, of course, applied to Mr. Monteux at the accompanying end of the concerto. He too was obviously convinced of the genius of Bela Bartok, and he let his conviction ring out from every corner of the orchestra.

Great Fervor.

That he did the same for Sibelius goes without saying. There is about this man Monteux a great feeling of authority, of absolute musical control; but there is a great fervor too.

Whether it was Bach, Bartok or Sibelius, he seemed to be telling the Boston musicians, and through them the audience:

"It is rhythm, yes, that beats in this music, but it is also a human heart."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK TIMES

FEB 11 1954

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Monteux Conducts Works of Bach, Bartok and Sibelius —Spivakovsky Is Soloist

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Pierre Monteux conducting, Tossy Spivakovsky, violinist. At Carnegie Hall.

Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G.......Bach
Violin Concerto.......Bartok
Symphony No. 2.......Sibelius

By OLIN DOWNES

Pierre Monteux, with Tossy Spivakovsky as soloist, was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall. The occasion reaped more acclaim for Monteux and for the performances, under his guidance, of the famous orchestra.

The least familiar item of the program was Bella Bartok's Violin Concerto, which has to be heard at least ten times for the listener to expect to grasp fully its contents. But the concerto, played phenomenally by Mr. Spivakovsky — wonderfully seconded by Mr. Monteux — grows upon us with every additional hearing.

It might grow upon us more slowly if its interpreter had had less virtuosity, temperament and understanding of the music than Mr. Spivakovsky possesses. His interpretation is so complete in all respects that it is as if Bartok had written this concerto for Mr. Spivakovsky, who is especially equipped to convey this music to us.

Ideas Carried Jointly

Nor is the concerto only a work for a soloist, and one of terrific difficulty at that. It is symphonic in a rare degree and the development of the ideas is carried on jointly both by the solo instrument and the orchestra. The instrumentation is of intense brilliancy, subtlety and variety of effect. At the same time it balances remarkably with the tone of the solo instrument.

GUEST CONDUCTOR: Pierre Monteux, who led the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Carnegie Hall.

The slow movement stands out at present for its vision and beauty. The finale, described by the program annotator as a variation on the first movement, speaks for itself, and with all its contrasting effects hangs together. Fortunate those who heard this concerto so communicated, so revealed in its essence.

The concert opened with the most substantial kind of music, soundly and substantially presented—the Bach concerto grosso. It closed with a performance of Sibelius' Second Symphony that combined unsurpassed musicianship and objectivity of approach with a born conductor's power of communication.

The symphony needs no words of description today. It has passed its half-century mark and it continues to stir us to the marrow by its freshness like primeval nature, its epical spirit. As, of course, when this symphony is adequately presented, the audience applauded and cheered for minutes afterward.

Cir. (D 311,466) (S 270,024)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

FEB 11 1954

WORDS and MUSIC

By Harriett Johnson

Spivakovsky Scores in Bartok

Tossy Spivakovsky's magnificent performance of the Bartok Violin Concerto last night with the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall was so impressive that several men in the ensemble spontaneously said "bravo" after the completion of the long, complex first movement. No higher compliment can be paid an artist than to have the symphony men themselves enthusiastic about a soloist.

This concerto is typical of much of Bartok's music when he seems impelled by an elemental force to quickly change tempi, rhythm and mood. In this vein, his fierce intensity never seems to find quite the answer it wants. He interchanges moments of tranquillity with driving sections of dynamic rhythmic movement but the resolution evades him. Bartok's questioning in a sense is the music's strength because it gives a sense of inevitability. One force moves against another until eventual conclusion, if not satisfaction, is achieved.

After the intermission, Monteux concluded the concert (which had begun with the Bach Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G Major, for Strings) with the glowing, positive Sibelius Second Symphony. Not in my recollection during the current season has the Boston ensemble performed with such effulgence of tone as they did for Monteux in this work. This was, first, an inspired piece of program building. The affirmation of the Sibelius, a much simpler work, technically and intellectually than the Bartok Concerto, resolved our problems momentarily as well as gave us much pleasure. It was a joyous illusion created by a superb performance.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 11 1954

Spivakovsky Plays Concerto Of Bartok With Bostonians

By Francis D. Perkins

Pierre Monteux was the Boston Symphony Orchestra's guest conductor yesterday for the third concert of its evening series in Carnegie Hall, where Tossy Spivakovsky was the soloist in Bela Bartok's Violin Concerto. This was prefaced by Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, and the program closed with a stirring performance of Jean Sibelius' Second Symphony.

The Bartok concerto, last played here by Isaac Stern and William Steinberg's visiting Pittsburghers nearly a year ago, is unlike some other contemporary works in this form in that it gives the solo instrument prevailing prominence. It is generous in melodies, and does not omit an at least occasional Hungarian savor; it has also a liberal wealth and variety of moods, sometimes quickly shifting. The skilfully wrought orchestration usually supports, rather than competes with, the solo violin; the instrumental proportion and balance of the score as a whole were admirably realized under Mr. Monteux' leadership.

Sometimes the structure seemed episodic; the finale, toward its close, seemed to wander from a direct path, but this is still a work of imagination and resource. Mr. Spivakovsky, according to Richard Pleasants' compilation, has been the soloist in twenty-three of the forty-nine professional performances which it has received thus far in the United States; his knowledge and devotion were always apparent in his interpretation. He met its exacting technical demands with a sense of ease; these never detracted from the firmness and musicality of his tone in a performance which fully realized the expressive demands of the music.

The performance of the Brandenburg Concerto had a well routined spirit; there was much more than this in the playing of the Sibelius symphony, which made its hearers conscious of its musical stature and its wide emotional span. Mr. Monteux' interpretation had breadth, but also pervasive momentum; it emphasized memorably the work's marked contrasts of instrumental hue and timbre. In the finale, there is a danger of anticlimax unless the final peroration is approached with constantly waxing expressive tension, but this tension was present as this admirable performance neared its close.

Cir. (D 132,013)

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
FEB 12 1954

Matchless Monteux

The concert guest conductor Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony gave at Constitution Hall last night certainly won't be surpassed this season. And it is unlikely that it will even be matched. Mr. Monteux' presence alone was a source of stimulation to both audience and orchestra, and his readings were, of course, authoritative.

The program did not range far afield, staying within a category that could be roughly described as "romantic." This sort of music is Mr. Monteux' special dish.

The Cowell Hymn and Fuguing Tune. No, 3, was a fine opener—sturdy and tuneful. The Beethoven Fifth Symphony followed. How many times must 78-year-old Mr. Monteux have conducted this work in his long and illustrious career. Yet last night he brought to it all the spontanity and excitement of a first performance. This freshness of spirit he imparted to the orchestra.

With the "Psyche" Suite, Mr. Monteux took the audience into the relaxed and peaceful world of Cesar Franck. Judging by the small applause at this point, not many listeners felt at home there. But while the four sections of the suite were subdued and quite similar, the orchestra played it all so beautifully that there should have been no complaints. Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" tone poem that closed the program was also magnificently performed. All in all, it was a rare evening of music. MILTON BERLINER.

Washington
Telephone, REpublic
Feb. 12, 1954

Bostonians Under Baton Of Monteux

BY GLENN DILLARD GUNN

The Boston Symphony brought Pierre Monteux as its guest conductor to Thursday's concert in Constitution Hall.

The venerable French artist now appears only in such guest engagements, which he fulfills with many orchestras. He should enjoy this wandering life, because he, in turn, is enjoyed by all the orchestras that he conducts, and is respected and even beloved of many American audiences, and not a few in Europe.

As is his habit, he brought music both new and old, some well-worn, some quite unfamiliar.

In the latter category, one must place the symphonic poem by Cesar Franck, "Psyche," a work which may well have had its first performance in Washington on this occasion.

Filled With Mysticism

Franck was a devout churchman and contributed much to the Roman ritual; but this did not inhibit his passion for pagan legend, and his idiom, so filled with mysticism, was perfectly suited to the communication of a feeling of antiquity.

The music, which tells of Psyche's four adventures in as many movements, seems to move behind a grey film. It is more than ancient. It is legendary, and it is filled with poetic allusion. One might add, also, that it enters those realms of illusion that were more fully explored by his successors, Debussy and Ravel.

In any event, it is beautiful music, and Monteux and the Bostonians made it a memorable experience.

The Franck score antedated Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration" by two years. But reckoned in the progress of the art, it is a much younger work. Strauss spread his melodrama over four continuous acts, all equally painful, and all filled with that expertly calculated melody which the world found so eloquent in 1890.

This score is another of Monteux's favorite items. I heard him do it some nine years ago with the Chicago Symphony, another great orchestra. It seems to me that this music could not have been played more advantageously. If it sounded dated, that is also to be expected.

Beethoven's Fifth

The major work of the evening was the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, and this, tho impeccably set forth with every accent of authority, also sounded dated. This is because Monteux is sternly academic in Beethoven, and faithfully traditional.

The novelty of the evening was Henry Cowell's "Hymn and Fuguing Tune, No. 3." This is a witty tribute to this country's first composer, a Bostonian who divided his time between his trade as harness and saddle-maker and art of composition. His name was William Billings, and between 1770 and 1794 he wrote many hymns and works which he called "fuguing tunes."

Cowell, of course, a witty, resourceful, but also respectful adventurer in his modern tribute to this ancient figure in American music, was, perhaps, more grave than gay. This was an unimportant disappointment, since he has great gifts of humor.

Cir. (D 226,101) (S 261,386)

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
FEB 12 1954

News of Music

Monteux Brings Out the Best In Boston Symphony Concert

By Day Thorpe

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor. Constitution Hall. Program: Hymn and Fuguing Tune, No. 3, Henry Cowell; Symphony No 5, in C minor, Beethoven; Suite from "Psyche," Symphonic Poem, Franck; "Tod und Verklarung," Opus 24, Strauss.

Few great conductors have been longer on the American scene than Pierre Monteux. It is hard to recall one other who has been conductor of so many of our ranking musical organizations. Coming to America in World War I with the Diaghilev Ballet, he was in turn conductor of the Metropolitan Opera, the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the San Francisco Orchestra and the NBC Orchestra. Now 79 years old, he has the bearing of a man of 55, the facial expression of a kindly satyr, and hair in which no gray is visible.

He conducted the Boston Symphony last night in Constitution Hall without score, quietly, and with the assurance that he would always achieve the effects he wanted. He always did; the orchestra sounded its best both in the vigorous reading of the Beethoven and the lush cantabiles of the Franck.

The third of Henry Cowell's nine "Hymn and Fuguing Tunes," the opening number of the concert, is a modern reworking for orchestra of a type of church music of early 18th century New England—"a relic of the polyphonic motets of the Elizabethan era, with . . . imitative entrances for each voice part in turn," to quote Leonard Ellinwood's new "History of American Church Music." The Cowell piece is modal, lively and tuneful, and the composer, who was in the audience, received appreciative applause.

The Beethoven fifth symphony was notable for a fast and hard-driven first movement, and an unusually brilliant finale. Mr. Monteux thinks of the weighty phrase with which the symphony opens as a motto rather than an integral part of the movement, as he invariably slowed it down whenever it appeared without counterpoint.

The "Psyche" of Franck is cut from the same bolt of cloth the composer used for virtually everything he wrote. No composer was ever so overwhelmed by a few idiosyncracies. In its performance, though, the piece showed Mr. Monteux at his best, a best that is surpassed by few. The suave and exquisitely molded string phrases, and the blaring harmonies of the brass choir, were judged and executed with the skill of a lifetime of the interpretation of Franck.

The poet Gray expresses the opinion that a favorite has no friend. Strauss's "Tod und Verklarung" is generally held to be a great favorite, but strangely enough one seldom hears of its admirers. It is a curious 25 minutes of soft, slow, thin music interspersed with patches of loud, fast, thick orchestral shouting. It is a marvelous orchestration of nothing at all, and this waste of a great talent may be behind a somewhat unkind corruption of its name—not "Tod und Verklarung" (Death and Transfiguration), but "Tod und Vergehrung" (Death and Transgression).

Marine Band Symphony Does Impossible Well

By Homer Ulrich

The United States Marine Band Symphony Orchestra, Lt. Col. William F. Santelmann, leader, in concert at the Department of Commerce Auditorium, S/Sergt. Edward Seferian, violin soloist. Program: Grand march from "The Queen of Sheba," Goldmark; "Siegfried Paraphrase," Wagner-Wilhelmj; three scenes from "Endymion," Hinton; Symphonie Espagnole, Lalo; A Night on Bald Mountain, Moussorgsky.

A derangement called "Siegfried Paraphrase," played by the United States Marine Band Symphony Orchestra last night, gave this reviewer a disconcerting quarter hour.

It is a piece put together by August Wilhelmj, who is also responsible for Bach's "Air On the G String," and is composed not only of phrases from Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," but also of other Siegfried fragments that Wagner chose not to use in the "Idyl."

Wilhelmj, in effect, took the familiar motives out of context and reassembled them without making sense. He produced the "heart of Wagner" without the brain. The orchestra, under Lt. Col. Santelmann, is to be commended for playing the piece as well as they did; the question remains, why did they play it?

Lalo's venerable "Symphonie Espagnole" was given a spirited performance by S/Sergt. Edward Seferian, listed among the orchestra's violinists. Sergt. Seferian has more than enough technical facility for this work, and he played cleanly and in good style throughout. One thing was lacking; he seldom achieved the luscious tone one must expect nowadays from those who would aspire to great things musically speaking. Perhaps there is nothing wrong with Sergt. Seferian's playing that a good Stradivarius would not cure.

Elsewhere on the program Col. Santelmann led his capable group through a variety of orchestral numbers, and added two marches by way of encores. Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain" revealed the orchestra's general competence, but also exposed a characteristic weakness. The group sounds like a band whenever a fortissimo is reached.

String tone is swallowed up in the rich sound the wind players deliver, and the strings can be seen and not heard. This is unfortunate, for in other respects the group is well balanced, plays with a good deal of flexibility and a fair amount of enthusiasm.

Composers' Concert Lacking in Merit

By Irving Lowens

The National Association for American Composers and Conductors. Concert of music composed by chapter members. U. S. Air Force Band wind ensemble; Rolf Conrad, viola; Pierrette de Beve, soprano; Matthew Mezzanotte, violin. Dorothy Eley, Max Seeboth, Dorothy Emery, Alba Vietor, piano. At the Church of the Holy City. Program: Movement for Wind Quintet, Gauldin; Three Spanish Songs, Eley; Sonata for Viola and Piano, No 3, Seeboth; three songs for soprano, Emery; two solos for violin, Vietor.

Yesterday's concert by the local chapter of the National Association for American Composers and Conductors was no doubt praiseworthy in intention. Nevertheless, it was utterly lamentable in presentation. Had this been a get-together of amateurs around a family hearth, a degree of charity would be warranted. Unfortunately, it was not. This was a group of composers and executants publicly presented by an honored professional organization, and hence presumably to be judged by professional standards.

The local chapter does its worthy cause a distinct disservice by even implying that such a program is at all representative of the American music being composed today.

There is little one can say about the music except that some pieces were prettier than others. The songs by Dorothy Radde Emery, sweetly sung by Pierrette de Beve, at least showed a degree of technical competence. Matthew Mezzanote played Alba Rosa Vietor's two violin pieces with enthusiasm but faulty technique.

It was announced that the Air Force Band wind players, who were to do Mr. Gauldin's work, would perform first as they were leaving for Iceland the next morning.

Cir. (D 187,555) (S 192,261)

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

FEB 12 1954

Postlude

Monteux's Reading of Strauss Excels in Boston's Concert

By Paul Hume

Pierre Monteux returned to Washington last night in another of his guest appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

His program, which he is repeating later this week in New York and Brooklyn, included a new Hymn and Fuguing Tune of Henry Cowell, the 5th Symphony of Beethoven, Franck's Psyche, and the Death and Transfiguration by Strauss.

In all he does, Monteux is one of the few remaining greats. He leads music without ostentation, in a spirit intended to place all the emphasis directly upon the music. And he conducts every work with a realization of its proper place in musical history, with attention to the sonorities inherent in its writing, the balance and dynamics correct for its composer.

Thus his Strauss draws from the orchestra its fullest fortissimo, though it also uses the whispered echo of its best pianissimo, too. Neither loudest nor softest are demanded in Beethoven's symphony, which was read as the classical symphony it is, with a flowing line, a growing sense of structure, and a soundness of proportion throughout that made it a rich reading. We must add that John Burk's notes on the piece follow the same line and read with grateful freshness.

We cannot say that the orchestra approached Monteux's conception in its playing. It was rough and unprecise in the first movement, and the brass blared rudely in the finale. To these blemishes others were added in the Strauss, with raw horn playing the principal defect.

No guest conductor can be held to account for the playing of an orchestra which he has in his care only briefly. The tone of the Boston brasses has been steadily coarsened for five years, and will not smooth itself out in two weeks.

The reading of the Strauss was of a single piece from start to finish, with the final climax devised so that it fittingly crowned the whole. The sound of the orchestra was frequently of heavenly texture. Richard Burgin, whose great career as concertmaster of this orchestra is one of the remarkable accomplishments of our time, showed again why his playing has always been so admired.

Cesar Franck's Psyche is faded in spots, but in so earnestly coaxed a reading as Monteux gave it, there are plenty of moments of living beauty still to enjoy. Cowell's work, familiar in resembling his other studies in the style, is engaging simplicity.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB 13 1954

MUSIC

Monteux Proves Master With Boston Symphony

By PAUL AFFELDER

"Music," goes the old expression, "hath charms to soothe the savage beast." And Pierre Monteux hath charms to soothe the savage music critic. The eminent French musician, now approaching his 79th birthday, appeared in the Academy of Music last evening as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the program he had planned was, we thought, of entirely too popular a nature, at least for a community which depends almost entirely on this organization's five concerts for its symphonic fare.

Consequently, we came to the concert just a trifle peeved that we and the rest of the audience would have to sit through two time-honored "warhorses," Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration." One or the other, we felt, would have been enough for even the most conservative listener. We still feel that way.

But by the time M. Monteux had finished, we were ready to cheer him to the rafters for a magnificent concert. Not in a long time have we heard the Boston orchestra play with such glowing tone or such sensitively balanced sound, where the strings sang with a glorious lustre and where the brasses were kept under control in every passage.

Ineffable Strauss

Never in our memory have we been so moved by the Strauss tone poem, interpreted on this occasion with great eloquence and emotional power. It was a deeply communicative interpretation, rounded off at the edges here and there, perhaps, but marked by climaxes that fairly lifted us out of our seat. Yet, with it all, there was no blasting of brasses, only warm, resonant mountains of tone.

M. Monteux' reading of the Fifth Symphony was sane, firmly rooted. Our only objection to it was his old-fashioned treatment of the first movement, where he slowed down the tempo for each important announcement of the so-called "Fate" motif. A little more drama and drive in this movement would also have been welcome.

But there was further cause for rejoicing last night. Always an admirable interpreter of the music of his native land, M. Monteux treated us to a sensitive, beautifully poised and expressive performance of the Suite from Cesar Franck's Symphonic poem, "Psyche," highlighted by the songful final movement, "Psyche and Eros." We hear this work all too seldom nowadays, especially in readings of such nobility.

The program began with the first New York performance of Henry Cowell's "Hymn and Fuguing Tune" No. 3. The "Hymn" has a simple, modal, religious quality, while the "Fuguing Tune" evokes the spirit of the old-time Southern revival meeting. Mr. Cowell has the knack of capturing the spirit of America in his music, and here he has given it real artistic stature.

As long as we're commenting on the contents of the Boston Symphony's programs in Brooklyn, we'd like to voice a dissenting vote regarding future plans. On one page of last night's program book, we were informed that Charles Munch plans to bring Berlioz's seldom-played "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony, complete with soloists and chorus, to Carnegie Hall and Washington during the orchestra's visit next month. On another page was the announcement that Richard Burgin, the orchestra's associate conductor, would be in charge of the next concert at the Academy of Music.

Now we have no quarrel with Mr. Burgin. He is a fine, justly respected musician who has done some excellent work on the Boston podium. But his direction of the next program here means that we in the borough will be deprived of the rare opportunity to hear a great and overpowering composition by a 19th century genius. Couldn't the orchestra's schedule be reshuffled, allotting the April program to Mr. Burgin, so that "Romeo and Juliet" might be presented at the Academy, too?

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB 13 1954

Boxholders Entertain Guests at Symphony

A capacity audience welcomed the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its guest conductor, Pierre Monteux, last night at the third concert in a series of five this season in the Opera House of the Academy of Music.

Seated in Box 1 were Mrs. Edward C. Blum and her guests, Mr. and Mrs. Carroll J. Dickson, Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Blum, Mrs. William H. Good and Mr. and Mrs. Frank D. Schroth. Box 2 was occupied by guests of Friends School and Box 3 by guests of Berkeley Institute.

Box 4, which has been taken for the season by Mrs. Darwin R. James Jr., was occupied by eight children from the Brooklyn Home for Children. In Box 5 were Adelphi Alumnae, including Mrs. William B. Parker and her guests, Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth C. Bell and Miss Emma Jessie Ogg and her guest, Mrs. Fred Lyon Stone.

Officers from the United States Naval Station in Brooklyn were present in Box 7 as guests of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. Seated in Box 8 were blind veterans and their escorts from the Red Cross, who came as guests of the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Box 9 was occupied by guests of Packer Collegiate Institute.

Houston, Texas
Chronicle
2/14/54

Record Changer

Munch Delivers Poignant Version Of Berlioz's 'Romeo and Juliet'

Hector Berlioz wanted to set Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet" to music as many as 10 years before he knew the precise form he would use.

It wasn't until around 1838 that the idea, and the means, were his. The idea for a dramatic symphony was germinated by Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, although he had no intention of imitating that work.

The famous violinist, Nicolo Paganini, provided the means. Berlioz was given a gift of 20,000 francs by Paganini in tribute to the composer's "genius." It naturally followed that "Romeo and Juliet" would be dedicated to Paganini. The orchestral work was performed for the first time in 1839 in Paris.

Charles Munch has recorded his interpretation of the Berlioz work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, soloists and choruses, a two-disk album (R. C. A.-Victor). It is an appealing version, well-played, and makes a worthy successor to an earlier album by Columbia that contained only the orchestral score.

This is the complete work, with Margaret Roggero, contralto, as Juliet; Leslie Chabay, tenor, Romeo; Yi-Kwei Sze, bass, Friar Laurence, and with the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society.

This recording is enhanced by excellent sound and fine voices. If one can visualize Juliet as a contralto, rather than a soprano, he will be satisfied with Miss Roggero. Her singing is sensitive and Chabay is in fine voice, although additional volume is needed when he sings. No fault is to be found with the two choral groups.

Apart from the story, the music is warm and enjoyable. The Love Theme and the "Queen Mab" Scherzo are especially familiar to music listeners.

The original French is used and a small libretto is supplied in the long-play album.

* * *

Symphony No. 3 in F Major, Brahms—Karl Bohm and Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra (London) 12-inch, long-play.

This work is presented by one of the world's most colorful orchestras in an exceptionally good recording. It is a vital performance, in which excellent musicianship, coupled with an imaginative interpretation on Bohm's part, offer the listener some fine musical moments.

Superb individual artistry of the players is especially evident in the first movement that calls for a number of first-chair and sectional solos. In addition, the orchestral delivery is firmly anchored by the lower strings.

This is one of London's better issues.—G. G.

Turntable Tips

Martha Lou Harp's "Dream Time" album (Columbia, 10-inch, L. P.), contains familiar favorites of a couple of decades ago. Her voice approaches the stentatorian a little too closely, but her intimate style does make the songs pleasant.

The recording is clear and the accompanist properly stays in the background. The favorites include "Harbor Lights," "I Hadn't Anyone Till You," "When You're a Long, Long Way From Home" and "If I Forget You."

* * *

You needn't wait for the Martin Kane or Nora Drake television shows in order to feel the thrills and chills of the theme music. M.-G.-M. has an interesting, provocative recording of the Martin Kane Theme, by Charles Paul and his orchestra—sneaky, detective-like, gumshoe music. It is backed by the Nora Drake theme, "Love," which is danceable, but poorly played.—L. A.

102

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 14 1954

MUSIC

Boston Symphony

By VIRGIL THOMSON

Carnegie Hall

Pierre Monteux conducting.
Hymn and Fuguing Tune, No. 3 (first N. Y. performance) .... Cowell
Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67 .... Beethoven
"Psyche," Symphonic Poem .... Franck
"Tod und Verklaerung," Tone Poem, Op. 24 .... Strauss

Eroded Repertory

Pierre Monteux, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, worked impeccably and with Olympian serenity. Though suffering from the immediate shock of a bereavement (his eldest son Jean just died in Paris), no sign of weakness or distraction appeared in his readings. If the concert languished a bit for this listener, save at its beginning and ending, that was the fault, I am sure, of its too chunkiest items.

* * *

These were Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, a work formerly so overplayed that it has tended in recent years to appear rarely on the subscription programs of our major orchestras, and Ce'sar Franck's "Psyche," a twenty-three minute symphonic poem in four movements that never was of lively interest. A Hymn and Fuguing Tune, No. 3, by Henry Cowell had opened the program with songful afflatus and jazzy metrics. Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" closed it with eloquence. But the middle was for this witness somnolent.

* * *

Beethoven's Fifth is probably the most famous orchestral piece in the world and used to be the most popular. Everybody loved it; everybody played it. We loved it so much and they played it so much that today its vividness is gone. That will come back later, no doubt, for it is a faultless work, coherent, direct, emphatic. But there is no surprise left in it, no strangeness, no mystery, no shock. Like Yellowstone Park, which any visitor can see is tired, very tired of being looked at, this great and grand old piece needs a rest, a period of neglect, of quietude. Mr. Monteux was not lacking in respectful attention to its every detail and contour though his speeds did seem a shade hasty throughout, as if nothing in it demanded to be dwelt on. One felt that, for all his consideration toward it and courage in attacking it again, the unconscionable plugging that the work suffered during the first half of our century has rendered it virtually useless to the repertory just now.

* * *

Henry Cowell

Franck's "Psyché" suffers, and always has, from banality in the melodic material and from lack of energy in the rhythm. Its harmonies meander from chord to chord, and its tunes are chiefly the notes of these chords arranged sequentially. Its formal progress is sequential too, the repetition of short passages through a series of different keys, most rising chromatically. I do not remember the piece as ever having been fun to listen to. Yesterday, for sure, it was not, though it was elegantly performed.

* * *

Henry Cowell's Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 3, though it lasted a bare six minutes, was a delight for fresh melodic sustenance and for joyful syncopation, like many of the old American tunes cast in that form. It is neither a pretentious work nor an unduly modest one. It is direct, heartfelt, skillfully harmonized and counterpointed; and its orchestral sound, ever songful, quite glows at the end.

2/14/54

THE NEW YORK TIMES, SUN

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRESENTS NOVELTY

Cowell's Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 3 Is Patterned on Early American Theme

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Conducted by Pierre Monteaux. At Carnegie Hall.
Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 3 (first N. Y. performance)....Henry Cowell
Symphony No. 5....................Beethoven
Suite from Psyche....................Franck
Tod und Verklaerung....................Strauss

Yesterday afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony, conducted by Pierre Monteux, consisted largely of familiar orchestral works. The one novelty was Henry Cowell's short Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 3.

Mr. Cowell has composed a series of these works, based on early American themes and techniques. The one heard yesterday contained some curious melodic ideas. At the very opening of the hymn there is a theme strongly suggestive of that which opens the introduction to Mussorgsky's "Khovantchina," almost note for note; and the Fuguing Tune has a strangely Oriental quality, what with a pentatonic scale strongly evident.

And yet, Russian and Oriental sounds notwithstanding, the feeling is decidedly American. The music produced in the Colonies in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries often had modal characteristics imported from Europe. Mr. Cowell has invented his melodies along those modal lines. What results is an attractive orchestral work. The composer was present yesterday to take several bows.

Had Orchestra Singing

Mr. Monteux here, and throughout the program, had the Boston Symphony singing. Few conductors can so shape a melody, can so maintain balance and proportion. And his interpretations carry tremendous authority.

Even though Mr. Monteux does not conduct German composers in a commonly accepted Teutonic tradition, his ideas always are of interest even to those brought up in that tradition. His Beethoven was lithe, almost brisk. The first movement of the Fifth Symphony perilously approached nonchalance; it might have been a trifle too fast, lacking breathing space and the intense vigor of those pile-driver rhythms.

Elsewhere, the conductor shaped the music with elegance, bringing to the variations in the slow movement a deft articulation, and to the finale a feeling of cumulative build-up that had stature without becoming ponderous.

The "Psyche" was all velvet. Franck's texture often sounds over-rich, but here everything was graceful, sensitive and, when the music demanded it, soaring. Strauss' symphonic poem, another example of fine-textured conducting from Mr. Monteux, concluded the program. H. C. S.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 14 1954

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRESENTS NOVELTY

Cowell's Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 3 Is Patterned on Early American Theme

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Conducted by Pierre Monteaux. At Carnegie Hall.
Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 3 (first N. Y. performance)....Henry Cowell
Symphony No. 5....................Beethoven
Suite from Psyche....................Franck
Tod und Verklaerung....................Strauss

Yesterday afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony, conducted by Pierre Monteux, consisted largely of familiar orchestral works. The one novelty was Henry Cowell's short Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 3.

Mr. Cowell has composed a series of these works, based on early American themes and techniques. The one heard yesterday contained some curious melodic ideas. At the very opening of the hymn there is a theme strongly suggestive of that which opens the introduction to Mussorgsky's "Khovantchina," almost note for note; and the Fuguing Tune has a strangely Oriental quality, what with a pentatonic scale strongly evident.

And yet, Russian and Oriental sounds notwithstanding, the feeling is decidedly American. The music produced in the Colonies in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries often had modal characteristics imported from Europe. Mr. Cowell has invented his melodies along those modal lines. What results is an attractive orchestral work. The composer was present yesterday to take several bows.

Had Orchestra Singing

Mr. Monteux here, and throughout the program, had the Boston Symphony singing. Few conductors can so shape a melody, can so maintain balance and proportion. And his interpretations carry tremendous authority.

Even though Mr. Monteux does not conduct German composers in a commonly accepted Teutonic tradition, his ideas always are of interest even to those brought up in that tradition. His Beethoven was lithe, almost brisk. The first movement of the Fifth Symphony perilously approached nonchalance; it might have been a trifle too fast, lacking breathing space and the intense vigor of those pile-driver rhythms.

Elsewhere, the conductor shaped the music with elegance, bringing to the variations in the slow movement a deft articulation, and to the finale a feeling of cumulative build-up that had stature without becoming ponderous.

The "Psyche" was all velvet. Franck's texture often sounds over-rich, but here everything was graceful, sensitive and, when the music demanded it, soaring. Strauss' symphonic poem, another example of fine-textured conducting from Mr. Monteux, concluded the program. H. C. S.

Spivakovsky at Musicale —

C.S. Monitor - 2/15/54

Violinist Heard in Works By Beethoven and Paganini

By Harold Rogers

There are musicians who do their best work while playing concertos with orchestras, and there are others who do their best in recital. There are some who are equally at home in both media, but they are rare indeed.

At present Tossy Spivakovsky is a violinist who is to be found in the first group. Earlier this month he made his Boston debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a fine performance of Bartok's Violin Concerto, Pierre Monteux conducting.

Yesterday he made his Boston recital debut at the Morning Musicale in the Hotel Statler. His appearance with the Symphony was far more successful.

* * *

For his Musicale program he chose an Adagio by Mozart, the Sonata No. 4 in A minor by Beethoven, the first movement to Paganini's Concerto in D major, plus a Brahms Intermezzo as arranged by Castelnuova-Tedesco, some Bartok Romanian Dances as arranged by Szekely, and Sarasate's Introduction and Tarantella.

Since Spivakovsky's oddly distinctive technique was described at length after his first Boston appearance, the present observations may be confined to his ability as an interpreter. And in this department, sad to say, Spivakovsky appears to be totally incommunicative of musical emotion.

* * *

Even if tone, dynamics, and accuracy are present—as they generally were in Spivakovksy's recital—simply to play the notes is not enough. One could easily make an intellecutal differentiation between the Mozart and the Beethoven, or between the Beethoven and the Paganini. The soloist was careful about matters of style.

But whether he was playing the Mozart Adagio, unadorned in the extreme, or the Paganini Concerto, extremely adorned, one remained emotionally unmoved. When such a condition exists at a recital there is usually one answer. The recitalist is feeling nothing himself. Musical emotion must overflow the heart of the performer if it is to touch the hearts of his listeners.

Open Rehearsal Tonight

For the open public rehearsal tonight by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Charles Munch will conduct a complete performance of Berlioz' Dramatic Legend, "The Damnation of Faust." The soloists will be Suzanne Danco as Marguerite, David Poleri as Faust, Martial Singher as Mephistopheles, and Donald Gramm as Brander. The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth, will participate. The performance, for which seats may be purchased at the door, will begin at 7:30.

BOSTON MASS.
POST

FEB 18 1954

Music in Review

By TUCKER KEISER

When Tessy Spivakovsky made his Boston debut two weeks ago playing the Bartok Violin Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra his performance of this exacting score created a mild sensation, not only for his authoritative interpretation but for his unorthodox violin technique, which nevertheless produced a large yet refined tone capable of the finest gradations of color and dynamics.

Yesterday, the violinist was heard at the Statler Morning Musicale in a recital which gave him a chance to prove his artistry in the more conventional repertory. In every piece Mr. Spivakovsky demonstrated that he is a musician of the very finest mettle.

The Mozart Adagio, warm and expansive, never fell to sentimentality, preserving the classic balance and unity so necessary to make the music convincing. Since the piano part is as important as the violin in Beethoven's Sonata No. 4 in A minor, the sensitive collaboration between Mr. Spivakovsky and Leopold Mittman, the accompanist, proved that each could submerge himself in the music. The Presto had the proper fire, the Andante was proprely more playful than profound, and the Allegro Molto tripped along good humoredly.

The first movement of Pagaofnini's Concerto in D major served as the necessary vehicle for pyrotechnical display in which Mr. Spivakovsky left his listeners breathless so glibly did he toss off double-stops, left-hand pizzicati, and rapid harmonics.

The first movement of Pagaformed after intermission, the Bartok-Szekely Roumanian Dances particularly delighted me with their strong, strange melodies and rhythmic dash.

C.S. monitor
2/18/54

Youth Should Be Heard

By Elizabeth Taylor

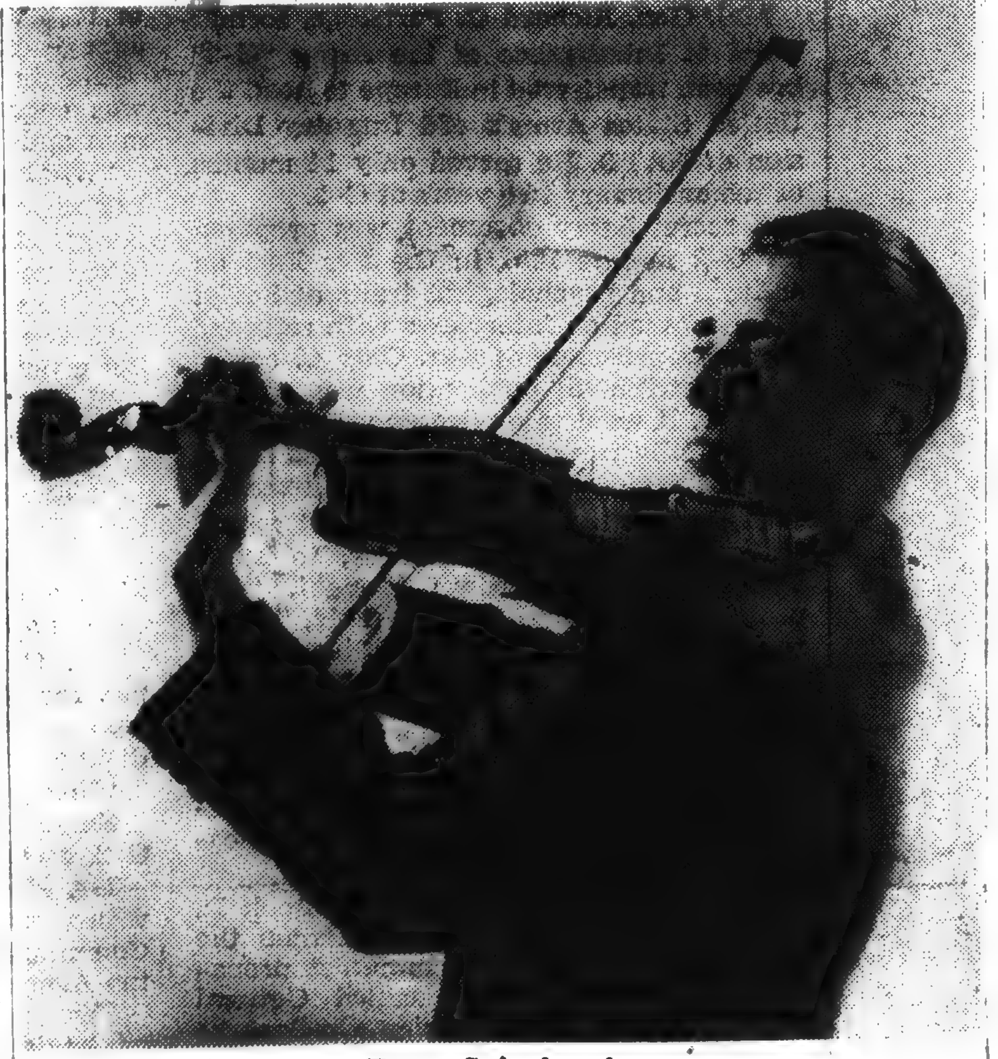
One night in 1948 a Russian-born violinist named Tossy Spivakovsky stepped onto the stage of San Francisco's Opera House, lifted a bow to his Stradivarius and brought San Francisco, long accustomed to memorable performances, cheering to its feet. He was called by one critic, "the greatest of a generation," which was to place him alongside such masters as Heifetz and Kreisler. He has maintained this position admirably, and in fact has many reviving memories of the technical wizardry of Ysaye and the 19th-century genius, Paganini.

Simultaneously with Mr. Spivakovsky's rise to fame has come public recognition of the works of the Hungarian composer, Béla Bartok. It was Spivakovsky who introduced the violin concerto of Bartók and repeated it in subsequent performances until it became well established and brought the composer a measure of recognition during his lifetime.

* * *

Mr. Spivakovsky has similarly been identified with other "causes" in the name of music. There was, for example, the time the Detroit Symphony found itself without a conductor or visible means of support. Spivakovsky stepped deftly into the spot, used his bow to conduct or otherwise perform with. Then in the period normally given to encores he gave a five-minute speech to the citizenry urging them to support the orchestra. His campaign was highly successful, and the orchestra has received ample backing.

Tossy Spivakovsky belongs to the class of the talented known as a prodigy. Born in Odessa, he was taken to Berlin before he was two. There he studied violin, appeared in public at the age of ten and thereafter concertized in Europe. In seven seasons of coast-to-coast tours, Spivakovsky has been heard in all of the 48 states, Canada, the South American countries, Hawaii, and Israel.



Tossy Spivakovsky

* * *

Between tours he lives in Wilton, Connecticut, where he may be found playing an occasional game of croquet, swimming or walking in the hills with his wife and daughter. Even here he is never too far from his well-loved 1721 Stradivarius, kept in the music room of his home which is specially regulated to prevent rapid temperature changes. It is said that when on tour it is not unusual for him to spend as much as two hours tuning it before a concert. But this is proof of his musical perfectionism, and the reason for his outstanding ability.

Among his neighbors in Wilton he has found many musicians, both professional and amateur, and not infrequently in the manner of the "busman's holiday" they will gather round his fireside to play chamber music.

Spivakovsky maintains a first-hand acquaintance with the early masters by way manuscripts because
"the handwriting—
you." However, co
musicians take an e
among them Sibeliu
sky and Sessions, A land and Bartók. T
the praise accorded kovsky moves with a calm and self-effa
fact he has, after
with the Houston
been seen by specta
a seat in the audien to another's interpre

Harvard Law School Record
Thurs. Feb. 18. 1954

105

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra needs funds to continue its operations.

The cost of running a 104-piece orchestra amounts to well over a million and a half dollars per year. This sum is met largely through ticket sales, royalties on recordings, and endowment income. Nevertheless, a considerable amount must be raised each year by contributions from those who value the orchestra as an essential asset in the world of culture.

When one considers the scope of the Orchestra's activities he realizes two things. First, how very easy it is to run up a bill of a million and a half dollars in one year, and second, the important function served by the Orchestra in our community life. The orchestra performs regular subscription series in Boston, Cambridge, Providence, and New York. In the spring the Orchestra provides Boston with the Pop Concerts and the free Esplanade Concerts during the summer. Then there is the Tanglewood season, and the extended tours.

All this occupies the full time of the players for at least 45 out of the 52 weeks in the year. The Orchestra plays to thousands more who listen on the radio and to recordings. The quality of the music produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is undeniably of the finest caliber, and competent critics have given it high rank among the great orchestras of the world.

In spite of generous contributions during the past five years there has accumulated a net deficit of over $350,000. The Orchestra has had to apply all available funds as well as certain unrestricted legacies to meet this deficit. The Orchestra no longer has any available cash reserve. In addition, the management has had to dip into the present season's receipts in order to pay outstanding bills. If the organization is to meet its current obligations it will be necessary to raise at least $250,000.

There are, no doubt, many students and faculty members at the Law School, as well as alumni, who are familiar with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its programs. Those who listen to its concerts undoubtedly derive a wealth of enrichment and inspiration from its performances. While a lawyer is at all times interested and necessarily engrossed in legal thinking and in solving legal problems, it is also important for him to maintain close contact with the arts and culture. No less an authority than Justice Frankfurter remarked at a talk he gave at the Law School last year that it is important for a lawyer to show a sincere appreciation for the arts and to improve his cultural background. He added that listening to fine music provided a valuable stimulus for the imagination that is unavailable in any other form.

While it is perhaps impossible for the students of the Law School to contribute large amounts any small contribution would be very helpful and greatly appreciated. All who wish to share in maintaining a great cultural asset are urged to send their tax-deductible check in any amount they can afford to Richard C. Paine, Treasurer, Symphony Hall, Boston. From those who wish to project their influence over the years ahead bequests under will are invited. Such bequests, in the past, have meant survival for the Orchestra.

---

without becoming pon-was all velvet.
texture often sounds
but here everything sensitive and, when demanded it, soaring.
symphonic poem, an-
of fine-textured
from Mr. Monteux,
the program. H. C. S.

Spivakovsky at Musicale —

C.S. Monitor - 2/18/54

Violinist Heard in Works By Beethoven and Paganini

By Harold Rogers

There are musicians who do their best work while playing concertos with orchestras, and there are others who do their best in recital. There are some who are equally at home in both media, but they are rare indeed. At present Tossy Spivakovsky is a violinist who is to be found in the first group. Earlier this month he made his Boston debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a fine performance of Bartók's Violin Concerto, Pierre Monteux conducting.

Yesterday he made his Boston recital debut at the Morning Musicale in the Hotel Statler. His appearance with the Symphony was far more successful.

* * *

For his Musicale program he chose an Adagio by Mozart, the Sonata No. 4 in A minor by Beethoven, the first movement to Paganini's Concerto in D major, plus a Brahms Intermezzo as arranged by Castelnuova-Tedesco, some Bartók Romanian Dances as arranged by Székely, and Sarasate's Introduction and Tarantella.

Since Spivakovsky's oddly distinctive technique was described at length after his first Boston appearance, the present observations may be confined to his ability as an interpreter. And in this department, sad to say, Spivakovsky appears to be totally incommunicative of musical emotion.

* * *

Even if tone, dynamics, and accuracy are present—as they generally were in Spivakovksy's recital—simply to play the notes is not enough. One could easily make an intellecutal differentiation between the Mozart and the Beethoven, or between the Beethoven and the Paganini. The soloist was careful about matters of style.

But whether he was playing the Mozart Adagio, unadorned in the extreme, or the Paganini Concerto, extremely adorned, one remained emotionally unmoved. When such a condition exists at a recital there is usually one answer. The recitalist is feeling nothing himself. Musical emotion must overflow the heart of the performer if it is to touch the hearts of his listeners.

Open Rehearsal Tonight

For the open public rehearsal tonight by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Charles Munch will conduct a complete performance of Berlioz' Dramatic Legend, "The Damnation of Faust." The soloists will be Suzanne Danco as Marguerite, David Poleri as Faust, Martial Singher as Mephistopheles, and Donald Gramm as Brander. The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth, will participate. The performance, for which seats may be purchased at the door, will begin at 7:30.

BOSTON MASS.
POST

FEB 18 1954

Music in Review

By TUCKER KEISER

When Tessy Spivakovsky made his Boston debut two weeks ago playing the Bartok Violin Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra his performance of this exacting score created a mild sensation, not only for his authoritative interpretation but for his unorthodox violin technique, which nevertheless produced a large yet refined tone capable of the finest gradations of color and dynamics.

Yesterday, the violinist was heard at the Statler Morning Musicale in a recital which gave him a chance to prove his artistry in the more conventional repertory. In every piece Mr. Spivakovsky demonstrated that he is a musician of the very finest mettle.

The Mozart Adagio, warm and expansive, never fell to sentimentality, preserving the classic balance and unity so necessary to make the music convincing. Since the piano part is as important as the violin in Beethoven's Sonata No. 4 in A minor, the sensitive collaboration between Mr. Spivakovsky and Leopold Mittman, the accompanist, proved that each could submerge himself in the music. The Presto had the proper fire, the Andante was proprely more playful than profound, and the Allegro Molto tripped along good humoredly.

The first movement of Pagaofnini's Concerto in D major served as the necessary vehicle for pyrotechnical display in which Mr. Spivakovsky left his listeners breathless so glibly did he toss off double-stops, left-hand pizzicati, and rapid harmonics.

The first movement of Paga- formed after intermission, the Bartok-Szekely Roumanian Dances particularly delighted me with their strong, strange melodies and rhythmic dash.

C.S. Monitor
2/18/54

Youth Should Be Heard

By Elizabeth Taylor

Tossy Spivakovsky

One night in 1948 a Russian-born violinist named Tossy Spivakovsky stepped onto the stage of San Francisco's Opera House, lifted a bow to his Stradivarius and brought San Francisco, long accustomed to memorable performances, cheering to its feet. He was called by one critic, "the greatest of a generation," which was to place him alongside such masters as Heifetz and Kreisler. He has maintained this position admirably, and in fact has many reviving memories of the technical wizardry of Ysaye and the 19th-century genius, Paganini.

Simultaneously with Mr. Spivakovsky's rise to fame has come public recognition of the works of the Hungarian composer, Béla Bartók. It was Spivakovsky who introduced the violin concerto of Bartók and repeated it in subsequent performances until it became well established and brought the composer a measure of recognition during his lifetime.

* * *

Mr. Spivakovsky has similarly been identified with other "causes" in the name of music. There was, for example, the time the Detroit Symphony found itself without a conductor or visible means of support. Spivakovsky stepped deftly into the spot, used his bow to conduct or otherwise perform with. Then in the period normally given to encores he gave a five-minute speech to the citizenry urging them to support the orchestra. His campaign was highly successful, and the orchestra has received ample backing.

Tossy Spivakovsky belongs to the class of the talented known as a prodigy. Born in Odessa, he was taken to Berlin before he was two. There he studied violin, appeared in public at the age of ten and thereafter concertized in Europe. In seven seasons of coast-to-coast tours, Spivakovsky has been heard in all of the 48 states, Canada, the South American countries, Hawaii, and Israel.

* * *

Between tours he lives in Wilton, Connecticut, where he may be found playing an occasional game of croquet, swimming or walking in the hills with his wife and daughter. Even here he is never too far from his well-loved 1721 Stradivarius, kept in the music room of his home which is specially regulated to prevent rapid temperature changes. It is said that when on tour it is not unusual for him to spend as much as two hours tuning it before a concert. But this is proof of his musical perfectionism, and the reason for his outstanding ability.

Among his neighbors in Wilton he has found many musicians, both professional and amateur, and not infrequently in the manner of the "busman's holiday" they will gather round his fireside to play chamber music.

Spivakovsky maintains a firsthand acquaintance early masters by way
manuscripts because
"the handwriting—
you." However, co
musicians take an e
among them Sibeliu
sky and Sessions,
land and Bartók.
the praise accorded kovsky moves with calm and self-effa
fact he has, after
with the Houston
been seen by specta
a seat in the audie
to another's interpr

Harvard LAW School Record
Feb. 18. 1954

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra needs funds to continue its operations.

The cost of running a 104-piece orchestra amounts to well over a million and a half dollars per year. This sum is met largely through ticket sales, royalties on recordings, and endowment income. Nevertheless, a considerable amount must be raised each year by contributions from those who value the orchestra as an essential asset in the world of culture.

When one considers the scope of the Orchestra's activities he realizes two things. First, how very easy it is to run up a bill of a million and a half dollars in one year, and second, the important function served by the Orchestra in our community life. The orchestra performs regular subscription series in Boston, Cambridge, Providence, and New York. In the spring the Orchestra provides Boston with the Pop Concerts and the free Esplanade Concerts during the summer. Then there is the Tanglewood season, and the extended tours.

All this occupies the full time of the players for at least 45 out of the 52 weeks in the year. The Orchestra plays to thousands more who listen on the radio and to recordings. The quality of the music produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is undeniably of the finest caliber, and competent critics have given it high rank among the great orchestras of the world.

In spite of generous contributions during the past five years there has accumulated a net deficit of over $350,000. The Orchestra has had to apply all available funds as well as certain unrestricted legacies to meet this deficit. The Orchestra no longer has any available cash reserve. In addition, the management has had to dip into the present season's receipts in order to pay outstanding bills. If the organization is to meet its current obligations it will be necessary to raise at least $250,000.

There are, no doubt, many students and faculty members at the Law School, as well as alumni, who are familiar with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its programs. Those who listen to its concerts undoubtedly derive a wealth of enrichment and inspiration from its performances. While a lawyer is at all times interested and necessarily engrossed in legal thinking and in solving legal problems, it is also important for him to maintain close contact with the arts and culture. No less an authority than Justice Frankfurter remarked at a talk he gave at the Law School last year that it is important for a lawyer to show a sincere appreciation for the arts and to improve his cultural background. He added that listening to fine music provided a valuable stimulus for the imagination that is unavailable in any other form.

While it is perhaps impossible for the students of the Law School to contribute large amounts any small contribution would be very helpful and greatly appreciated. All who wish to share in maintaining a great cultural asset are urged to send their tax-deductible check in any amount they can afford to Richard C. Paine, Treasurer, Symphony Hall, Boston. From those who wish to project their influence over the years ahead bequests under will are invited. Such bequests, in the past, have meant survival for the Orchestra.

2/20/54

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 18th concert of the 73d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was given over to Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust." The soloists were Suzanne Danco, soprano; David Poleri, tenor; Martial Singher, baritone, and Donald Gramm, bass. Assisting were the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor.

104

By RUDOLPH ELIE

THIS PERFORMANCE of Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust" stands as the supreme achievement of Charles Munch in Boston, perhaps even the supreme achievement of his career.

From beginning to end there was never a doubt that Berlioz was here speaking to us through the heart and mind and passion of a man who perhaps more than any other living conductor reflects the ardor, the humanity, the integrity, the yearning and even the expressive compulsion of the composer himself. It is not merely that he captures the mood in every bar, or that he touches off the chain reaction of inspiration in every performer, or certainly not that his technical command of every instant is absolute. It is rather that he is all but the personification of the composer as well as every character in the narrative and the central significance of the very Faust legend itself. Thus, from the outset, here is no glittering demonstration of orchestral and choral mastery lying within the province of any technically competent conductor, but an act of re-creation on a plane of inspiration as informed with genius as the work itself.

INFORMED WITH GENIUS

To say that "The Damnation of Faust" is informed with genius is ridiculously simple, but there is much more than the pure genius of the one endowed with instinctive, spontaneous musical creativity in this. The spontaneous creativity is everywhere in evidence, of course, whether it be in the exquisite melodies that pour forth in astounding profusion in the wildly exciting pictorial images projected, or in the transitional passages from scene to scene, as in the incomparable transition from the brawling tavern scene to the glowing radiance of the first disclosure of Margarita to the dreaming Faust. The instrumental colors, the ever varied and ever evocative combinations of tonal expression and emphases, as in the English horn obligato or the Romance of Scene XV; all these are the genius of Berlioz, too.

But there is more than genius here; for genius can ofter be found where there is no real contact with the human heart at all. And if anything, Berlioz had that. His whole approach to the Faust legend is one of infinite grasp of the questing spirit of a humanity bogged down in the mediocrities of living, unable to recognize happiness, foolish in the delusion that there is any way out save in service to mankind.

The Faust of Goethe learns this while the Faust of Gounod never recognizes the problem even exists. The Faust of Berlioz, however, though he doesn't come to grips with Goethe's final problem, suggests that he could. He is shown here as the lover, to be sure, but not until—like Berlioz—he has explored the horizon of his melancholy, and has rejected peasant gayety and drunken brawling as well.

LESS SINISTER

Berlioz' Mephistopheles, too, is a less sinister figure. Here he represents more the spirit of unruly mischief to be found in the back of everyone's head, the almost deliberate capacity of the human to make himself miserable though fully aware of the inevitability of his misery. Only in the ride to hell does Berlioz get caught in the theatricality of his own invention and touch on the satanic, but by then the compassion and the profound beauty of his personality is known to everyone. And long before then the staggering musical genius reflected in this immense work is known to everyone as well.

The performance of the soloists in this production, which will fortunately be later preserved on records, was admirable in the extreme. We not always have first-level artists on these occasions, but in David Poleri, Martial Singher, Suzanne Danco and Donald Gramm we had soloists capable of remarkable vocal and interpretative qualities. Mr. Poleri, whose style occasionally bordered on the Italianate, sang with a tenor as expressive as it was clear and silvery in color, and he rose to impressive heights during his love scene with Margarita. Martial Singher, wonderfully secure and authoritative in his role as Mephistopheles, made the part a joy—and sometimes a terror—to hear throughout, traversing the Serenade as well as we can ever expect to hear it. Miss Danco, though occasionally covered by the orchestra, sang Margarita with great purity of expression and appealing emotional overtones, while Mr. Gramm, in a brief role, made Brander a memorably rollicking figure.

Sharing in every way in the superlatives were the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Every time I hear them I say they were better than they were the last time, which by now lifts them to a point quite out of sight, but they were absolutely superb in this, singing with a precision, a tonal capacity, a response and an enunciation rather hard to believe possible. It goes without saying the orchestra outdid itself, but the men of the hour were Berlioz (there ought to be the four B's, really) and the finest interpreter he ever had: Charles Munch.

Music in Review

B. Post 2/20/54

By TUCKER KEISER

For a superlative afternoon in Symphony Hall, the tested recipe requires three ingredients: a choral work, Hector Berlioz to compose it, and Charles Munch to conduct it. Add such a well-trained organization as the Harvard-Radcliffe choristers and such superb soloists as Suzanne Danco, a crystalline-voiced soprano; David Poleri, a robust operatic tenor; Martial Singher, a spirited and assured baritone; and Donald Gramm, a virile and volatile bass-baritone, and the dish becomes even more delectable. Performing Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust" yesterday afternoon, the Boston Symphony Orchestra provided the ultimate touch necessary to make the occasion a musical gourmet's delight.

Last fall Mr. Munch declared this to be Berlioz' masterpiece, as it undoubtedly is; after yesterday's fine performance it is evident that Mr. Munch's conducting of this work is masterly, also. The score was very carefully prepared in a series of painstaking rehearsals, which insured a well-conceived balance of musical forces, not an inevitable feature of our concerts this season.

---

years, six months; Wellman, four years, eight months; and Schatz, four years and four months.

In addition, Judge Picard fined each of the defendants $10,000—the maximum allowable under the Smith Act.

The defendants were convicted Tuesday of violating the Smith Act by conspiring to teach and advocate the violent overthrow of the United States government.

All said they will appeal the verdict.

Judge Picard set bonds totaling $112,500 on the defendants pending the appeal. The six were remanded to the U. S. marshal until the bonds were posted. Ganley's bond, the highest, was set at $25,000. The others ranged to one of $5000 for Mrs. Winter.

Cir. (D 38,155)

This Clipping From
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

FEB 20 1954

Boston Symphony To Give Concert

Flutist To Feature ProgramAtProvidence

The music of Berlioz, and a flute concerto featuring Doriot Anthony, first flutist, will highlight the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday night at 8:15 in Veterans Memorial Auditorium, Providence.

This is the fourth visit of the famous orchestra to Providence this season. Charles Munch, music director, is featuring the music of Berlioz this year in recognition of the composer's 150th birthday. Dr. Munch will direct the orchestra in three excerpts from Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust" which include "Minuet of the Willo'-the-Wisp," the "Ballet of the Sylphs," and the "Hungarian March" (Rakoczy).

Mr. Anthony, famous flutist, will play the solo in Jacques Ibert's "Concerto for Flute and Orchestra."

For the opening work, the orchestra will present Beethoven's "Symphony No. 3, The Eroica."

The final concert in Providence by the Boston Symphony will be March 30. All their concerts here begin at 8:15 instead of the usual 8:30 p. m. because of the distance the musicians have to travel.

BOSTON MASS.
POST

FEB 20 1954

Music in Review

By TUCKER KEISER

For a superlative afternoon in Symphony Hall, the tested recipe requires three ingredients: a choral work, Hector Berlioz to compose it, and Charles Munch to conduct it. Add such a well-trained organization as the Harvard-Radcliffe choristers and such superb soloists as Suzanne Danco, a crystalline-voiced soprano; David Poleri, a robust operatic tenor; Martial Singher, a spirited and assured baritone; and Donald Gramm, a virile and volatile bass-baritone, and the dish becomes even more delectable. Performing Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust" yesterday afternoon, the Boston Symphony Orchestra provided the ultimate touch necessary to make the occasion a musical gourmet's delight.

Last fall Mr. Munch declared this to be Berlioz' masterpiece, as it undoubtedly is; after yesterday's fine performance it is evident that Mr. Munch's conducting of this work is masterly, also. The score was very carefully prepared in a series of painstaking rehearsals, which insured a well-conceived balance of musical forces, not an inevitable feature of our concerts this season.

Space does not permit a detailed account of the score itself, not a line of which is second-rate or dull or derivative. At a later date I shall discuss the work at greater length.

Obviously considerable attention was given to selecting soloists whose vocal qualities were suited to the roles they were called upon to sing. Miss Danco's light, ingenuous soprano and Mr. Singher's subtlety of intonation were in dramatic contrast; Mr. Poleri's masculine tenor and Mr. Gramm's flexible bass-baritone added realism to the roles of Faust and Brander. McHenry Boatwright, winner of The Boston Post Music Festival last spring, sang the Epilogue in a very sonorous baritone.

So definitive a performance deserves preservation in the form of a recording.

This Clipping From
BOSTON MASS.
GLOBE

FEB 20 1954

MUSIC

Munch Conducts Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust"

Sixteenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Friday afternoon-Saturday evening series, at Symphony Hall. Charles Munch conducted "The Damnation of Faust," by Hector Berlioz. The choruses were the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth. The soloists: Suzanne Danco, soprano, as Marguerite; David Poleri, tenor, as Faust; Martial Singher, baritone, as Mephistopheles, and Donald Gramm, bass, as Brander. The baritone solo in the epilogue was sung by McHenry Boatwright.

By CYRUS DURGIN

Not the least of Charles Munch's distinctions during his years in Boston has been his devotion to the music of Hector Berlioz. That already has given us the Requiem, the complete "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony, the "Fantastic" Symphony, and "L'Enfance du Christ." Now it brings us, this week, the first local performances in nearly 20 years of "The Damnation of Faust." I think, when the record comes to be examined in times future, this performance of "The Damnation of Faust" will prove to have been one of the great achievements of Mr. Munch's sojourn here.

In the first place it was the whole score—except for the 55-measure introduction, on the bugle calls of the returning soldiers, which opens the third part but makes a jarring effect just before the scene in Marguerite's chamber. This, Mr. Munch was justified in omitting. In the second place it was a performance absolutely gorgeous in terms of orchestral virtuosity, and very superior, indeed, for the singing by chorus and soloists. Just for pure richness of tone, sweet, transparent and unforced, this performance was memorable.

It takes a real Berlioz conductor to re-create this work as the splendid and imposing work it can be; a conductor who understands and sustains the passion that filled most of the music that Berlioz ever wrote, and yet who does not dwell upon spectacular effects for their own sake.

"The Damnation of Faust," analyzed literarily, philosophically or poetically, is no more the "Faust" of Goethe than is Gounod's well-known opera. But like the opera it is a musical expression, peculiarly personal to the composer, of elements of "Faust". So far as each composer chose to go, his "Faust" is a masterpiece. Even, with Berlioz, the fiery, interpolated "Rakoczy" March yesterday won a special round of applause.

Though "The Damnation of Faust" ranges from the martial magnificence of the "Rakoczy" through the brilliant trivialities of the songs in Auerbach's cellar, to the amorous beauties of the lovers' songs, to the three-ring circus of the "Pandemonium" and the pious assurance of the epilogue, it must all be treated seriously and on the same level of worth. That Mr. Munch did, and thereby performed the score with irresistible eloquence.

The soloists were well suited to their parts, although the clean and finely styled singing of Mme. Danco was cucumber-cool for her part. David Poleri, as Faust, sang with ringing tones, real passion and admirable enunciation. Perhaps his style might have been a little more Italian than French, but the total result was glorious. Mr. Singher, unfailingly excellent in whatever he does, was resonant and expressive, and in every note the artist. The short role of Brander was commendably done by Mr. Gramm.

Mr. Woodworth prepared his Harvard and Radcliffe choruses well. As usual with young singers, their tone was light, but their vigor and precision were sufficient to compensate. If they got foul of the beat now and again, they need not feel badly, for Berlioz, when he goes fast, is the devil himself for tricky rhythms.

Mr. Boatwright, a promising young artist, did well the short solo of the epilogue which suffered not at all in being transferred to a single voice from the six basses originally prescribed. There was no boys' chorus for this section and it did not matter. The performance took just 2½ hours, with a single intermission.

ing — Berlioz Masterpiece at the Symphony

Munch Presents 'The Damnation of Faust' With Chorus and Soloists

By Harold Rogers

Too seldom nowadays do we hear a vast musical production like Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust." The time and expense involved—the joining of solo, choral, and orchestral forces—are almost prohibitive in our streamlined age.

This masterwork has been unheard in Symphony Hall for 20 years. Our debt of gratitude to Charles Munch is therefore all the greater for the magnificent presentation that he has prepared for the week-end concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Munch is observing this season as a Berlioz year, it being the 150th since the composer's birth. That Berlioz is a favorite of Mr. Munch's is well established; he has long since convinced many of us—if we were unconvinced before—that Berlioz was the greatest genius in French music during the 19th century.

* * *

The Faust legend, as crystalized in Goethe's poem, has captured the imagination of many composers—of Gounod, Wagner, Liszt, and Boito, among others. Gounod's "Faust," of course, is the only opera that continues to flourish.

But there is no question that for sensitivity of writing, for graphic description, for intensely lyrical music, for a sense of gripping drama as Mephistopheles and Faust gallop into the abyss on two black horses—for these things the Berlioz conception of the legend is the greatest.

This is vivid Faust music that carries an impact. Berlioz could say exactly what he meant and he said it with an originality that has gained no tarnish in more than 100 years. Only the true genius can speak in universal terms that transcend his own time.

* * *

Mr. Munch infused the entire work with that inner excitement for which he is noted. The Hungarian March sparkled with brilliance; the Dance of the Sylphs was of gossamer lightness. But these familiar portions were only a few of the manifold marvels of the score.

The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, thoroughly polished through their training by G. Wallace Woodworth, were a dramatic force in themselves. Suzanne Danco as Marguerite gave another of her deeply subjective portrayals, her soprano lovely with shimmering color, as usual. David Poleri's Faust, though his top tenor notes were occasionally uncomfortably produced, was handsomely sung; and the baritone Martial Singher was vocally triumphant as Mephistopheles. In Donald Gramm's Brander we heard a basso of power and promise, and in MacHenry Boatwright's brief solo we heard another baritone of strength and beauty.

Mr. Munch will doubtless record this performance. It should be preserved.

French Music at Museum

Piano works and chamber music of the French Six will be heard at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts on Tuesday evening at 8:15.

Allen Barker, pianist, will offer representative works of the three composers of the group—Milhaud, Honegger, and Poulenc—with brief comments. Dorothy Bales, violinist, will perform a group of pieces by Satie. They will be joined by Janice Richmond, clarinetist, in a Trio by Milhaud.

Cir. (D 6,571)

This Clipping From
GARDNER, MASS.
NEWS

FEB 19 1954

HOME NEWS

Two divorces were granted yesterday in Worcester Probate Court. Mrs. Evelyn I. Hetnick received a divorce from Gabriel G. Hetnick and was permited to resume her maiden name of Godin. Gertrude J. Harris of Ashburnham was divorced from Herbert E. Harris of East Jaffrey, N. H.

Edward Morse, son of Mr. and Mrs. Lucius V. Morse of 48 Pearl Street, has a busy three weeks ahead of him besides being a Pre-med student. He sings with the Harvard Glee Club with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday in "The Damnation of Faust." The following Wednesday, Friday and Saturday, he sings as the admiral in H.M.S. Pinafore put on by the Congregational and Presbyterian Youth Group from Harvard and Radcliffe at the Margaret Jewell Hall. The next Sunday he sings with Harvard Glee Club and Symphony Orchestra in "Romeo and Juliet" in Boston and the following weekends in New York and Washington.

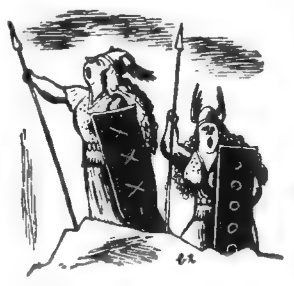
Cir. (W 370,017)

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

FEB 20 1954

MUSICAL EVENTS

Sibelius and Strauss



WITH the possible exception of Richard Wagner, the most unfashionable composers of the moment among intellectual concertgoers seem to be Jean Sibelius and Richard Strauss. The feeling against their music, which one can hear expressed at nearly any cocktail party, is not shared by the general musical public, with whom they have always been reasonably popular, and I can explain it only in terms of a very doctrinaire attitude that regards "romanticism" as a sin. As it happens, I myself have never shared this feeling, and though I can find fault with certain details of certain of their compositions, I have never really been able to understand the blanket condemnation of their work that I so frequently hear aired by my more sophisticated friends. On the contrary, it seems to me that each of these composers had (I use the past tense because Sibelius, though living, hasn't turned out a note in almost twenty-five years) qualities that are found only in very important composers—qualities that, by the way, are not very common today: Each was the possessor of an individual style whose originality sprang from personal, rather than eclectic, sources; each wrote music that has an emotional content as well as an intellectual form; and each was a master of the structural problems involved in writing music that is in the true sense symphonic.

Last week, Pierre Monteux brought the Boston Symphony to Carnegie Hall and, on Wednesday evening, conducted one of the most eloquent performances of Sibelius's Second Symphony that I have ever heard. The following evening, in the same auditorium, Dimitri Mitropoulous and the New York Philharmonic performed with equal eloquence an entire program devoted to less well-known compositions by Strauss. I found both these events of interest not only because I enjoyed the music but because they gave me the opportunity to test again my impressions of the composers in question.

Aside from the similarities that I have pointed out, the two are, of course, quite different. Sibelius's Second Symphony, which is early and very typical Sibelius, has a monumental quality that has always reminded me of a heroic landscape. It expresses a passion for the grandeur of nature and the open air that is quintessentially Finnish. I do not find it particularly civilized music. The emotions it expresses are not complex or very deeply human. Sexual passion is not among them. They are, in general, the emotions of a man who has found serenity and affirmation in contemplating the drama of the world of natural forces. Thus their range is somewhat limited. But within this range Sibelius has found room for a kind of poetry that is all his own—the poetry of elemental cataclysms and of interminable northern forests, and the echoes of an epic national folklore. He expresses this poetry unaffectedly and with vigor, and I, for one, find his rather austere, moody kind of nature drama moving and frequently impressive.

Strauss, on the other hand, is a distinctly urban type. His music contains both sex and humor. At its worst, it sometimes verges on vulgarity, but it is so endlessly exuberant and so dashing in its audacious virtuosity that one easily forgives these lapses. I have always been a little irritated, for example, by the crude, if clever, touches of realism in the "Sinfonia Domestica," and by the shameless way Strauss has of parading his own not too interesting autobiographical experiences in this work. But on Thursday night I forgot about all this and listened to the "Sinfonia Domestica" as music pure and simple. Considered from this point of view, it has moments of great magic. Its orchestration is almost unbelievably brilliant and lucid—the sort of orchestration that is so effective and so lovingly written for the instruments that it makes you feel the players themselves are enjoying the spectacular tasks the composer has set them. At the present time, not much music is written that is deliberately designed to show off the marvellous potentialities of voices and instruments, though this sort of writing was a commonplace with most of the great classical and romantic composers of symphony and opera. And beyond this technical point lies another reason for Strauss's importance—his unabashed emotionalism. He is not afraid to have emotions, to express them, and to let you share them for what they are worth.

I am aware that nowadays it is not considered the thing to draw attention, as I have, to the emotional content of a musical composition. Nowadays the curious idea is very popular that music is somehow an "abstract" art, consisting of aural sensations and mathematical relationships—purely a matter of "form," without any content except what naïve listeners read into it. I admit that it is hard to pin down the content of great music—that its exact content is open to varying interpretations. But to assume therefore that great music has no content whatever is to my mind arrant nonsense, and this nonsense, I believe, is responsible for a great deal of the confused thinking that currently bedevils musical aesthetics. Music is, of course, an elusive art, and most of the aesthetic thinking that surrounds it is borrowed by analogy from other arts. One speaks of musical "form" and musical "architecture" as if one were speaking of sculpture or building, and this is apt to be misleading. At the risk of confusing things even further, I should like to suggest another analogy—one that I find is far more fruitful. This is that if music is like any other art, it is like the drama—so like it, in fact, that it may be regarded as a purely aural branch of it. A symphony is something that is written to be performed before an audience by artists who are in somewhat the position of actors. Like a drama, it involves stretches of time, it contains conflicting and otherwise interesting emotions, it builds up suspense to climaxes, and it ends, if it is a good symphony, in some sort of catharsis. To apply to it notions of abstract form and color derived from such static visual arts as painting and architecture is, I submit, a mistake. Yet a lot of contemporary music has been influenced by this mistake. To me, the important thing about a great piece of music is that it moves and pulsates with emotion. And here is where, with some apologies for a philosophical digression, I get back to Sibelius and Strauss. Their music moves, and it is clearly dramatic. This is one reason I feel that both of them are composers of consequence.

—WINTHROP SARGEANT

IENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1954

105

ing — Berlioz Masterpiece at the Symphony

Munch Presents 'The Damnation of Faust' With Chorus and Soloists

By Harold Rogers

Too seldom nowadays do we hear a vast musical production like Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust." The time and expense involved—the joining of solo, choral, and orchestral forces—are almost prohibitive in our streamlined age.

This masterwork has been unheard in Symphony Hall for 20 years. Our debt of gratitude to Charles Munch is therefore all the greater for the magnificent presentation that he has prepared for the week-end concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Munch is observing this season as a Berlioz year, it being the 150th since the composer's birth. That Berlioz is a favorite of Mr. Munch's is well established; he has long since convinced many of us—if we were unconvinced before—that Berlioz was the greatest genius in French music during the 19th century.

* * *

The Faust legend, as crystalized in Goethe's poem, has captured the imagination of many composers—of Gounod, Wagner, Liszt, and Boito, among others. Gounod's "Faust," of course, is the only opera that continues to flourish.

But there is no question that for sensitivity of writing, for graphic description, for intensely lyrical music, for a sense of gripping drama as Mephistopheles and Faust gallop into the abyss on two black horses—for these things the Berlioz conception of the legend is the greatest.

This is vivid Faust music that carries an impact. Berlioz could say exactly what he meant and he said it with an originality that has gained no tarnish in more than 100 years. Only the true genius can speak in universal terms that transcend his own time.

* * *

Mr. Munch infused the entire work with that inner excitement for which he is noted. The Hungarian March sparkled with brilliance; the Dance of the Sylphs was of gossamer lightness. But these familiar portions were only a few of the manifold marvels of the score.

The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, thoroughly polished through their training by G. Wallace Woodworth, were a dramatic force in themselves. Suzanne Danco as Marguerite gave another of her deeply subjective portrayals, her soprano lovely with shimmering color, as usual. David Poleri's Faust, though his top tenor notes were occasionally uncomfortably produced, was handsomely sung; and the baritone Martial Singher was vocally triumphant as Mephistopheles. In Donald Gramm's Brander we heard a basso of power and promise, and in MacHenry Boatwright's brief solo we heard another baritone of strength and beauty.

Mr. Munch will doubtless record this performance. It should be preserved.

French Music at Museum

Piano works and chamber music of the French Six will be heard at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts on Tuesday evening at 8:15.

Allen Barker, pianist, will offer representative works of the three composers of the group—Milhaud, Honegger, and Poulenc—with brief comments. Dorothy Bales, violinist, will perform a group of pieces by Satie. They will be joined by Janice Richmond, clarinetist, in a Trio by Milhaud.

Cir. (D 6,571)

This Clipping From
GARDNER, MASS.
NEWS

FEB 19 1954

HOME NEWS

Two divorces were granted yesterday in Worcester Probate Court. Mrs. Evelyn I. Hetnick received a divorce from Gabriel G. Hetnick and was permited to resume her maiden name of Godin. Gertrude J. Harris of Ashburnham was divorced from Herbert E. Harris of East Jaffrey, N. H.

Edward Morse, son of Mr. and Mrs. Lucius V. Morse of 48 Pearl Street, has a busy three weeks ahead of him besides being a Pre-med student. He sings with the Harvand Glee Club with the ~~Boston Symphony~~ Orchestra Sunday in "The Damnation of Faust." The following Wednesday, Friday and Saturday, he sings as the admiral in H.M.S. Pinafore put on by the Congregational and Presbyterian Youth Group from Harvard and Radcliffe at the Margaret Jewell Hall. The next Sunday he sings with Harvard Glee Club and Symphony Orchestra in "Romeo and Juliet" in Boston and the following weekends in New York and Washington.

Cir. (W 370,017)

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

FEB 20 1954

MUSICAL EVENTS

Sibelius and Strauss

WITH the possible exception of Richard Wagner, the most unfashionable composers of the moment among intellectual concertgoers seem to be Jean Sibelius and Richard Strauss. The feeling against their music, which one can hear expressed at nearly any cocktail party, is not shared by the general musical public, with whom they have always been reasonably popular, and I can explain it only in terms of a very doctrinaire attitude that regards "romanticism" as a sin. As it happens, I myself have never shared this feeling, and though I can find fault with certain details of certain of their compositions, I have never really been able to understand the blanket condemnation of their work that I so frequently hear aired by my more sophisticated friends. On the contrary, it seems to me that each of these composers had (I use the past tense because Sibelius, though living, hasn't turned out a note in almost twenty-five years) qualities that are found only in very important composers—qualities that, by the way, are not very common today: Each was the possessor of an individual style whose originality sprang from personal, rather than eclectic, sources; each wrote music that has an emotional content as well as an intellectual form; and each was a master of the structural problems involved in writing music that is in the true sense symphonic.

Last week, Pierre Monteux brought the Boston Symphony to Carnegie Hall and, on Wednesday evening, conducted one of the most eloquent performances of Sibelius's Second Symphony that I have ever heard. The following evening, in the same auditorium, Dimitri Mitropoulous and the New York Philharmonic performed with equal eloquence an entire program devoted to less well-known compositions by Strauss. I found both these events of interest not only because I enjoyed the music but because they gave me the opportunity to test again my impressions of the composers in question.

Aside from the similarities that I have pointed out, the two are, of course, quite different. Sibelius's Second Symphony, which is early and very typical Sibelius, has a monumental quality that has always reminded me of a heroic landscape. It expresses a passion for the grandeur of nature and the open air that is quintessentially Finnish. I do not find it particularly civilized music. The emotions it expresses are not complex or very deeply human. Sexual passion is not among them. They are, in general, the emotions of a man who has found serenity and affirmation in contemplating the drama of the world of natural forces. Thus their range is somewhat limited. But within this range Sibelius has found room for a kind of poetry that is all his own—the poetry of elemental cataclysms and of interminable northern forests, and the echoes of an epic national folklore. He expresses this poetry unaffectedly and with vigor, and I, for one, find his rather austere, moody kind of nature drama moving and frequently impressive.

Strauss, on the other hand, is a distinctly urban type. His music contains both sex and humor. At its worst, it sometimes verges on vulgarity, but it is so endlessly exuberant and so dashing in its audacious virtuosity that one easily forgives these lapses. I have always been a little irritated, for example, by the crude, if clever, touches of realism in the "Sinfonia Domestica," and by the shameless way Strauss has of parading his own not too interesting autobiographical experiences in this work. But on Thursday night I forgot about all this and listened to the "Sinfonia Domestica" as music pure and simple. Considered from this point of view, it has moments of great magic. Its orchestration is almost unbelievably brilliant and lucid—the sort of orchestration that is so effective and so lovingly written for the instruments that it makes you feel the players themselves are enjoying the spectacular tasks the composer has set them. At the present time, not much music is written that is deliberately designed to show off the marvellous potentialities of voices and instruments, though this sort of writing was a commonplace with most of the great classical and romantic composers of symphony and opera. And beyond this technical point lies another reason for Strauss's importance—his unabashed emotionalism. He is not afraid to have emotions, to express them, and to let you share them for what they are worth.

I am aware that nowadays it is not considered the thing to draw attention, as I have, to the emotional content of a musical composition. Nowadays the curious idea is very popular that music is somehow an "abstract" art, consisting of aural sensations and mathematical relationships—purely a matter of "form," without any content except what naïve listeners read into it. I admit that it is hard to pin down the content of great music—that its exact content is open to varying interpretations. But to assume therefore that great music has no content whatever is to my mind arrant nonsense, and this nonsense, I believe, is responsible for a great deal of the confused thinking that currently bedevils musical aesthetics. Music is, of course, an elusive art, and most of the aesthetic thinking that surrounds it is borrowed by analogy from other arts. One speaks of musical "form" and musical "architecture" as if one were speaking of sculpture or building, and this is apt to be misleading. At the risk of confusing things even further, I should like to suggest another analogy—one that I find is far more fruitful. This is that if music is like any other art, it is like the drama—so like it, in fact, that it may be regarded as a purely aural branch of it. A symphony is something that is written to be performed before an audience by artists who are in somewhat the position of actors. Like a drama, it involves stretches of time, it contains conflicting and otherwise interesting emotions, it builds up suspense to climaxes, and it ends, if it is a good symphony, in some sort of catharsis. To apply to it notions of abstract form and color derived from such static visual arts as painting and architecture is, I submit, a mistake. Yet a lot of contemporary music has been influenced by this mistake. To me, the important thing about a great piece of music is that it moves and pulsates with emotion. And here is where, with some apologies for a philosophical digression, I get back to Sibelius and Strauss. Their music moves, and it is clearly dramatic. This is one reason I feel that both of them are composers of consequence.

—WINTHROP SARGEANT

106

Cir. (D 103,308)

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

FEB 22 1954

Coast-to-Coast:

Boston Symphony Plays Bushnell Concert Mar. 8

By ALLEN M. WIDEM
Times Theater Editor

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Mar. 8 concert will conclude the 1953-54 Bushnell Memorial Symphony series.

* * *

DR. CHARLES MUNCH, the orchestra's musical director since 1949, who will conduct the local concert, will announce his program within a few days.

In the meantime, Dr. Munch's orchestra is far advanced in plans for next Summer's Berkshire Music Center concerts. Manager George E. Judd has informed Bushnell Managing Director William H. Mortensen that the 1954 Festival at Tanglewood will consist of six Wednesday evenings in the theater-concert hall, running from July 7 to Aug. 11; six Friday evenings in the same hall, running from July 9 to Aug. 13 (concerts by a chamber orchestra of the Boston Symphony with Charles Munch conducting and featuring music of Bach and Mozart; six Saturday evenings and six Sunday afternoons in the Music Shed, from July 10 to Aug. 15, by the entire orchestra.

* * *

THE PROGRAMS will include the principal choral and instrumental works of Berlioz. Soloists will be Claude Arrau, Vera Franceschi and Nicole Henriot, pianists; Ruth Posselt, violin; William Primrose, viola.

For the Mar. 8 concert in the Bushnell, sponsored by the Bushnell Community Concert Association, a limited number of tickets are now available in the box office at $4.80, 4.20 and 3.60.

* * *

Cir. (D 203,001)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER

FEB 26 1954

SYMPHONY CHANGE

Because of the illness of Alexander Brailowsky, who was to have been soloist with the Boston Symphony this afternoon, tomorrow night and Tuesday, Charles Munch has substituted Wagner's "Faust" overture, Lopatnikoff's "Divertimento for Orchestra" (first Boston performance) and Liszt's "Faust" Symphony for the week - end series.

Cir. (D 46,023) (S 174,898)

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 24 1954

Music

Fourth Concert Given By Boston Symphony; Miss Anthony Soloist

By WILLIAM DINNEEN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, presented the fourth of its current series of Providence concerts last evening at the Veteran's Memorial Auditorium with Doriot Anthony as soloist.

The program:

Beethoven .... Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55
- I. Allegro con brio
- II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai
- III. Scherzo: Alegro Vivace
- IV. Finale: Allegro molto

INTERMISSION

bert ...Concerto for Flute and Orchestra
- I. Allegro
- II. Andante
- III. Allegro scherzando

erlioz... Excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust," Op. 24
- I. Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps
- II. Ballet of the Sylphs
- III. Hungarian March (Rakoczy)

Doriot Anthony, well-known here as first flutist of the Boston Symphony, surmounted some tremendous technical and stylistic hurdles in the Ibert Concerto for flute and orchestra.

The murderous pace of the first movement was handled with complete ease and assurance and this was followed by a beautifully expressive second movement so excellently done that we found ourselves transported into a mood of pure enjoyment, as if Miss Anthony's flute had magic qualities.

The final movement alternately danced and sparkled, as if enjoying its own subtle humor, and the audience seemed not to mind this bit of modern music.

Miss Anthony, in addition to her skill as an artist and musician, has a completely charming stage presence and the applause was sincere and sustained at the end of the Concerto.

Dr. Munch continued the Gallic mood with his interpretation of the Berlioz excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust." The minuet ended with a wonderful smile, the ballet trailed off into space and the Rakoczy march as set by Berlioz was exciting enough for anybody. It produced virtually an ovation for Dr. Munch and the orchestra.

As an opening number, the Beethoven "Eroica" was also somewhat on the exciting side, partly because of tempos and partly because of the poetic-descriptive reading given it by Dr. Munch.

This disturbed some people, we know, because we were asked by two serious collectors why the performance did not sound like the records! Since we did not have time to ask who did the records, the question was practically impossible to answer.

The original Beethoven has been largely obscured anyway by additions to the size of the orchestra, if for no other reason, so the [illegible] it seems to us, is simply to establish whether any given reading has artistic integrity. We were never in doubt on this point with Dr. Munch's "Eroica", and we enjoyed the performance thoroughly.

Cir. (D 142,658)

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 24 1954

Review of Music

Boston Symphony Gives Fourth Concert; Doriot Anthony, Flutist, Is Soloist

By WILLIAM DINNEEN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, presented the fourth of its current series of Providence concerts last evening at the Veteran's Memorial Auditorium with Doriot Anthony as soloist.

The program:

Beethoven .... Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55
- I. Allegro con brio
- II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai
- III. Scherzo: Alegro Vivace
- IV. Finale: Allegro molto

INTERMISSION

Ibert ...Concerto for Flute and Orchestra
- I. Allegro
- II. Andante
- III. Allegro scherzando

Berlioz...Excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust," Op. 24
- I. Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps
- II. Ballet of the Sylphs
- III. Hungarian March (Rakoczy)

Doriot Anthony, well-known here as first flutist of the Boston Symphony, surmounted some tremendous technical and stylistic hurdles in the Ibert Concerto for flute and orchestra.

The murderous pace of the first movement was handled with complete ease and assurance, and this was followed by a beautifully expressive second movement so excellently done that we found ourselves transported into a mood of pure enjoyment, as if Miss Anthony's flute had magic qualities.

The final movement alternately danced and sparkled, as if enjoying its own subtle humor, and the audience seemed not to mind this bit of modern music.

Miss Anthony, in addition to her skill as an artist and musician, has a completely charming stage presence and the applause was sincere and sustained at the end of the Concerto.

Dr. Munch continued the Gallic mood with his interpretation of the Berlioz excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust". The minuet ended with a wonderful smile, the ballet trailed off into space and the Rakoczy march as set by Berlioz was exciting enough for anybody. It produced virtually an ovation for Dr. Munch and the orchestra.

As an opening number, the Beethoven "Eroica" was also somewhat on the exciting side, partly because of tempos and partly because of the poetic descriptive reading given it by Dr. Munch.

This disturbed some people, we know, because we were asked by two serious collectors why the performance did not sound like the records! Since we did not have time to ask who did the records, the question was practically impossible to answer.

The original Beethoven has been largely obscured anyway by additions to the size of the orchestra, if for no other reason, so the main point, it seems to us, is simply to establish whether any given reading has artistic integrity. We were never in doubt on this point with Dr. Munch's "Eroica", and we enjoyed the performance thoroughly.

Pension Fund Concert Canceled

The Pension Fund concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced to be given March 21 will not be held.

The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, which were to appear with the orchestra in this work, will sing in Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" at the concerts next week in Boston as previously announced, and in New York and Washington the following week. They will also appear in the performances of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which will close the season April 30 and May 1.

Those who bought tickets for the Pension Fund concert will have their money refunded upon application to the Symphony Hall box office.

The next open rehearsal, from which proceeds are devoted to the Pension Fund, will be on April 1, Charles Munch conducting.

Cir. (D 400,454)

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
RECORD

FEB 27 1954

Symphony Postpones Brahms Requiem

The Pension Fund concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, previously announced to be given on March 21, is postponed until next season.

The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, which were to appear with the orchestra in the Brahms Requiem, will sing in Berloiz's "Romeo and Juliet" at the concerts next week in Boston, as previously announced and likewise in New York and Washington in the week following. They will also appear in the announced performances of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which will close the season

Those who have purchased tickets for the pension fund concert on March 21 will have their money refunded upon application to the box office

The next open rehearsal, from which the proceeds are devoted to the orchestra's pension fund, will be on Thursday evening, April 1, Charles Munch conducting.

This Clipping From
BOSTON MASS.
POST

FEB 27 1954

Music in Review

By TUCKER KEISER

It would be pleasant to report that yesterday's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra maintained the high level achieved in the three previous pairs of week-end concerts. It would be pleasant, but it would not be true.

The program was ill-advised if for no other reason than it invited comparison with last week's superlative "The Damnation of Faust." Yesterday we heard Wagner's "Faust" Overture and Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, thin Faustian broth after the strong Faustian meat of Berlioz. These pieces, unspiced and lukewarm as they are by comparison, can provide a pleasant hour of music; tabascoed and gingered up, they have little genuine flavor and they irritate rather than delight.

Alexander Brailovsky was to have played the Chopin Second Piano Concerto, but illness prevented his appearance. For the Chopin, Mr. Munch substituted Lopatnikoff's "Divertimento for Orchestra," op. 34, given its first local hearing. The composer, an unimportant composer of an earlier Russian generation, fashioned a score which sounds like the background music for a documentary film.

The opening Allegro [illegible] would go well with the [illegible] credits, the Allegro molto vivace could accompany catastrophic scenes of fire and flood, the Andante could accent close-ups showing the grim faces of suffering humanity, and the final Allegro molto could express joy at salvation—UNRA to the rescue.

Cir. (D 38,155)

This Clipping From
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

FEB 24 1954

Music In Review

Boston Symphony Orchestra Flutist Features Concert

Doriot Anthony, flutist, gave a brilliant performance of Ibert's "Concerto for Flute and Orchestra" last night with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Veterans' Memorial Auditorium.

The orchestra, directed by Charles Munch, was reduced to about half for her accompaniment, but even then, there were passages where her delicate intonations were overpowered by the horns.

Miss Anthony's technique was flawless, her enunciations were perfect, bold and positive; and the ornamentations of the work were played with remarkable facility. Especially, this was so in the rapid ascending and descending chromatics which at times she produced almost as glissandos. Her clarity in the theme was dulcet and her free cadenza in the final movement, allegro scherzando, was perfect in phrasing. The applause of the audience and the musicians recalled her to the center stage four times.

The work was brilliant and modern — 1934 — and here and there was syncopation with a suggestion of "boogie-woogie," but not in amounts to produce bad taste. It was not very melodic, and I didn't care for the harmonizing, but it challenged the artist and she met it with confidence, and mastered it.

Beethoven Symphony Opened

Dr. Munch opened the program with Beethoven's magnificent "Symphony No. 3 in E-Flat, 'Eroica' opus 55" which began with a clarion call on the trumpets and then the full orchestra took up the herioc theme that seemed defiant and aggressive. This symphony marked Beethoven's departure from the conventional, polite style set by Haydn and Mozart, it says here.

Between this first movement, allegro con brio, and the following one, marcia funebre: adagio assai, there was a rude interruption by a number of late comers who shuffled and clattered while searching for seats. Dr. Munch waited patiently but many of the musicians frowned in vexation at this disregard of the etiquette of concert behavior. It was irksome to the listeners, too, because the mood of the first movement must be retained if the following movement is to be thoroughly enjoyed. The continuity was broken.

Not Funereal

The marcia funebre (funeral march) was not funereal but rather religioso in its deep-toned solemness. It was majestic but not dolorous, and in the middle, the rhythm quickened like a promise of hope, then decelerated to the slow-measured tempo to become a hymn of quiet, but jubilant, peace.

In the third and fourth movements, scherzo: allegro vivace, and finale: allegro molto, the brasses dominated and a horn trio brought a tonal grandeur that is unsurpassed in any symphonic work. In the fourth movement, the brasses and woodwinds sang through a mist of strings, and the brass choir was magnificent.

The final works were three excerpts from Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust," the "Minuet of the Will-of-the-Wisps" the "Ballet of the Sylphs" and the "Hungarian March (Rakoczy)."

Minuet Was Ephemeral

The minuet was ephemeral and mystic, lilting, but it created a spectral apprehension and foreboding. The startling, abrupt ending broke the spell and the ballet which followed was a delightful rhythmic waltz. The music, like the creatures it played for, was light, graceful, undulating, sylph-like, swelling and fading, rising and falling, and gliding into evanescence.

The march was a quick step that seemed to move the columns of men relentlessly toward the sound of battle. Then the heavier roll of caissons rumbled through the ever-advancing cadence of footstep and hoofbeat. Then came the onslaught and the voice of cannon, the flare of trumpets, the crash of musketry and the charge of cavalry. A magnificent ending to a well-chosen program!

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play its last Providence concert of this season March 30.

It will be well for those who were late last night to note that all concerts by the Boston Symphony played here begin at 8:15 because of the distance the musicians have to travel. C. H. L.

Music in Review

Boston Post Sat 2/27/54

By TUCKER KEISER

It would be pleasant to report [illegible] yesterday's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible] the high level [illegible] the three previous [illegible] week-end concerts. It [illegible] pleasant, but it would [illegible]

[illegible] was ill-advised [illegible] reason than it in- [illegible] comparison with last week's [illegible] "The Damnation of Faust." Yesterday we heard Wagner's "Faust" Overture and Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, thin Faustian broth after the strong Faustian meat of Berlioz. These pieces, unspiced and lukewarm as they are by comparison, can provide a pleasant hour of music; tabascoed and gingered up, they have little genuine flavor and [illegible] rather than delight.

Alexander Brailovsky was to [illegible] Chopin Second [illegible] illness pre- [illegible] For the [illegible] substituted [illegible] mento for Orchestra," op. 34, given its first local hearing. The composer, an unimportant composer of an earlier Russian generation, fashioned a score which sounds like the background music for a documentary film.

The opening Allegro risoluto would go well with the initial credits, the Allegro molto vivace could accompany catastrophic scenes of fire and flood, the Andante could accent close-ups showing the grim faces of suffering humanity, and the final Allegro molto could express joy at salvation—UNRA to the rescue.

ew

given its first ... composer, an ... poser of an ear- ... neration, fash- ... hich sounds like ... music for a doc-

Allegro risoluto ... with the initial ... molto vivace ... catastrophic ... flood, the An- ... accent close-ups ... faces of suffer- ... nd the final Al- ... express joy at ... to the rescue.

"FAUST" FESTIVAL

Goethe's "Faust" is an Easter poem, and, as the Easter season draws near, we are having in this city four performances within nine days of three symphonic masterworks inspired by that drama. Last week, Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," this week today and tomorrow at Symphony Hall, Wagner's "Faust Overture" and Liszt's "Faust Symphony," —these are three high spurs of that majestic mountain massif in Central Europe which is named Goethe.

Were this music accessible in Symphony Hall only, as would have been the case thirty years ago, to flaunt such a banquet in the faces of the famished would be an affront; but there has been a technological revolution, and, that the words of the Magnificat might be fulfilled, the hungry are now filled with good things. Both performances, this afternoon's at 2:15 and Saturday evening's at 8:30, are broadcast to a multitudinous audience by station WGBH. Beyond these the banqueting tables stretch in perspective to Tanglewood where Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" will be repeated this coming Summer, and even beyond that, for the work was recorded in full by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Harvard and Radcliffe Choirs, and distinguished soloists during four herculean sessions at Symphony Hall this past Sunday and Monday for probable release in September, which means that this towering monument of music and poetry will be available for close and leisured study.

⁂

German is worth learning if only in order to read Goethe's "Faust" in the original. Lacking that, a good translation, Bayard Taylor's, will do.

For it can be a life-long companion,
From first youth tested up to extreme old age.

"Everything is in 'Faust,'" for the reader as indeed it was for the poet himself,—not an extravagant estimate when we reflect that he began meditating the theme in 1769 as a youth of twenty-one and finally finished it six months before his death in 1832.

Like a colossus it bestrides the river of Time as that stream broadens from 18th century classicism into 19th century romanticism. One of the last, if not the last, Goethe was able to write a European book, a drama which transcends all frontiers and still speaks to Western man from a world-historical mountain summit. Who has done so since? Can it ever be done again? The golden bees of his poem sped marauding to cross-fertilize the glowing garden of music, and, as the 19th century went on, composer after composer essayed scores to Goethe's drama,—Schumann, Boito, Gounod . . . Berlioz, Liszt, and Wagner are but three, though easily the most eminent, and of these three it is Berlioz, on fire with his romantic genius, who rushes impetuously on and dares the grim end of the tragedy which Goethe himself could not quite bring himself to write, the damnation of Faust; for in Goethe's drama Faust is saved.

⁂

A good many people think the heaviest hitting in the poetic drama is at the very start and at the very end,—the Prologue in Heaven and the Easter scenes up to the beginning of Gretchen's tragedy, then that tremendous last act of Part Two, Faust's death and translation; for it must be admitted that it took a greater poet to save him than to damn him. The brooding introspection of the opening scene on Easter Eve, the sudden shock of joy at the Easter choruses, and that majestic hymn to spring which begins,
From ice now freed are brook and river, once these are in one's veins, to live through a Spring without rereading them is to leave life's banquet but half tasted.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

BOSTON MASS.
GLOBE

FEB 26 1954

BOSTON MASS.
GLOBE

FEB 27 1954

MUSIC

Lopatnikoff Work, Liszt "Faust" Heard

Seventeenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch music director, in the Friday afternoon-Saturday evening series at Symphony Hall. The revised program: Wagner: "A Faust Overture"; Nicolai Lopatnikoff: Divertimento for Orchestra, Op. 34 (first performance in Boston); Liszt: "A Faust Symphony."

By CYRUS DURGIN

Due in part to the illness of pianist Alexander Brailovsky, who had been announced to play the Chopin F minor Concerto, this week's revised Symphony program turned out a peculiar affair. It served as a makeshift only, for it found Lopatnikoff's Gallic and breezy Divertimento sandwiched in between Wagner's and Liszt's magnificent broodings upon the story of Faust, Gretchen and The Devil.

The Divertimento, new to Boston, is respectable and even engaging music in itself, but it could scarcely have been put in a worse position. What undoubtedly would have seemed a bracing concert-opener only appeared trivial by contrast, coming after the "Faust" Overture. The Divertimento really deserves another chance in appropriate surroundings, for its four movements sounded, on one hearing, like a brief and well-made little symphony, with a tuneful slow movement and consistent motion, waggery and vitality in the three allegros.

It would have been more accurate, also, to have announced the rarely-heard music of Liszt as parts of the "Faust" Symphony, for not only was the choral finale omitted, but there were abundant cuts along the way. This great Romantic Symphony is long and repetitive, but it is also a masterpiece of its kind, so why not reserve it for an occasion when it could be played complete and by itself? I fear the good, gray Abbe would have torn his long hair at yesterday's vivisection of his work.

Apart from these mischances, yesterday afternoon was one of gorgeous orchestral sound and brilliant playing. The insoluble enigma of life, youth, age, wisdom, the flesh and The Devil, as Goethe so profoundly expressed it in his poem, has not only had an irresistible appeal to the German musical spirit, but in the case of Wagner and Liszt it proved the foundation of two heroic conceptions in art.

Though the Overture is young and early Wagner, and not nearly of the complexities of his mature music, it is yet music of stature and quality, and requires both interpretive discernment and high technical competence. It is doubtful that Liszt, orchestrally speaking, was ever more inventive, structurally enterprising, and—in the Mephistopheles movement—more brilliantly skilled, than in these brave, idealized, highly-colored character pictures. Only a master conductor and orchestra can do them justice.

Since, as I believe, Mr. Munch is more than half a Romantic (and the remainder a somewhat austere scholar where art is concerned) Overture and Symphony appeal powerfully to his temperament. His response took the form of readings vividly intense but disciplined in expression, highly colored but never blatant or garish. The orchestra responded in kind, functioning at its very best and in its richest (therefore purest) quality of tone. The end result was complete revelation of Wagner and Liszt, and so far as each of them was able to go in the nonconcrete communication of music, of Goethe.

108

THE BOSTON HERALD, SATU

2/27/54

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 17th program of the 73d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:
A Faust Overture.............Wagner
Divertimento for Orchestra, op. 34 Lopatnikoff
A Faust Symphony.............Liszt

By RUDOLPH ELIE

An admirable idea, this, to demonstrate in consecutive weeks the approach of three musical masters to the Faust theme.

Last week of course, it was Berlioz' "Damnation," the greatest of them all in an absolutely memorable performance. This week it was Wagner and Liszt, the former in his early "Faust" Overture, the latter in his inflated "Faust Symphony," and although it was a pleasure to hear both, the odd thing was that a contemporary work brand new to Boston all but stole the show.

This was a Divertimento by Nikolai Lopatnikoff, a 51-year-old Estonian-born composer who has made this country his permanent home since 1939. The work, in four fairly brief movements, is especially delightful for the wit that abounds in it; for the ingenuity and vivacity of spirit that informs it throughout. The composer, whose style here sometimes suggests the gusto of Shostakovitch's earlier works combined with the modulatory freedom of Prokofieff, speaks a musical language readily assimilable. His harmonies are sharp and piquant without being aggressive anywhere; his melodies filled with engaging twists and turns rather than the usual jagged phrases so much the fashion nowadays, and his sense of orchestral style and color is sure and knowing.

Trip Over Slow

While many contemporary composers can and do compose exciting and interesting fast movements, nearly all trip over the threshold of the slow. How to compose a slow movement is, indeed, the central esthetic problem facing composers today. They cannot go back to the adagios of Beethoven or Mahler (though why I do not exactly know), nor can they invent, out of the blue, a wholly new kind of melody. For while harmonic values are ever changing and swift-moving melodic phrases can take any direction, a good tune has been a good tune from the beginning, and from the beginning a slow movement has been a good tune. (I hesitate to make such a sweeping generality without space to defend it, but quite a case could be made for it just the same using the great Davison-Apel anthology of musical examples as the authority.)

In any case, Mr. Lopatnikoff, though his procedure in the slow movement of his little Divertimento is fairly typical of the day in the extension of a mood rather than the obvious song-form juxtaposition of contrasted melodies, nonetheless achieves a grateful, even a delicious melodic character in his andante. The whole is perhaps not an important or significant work — a Divertimento is not intended to be. But it is clever, bright, amusing and musical all the way through.

Wagner's "Faust" Overture, although it evokes a good deal of Faustian atmosphere, is never quite convincing, though I am hard put at the moment to say why. Mainly, I think, it is because the ghosts of an endless procession of Siegfrieds, Lohengrins, Tristans and Tannhaeusers march through the work. At any given cadence you brace yourself for the sudden appearance of one of the old familiar friends. They never materialize, but it is a little distracting just the same. I should add that most of the ghosts referred to above were not even born when Wagner first wrote this Overture, but they were well on their way by the time he rescored this early work.

Cuts Traditional

Liszt's "Faust" Symphony also evokes a lot of the Faustian atmosphere, but with it no little fustian atmosphere to boot. It is one of the very few large works in the repertoire that are composed by the conductor, too, in that cuts have been traditional from the outset. Since cuts have to be made, each conductor cuts the work the way he sees it and the result yesterday could be entitled "A Faust Symphony" by Charles Munch, Based on a Work in Three Movements by Franz Liszt.

However, he demonstrated an unerring instinct for cutting the piece and putting it back together again, for he omitted quantities of repetitions, preserving only those necessary to the modulations. The result was a sounder edifice and a more direct communication, and it must be said there are moments of truly beautiful communication, too. But in the end it all collapses of its own immensity, leaving the impression that Liszt never did get inside his characters, he only painted vivid photograph likenesses of them and hung them up on the gallery wall in nice gilt frames.

Next week Mr. Munch will do Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" again, and I need hardly add that it promises to be as memorable an occasion as it was last season. His Victor recording of it, incidentally, was chosen by the Saturday Review poll as one of the two or three finest recordings of 1953.

This Clipping From
BUFFALO N.Y.
NEWS

FEB 27 1954

MUSIC NOTES

The next concert in the Buffalo Chamber Music Society series, to be presented by a trio consisting of Alexander Schneider, violinist; Paul Tortelier, cellist, and Mieczyslaw Horszowski, pianist, on Monday, March 8, will be devoted to works of Beethoven, a nicely timed collaboration with the Philharmonic's Beethoven cycle. The concert will take place in the Mary Seaton Room of Kleinhans Music Hall.

* * *

Not only has the Boston Symphony announced the lengthening of its Berkshire Festival season, but it has announced expansion of its Esplanade Concerts. The early summer series, under Arthur Fiedler, will open July 5, and continue through Aug. 10, concerts being played on Mondays.

* * *

Cir. (D [illegible]) (S [illegible])

This Clipping From ERIE, PA.
TIMES

FEB 28 1954

Intermission Notebook
by TIMMIE SULLIVAN

THE PROGRAMS for the enlarged Berkshire Festival of July and August, 1954, have been announced by Charles Munch, Music Director of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Twenty-four concerts are announced for the six weeks from July 7 to Aug. 15, including six concerts by chamber groups on Wednesday nights; six concerts by a chamber orchestra of Boston Symphony players on Friday nig . and six concerts by the full orchestra in the Shed on Saturday nights and six Sunday afternoons.

In the course of the Shed concerts, Charles Munch will honor the 150th anniversary season of the birth of Berloiz by conducting this composer's principal works in their complete form. Guest conductors in the Shed concerts will be Pierre Monteux, Jean Morel and Richard Burgin.

---

ond.

Boston Globe
Sat
Feb 27 1954

MUSIC

Lopatnikoff Work, Liszt "Faust" Heard

Seventeenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch music director, in the Friday afternoon–Saturday evening series at Symphony Hall. The revised program: Wagner: "A Faust Overture"; Nicolai Lopatnikoff: Divertimento for Orchestra, Op. 34 (first performance in Boston); Liszt: "A Faust Symphony."

By CYRUS DURGIN

Due in part to the illness of pianist Alexander Brailovsky, who had been announced to play the Chopin F minor Concerto, this week's revised Symphony program turned out a peculiar affair. It served as a makeshift only, for it found Lopatnikoff's Gallic and breezy Divertimento sandwiched in between Wagner's and Liszt's magnificent broodings upon the story of Faust, Gretchen and The Devil.

The Divertimento, new to Boston, is respectable and even engaging music in itself, but it could scarcely have been put in a worse position. What undoubtedly would have seemed a bracing concert-opener only appeared trivial by contrast, coming after the "Faust" Overture. The Divertimento really deserves another chance in appropriate surroundings, for its four movements sounded, on one hearing, like a brief and well-made little symphony, with a tuneful slow movement and consistent motion, waggery and vitality in the three allegros.

It would have been more accurate, also, to have announced the rarely-heard music of Liszt as parts of the "Faust" Symphony, for not only was the choral finale omitted, but there were abundant cuts along the way. This great Romantic Symphony is long and repetitive, but it is also a masterpiece of its kind, so why not reserve it for an occasion when it could be played complete and by itself? I fear the good, gray Abbe would have torn his long hair at yesterday's vivisection of his work.

Apart from these mischances, yesterday afternoon was one of gorgeous orchestral sound and brilliant playing. The insoluble enigma of life, youth, age, wisdom, the flesh and The Devil, as Goethe so profoundly expressed it in his poem, has not only had an irresistible appeal to the German musical spirit, but in the case of Wagner and Liszt it proved the foundation of two heroic conceptions in art.

Though the Overture is young and early Wagner, and not nearly of the complexities of his mature music, it is yet music of stature and quality, and requires both interpretive discernment and high technical competence. It is doubtful that Liszt, orchestrally speaking, was ever more inventive, structurally enterprising, and — in the Mephistopheles movement— more brilliantly skilled, than in these brave, idealized, highly-colored character pictures. Only a master conductor and orchestra can do them justice.

Since, as I believe, Mr. Munch is more than half a Romantic (and the remainder a somewhat austere scholar where art is concerned) Overture and Symphony appeal powerfully to his temperament. His response took the form of readings vividly intense but disciplined in expression, highly colored but never blatant or garish. The orchestra responded in kind, functioning at its very best and in its richest (therefore purest) quality of tone. The end result was complete revelation of Wagner and Liszt, and so far as each of them was able to go in the non-concrete communication of music of Goethe.

Cir. (D 643,985) (S 1,124,787)

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

FEB 28 1954

Music Fund Memorial to Koussevitzky

By Marion Kelley

NOT many people in the Academy audience noticed a quiet little blonde woman listening to a symphony concert conducted by George Szell when his Cleveland Orchestra played for The Philadelphia Forum recently. Fewer still saw the sparkle in her eyes as they read with superb feeling, Ernest Bloch's "Sinfonia Breve."

It was Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky who had stopped off en route to Washington just to hear Szell and his musicians play for the first time in Philadelphia, this new work by the contemporary composer commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation.

Since her famous husband's death in 1951, Mrs. Koussevitzky gives all her time to the furthering of this project, founded 12 years ago for the purpose of assisting talented composers all over the world, and developing new ones.

AIDS YOUNG TALENT

The organization is dedicated to the memory of the conductor's first wife, Natalie, who was intensely interested in the idea and the project has as avid a worker in the present Mrs. Koussevitzky who is a niece of the founder's first wife.

"My husband always was interested in helping young musicians with great talent," said Mrs. Koussevitzky. "So many of them need financial assistance and for many it is impossible to take time out to compose. Without musical composition depicting the era in which we live, what chance is there to preserve our modern musical history?"

PERMANENT ENDOWMENT

Mrs. Koussevitzky explained how flexible was the organization. The original foundation, established in 1942, began with a contribution from Dr. Koussevitzky and since his death it has been replenished by outside donations.

In 1950 a new angle was added to the Foundation. The founder established a permanent endowment in the Library of Congress in Washington under the name of the Serge Koussevitzky Music Foundation with the specific purpose of not only aiding talented composers to enrich the literature, but of preserving their work. There is a permanent capital fund of $100,000 which yields about $4,000 a year for the commissioning of a new work.

MUST FILE WORK

"The amount appropriated to each composer is not divulged," said Mrs. Koussevitzky. "It varies naturally with the size and scope of the composition. Composers are entirely free to dispose of the finished compositions as they see fit, once they have filed the original at the Library of Congress."

Mrs. Koussevitzky said the Foundation cannot say where the work is to be premiered; this is up to the composer. She explained that her husband often played many of the premiers but never asked for the privilege.

This little Russian born lady thinks nothing of traveling thousands of miles to hear the premiere of a new work made possible by the efforts of her late husband, who, for so many years piloted the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Damnation of Faust"

Feb 28

Orchestra's Performance of Berlioz Work Proved Impressive, Exciting

By TUCKER KEISER

Climaxing his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch gave us last week end the definitive performance of the greatest French score of the 19th century, Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust." Mr. Munch has now given us all the major works of this composer with the exception of "Harold in Italy," a purely orchestral work with viola solo. While these other performances were personal triumphs, none created the excitement nor possessed the vital intensity of the Faust legend.

In the "Damnation" Berlioz did not slavishly follow the Goethe play, but rearranged scenes, altered situations, and condensed action to suit his plan for the composition. He freely elaborated on or deleted from the original as his musical sense dictated. The result is neither an opera nor an oratorio though it contains elements of each, and it cannot be fitted neatly into the pattern of the symphony though its development is symphonic.

In 1846, Wagner had not yet thoroughly tagged his pomposities as "music dramas," and Berlioz classified the work as a "dramatic legend," although a "music-drama" is precisely what he had created.

Used All Devices

Using every musical device known at the time, Berlioz built his unique drama through purely musical means. From the opening scene with Faust alone in the fields chanting his praises of nature to the final glorification of Marguerite in heaven, Berlioz presents his "dramatic legend" in a straightforward yet absorbing way.

This directness has led misguided operatic impresarios to attempt staging the piece, a practice which is evidence of complete misunderstanding of its power. In the concert hall the aural impact is sharp in every scene. In the opera house visual presentation hampers that facility on which Berlioz works to produce the most powerful effects, the listener's imagination.

Apparently the work remains in the repertory of the Paris Opera, but after five unsuccessful performances in the 1906 season, the Metropolitan wisely returned the "Damnation" to its rightful home, the concert hall.

The theatre has discovered that suggestion can be more forceful than underlined statement, that the stimulated imagination can supply infinitely more gorgeous trappings than a theatrical prop boy. A performance of Berlioz' "Damnation" is a rich experience when we have a sympathetic conductor, four soloists who can create vivid characters without costumes, scenery, and action, and an orchestra of eloquence to take the part of the Greek chorus.

Mr. Munch chose his singers with keen perception. Suzanne Danco, a light-voiced soprano of almost etheral quality, sang Marguerite with an ingenuousness that provided a marked contrast to a virile, robust masculine Faust of David Poleri. The tenor, not completely at home in the French style, nevertheless fashioned a remarkable third-dimensional character. To him fell the burden of the work, the most demanding vocal part, and the necessity for the greatest variety in expressiveness; Mr. Poleri hurdled these artistic obstacles with a brilliance seldom heard in the concert hall or the opera house. He has come a long way since he sang here several years ago with the San Carl Opera company, then a self-assured but inexperienced tenor.

Mr. Munch's choice for the important, though less demanding role of Mephistopheles was the famous French baritone, Martial Singher, whose suave vocalism suggested a sinister characterization.

On Sunday and Monday the entire performance was painstakingly recorded; barring technical difficulties it will be Mr. Munch's finest recording with the Boston Symphony to date.

BOSTON MASS.
HERALD

FEB 28 1954

Musical Events

In honor of the Berlioz anniversary season, the complete "Romeo and Juliet," introduced by Charles Munch with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at these concerts last season, will be repeated. The performances will be at the Friday, Saturday concerts on March 5 and 6 at Symphony Hall.

The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, directed by G. Wallace Woodworth, will assist and the soloists will be: Mary Davenport, contralto, John McCollum, tenor, and Yi Kwei-Sze, bass.

The program for Tuesday evening, March 2, will consist of Wagner's "Faust" Overture, three excerpts from Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust": Minuet of the Will-o-the-Wisps, Ballet of the Sylphs, and the Hungarian March (Rakoczy); Ibert's Flute Concerto with Doriot Anthony as soloist, and Elgar's "Enigma" Variations.

YI KWEI-SZE, bass soloist with Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony in Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

BOSTON MASS.
HERALD

FEB 27 1954

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch, conducting, gave the 17th program of the 73d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:
A Faust Overture.............Wagner
Divertimento for Orchestra, op. 34 Lopatnikoff
A Faust Symphony.............Liszt

By RUDOLPH ELIE

An admirable idea, this, to demonstrate in consecutive weeks the approach of three musical masters to the Faust theme.

Last week of course, it was Berlioz' "Damnation," the greatest of them all in an absolutely memorable performance. This week it was Wagner and Liszt, the former in his early "Faust" Overture, the latter in his inflated "Faust Symphony," and although it was a pleasure to hear both, the odd thing was that a contemporary work brand new to Boston all but stole the show.

This was a Divertimento by Nikolai Lopatnikoff, a 51-year-old Estonian-born composer who has made this country his permanent home since 1939. The work, in four fairly brief movements, is especially delightful for the wit that abounds in it; for the ingenuity and vivacity of spirit that informs it throughout. The composer, whose style here sometimes suggests the gusto of Shostakovitch's earlier works combined with the modulatory freedom of Prokofieff, speaks a musical language readily assimilable. His harmonies are sharp and piquant without being aggressive anywhere; his melodies filled with engaging twists and turns rather than the usual jagged phrases so much the fashion nowadays, and his sense of orchestral style and color is sure and knowing.

Trip Over Slow

While many contemporary composers can and do compose exciting and interesting fast movements, nearly all trip over the threshold of the slow. How to compose a slow movement is, indeed, the central esthetic problem facing composers today. They cannot go back to the adagios of Beethoven or Mahler (though why I do not exactly know), nor can they invent, out of the blue, a wholly new kind of melody. For while harmonic values are ever changing and swift-moving melodic phrases can take any direction, a good tune has been a good tune from the beginning, and from the beginning a slow movement has been a good tune. (I hesitate to make such a sweeping generality without space to defend it, but quite a case could be made for it just the same using the great Davison-Apel anthology of musical examples as the authority.)

In any case, Mr. Lopatnikoff, though his procedure in the slow movement of his little Divertimento is fairly typical of the day in the extension of a mood rather than the obvious song-form juxtaposition of contrasted melodies, nonetheless achieves a grateful, even a delicious melodic character in his andante. The whole is perhaps not an important or significant work — a Divertimento is not intended to be. But it is clever, bright, amusing and musical all the way through.

Wagner's "Faust" Overture, although it evokes a good deal of Faustian atmosphere, is never quite convincing, though I am hard put at the moment to say why. Mainly, I think, it is because the ghosts of an endless procession of Siegfrieds, Lohengrins, Tristans and Tannhaeusers march through the work. At any given cadence you brace yourself for the sudden appearance of one of the old familiar friends. They never materialize, but it is a little distracting just the same. I should add that most of the ghosts referred to above were not even born when Wagner first wrote this Overture, but they were well on their way by the time he rescored this early work.

Cuts Traditional

Liszt's "Faust" Symphony also evokes a lot of the Faustian atmosphere, but with it no little fustian atmosphere to boot. It is one of the very few large works in the repertoire that are composed by the conductor, too, in that cuts have been traditional from the outset. Since cuts have to be made, each conductor cuts the work the way he sees it and the result yesterday could be entitled "A Faust Symphony" by Charles Munch, Based on a Work in Three Movements by Franz Liszt.

However, he demonstrated an unerring instinct for cutting the piece and putting it back together again, for he omitted quantities of repetitions, preserving only those necessary to the modulations. The result was a sounder edifice and a more direct communication, and it must be said there are moments of truly beautiful communication, too. But in the end it all collapses of its own immensity, leaving the impression that Liszt never did get inside his characters, he only painted vivid photograph likenesses of them and hung them up on the gallery wall in nice gilt frames.

Next week Mr. Munch will do Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" again, and I need hardly add that it promises to be as memoable an occasion as it was last season. His Victor recording of it, incidentally, was chosen by the Saturday Review poll as one of the two or three finest record-

---

Cir. (D 55,839)

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

MAR 1 - 1954

Berkshire Festival Slates 24 Concerts for Season

Twenty-four concerts will be offered on the enlarged program for the Berkshire Festival July 7 to Aug. 15 at Tanglewood.

The season's program, planned by Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will include six Saturday night concerts and six Sunday afternoon programs in the Shed by the full Symphony Orchestra.

There also will be presented in the Theater-Concert Hall six Friday night concerts by a chamber orchestra of Boston Symphony players, and a series of six concerts by chamber groups on Wednesday nights.

In the course of the Shed concerts, Mr. Munch will honor the 150th anniversary season of the birth of Berlioz by conducting this composer's principal works in their complete form.

Guest conductors in the Shed concerts will be Pierre Monteux, Jean Morel and Richard Burgin.

Mr. Munch will conduct the Boston Symphony in the opening concert of the Shed series July 10. On this program the orchestra will perform Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust," with the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society.

Requests for seats at subscription rates are now being received by the Berkshire Festival office, Symphony Hall, Boston.

110

Monday, March 1, 1954 Part 3—Page 11

Chicago Daily Tribune

On the Aisle

Oliver J. in Historic Upset as Dragon Rescues Concert

BY CLAUDIA CASSIDY

INCREDIBLE how misinformed you can be all your life. I always thought you were rescued from, not by, dragons. But over at the Opera house when the weary Boston Pops Tour orchestra [and please note the "Tour," which is not by any stretch of terms the genuine article] had wheezed its way thru some uninterested music, and Ruth Slenczynska had attacked Liszt's "Totentanz" as if the piano were a xylophone and her hands were hammers, I heard a dismayed voice sighing, "Me, me, My, my," and thought I was talking out loud.

Tillstrom

But it was Oliver J. Dragon, and along with the dragon at Salzburg I love him dearly. I wish they would both come to my house to live.

There are dragons and dragons, as you undeniably know. There is the green-eyed dragon with the 13 tails, also a baritone. There is the dank and fearsome dragon at Bayreuth, who would scare me to death in broad daylight, and is a real horror in the stygian glooms of Wieland Wagner staging. Much nicer is the delectable dragon at Salzburg, who would simply crawl in your lap and shed a few sequins. Nicest of all is Oliver J., who is green, sequiny and slithery, who breathes fire, brimstone and laughing gas, who has one lovely tooth as well as a limpid neck, and who is going to join me in a crosscut saw job of reducing that Opera house stage rim so we can watch the feet of ballet dancers without being too far away to see their faces.

If this suggests that Oliver J. is indiscreet — well, yes, from this and other things, it wouldn't surprise me. But he has manners. Whatever he thought of the concert he rescued, he wasn't commenting, he was vocalizing. Or maybe both. Anyway, he was about to embark on half the title role of "St. George and the Dragon." Embark is a lovely word to launch the Dragon baritone.

"ST. GEORGE AND THE DRAGON"
Opera by Jack Fascinato and Burr Tillstrom, presented with Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Tour orchestra in the Opera house Saturday and Sunday evenings, Feb. 27 and 28, 1954.

THE CAST

The King..................Colonel Crackie
Lady in Waiting..Mme. Ophelia Ooglepuss
Lady in Waiting......Miss Buelah Witch
The Princess............Miss Fran Allison
Sir George....................Mr. Kukla
The Dragon ....Mr. Oliver J. Dragon

It seems that in this knightly opera, full of just the alarums and excursions it thrives on, Oliver J. is arriving to devour a princess on schedule, when he meets Sir George, her defender, battles to a draw when Sir George puts his fire out and he can't breathe smoke any more, and decides to be a civilized dragon, which is more fun, anyway. If T. S. Eliot had written this, plainly it would be a plea for world peace. As things stand, call it a festive shenannigan expanding in happy space from the television screen to the wide open spaces of the Opera house.

When it was all over, a bland young man named Burr Tillstrom took Oliver J.'s bows for him, which was nice, for it let you remember Oliver J. with his limpid neck resting cosily on Fran Allison's shoulder. Of his other cohorts, given to bird beaks, kitten paws and batlike jet propulsion, Miss Buelah Witch, a cackaloratura soprano, shared his gife for saying the wrong thing at the right time. She is invited to come and visit. But Oliver J. can shed sequins on my best Fortuny chair, cut his tooth on the piano, and kibitz high fidelity. I never was rescued by a dragon before, and I like it.

Munch will conduct the Boston orchestra in the final concert of this season's Bushnell Symphony Series Mar. 8 at 8:15 p. m.

Cir. (D 2,165)

This Clipping From HUDSON, MASS.
SUN

MAR

TWO STRADS

Boston (U.P.)—Two of the 34 violins in the Boston Symphony Orchestra are Stradivari. pounds."

Cir. (D 503,999) (S 1,096,738)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 2 - 1954

BLOCH CAPTURES 2 MUSIC AWARDS

Wins Local Critics Vote for Orchestral, Chamber Works —Avshalomoff Gets Prize

Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso No. 2 and String Quartet No. 3 were voted yesterday as the outstanding orchestral and chamber music works of 1953 by the Music Critics Circle of New York. This is the first time since the circle began making awards in 1942 that one composer has won top honors in two categories in one year.

The other award of the circle went to Jacob Avshalomoff's "Tom O'Bedlam" as the outstanding new choral work introduced to New York last year. Mr. Avshalomoff, a 34-year-old naturalized citizen, was born in Tsingtao, China, and came here in 1937. This is the first time he has won a circle award.

Mr. Bloch, though, is a repeater. His String Quartet No. 2 was voted the best chamber work of the 1946-47 season. Besides having the two prize-winning works entered this year, Mr. Bloch had a third, his Sinfonia Breve, in the voting.

His Concerto Grosso won the orchestral award on the second ballot. Other works that received votes on the first ballot were Ernst Toch's Symphony No. 2, Nicolai Lopatnikoff's Concertino and Howard Shapero's Classical Symphony. In the second balloting, Mr. Toch's work was the closest competitor.

The other composition voted on in the choral category was Arthur Honegger's Danse des Morts.

The consensus of the meeting, which was held in the eleventh floor clubroom of The New York Times, was that the works competing for the chamber music award made an unusually strong list. Henri Sauguet's String Quartet No. 2 and Elliott Carter's Quartet (1951) each received a vote, but the two leading contenders were Mr. Bloch's Quartet and Quartet No. 1 by Irving Fine. The two were voted on again, and in the second balloting the Bloch entry won the majority.

The circle voted not to make any awards in the opera or theatre music categories.

Mr. Bloch's Concerto Grosso was introduced by the Boston Symphony, under Charles Munch, on Dec. 2. His Quartet No. 3 was first played here by the Griller Quartet on Jan. 4 of last year. Mr. Avshalomoff's "Tom O'Bedlam" was introduced by the Collegiate Chorale, under Robert Shaw, on Dec. 15.

Receive Music Critics Circle Awards

Ernest Bloch

Jacob Avshalomoff

Cir. (D 8,302)

This Clipping From
GREENWICH, CONN.
TIME

Tales of Tanglewood . . .

County music-lovers who think nothing of the trek to the Berkshires for the Tanglewood concerts held there every summer under the auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heartened to know that their enthusiasm is shared by many others.

According to Charles Munch, the Boston Symphony's music director, an enlarged program has been planned for July and August of this year, to meet the constantly growing popularity of these concerts, which drew a record number to Lenox in the Berkshire Hills last summer.

Twenty-four concerts have been announced for the six weeks from July 7 to August 15, including six concerts by chamber groups on Wednesday evenings, six by a chamber orchestra of Boston Symphony players on Friday evenings, six concerts by the full Orchestra in the shed on Saturday evenings, and six on Sunday afternoons.

In the course of the Shed concerts, Mr. Munch will honor the 150th anniversary season of the birth of Berlioz by conducting this composer's principal works in their complete form. Guest conductors in the Shed concerts will be Pierre Monteux, conducting two concerts, and Jean Morel and Richard Burgin, each conducting one.

Cir. (D 12,002)

This Clipping From
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

MAR 5 - 1954

Special Friends Raise Funds For Boston Orchestra

Dr. Palfrey Perkins, chairman of the Special Friends' Committee, at a meeting today of the committee which is assisting him in a campaign to raise $250,000 for the current needs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reported that 150,000 of this amount is now in hand.

By far the largest part of this total is in contributions from individuals who have become Friends of the Symphony. To date 3,698 have been enrolled, 1,090 of whom are new Friends. Many gifts in response to public, press and radio appeals, have been received. Contributions from business total $10,065.

They will continue their solicitation of special gifts in an effort to reach their goal before the Annual Meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to which all members will be invited. The meeting will be held Wednesday, March 31, at 4:00 p. m. After a short business meeting Charles Munch will lead the orchestra in a special program and the Friends will be received by the conductor, the trustee and members of the orchestra at tea immediately afterward.

Cir. (D 389,011) (S 258,545)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

MAR 2 - 1954

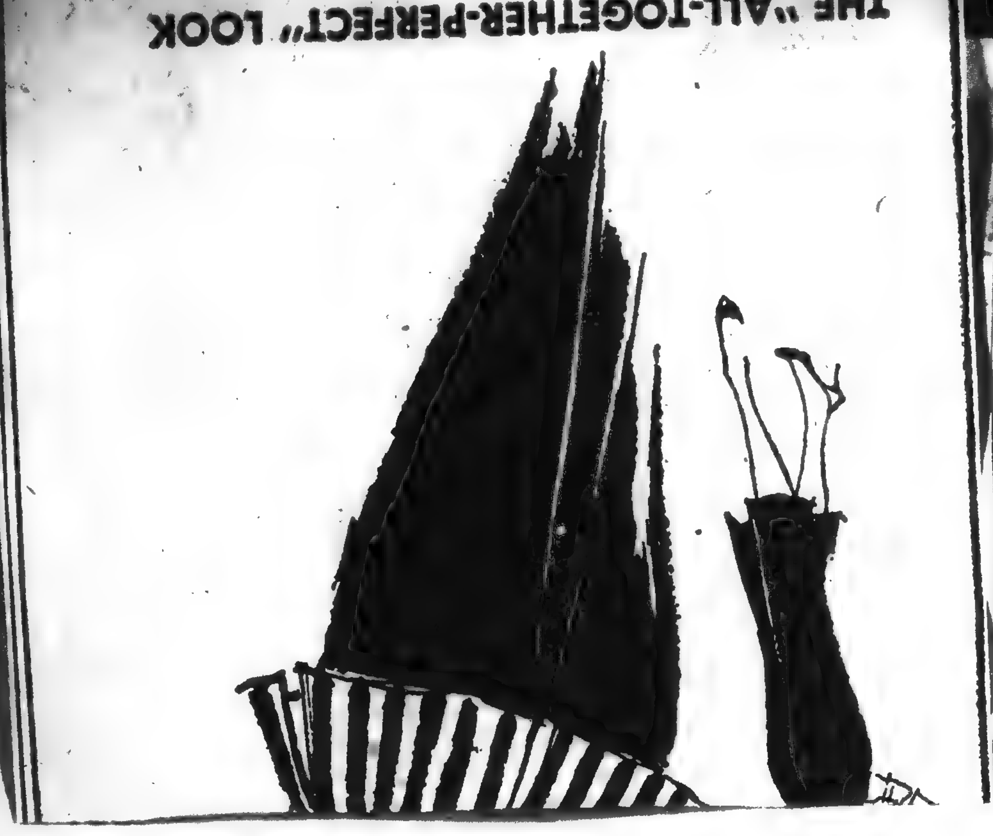
WORDS and MUSIC

By Harriett Johnson

Music Critics Give Bloch 2 Awards

For the first time in the history of its award giving, the Music Critics' Circle of New York voted yesterday to give two top prizes in one year to the same composer—Ernest Bloch, Swiss-born, American citizen, now residing in Agate Beach, Oregon. Bloch's Concerto Grosso, No. 2, first introduced by the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall last December, was voted the outstanding orchestral work performed during 1953. His String Quartet No. 3, introduced Jan. 4, 1953, by the Griller Quartet in Town Hall, was awarded the identical distinction in its category.

The one other citation given went to Jacob Avshalomoff for his choral work, "Tom O'Bedlam," voted the best of its kind performed during the last year. The Collegiate Chorale, Robert Shaw conducting, gave the composition its premiere Dec. 15 at Carnegie Hall. This is Avshalomoff's first award from the Circle. Bloch's Second String Quartet won the chamber music award in 1946-47.



Cir. (D 2,165)

This Clipping From HUDSON, MASS.
SUN

MAR 2 - 1954

TWO STRADS

Boston (U.P.)—Two of the 34 violins in the Boston Symphony Orchestra are Stradivari. pounds."

Cir. (D 503,999) (S 1,096,738)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 2 - 1954

BLOCH CAPTURES 2 MUSIC AWARDS

Wins Local Critics Vote for Orchestral, Chamber Works —Avshalomoff Gets Prize

Receive Music Critics Circle Awards

Ernest Bloch   Jacob Avshalomoff

Ernest Bloch's Concerto Grosso No. 2 and String Quartet No. 3 were voted yesterday as the outstanding orchestral and chamber music works of 1953 by the Music Critics Circle of New York. This is the first time since the circle began making awards in 1942 that one composer has won top honors in two categories in one year.

The other award of the circle went to Jacob Avshalomoff's "Tom O'Bedlam" as the outstanding new choral work introduced to New York last year. Mr. Avshalomoff, a 34-year-old naturalized citizen, was born in Tsingtao, China, and came here in 1937. This is the first time he has won a circle award.

Mr. Bloch, though, is a repeater. His String Quartet No. 2 was voted the best chamber work of the 1946-47 season. Besides having the two prize-winning works entered this year, Mr. Bloch had a third, his Sinfonia Breve, in the voting.

His Concerto Grosso won the orchestral award on the second ballot. Other works that received votes on the first ballot were Ernst Toch's Symphony No. 2, Nicolai Lopatnikoff's Concertino and Howard Shapero's Classical Symphony. In the second balloting, Mr. Toch's work was the closest competitor.

The other composition voted on in the choral category was Arthur Honegger's Danse des Morts.

The consensus of the meeting, which was held in the eleventh floor clubroom of The New York Times, was that the works competing for the chamber music award made an unusually strong list. Henri Sauguet's String Quartet No. 2 and Elliott Carter's Quartet (1951) each received a vote, but the two leading contenders were Mr. Bloch's Quartet and Quartet No. 1 by Irving Fine. The two were voted on again, and in the second balloting the Bloch entry won the majority.

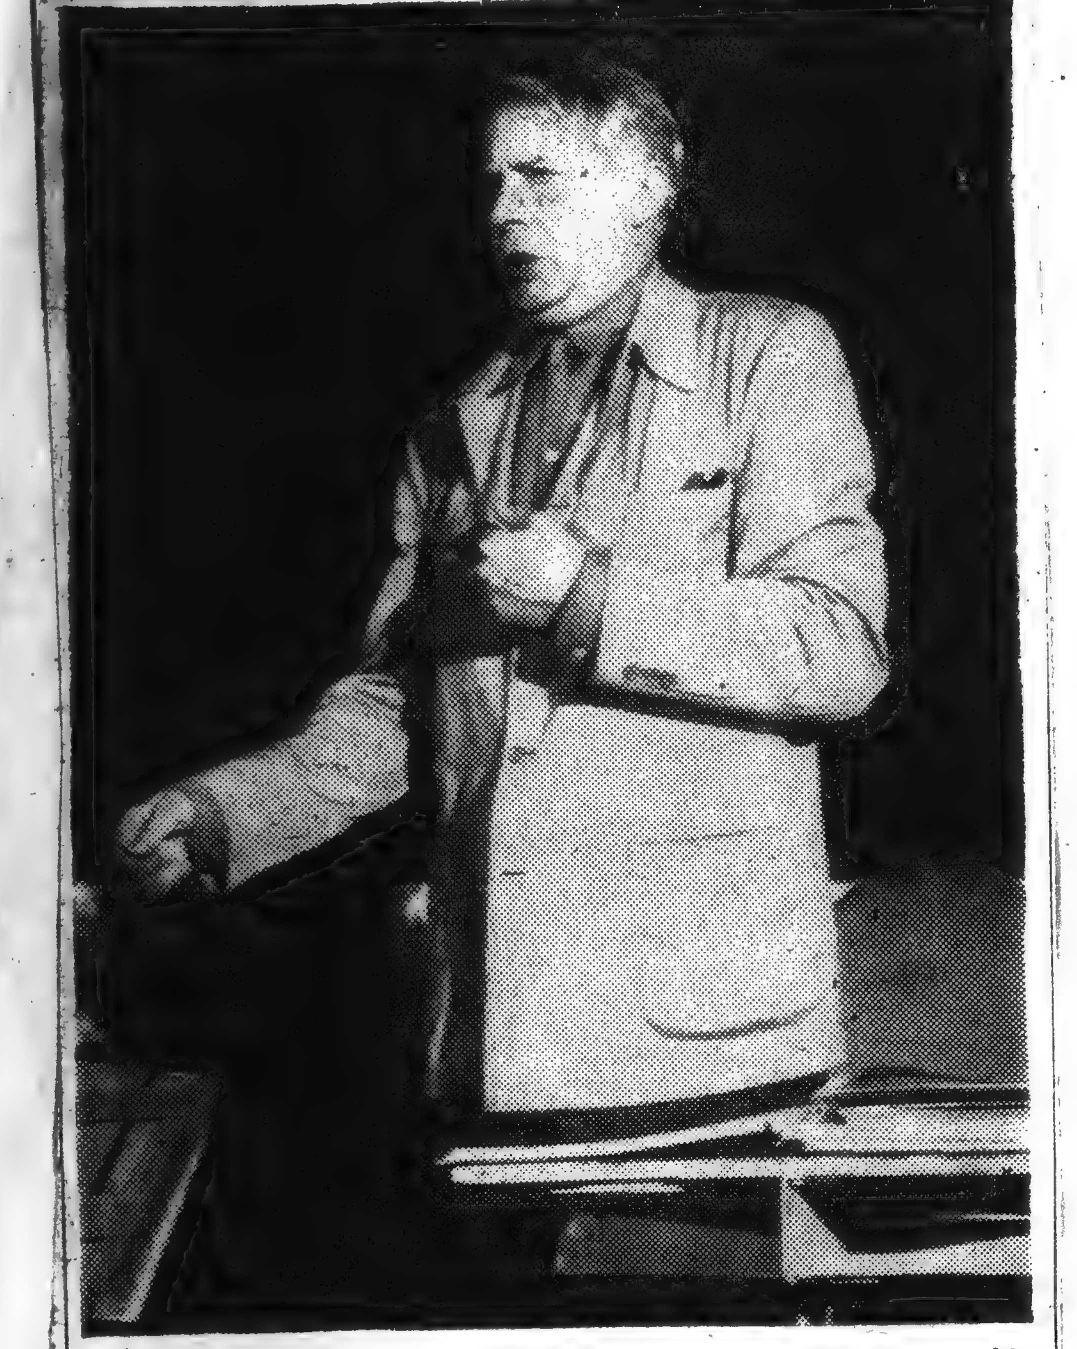
The circle voted not to make any awards in the opera or theatre music categories.

Mr. Bloch's Concerto Grosso was introduced by the Boston Symphony, under Charles Munch, on Dec. 2. His Quartet No. 3 was first played here by the Griller Quartet on Jan. 4 of last year. Mr. Avshalomoff's "Tom O'Bedlam" was introduced by the Collegiate Chorale, under Robert Shaw, on Dec. 15.

Cir. (D 103,308)

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

MAR 2 - 1954



CHARLES MUNCH, conductor of Boston Symphony, puts his all into his rehearsals. Successor to Serge Koussevitzky, Dr. Munch will conduct the Boston orchestra in the final concert of this season's Bushnell Symphony Series Mar. 8 at 8:15 p. m.

Cir. (D 8,302)

This Clipping From
GREENWICH, CONN.
TIME

MAR 3 - 1954

Tales of Tanglewood . . .

County music-lovers who think nothing of the trek to the Berkshires for the Tanglewood concerts held there every summer under the auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heartened to know that their enthusiasm is shared by many others.

According to Charles Munch, the Boston Symphony's music director, an enlarged program has been planned for July and August of this year, to meet the constantly growing popularity of these concerts, which drew a record number to Lenox in the Berkshire Hills last summer.

Twenty-four concerts have been announced for the six weeks from July 7 to August 15, including six concerts by chamber groups on Wednesday evenings, six by a chamber orchestra of Boston Symphony players on Friday evenings, six concerts by the full Orchestra in the shed on Saturday evenings, and six on Sunday afternoons.

In the course of the Shed concerts, Mr. Munch will honor the 150th anniversary season of the birth of Berlioz by conducting this composer's principal works in their complete form. Guest conductors in the Shed concerts will be Pierre Monteux, conducting two concerts, and Jean Morel and Richard Burgin, each conducting one.

Cir. (D 12,002)

This Clipping From
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

MAR 5 - 1954

Special Friends Raise Funds For Boston Orchestra

Dr. Palfrey Perkins, chairman of the Special Friends' Committee, at a meeting today of the committee which is assisting him in a campaign to raise $250,000 for the current needs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reported that 150,000 of this amount is now in hand.

By far the largest part of this total is in contributions from individuals who have become Friends of the Symphony. To date 3,698 have been enrolled, 1,090 of whom are new Friends. Many gifts in response to public, press and radio appeals, have been received. Contributions from business total $10,065.

They will continue their solicitation of special gifts in an effort to reach their goal before the Annual Meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to which all members will be invited. The meeting will be held Wednesday, March 31, at 4:00 p. m. After a short business meeting Charles Munch will lead the orchestra in a special program and the Friends will be received by the conductor, the trustee and members of the orchestra at tea immediately afterward.

Cir. (D 389,011) (S 258,545)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

MAR 2 - 1954

WORDS and MUSIC

By Harriett Johnson

Music Critics Give Bloch 2 Awards

For the first time in the history of its award giving, the Music Critics' Circle of New York voted yesterday to give two top prizes in one year to the same composer—Ernest Bloch, Swiss-born, American citizen, now residing in Agate Beach, Oregon. Bloch's Concerto Grosso, No. 2, first introduced by the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall last December, was voted the outstanding orchestral work performed during 1953. His String Quartet No. 3, introduced Jan. 4, 1953, by the Griller Quartet in Town Hall, was awarded the identical distinction in its category.

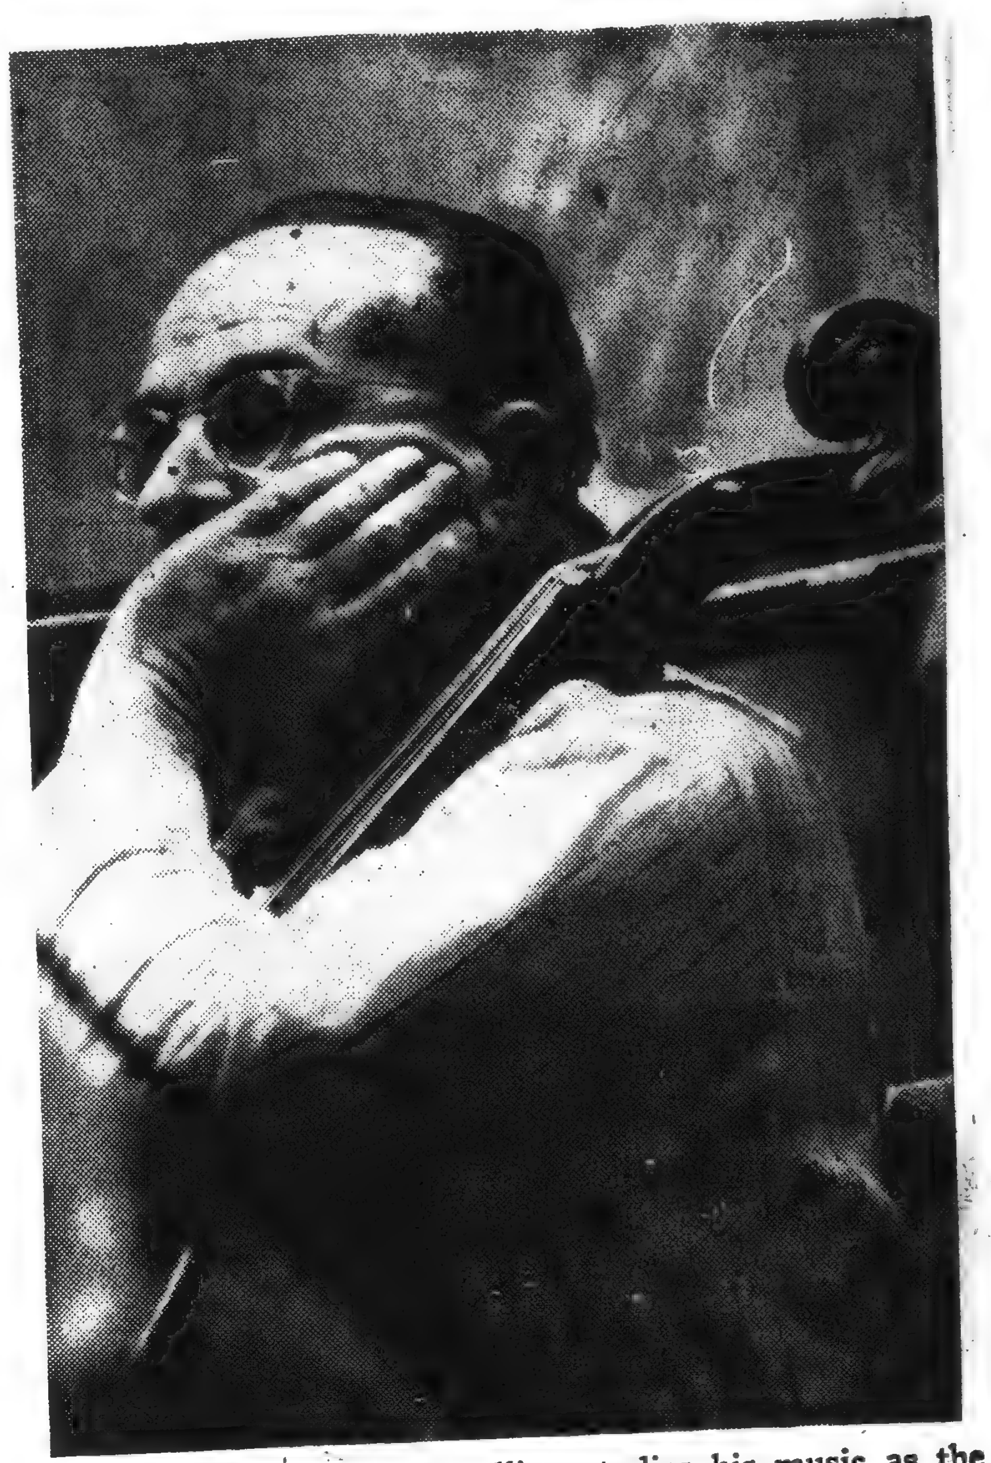
The one other citation given went to Jacob Avshalomoff for his choral work, "Tom O'Bedlam," voted the best of its kind performed during the last year. The Collegiate Chorale, Robert Shaw conducting, gave the composition its premiere Dec. 15 in Carnegie Hall. This is Avshalomoff's first award from the Circle. Bloch's Second String Quartet won the chamber music award in 1946-47.

BOSTON MASS.
GLOBE

MAR 4 - 1954

Candid Camera Shots of Boston Symphony Rehearsal

STRING BASS PLAYER Henry Portnoi turns page of music while awaiting place for his section to come in again.



LEON MARJOLLET, cellist, studies his music as the conductor explains how he wants passage played.

CONDUCTOR CHARLES MUNCH gives a slow downbeat at start of a quiet phrase for woodwinds and horns.

A crack orchestra like the Boston Symphony is a large and extremely sensitive human apparatus.

Preparing concerts requires many hours and deep concentration at rehearsals.

Now, thanks to the Open Rehearsals, the Boston public can see and hear how Conductor Charles Munch and his 100-odd players work.

But close views are something else again, and very interesting. Globe photographer Charles McCormick sat in during a morning rehearsal at Symphony Hall the other day and got these shots, using a candid camera and only the usual stage lighting.

Large orchestras are so costly to operate that they usually run deficits. The Boston Symphony is no exception, and is now engaged in a campaign to raise $250,000. They have already passed the halfway mark, it is said, but the balance has still to be contributed, which anyone may do, with thanks.

HARPIST OLIVIA LUETCKE launches into a passage and at the same time watches the baton of Mr. Munch.

FIRST TRUMPETER ROGER VOISIN, one of best in the country, reads the notes as he plays.

FIDDLERS THREE—James Nagy, seated, left; Einar Hansen, standing, and Rolland Tapley examine back of violin during rehearsal intermission. A good violinist always has a lynx eye and ear for qualities of his instrument.

OBOISTS Jean Devergie and John Holmes listen attentively to instructions from Conductor Charles Munch.

JUST PRACTISING—Orchestra is not yet assembled for rehearsal, but first oboe Ralph Gomberg, left, warms up his instrument as Doriot Anthony, seated, first flute, marks her part to remind her of an important detail.

LOUIS SPEYER, one of the world's greatest masters o the English horn, examines place in music to see if hi part corresponds exactly with notes in conductor's sco Mistakes sometimes happen!

---

rale, Robert ave the com-re Dec. 15 in is Avshalom-
rom the Circle.
String Quartet
music award

112

Cir. (D 13,151)

This Clipping From
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

MAR 3 - 1954

Music Festival Programs For Tanglewood Announced

The programs for the 24 concerts that will comprise the Berkshire Symphonic festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, for the six weeks from July 7 to Aug. 15 have been announced.

Season Lengthened

The lengthened season has been planned by Charles Munch, the music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to meet the growing popularity of the concerts which drew a record number to Lenox last summer.

The 24 concerts consist of six concerts by chamber groups on Wednesday evenings, six concerts by a chamber orchestra of Boston Symphony orchestra players on Friday evenings, six concerts by the full orchestra in the Music shed on Saturday evenings and six Sunday afternoon concerts by the full orchestra.

Guest conductors in the shed concerts will be Pierre Monteux, conducting two concerts, and Jean Morel and Richard Burgin, each conducting one concert. In the course of the shed concerts Mr. Munch will honor the 150th anniversary season of the birth of Hector Berlioz by conducting the composer's principal works in their complete form.

Opens July 10

Mr. Munch will open the shed series on Saturday, July 10, with Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust," with the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe Choral society. On Sunday afternoon, July 11, Mr. Monteux will present a Beethoven program including the overture to "Leonore," No. 3, the Piano concerto No. 5 ("Emperor") with Claudio Arrau as soloist, and the Fifth symphony.

On Saturday, July 17, in the evening, Mr. Monteux will conduct a Franck program in the shed as follows, "Le Chasseur Maudit," "Les Eolides," "Les Djinns," with Vera Franceschi as piano soloist, and the symphony in D minor.

On Sunday, July 18, Mr. Munch will conduct the afternoon program in the shed with Leo Smit as soloist in the Aaron Copland piano concerto. The program also includes Debussy's "Iberia," and Berlioz' "Fantastic" symphony.

On Saturday evening, July 24, in the shed, Jean Morel will conduct Weber's overture, "Der Freischutz," Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony, Strauss' "Don Juan" and Elgar's "Enigma Variations."

Other Concerts

On Sunday afternoon, July 25 Mr. Munch will conduct Berlioz "Beatrice and Benedict" overture and "Harold in Italy" with William Primrose as viola soloist The symphony No. 2 by Ernst Toch will also be on the program

On Saturday evening, July 31 Mr. Munch will conduct in the shed, Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" with Festival chorus and soloists On Sunday afternoon, Aug. 1, in the shed Mr. Burgin will conduct Prokofieff's "Chout," Dvorak's violin concerto with Ruth Posselt as solist, and the Sibelius symphony No. 2.

On Saturday evening, Aug. 7, in the shed Mr. Munch will conduct Gluck's "Alceste" overture, Beethoven's violin concerto with Zino Francescatti as soloist and the Brahms symphony No. 2. On Sunday afternoon, Aug. 8, Mr. Munch will conduct a Berlioz program as follows: "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, "The Royal Hunt and Storm" from "The Trojans," the "Te Deum" and "Summer Nights" for soprano and orchestra with Eleanor Steber as soloist.

The sixth week of the Shed series will feature on Saturday evening, Aug. 14, Mr. Munch conducting Wagner's "Lohengrin" prelude; Piston's Fourth symphony, Ravel's piano concerto with Nicole Henriot as soloist, and Saint-Saens Organ symphony. On Sunday afternoon, Aug. 15, Mr. Munch will conduct the Berlioz "Requiem" with festival chorus and four auxiliary orchestras to close the festival.

Friday Programs

On the six Friday evenings preceding each shed concert, except in the final week when it will be given on Thursday, the concerts will be given in the intimate theater-concert hall by an orchestra of chamber proportions. The first two weeks, July 9 and 16, Charles Munch will conduct music of Bach, including in the first the Brandenburg concertos Nos. 1, 3, 2, 6, 5, and in the second, the Cantata No. 93 and Suites Nos. 1 and 4. Only July 23, he will conduct Handel's Concerto Grosso, Op. 6, No. 4, Haydn's "Military" symphony, No. 100, and Hugh Ross will conduct Haydn's "Nelson" mass.

On July 30 Mr. Munch will conduct Roussel's "The Spider's Feast," the Ibert flute concerto with Doriot Anthony as soloist, Mozart's Serenade for Eight Winds in C minor, K. 388, and the same composer's "Paris" symphony, K. 297. On Aug. 6, Lukas Foss will conduct the complete Stravinsky ballet "Pulcinella," a piano concerto by Mozart with Seymour Lipkin as soloist, and excerpts from Mozart's "Idomeneo" with chorus and soloists. At the final concert on Thursday, Aug. 12, Jean Morel, as guest, will conduct Rossini's overture to "The Silk Ladder," Mozart's symphony in B flat, K. 319, and Straus' "Der Burger als Edelmann."

Chamber Music Programs

The series of concerts in the theater-concert hall on the six Wednesday evetnings will be devoted to music of chamber proportions. The first program on July 7 will be shared by Claudio Arrau, piano, and the Bel Arte string trio. The second on July 14 will have the Albeneri trio, the third on July 21 the Zimbler Sinfonietta, the fourth on July 28 the Griller string quartet, the fifth on Aug. 4 will have the Boston woodwind quintet and a soloist to be announced, the sixth on Aug. 11 the Kroll quartet.

HOLYOKE MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

MAR 5 - 1954

BOSTON SYMPHONY RECEIVES $150,000 TO MEET EXPENSES

The Special Friends Committee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra reports that $150,000 has been raised toward a goal of $250,000 to meet current needs of the orchestra.

To date Dr. Palfrey Perkins, Friends chairman, stated that 3698 have enrolled of which 1090 are new Friends. Solicitation continues with the deadline set as the annual meeting of the Friends on Wednesday, March 31, at 4 p. m. Charles Munch will conduct the orchestra in a special program followed by tea that day for the Friends.

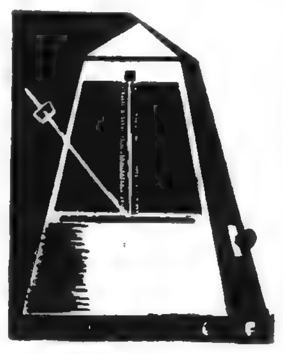
Cir. (W 370,017)

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

MAR 6 - 1954

MUSICAL EVENTS

Bartók and Kabuki



THE late Béla Bartók was a composer of rather complex music, which defies classification in any obvious technical category such as atonality. It is perhaps because of this that his music is often difficult to understand on first hearing, and seems to improve with repetition. I have always found, however, that at a certain point it seems to stop improving, and that this point is somewhat short of the standard of really great music; when one has it all figured out, Bartók's art is basically of the sort that titillates the ear and stimulates the nerves but leaves the emotional regions of the psyche untouched. I saw no reason to revise this estimate last week when, in Carnegie Hall, I listened to the Concerto for Orchestra, which was brilliantly played by the Minneapolis Symphony under Antal Dorati, on Tuesday evening, and the Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta, which was played with equal brilliance by the New York Philharmonic under Guido Cantelli, on Thursday evening. Both works (of the two, I prefer the former—mainly, I think, because it is louder and more dramatic and has a kind of propulsiveness that I find exciting) contain fascinating ingenuities of style but neither makes an impression that goes beyond the purely sensual pleasure of experiencing bizarre and colorful combinations of sound. Bartók's Violin Concerto, which was performed a few weeks ago in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony, with Pierre Monteux conducting and Tossy Spivakovsky as soloist, affects me in very much the same way. Even Mr. Monteux's perceptive conducting and Mr. Spivakovsky's impressive virtuosity failed to make anything more of the concerto than what is usually described as an "interesting" composition.

Quite aside from the Bartók works, both of last week's symphonic concerts were worthy of attention. The Minneapolis Symphony, which was making its first appearance here in six years, proved to be an extraordinarily well-drilled and competent orchestra, clearly entitled to a place among the finest organizations in the country, and its conductor, Mr. Dorati, whom I was watching for the first time, seemed to me an artist who shines to advantage in flamboyant, tense, and technically complicated music. Whether he would be similarly at ease with more serene and measured compositions, I have no way of judging. He conducted a suite of three symphonic pieces from Alban Berg's opera "Lulu" very eloquently, and I discovered, as I have in the past, that the music has compelling emotional power, despite the rather neurotic air of moody pessimism that pervades it. Mr. Cantelli, who was leading the Philharmonic for the first time this season and who is another conductor I had never seen before, appears, like Mr. Dorati, to be an expert technician and a specialist in flamboyance and high tension. I did not altogether like his performance of Brahms' First Symphony, for, though in its way it was well controlled and well proportioned, it struck me as hurried and lacking in the sort of majestic gravity that a really fine Brahms performance should have.

BOSTON MASS.
POST

MAR 6 -

Music in Review

By TUCKER KEISER

Charles Munch's greatest success last year was Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet." The work was repeated with similar results at Tanglewood last summer and in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and will undoubtedly be equally successful when it is again performed in July at the Berkshire Festival. Also, the recording was voted one of the outstanding discs of 1953. With performances following so closely upon one another, the score is beginning to reveal certain weaknesses. Even so, realizing that the idiom is amazingly advanced for 1839, the year of its composition, the listener is impressed by its historical significance if not entirely convinced that it is critically unexceptionable today.

In addition to the orchestra, "Romeo and Juliet" requires a chorus and three soloists. Yesterday, Mary Davenport sang the brief measures assigned to the contralto with affection. John McCollum made the Queen Mab scene a properly frisky divertisement. However, just as was true last year, Yi-Kwei Sze did little more than sing the notes assigned to Friar Lawerence; his voice has adequate power but little beauty of tone, and his interpretation failed to make much of the character.

The Harvard-Radcliffe Chorus maintained their unusually high choral standards and deserve special commendation for the clarity of the French diction. Mr. Munch's podium performance was restrained, giving the musicians a feeling of unaccustomed security, so that they paid more attention to tonal matters, with salutary results.

BOSTON MASS.
GLOBE

MAR 6 -

Boston Symphony Needs $100,000

Dr. Palfrey Perkins, chairman of the Special Friends' Committee which is assisting him in a campaign to raise $250,000 for current needs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reported today that $150,000 is now in hand. By far the largest part is in contributions from individuals who have become Friends of the Symphony

To date, 3698 have been enrolled, 1090 of whom are new Friends Many gifts in response to public, press and radio appeals have been received. Contributions from business total $10,065.

Solicitation of special gifts will continue in an effort to reach their goal before the annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Wednesday, March 31.

This Clipping From
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

MAR 3 - 1954

Music Festival Programs For Tanglewood Announced

The programs for the 24 concerts that will comprise the ~~Berkshire~~ Symphonic festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, for the six weeks from July 7 to Aug. 15 have been announced.

Season Lengthened

The lengthened season has been planned by Charles Munch, the music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to meet the growing popularity of the concerts which drew a record number to Lenox last summer.

The 24 concerts consist of six concerts by chamber groups on Wednesday evenings, six concerts by a chamber orchestra of Boston Symphony orchestra players on Friday evenings, six concerts by the full orchestra in the Music shed on Saturday evenings and six Sunday afternoon concerts by the full orchestra.

Guest conductors in the shed concerts will be Pierre Monteux, conducting two concerts, and Jean Morel and Richard Burgin, each conducting one concert. In the course of the shed concerts Mr. Munch will honor the 150th anniversary season of the birth of Hector Berlioz by conducting the composer's principal works in their complete form.

Opens July 10

Mr. Munch will open the shed series on Saturday, July 10, with Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust," with the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe Choral society. On Sunday afternoon, July 11, Mr. Monteux will present a Beethoven program including the overture to "Leonore," No. 3, the Piano concerto No. 5 ("Emperor") with Claudio Arrau as soloist, and the Fifth symphony.

On Saturday, July 17, in the evening, Mr. Monteux will conduct a Franck program in the shed as follows, "Le Chasseur Maudit," "Les Eolides," "Les Djinns," with Vera Franceschi as piano soloist, and the symphony in D minor.

On Sunday, July 18, Mr. Munch will conduct the afternoon program in the shed with Leo Smit as soloist in the Aaron Copland piano concerto. The program also includes Debussy's "Iberia," and Berlioz' "Fantastic" symphony.

On Saturday evening, July 24, in the shed, Jean Morel will conduct Weber's overture, "Der Freischutz," Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony, Strauss' "Don Juan" and Elgar's "Enigma Variations."

Other Concerts

On Sunday afternoon, July 25 Mr. Munch will conduct Berlioz "Beatrice and Benedict" overture and "Harold in Italy" with William Primrose as viola soloist The symphony No. 2 by Ernst Toch will also be on the program

On Saturday evening, July 31 Mr. Munch will conduct in the shed, Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" with Festival chorus and soloists On Sunday afternoon, Aug. 1, in the shed Mr. Burgin will conduct Prokofieff's "Chout," Dvorak's violin concerto with Ruth Posselt as solist, and the Sibelius symphony No. 2.

On Saturday evening, Aug. 7 in the shed Mr. Munch will conduct Gluck's "Alceste" overture, Beethoven's violin concerto with Zino Francescatti as soloist and the Brahms symphony No. 2. On Sunday afternoon, Aug. 8, Mr. Munch will conduct a Berlioz program as follows: "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, "The Royal Hunt and Storm" from "The Trojans," the "Te Deum" and "Summer Nights" for soprano and orchestra with Eleanor Steber as soloist.

The sixth week of the Shed series will feature on Saturday evening, Aug. 14, Mr. Munch conducting Wagner's "Lohengrin" prelude; Piston's Fourth symphony, Ravel's piano concerto with Nicole Henriot as soloist, and Saint-Saens Organ symphony. On Sunday afternoon, Aug. 15, Mr. Munch will conduct the Berlioz "Requiem" with festival chorus and four auxiliary orchestras to close the festival.

Friday Programs

On the six Friday evenings preceding each shed concert, except in the final week when it will be given on Thursday, the concerts will be given in the intimate theater-concert hall by an orchestra of chamber proportions. The first two weeks, July 9 and 16, Charles Munch will conduct music of Bach, including in the first the Brandenburg concertos Nos. 1, 3, 2, 6, 5, and in the second, the Cantata No. 93 and Suites Nos. 1 and 4. Only July 23, he will conduct Handel's Concerto Grosso, Op. 6, No. 4, Haydn's "Military" symphony, No. 100, and Hugh Ross will conduct Haydn's "Nelson" mass.

On July 30 Mr. Munch will conduct Roussel's "The Spider's Feast," the Ibert flute concerto with Doriot Anthony as soloist, Mozart's Serenade for Eight Winds in C minor, K. 388, and the same composer's "Paris" symphony, K. 297. On Aug. 6, Lukas Foss will conduct the complete Stravinsky ballet "Pulcinella," a piano concerto by Mozart with Seymour Lipkin as soloist, and excerpts from Mozart's "Idomeneo" with chorus and soloists. At the final concert on Thursday, Aug. 12, Jean Morel, as guest, will conduct Rossini's overture to "The Silk Ladder," Mozart's symphony in B flat, K. 319, and Straus' "Der Burger als Edelmann."

Chamber Music Programs

The series of concerts in the theater-concert hall on the six Wednesday evetnings will be devoted to music of chamber proportions. The first program on July 7 will be shared by Claudio Arrau, piano, and the Bel Arte string trio. The second on July 14 will have the Albeneri trio, the third on July 21 the Zimbler Sinfonietta, the fourth on July 28 the Griller string quartet, the fifth on Aug. 4 will have the Boston woodwind quintet and a soloist to be announced, the sixth on Aug. 11 the Kroll quartet.

HOLYOKE MASS
TRANSCRIPT

MAR 5 - 1954

BOSTON SYMPHONY RECEIVES $150,000 TO MEET EXPENSES

The Special Friends Committee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra reports that $150,000 has been raised toward a goal of $250,000 to meet current needs of the orchestra.

To date Dr. Palfrey Perkins, Friends chairman, stated that 3698 have enrolled of which 1090 are new Friends. Solicitation continues with the deadline set as the annual meeting of the Friends on Wednesday, March 31, at 4 p. m. Charles Munch will conduct the orchestra in a special program followed by tea that day for the Friends.

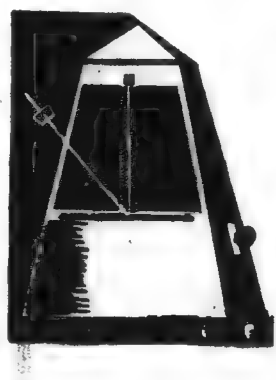
Cir. (W 370,017)

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

MAR 6 - 1954

MUSICAL EVENTS

Bartók and Kabuki



THE late Béla Bartók was a composer of rather complex music, which defies classification in any obvious technical category such as atonality. It is perhaps because of this that his music is often difficult to understand on first hearing, and seems to improve with repetition. I have always found, however, that at a certain point it seems to stop improving, and that this point is somewhat short of the standard of really great music; when one has it all figured out, Bartók's art is basically of the sort that titillates the ear and stimulates the nerves but leaves the emotional regions of the psyche untouched. I saw no reason to revise this estimate last week when, in Carnegie Hall, I listened to the Concerto for Orchestra, which was brilliantly played by the Minneapolis Symphony under Antal Dorati, on Tuesday evening, and the Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta, which was played with equal brilliance by the New York Philharmonic under Guido Cantelli, on Thursday evening. Both works (of the two, I prefer the former—mainly, I think, because it is louder and more dramatic and has a kind of propulsiveness that I find exciting) contain fascinating ingenuities of style but neither makes an impression that goes beyond the purely sensual pleasure of experiencing bizarre and colorful combinations of sound. Bartók's Violin Concerto, which was performed a few weeks ago in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony, with Pierre Monteux conducting and Tossy Spivakovsky as soloist, affects me in very much the same way. Even Mr. Monteux's perceptive conducting and Mr. Spivakovsky's impressive virtuosity failed to make anything more of the concerto than what is usually described as an "interesting" composition.

Quite aside from the Bartók works, both of last week's symphonic concerts were worthy of attention. The Minneapolis Symphony, which was making its first appearance here in six years, proved to be an extraordinarily well-drilled and competent orchestra, clearly entitled to a place among the finest organizations in the country, and its conductor, Mr. Dorati, whom I was watching for the first time, seemed to me an artist who shines to advantage in flamboyant, tense, and technically complicated music. Whether he would be similarly at ease with more serene and measured compositions, I have no way of judging. He conducted a suite of three symphonic pieces from Alban Berg's opera "Lulu" very eloquently, and I discovered, as I have in the past, that the music has compelling emotional power, despite the rather neurotic air of moody pessimism that pervades it. Mr. Cantelli, who was leading the Philharmonic for the first time this season and who is another conductor I had never seen before, appears, like Mr. Dorati, to be an expert technician and a specialist in flamboyance and high tension. I did not altogether like his performance of Brahms' First Symphony, for, though in its way it was well controlled and well proportioned, it struck me as hurried and lacking in the sort of majestic gravity that a really fine Brahms performance should have.

BOSTON MASS.
POST

MAR 6 - 1954

Music in Review

By TUCKER KEISER

Charles Munch's greatest success last year was Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet." The work was repeated with similar results at Tanglewood last summer and in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, and will undoubtedly be equally successful when it is again performed in July at the Berkshire Festival. Also, the recording was voted one of the outstanding discs of 1953. With performances following so closely upon one another, the score is beginning to reveal certain weaknesses. Even so, realizing that the idiom is amazingly advanced for 1839, the year of its composition, the listener is impressed by its historical significance if not entirely convinced that it is critically unexceptionable today.

In addition to the orchestra, "Romeo and Juliet" requires a chorus and three soloists. Yesterday, Mary Davenport sang the brief measures assigned to the contralto with affection. John McCollum made the Queen Mab scene a properly frisky divertisement. However, just as was true last year, Yi-Kwei Sze did little more than sing the notes assigned to Friar Lawerence; his voice has adequate power but little beauty of tone, and his interpretation failed to make much of the character.

The Harvard-Radcliffe Chorus maintained their unusually high choral standards and deserve special commendation for the clarity of the French diction. Mr Munch's podium performance was restrained, giving the musicians a feeling of unaccustomed security, so that they paid more attention to tonal matters, with salutary results.

BOSTON MASS.
GLOBE

MAR 6 - 1954

Boston Symphony Needs $100,000

Dr. Palfrey Perkins, chairman of the Special Friends' Committee, which is assisting him in a campaign to raise $250,000 for current needs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reported today that $150,000 is now in hand. By far the largest part is in contributions from individuals who have become Friends of the Symphony.

To date, 3698 have been enrolled, 1090 of whom are new Friends. Many gifts in response to public, press and radio appeals have been received. Contributions from business total $10,065.

Solicitation of special gifts will continue in an effort to reach their goal before the annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Wednesday, March 31.

BOSTON MASS.
HERALD

MAR 6 - 1954

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, gave the 18th concert of the 73rd season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, the entire performance given over to Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet." The soloists were Mary Davenport, contralto; John McCollum, tenor; and Yi-Kwei-Sze, bass. The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society were assisting artists; G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor.

By RUDOLPH ELIE

Once again Charles Munch has scored as the master interpreter of Hector Berlioz: "Romeo and Juliet" yesterday afternoon was in every way beautiful, in every way enchanting.

It was last year, too, when he first presented us with the complete version of this work. But times and men change, and Mr. Minch's approach this season was much in contrast to his approach last season.

The difference was one of spirit; today Mr. Munch, having lived with this score through the labors and the excitements of preparing it for its debut in Boston as well as through the crucible of the recording session, goes deeper into the heart of the matter. Last season his performance was more fiery, more mercurial, more highly keyed; he seemed to see the characters and the crowds more vividly.

Poetic Eloquence

This season there was a deeper quality in his approach. There was of course all the excitement of the throng scenes and all the gayety and elan of the ball scene, but the overall atmosphere was more subdued, more reflective, even more wistful and melancholy. It was more a quest for an unnattainable romantic evocation than a pictorial delineation of romantic events, and it thus emerged with even more poetic eloquence than before.

That poetic eloquence is everywhere. What could be more eloquent, or more magical, than the incomparable obbligato to the second verse of the strophes for contralto that appears in the cellos? Nowhere in all music do the cellos speak more beautifully than they do here as the singer tells of the lovers' vows. The Queen Mab scherzo, as Lang put it in a memorable phrase, is incomparable and unforgettable, living in the memory of everyone as music of eternal freshness, but these moments fall upon the ears with every passing phrase, every accent, every lyric expression. And Mr. Munch seems not only to hear every one but to feel them too. His reading of the work is now more subdued, more calm, more controlled, more discriminating, but he brings out nuances that reveal a new world of romantic drama to this exquisite work of art.

The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society could hardly have conveyed the choral sections of "Romeo" with more finish or more lustrous tone quality than it did on this occasion. As in "The Damnation of Faust," its role is that of observer, commentator and partisan, now describing the nature of events to come, again portraying the brawling Capulets and Montagues. Yet so perfectly is it trained, so flexible its response, and so capable of tonal subtleties it is, that it becomes as integral to the score as the orchestra itself; here is no mere division of orchestral and choral sections, but complete musical entity. Its command of French enunciation and accent in ensemble is almost more astonishing than its command of choral expressivity and tone, too, and beside it the individual soloists' enunciation was in marked contrast. I wonder if a French chorus would ever take the trouble to make English quite so perfect? Anyway, for G. Wallace Woodworth, may the Lord be eternally praised!

Imposing Dimension

Although Yi-Kwei-Sze sang the role of the Friar Laurence last season it may be said he was far and away more effective in this performance. He caught the dominating character of the Friar here to give him more imposing dimension and his voice was fuller, richer, more impressive — and more expressive as well. Mary Davenport, contralto, was impressive, too, being big and rich and flexible though occasionally wanting in a firm focus of tone, while John McCollum, whose role is as difficult as it is thankless for a solo tenor, articulated the Queen Mab scene with great agility against the equally agile responses of the male chorus.

All in all, then, this was another memorable occasion and one that found the orchestra itself at the peak of its capacity to respond with tone colors and textures of infinite variety, all the while with matchless technical facility. The orchestra takes this work to New York and Washington next week, returning on March 19 to bring out a new work by Gardner Read (the composer conducting) as well as a Rossini overture and Mahler's Fourth under Richard Burgin.

RCH 6, 1954 Art—Music—Theater 7

C. S. Monitor

ınd Juliet' at Symphony

Munch Conducts Berlioz Masterwork

By Harold Rogers

If the Boston Symphony programs have been heavily weighted in favor of Berlioz during these past three weeks, little justification is needed since Berlioz wrote great music and Charles Munch plays it with special ardor.

There are reasons, however, for this accent on Berlioz, one of them being that the Berlioz programs this winter in Boston and during the summer at Tanglewood are in commemoration of the 150th anniversary of the composer's birth. Of course, last year — 1953 — was the anniversary year; but since music seasons have a way of straddling the juncture of two years, we can acceed that this, too, is part of the Berlioz anniversary.

We therefore needn't feel too imposed upon if we are given the Berlioz "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony two seasons running. Masterpieces like this can bear repeating, especially when performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Harvard Glee Club, and the Radcliffe Choral Society, plus a good set of soloists.

A year ago Mr. Munch's performance of the "Romeo and Juliet" called forth an ovation. When the work was repeated yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, the polite applause may not have indicated that it was a lesser performance. It may have been, but more than likely the listeners are feeling the weight of series of long works, having heard in succession the Berlioz "Damnation of Faust," the Liszt "Faust" Symphony, and the Berlioz "Romeo and Juliet." They might be too weary to applaud very hard.

But there is also another reason why Mr. Munch has programmed the "Romeo and Juliet" this week end. He is whipping it into shape for the orchestra's tour next week. The work will be heard twice in New York and once in Washington.

* * *

Last season the soloists were Leslie Chabay, tenor, Margaret Roggero, contralto, and Yi-Kwei Sze, bass. For the present performances only Mr. Yi-Kwei is making a second appearance. Again he displayed a basso that is unusually susceptible to the colors and nuances of French music.

It is not illogical that a Chinese can sing French music well. Though the musical idioms of the French and the Chinese are different in sound, they do have much in common as to civilized refinements. Mr. Yi-Kwei sang excellently yesterday, and his final sermon as Père Laurence was especially moving.

Mary Davenport's contralto, though shaded to the darker side, had a mellow, liquid flow that was pleasing to listen to. Her enunciation, however, was not too carefully delineated. John McCollum's brief tenor solo in the Scherzetto was adroitly done in deft pianissimo.

* * *

Mr. Munch was at his best yesterday in the more intensely emotional portions—the music of impassioned longing and aspiration when Romeo is alone in the garden, for instance, or for the wonderful mixture of moonlight and young love that we find in Part III.

G. Wallace Woodworth has again trained his choral forces to perfection. It will be a privilege for these undergraduate singers to appear in the New York and Washington performances, and Boston will be privileged to have them sing there.

When the orchestra returns for the Symphony Hall concerts on March 19 and 20, Richard Burgin will conduct Rossini's Overture to "La Gazza Ladra" and the Mahler Fourth Symphony, for which Anne English will be the soprano soloist. "The Temptation of St. Anthony," a Dance Symphony by Gardner Read of Boston, will have its first Boston performance under the direction of the composer.

BOSTON MASS.
GLOBE

MAR 6 - 1954

MUSIC

'Romeo and Juliet' Again a Delight at Symphony

Eighteenth program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch music director, in the Friday afternoon—Saturday evening series, at Symphony Hall. The program consisted of Berlioz' Dramatic Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," presented complete. The choruses were the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, prepared by G. Wallace Woodworth. The soloists were Mary Davenport, contralto; John McCollum, tenor, and Yi-Kwei-Sze, bass.

By CYRUS DURGIN

Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony is again a delight at the Symphony concerts this week, as it was a little more than a year ago. The soloists are better balanced and the Harvard and Radcliffe singers, if memory is correct, are also better.

I suspect, too, that the performance tonight will be free of the harshness with which the strings launched into the introduction yesterday afternoon. Truth to tell, I never before heard these Boston Symphony sections quite so tense and uncertain. But for the remainder of the performance, apart from a certain heaviness in the "Queen Mab" scherzo, all went well; the music was poetry in excelsis, and the sound gorgeous and glowing.

It is, I think, sufficient tribute to the genius of Berlioz and his brilliant interpreter, Charles Munch, that though we have had the complete "Damnation of Faust" and "Romeo and Juliet" within two weeks there has been no imitation of surfeit. (For myself, I could look forward to "Harold in Italy" next week, if that were scheduled, which it is not!) The ultimate test of anything not sheerly ephemeral is its wearing qualities, and Berlioz-from-Munch retains its freshness and sheen.

To be sure, all of "Romeo and Juliet" may not share the passion, the grandeur and the loveliness of its finest (which is to say, orchestral) pages. The choral portions, for all their skill and originality, are not all on the same level of expressive power, and the part of Friar Laurence, like most musical moralists from King Marke and Gurnemanz to the elder Germont and old Arkel, compels interested attention rather than fascination. But, all in all, "Romeo and Juliet" is a grand and sweeping, a poetic and ardent work of art, and we are fortunate indeed to be able to hear it twice in 13 months.

Yi-Kwei-Sze, the Chinese bass, once again made a deep impression with his fine vocal resonance, the intelligence and the dramatic force of his singing. He certainly makes the most of the exhorting Friar Laurence. Miss Davenport, with her rich, darkly-colored contralto, dealt admirably with her part even if her enunciation was not always clear. Mr. McCollum, on the other hand, with his quality of voice and diction which the Italians call "right on the teeth," made every word understandable, and projected ringing sonorities as well. He has, too, just the right weight and color of voice for the music.

The Harvard and Radcliffe choruses, as aforesaid, were precise and rhythmically vital. Indeed, all concerned richly deserved the final ovation in which, deservedly, Mr. Woodworth was brought out to share.

114

THE MUSIC BOX

NBC to telecast opera based on Shakespeare

By IRVING KOLODIN

Are you an American composer with an opera you'd like to see produced on television? Chances of its being accepted seem to be better if you are of Italian descent and have grown up in Philadelphia. It may be no more than coincidence, but it applies to Vittorio Giannini, whose setting of "The Taming of the Shrew" will be favored by NBC-TV Opera Theater next week, as it did to Gian-Carlo Menotti o fthe well-remembered "Amahl" and other works.

Unlike Menotti, who was born in Italy and went to Philadelphia for studies at the Curtis Institute with Rosario Scalero, Giannini is a native Philadelphian whose father was a well-known tenor earlier in the century. (Another offspring was the soprano Dusolina Giannini, who had a considerable career in European opera houses as well as at the Met.) Giannini has devoted most of his mature life to writing operas, of which a setting of Hawthorne's "The Scarlet Letter" had a successful production abroad. Another opera, "Lucrezia," was produced in Munich before the war, and he wrote one of the earliest radio operas ("Beauty and the Beast") on commission from CBS in 1938.

* * *

TO SAY IT IS far from easy to persuade an American theater to underwrite the production of a native opera is hardly the truth; it would be more exact to say that it is next to impossible. So, for the privilege of hearing "The Taming of the Shrew" performed Giannini accepted an offer in 1953 from the Cincinnati Symphony, under Thor Johnson, to produce his work in concert form. This yielded not merely the satisfaction for which any composer yearns—to hear his work come to life—but also the more practical asset of a recording, from which much more about the sound of the score can be learned than from the printed page.

Now that NBC has allotted an hour and a half of its TV time to this project, Giannini will have at least some pictorial evidences of his drama to show in future efforts to have his work produced on the stage, and, if he can acquire a kinescope, two-thirds of the total work in actual sequence. Moreover, of course, he will have had the experience of seeing and hearing his work "played" (in the dramatic sense), and can measure audience reaction, both lay and professional. If the impact should be strong enough, the chance of a full-scale production in the New York City Center or the Metropolitan Opera will be considerably enhanced.

* * *

NEEDLESS TO SAY, Giannini chose wisely in selecting Shakespeare as a collaborator, and there is every reason to believe that NBC-TV has chosen wisely in casting John Raitt to be Petruchio. Of lesser repute are Suzanne Yeager, who sings Katherine, and young Sonya Stollin, the Bianca, who was seen last year on NBC-TV's production of Martinu's "Comedy on the Bridge."

To judge from the audience response to such previous ventures as Britten's "Billy Budd," Leonard Bernstein's "Trouble in Tahiti," Menotti's several works, and the Martinu score, there is a lively interest in the creations of living composers in this medium. Perhaps it will be not too long before we shall be speaking of more creations "for" this medium. Certainly this interest in Giannini will do much for him while he is waiting for a full-dress hearing. live.

* * *

SOMETHING MORE THAN lip service to the memory of Hector Berlioz (who was born 150 years ago) will be offered at Tanglewood this summer by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch. Beginning with the concert of Saturday night, July 10, when he will conduct the "Damnation of Faust" with the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, Munch will include a major Berlioz work on each week's program: the "Fantastique" on July 18, "Harold in Italy" (with William Primrose as viola soloist) on the 25th, "Romeo and Juliet" with chorus and soloists on August 1, a full Berlioz program including the "Te Deum" and "Nuits d'Etes" (with Eleanor Steber) on August 8, and, as climax, the "Requiem" on August 15.

Suzanne Yeager
Sings in 'Shrew'

* * *

JAN KIEPURA, who has exceeded Shakespeare's specification relative to the seven ages of man, prefaced a recent New York appearance with his wife, Marta Eggerth, by saying, "A concert should be like a party in your own living room. The audience are your guests." I wonder how cordial the Polish tenor would be to them if they hadn't paid their way in at the box office.

* * *

TEXAS WELCOMED a new figure in its musical experience last week when Sir Ernest MacMillan, conductor of the Toronto Antonio as guest director of its symphony orchestra. His interesting program included the Fifth Symphony of Schubert, and the first performance in San Antonio of Vaughan Williams' "A London Symphony."

Cir. (D 178,621) (S 246,284)

This Clipping From
NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER

MAR 7 - 1954

Cir. (D 98,860)

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

MAR 7 - 1954

$150,000 Contributed For Boston Symphony

Boston, Mar. 5—Dr. Palfrey Perkins chairman of Special Friends'' Committee, at a meeting today of the committee which is assisting him in a campaign to raise $250,000 for the current needs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, reported that $150,000 of this amount is now in hand.

By far the largest part of this total is in contributions from individuals who have become Friends of the Symphony. To date 3698 have been enrolled, 1090 of whom are new friends. Many gifts in response to public, press and radio appeals, have been received. Contributions from business total $10,065.

BOSTON MASS.
HERALD

MA[illegible]4

$150,000 Raised For Symphony Orchestra so Far

The campaign to raise $250,000 for the Boston Symphony Orchestra reached the $150,000 level yesterday, according to Dr. Palfrey Perkins, chairman of the Special Friends' Committee.

Reporting that the largest part of the total are gifts from individuals. Dr. Palfrey said that of the 3,698 enrolled in the drive, 1,090 are new contributors. Gifts from business total $10,065.

The campaign will continue in an effort to reach the set goal before the annual meeting of the Frends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at 4 P. M. March 31, to which all contributors are invited. A special concert will be given by the orchestra under Charles Munch, who with the musicians and trustees will receive the group at tea.

Cir. (D 66,159) (S 111,148)

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

MAR 7 - 1954

Doriot Anthony Flute Soloist With Boston Symphony

Doriot Anthony, one of this country's outstanding flutists, will be heard as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Monday evening in the Bushnell Memorial. Miss Anthony will play the solo parts of the Jacques Ibert "Concerto for Flute and Orchestra," written in 1934 by the contemporary French composer and never previously performed in a Bushnell Symphony Series concert.

Miss Anthony was born in Streator, Ill. Her first teacher was her mother, a professional flutist, and she subsequently studied under a number of leading American masters of the instrument. She played in the National Symphony in Washington for two years, later in the Los Angeles Philharmonic and as first flute in the Hollywood Bowl Orchestra. She joined the Boston Symphony as first flute late in 1952.

In addition to Ibert's work, the following other compositions will make up Monday's program: Mozart's Divertimento in D Major for Strings; three excerpts from the Berlioz dramatic symphony "Romeo and Juliet"; Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Second Suite. A limited number of seats are available for the concert at the Bushnell box office.

BOSTON MASS
POST

MAR 8 - 1954

Music in Review

By TUCKER KEISER

Sara Locke, who made her Jordan Hall debut yesterday afternoon, is a pianist who brings to her art considerable intelligence. Having analyzed her own temperament, she has decided that her forte is objectivity. Her program took excellent advantage of her ability to play with clarity and authority.

Three large pieces provided the major part of the concert. Irving Fine's "Music for Piano" received its first performance. This five-movement suite is an interesting addition to the repertory, employing a vast range of pianistic sonorities without ever becoming thick-textured, subtle rhythmic contrasts, and rapidly shifting tonal centers. It is never very moving, but it was not intended to be. Too frequently music of this type is fun to play but not particularly interesting to listen to; however, Mr. Fine's new piece is also fun to hear.

Prokofieff's Sonata No. 3, essentially a flashy work, received a controlled and tasteful performance, and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" possessed strength, movement, and color.

Miss Locke's stage manner is both gracious and businesslike.

In Symphony Hall, at the same time, the New England Preparatory School Music Festival Chorus was presenting its annual concert. These young singers from the Beaver Country Day School, Dana Hall School, Governor Dummer Academy, Groton School, Milton Academy, Phillips Exeter Academy, Walnut Hill School, and the Windsor School were accompanied by members of the Boston Symphony; Wilfrid Pelletier was the conductor, and the soloists were Rose Bampton, soprano; Ernest McChesney, tenor; Denis Harbour, bass, and Edward Gammons, organist.

Two choruses by Heinrich Schutz opened the program and the concert continued with portions of Handel's "Messiah." I was sorry that I could not hear the whole concert, for Mr. Pelletier has a special gift in leading teen-age choristers.

These young singers have an unusual and beautiful tone; the sopranos and altos retain childish purity of sound and the tenors and basses have not yet acquired the weightier adult color.

The aria, "He was despised," here sung by all the altos, was as affecting a performance as I have ever heard.

Cir. (D 226,101) (S 261,386)

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

MAR 7 - 1954

Mary Davenport, contralto, who will sing the part of Juliet Thursday in the Boston Symphony's production of the Berlioz symphony based on the Shakespeare play.

Cir. (D 187,555) (S 192,261)

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
MAR 7 - 1954

Mary Davenport, contralto, and Yi-kwei Sze, bass-baritone, will be among the soloists for the Berlioz "Romeo and Juliet," to be presented by the Boston Symphony Thursday in Constitution Hall under Charles Munch.

Cir. (D 103,308)

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

MAR 8 - 1954

'Damnation of Faust' at Symphony Hall

By FEROL AUSTEN
Special to The Hartford Times

Boston — In keeping with Charles Munch's emphasis on the music of Berlioz this year, we were given a rare treat in Symphony Hall last Friday afternoon — "The Damnation of Faust" complete with chorus, orchestra, and soloists.

It was a mammoth undertaking, shared by the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and soloists Suzanne Danco, David Poleri, Martial Singher, Donald Gramm and Henry Boatwright — and, of course, conductor Munch who molded all these individual forces together to form a memorable, artistic achievement.

* * *

THERE HAVE BEEN many "Faust"'s — Gounod's is the only one that has really stood the test of time — but there are none like Berlioz's. It's easy to see why Berlioz was considered a revolutionary in his day. His work is explosive, bursting with originality and imagination. What unbelievable power he had over an orchestra — what a spell he was able to cast through the magic of his orchestrations!

Moreover, it is inconceivable that anyone conducts Berlioz with as much brilliance and devotion as Charles Munch. He filed down some of the rough edges and then pulled out all the stops.

However, this concert was a little matter of too much of the same thing, for Mr. Munch again presented Bostonians with more "Faust" music — Wagner's "Faust" Overture, and Liszt's "A Faust Symphony". Now perhaps we can go on to the next letter of the alphabet. The Overture was palatable, but the Liszt just simply went on and on and on.

Squashed between these two bits of ball-and-chain music was the Boston premiere of Nicolas Lopatnikoffs Divertimento for Orchestra, Opus 34. Alas — it was presented with the timing of a singing commercial between two dramatic acts. Despite these apparent errors in programing, the Divertimento received felicitous treatment and more than justified the work put in on it. It is a light, pleasant work with some interesting underground qualities in rhythm and harmony — a sort of musical lollipop. Served up as it was, though, flanked by onions on either side, it was merely episodic.

* * *

